By this time it had become evident that Japan was at the end of her rope and that, even without the use of the atomic bomb, Russian help was no longer needed. Mr. Truman thus found himself in the position of having to carry out what must have seemed to him an extremely bad bargain. Nevertheless, the Anglo-American negotiators at Potsdam not only loyally applied the Yalta Agreement to Germany but permitted an even greater annexation of German territory by Russia and Poland than had been contemplated. In addition, they made the fatal mistake of leaving Germany's Western frontier unsettled, thereby arousing French fears of a German-controlled Ruhr arsenal. To cap the climax, they admitted the French to equal partnership in the four-power management of Germany without securing French adherence to the Potsdam Agreement. The result was that the execution of the Potsdam Agreement was blocked from the very start—and not, in the first instance, by the Russians, but by French insistence that it be held in abeyance until the question of the Franco-German frontier could be settled.

I submit that these facts of recent history add up to a major contributing cause in the present crisis. Not only do they find no recognition in the current bipartisan analysis. They were actually distorted by the President's claim on March 14, 1948, that: "The agreements reached, though imperfect, could have provided the basis for a just and honorable peace, if they had been kept. But they were not kept. They were ignored and violated by one nation."

Surely any analysis is worse than useless which does not recognize that it was precisely the nature of the agreements reached between Russia and the West which destroyed the basis for a just peace. Surely any analysis is worse than useless which does not recognize that both sides have violated these agreements.

Soviet Sins Re-examined.

If it be accepted that the socio-economic revolution, the technological revolution, the polarization of power, and the wartime agreements are major contributing causes of the world crisis, the dangerous futility of attempting to load the blame upon any one scapegoat becomes apparent. It also then becomes possible to examine the charges against any putative scapegoat in the light of the greater objectivity provided by the context.

It is true that the Soviet Union has failed to cooperate in making the peace. It is true that the Soviet Union has violated agreements. It is true that the Soviet Union has obstructed the work of the United Nations. But it is glaringly untrue to assert that the Soviet Union alone has been guilty on these counts.

There can be no doubt whatsoever that the Soviet Union has exploited the socio-economic revolution of our times in order to propagate its communist doctrine. But—to a lesser extent—is it not also true that the United States has exploited the same conditions to propagate its doctrine of free enterprise capitalism?

There can be no doubt whatsoever that the Soviet Union has ruthlessly exploited the existing condition of international anarchy to push forward wherever possible not only the Russian frontiers but the frontiers of Soviet influence. But have not we, too—though less ruthlessly—pushed forward the frontiers of our influence? We have not annexed territory nor created satellites in the Soviet manner, but surely we have made Greece, Turkey and Italy into something less than independent nations, and Japan into an American outpost.

We may think that we have done these things because the Russians did them first. The Russians may think the same in reverse. The facts of our respective actions remain unaltered. Some of these facts are not yet clear. One question, which remains for future historians to decide, is whether or not—apart from conscious motivation—our use of the first atomic bombs against Japan was actually the opening move in a post-war power-struggle against the Soviet Union. Mr. P. M. S. Blackett, an eminent British scientist, who was advisor to the Royal Navy during the war, comes—after a careful sifting of evidence—to the flat conclusion that "the dropping of the atomic bombs was not so much the last military act of the Second World War as the first act of the cold diplomatic war with Russia now in progress." One can accept the undoubted sincerity of Secretary Stimson's statement that the bombs were used to shorten the war and save lives, and yet also recognize the fact that the use of the bombs at that precise moment in history did actually deny to the Soviet Union any legitimate claim to a major share in the victory over Japan, thereby establishing the post-war supremacy of the United States in the Far East. Was this the opening move? Or had the cold war already begun?

Whichever way the question is answered, the facts of Soviet action and the facts of American action remain. Any analysis—if it is to serve as the basis for a new constructive policy—will fail of its purpose so long as it ignores facts and proceeds on the basis of self-justification. The only analysis which can serve as the foundation for a new American policy is one which seeks the truth and not a rationalization of past action or present prejudice.

III.

A REVISED POLICY.

Aims.

What conclusions emerge from this reconsideration of the problem we face? What should be the positive aims of our foreign policy? What fears are justified, and what negative counter-measures should be embodied in our policy to insure against actually existing dangers?

The two broad positive aims of our policy should be:

First: to help make "a just and honorable" peace settlement.

Second: to help devise the means of preserving the peace, once a just and honorable settlement is made.

These two aims cannot be undertaken in chronological sequence. They interlock and require simultaneous parallel effort. It is obvious that the peace cannot be preserved until it has been firmly established. It is less obvious, but equally true, that the peace cannot be made until there is in sight a means of preserving it.

Reverse Emphasis.

Let us consider first how the United States could more effectively help toward making an equitable peace settlement.

If there is any validity to the revised analysis which I have suggested, it seems clear that the greatest contribution the United States could theoretically make would be to reverse the emphasis at present placed upon the two conflicting elements in its policy. That is to say, the greatest contribution the United States could make—if this were possible—would be to double or triple its present expenditure on constructive economic recovery —without cold war strings attached to the assistance given—and to cut in half, or reduce even further, its present expenditures on conducting the cold war and preparing against actual armed conflict.

This can obviously not be done—or even recommended—unless a re-examination of our present fears leads to the conclusion that some of them are baseless or exaggerated.

Our Fears Re-examined.

I submit that a large part of our anxiety is misdirected or exaggerated by psychological factors within ourselves.

The fear of worldwide communist revolution—which means in the first instance the fear of communist penetration of Western Europe and non-communist Asia—is not without foundation in reality. There is still justified mass discontent in large segments of the world's population. There are well-organized and highly disciplined communist parties operating within most of the Western European nations—especially in France and Italy. These parties seek eventually to gain control of the governments of their respective countries; and, should they gain control, they would no doubt seek to make these countries subservient to Moscow; they would likewise without doubt abolish the Western concept of political freedom. In China, the communists already control vast areas and are waging an increasingly successful civil war against the Central Government. Communism seems to be on the increase in the important food-producing countries of Southeast Asia. The American policy-makers are therefore probably justified in their fear of communist penetration and revolution. We shall return to the question of whether their present counter-measures are, or are not, effective.

Our second great fear is of Soviet military aggression. This, too, is in the first instance a fear for Western Europe, but it also includes apprehensions with regard to Asia and the very definite fear of an atomic blitz upon our own cities, once the Russians come into possession of atomic weapons.

This fear seems to me exaggerated. There is no tradition of aggressive Russian militarism. As General Clay recently stated—and he should know—there is no sign of Russian preparation for aggressive warfare. There is, on the contrary, much evidence that the Russian regime fears war and believes that it can gain far more from continuing to exploit an uneasy armistice than it could from an attempt at world conquest by military means. If this were not true, it is difficult to see what has kept the Red Army from over-running Europe before now. As to an atomic attack upon the United States—assuming that the Russians have atomic weapons and the means of delivering them—it is hardly likely that the realists in the Kremlin believe that they could achieve quick and decisive victory by these means. And, if they failed of quick victory, they would merely have forged an anti-Soviet coalition which would ultimately destroy them.

There is, of course, the danger that panic may produce irrational action.

I submit, nevertheless, that our fear of Soviet military aggression is probably founded less upon reality than upon our own unconscious desire to shift the conflict out of the realm of politics and ideology, where we feel uneasy and uncertain, into the realm of military force, where we feel ourselves on familiar ground and are confident of our preponderant strength. We must also bear in mind that we—having once used the atomic bomb and being tempted to use it again—are predisposed to attribute a similar attitude to others.

If there is any truth in the foregoing examination of our two major fears, it would seem to follow that we should, in our own self-interest, expend the greater part of our efforts in stopping the spread of communism and the smaller part in preparing for military conflict.

Stopping the Armament Race.

But how can the United States cut down its present high rate of expenditure on armaments without jeopardizing its safety and without inviting Soviet aggression through a demonstration of weakness? And, unless it cuts down on its own armament and the projected re-armament of Western Europe, how can the United States double its expenditures on reconstruction?

These highly pertinent questions carry us to the point where it becomes evident that the effort to develop a policy that will help make the peace must be paralleled by an effort to develop a policy that will preserve a peace once it is made.

Past experience has clearly demonstrated the futility of all attempts to attain even limited disarmament by agreement among the sovereign nation-states. So long as there is no supra-national world law and no supra-national authority to enforce it, it is clearly hopeless to expect the sovereign nation-states to forego the ultimate sanction of force. To harbor any such hope is about as reasonable as to expect gold prospectors in a new frontier community, where there is neither law nor a sheriff, to abandon the habit of carrying fire-arms. The world's statesmen have realized this for the past fifty years. But—instead of coming to the only logical conclusion—the world's statesmen have deluded themselves and the peoples of the world with the notion that, while total disarmament might be impossible, limited disarmament might be brought about by international agreement. The fact is that, in a world of international anarchy, limited disarmament simply means giving the initial advantage to an aggressor. The experience with Nazi Germany and Japan should have proved that point once and for all.

The fact is that there can be no half-way house between total armament for total war and total disarmament for total peace. There can be no half-way house between an armament race and world government. The present United Nations structure is precisely an attempt at building such a half-way house. It cannot produce disarmament because it lacks the authority of a world government.

This Requires World Government.

Once this is realized, any nation which truly wants peace cannot escape from the conclusion that it must throw its full energy and power behind the effort to develop the United Nations into a world government. Our present leadership has so far failed to grasp this all-important fact. Secretary Marshall has expressed the opinion that "the problems presented to those who desire peace are not questions of structure." Our present bipartisan policy-makers apparently hold the view that the existing United Nations structure would be adequate to preserve the peace, if the peace could be made—that is to say, if Russia would permit the peace to be made and the United Nations to function.

I submit that the peace cannot be made unless a way is found to stop the armament race, and that the armament race cannot be halted except by making the United Nations into a world government, endowed with the exclusive right to maintain and, if necessary, to use armed force.

What About Russia?

To say that it is useless to discuss the establishment of world government so long as the Soviet Union would obviously refuse to join, is like saying that it is useless to stop smallpox in Europe and the Western Hemisphere so long as the peoples of Asia refuse to be vaccinated. It takes years of educational effort to persuade a suspicious and superstitious coolie that vaccination is not some form of evil magic. It may take years to persuade the suspicious and—in a sense—superstitious Soviet leadership that world government is not some sinister device to destroy the Soviet Revolution. Russia cannot be expected to subordinate its national sovereignty to that of world government, until Russia is convinced that Russian interests would best be served by such action.

No such considerations are involved for the United States. There can be no legitimate fear that the subordination of American sovereignty to a world government might mean subordination to a world government hostile to American interests. This is all the more true, if it is assumed that the Soviet Union and its satellites would decline to participate in the early formative phase of world government.

If, as is likely, the Soviet Union would at first refuse to agree to an American proposal to transform the United Nations into a world federal government, we could then proceed, under Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, to organize a federal government of all the peoples prepared to unite in this manner. It is true that the establishment of such a federation within the United Nations framework would not make immediate disarmament possible. But it would make possible a long step in that direction. It would let the majority of the peoples of the world, united on the federal principle, disarm as individual nations and concentrate their military strength in a single supra-national military establishment. This establishment would have to be maintained at sufficient strength to deal with any realistic threat of military aggression, until the day when the Soviet Union might tire of standing alone and of supporting the heavy burden of unnecessary armaments. Then, and then only, would complete disarmament become possible. In the meantime, however, there would no longer be an armament race between the United States and the Soviet Union. The Soviet leaders would have to realize that the only element of superior force in the world belonged, not to one nation, but to the majority of the peoples of the world. I question whether the Soviet regime could long persuade the Russian people that such a force was arrayed for any other purpose than to maintain the peace. It would not be easy to make the charge of "capitalist imperialism" stick against the united peoples of Western Europe, the Western Hemisphere of Australasia and much of Africa, Asia and the Near and Middle East.

Means of Halting Communism.

Much would, of course, depend upon the role of the United States in such an embryonic government of the world. If we sought to dominate the other peoples and used our preponderant economic and military resources to assert domination, nothing but harm would be accomplished. Perhaps the most dangerous way in which we could abuse our strength would be by forcing upon an embryonic world government a wrong method of combatting the spread of communism. This brings us finally to the question of means to be employed.

The means so far employed by the United States to stop communist penetration fall into two major categories: first, an attack upon the social and economic conditions which breed mass discontent; and, second, subsidies, arms and eventually outright military assistance to nations, or groups within nations, hostile to communism and the Soviet Union. In the first category belong UNRRA, the American loan to Britain and a large part of the funds being spent by ECA. In the second category belong the subsidies to Chiang Kai-shek, the re-arming of Turkey and our intervention in Greece and in the recent Italian elections. Due to the merging of the Marshall Plan into the Truman Doctrine, the distinction between the two categories cannot always be clearly drawn.

The operations conducted primarily as an attack upon economic distress have been, on the whole, fruitful. The economic recovery of the United Kingdom is the outstanding example.

The operations conducted as outright anti-communist or anti-Soviet campaigns have either produced limited and perhaps temporary results, or have backfired altogether.

Our intervention in Greece can at best be described as a temporarily successful holding operation, which has bought time without producing a cure. Italy is another example of limited success; by bringing to bear every known kind of pressure, we succeeded in holding down the communist vote in last Spring's elections; but, in spite of an American threat of starvation and a Papal threat of excommunication, one Italian out of every three still dared to vote the communist ticket. The social and economic evils which tempted the Italian peasant and factory worker toward communism remain to be cured.

China is an example of outright failure. It is not too much to say that American aid to a corrupt and reactionary Central Government has actually benefited the Chinese Communists. This is primarily because, in backing oppressive landlordism, we have left the communists free to exploit the most powerful sentiment among the Chinese masses—namely, the desire for land reform.

Apart from these direct results of the two methods, it is clear that the negative anti-communist approach entails another important basic disadvantage. It puts us into bed with our natural enemies and estranges us from our natural friends. If hostility to communism is the chief qualification for American aid, not only fascist and semi-fascist governments but reactionary political parties and groups within all countries may hope to qualify. This, in turn, alienates the sympathy and support of middle-of-the-road liberals and of the vast masses in Europe and Asia, who are not predisposed toward communism, but who are even less disposed to acquiesce in the maintenance of an intolerable status quo.

IV.

Conclusions.

We come, then, to these three major conclusions:

1. We cannot effectively help in making the peace unless we simultaneously help effectively in devising the means to preserve it, because:

(a) The peace cannot be made unless the armament race is halted;

(b) The armament race cannot be halted without the establishment of a supra-national authority.

2. There is relatively little danger of Soviet military aggression unless there is first a further communist penetration sufficient to alter greatly the present power relationship between Russia and the United States. There is, however, a very real danger of further communist penetration.

3. The way to stop communist penetration is to seek this result as the by-product of an effective attack upon economic distress and social injustice.

This means a policy which will truly carry out Secretary Marshall's great sentence. It means a policy—for us and for the embryonic world federation to be established—which is actually "not directed against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos."

Such a policy must rest upon an honest quest for facts, and not upon the hysterical search for a scapegoat. It must be born out of courage, clear vision and confidence, and not out of fear-befuddled confusion. It must, above all, be carried out by men who look steadfastly ahead to the goal of peace, and who do not pause every now and then in their search for peace to consider the foul alternative of atomic war.

Such a policy must be demanded and supported by a people which recognizes that, even if quick victory could be achieved by atomic war, such a victory would destroy all that is good in ourselves and in our nation.

The American people have given President Truman a vote of confidence. They have given him a new and better Congress to work with—a Congress fully controlled by Mr. Truman's own Party.

Will a new leadership emerge to meet this challenge?

Will it sweep away the misreading of our time, the distortion of history, the false fears and contortions of self-justification which have produced our present policy?

It can, if it has the courage and the will.

THE BERLIN CRISIS

Address to the

COUNCIL ON WORLD AFFAIRS

by

JAMES P. WARBURG

Providence, Rhode Island

December 7, 1948.

The Berlin Crisis

You have asked me to discuss the Berlin crisis. I should like to begin by trying to set this problem in the context of contemporary history.

The present crisis in Berlin is the logical culmination of three years of mounting tension over the larger and more complicated problem of Germany. The tensions in Germany, and in other trouble-spots on this troubled planet, are in turn symptoms of the malady from which the entire world is suffering. They are like the rash which accompanies a case of measles. At times they itch so agonizingly as to appear to be the real source of our affliction.

Yet the true seat of the evil lies deeper—in the breakdown of friendly relations between the Soviet Union and the West. Even this is not the ultimate source of the disturbance, for the breakdown of the wartime coalition, upon the maintenance of which the fragile structure of peace was precariously erected, arises from a number of factors; some of them have little or nothing to do with the nature or intentions of either the Soviet Union or the West.

For one thing, the world is full of tensions because we are living in a period of far-reaching social and economic change. For another, the world has almost overnight become physically one, and can henceforth be governed peacefully only as one entity. This means that the ill-prepared human race now faces the grim choice of either rapidly devising the means of peaceful political unification, or else submitting to unification by conquest through atomic war.

Given the technological, sociological and economic facts of life, we should be facing a major crisis in world affairs, even if there were no Soviet Union, no communist doctrine, no breakdown in Germany and no minor crisis in Berlin.

Within this framework of overall context, it is true that Germany and China are at present the itchiest spots in the rash of trouble which covers the face of the globe. They, more than any other points of irritation, arouse the temptation to scratch frantically, thereby causing a serious and perhaps fatal infection.

Germany is important, not merely because of its explosive potential, but for three other reasons.

In the first place, there is no other spot on the globe where the whole theory of a peace based upon great power cooperation is as explicitly on trial as it is in Germany. Nowhere else are the three leading Western powers and Russia so deeply committed to the experiment of cooperative management. Nowhere else have they failed so dismally. The fiasco in Germany has not only postponed the making of a peace settlement; it has undermined the at best flimsy structure set up to preserve the peace, once a settlement is made. The United Nations organization rests upon the assumption of continued great power unanimity. The attempted quadripartite control and management of Germany rested upon precisely the same assumption, except that it involved only the four occupying powers—the US, the USSR, Great Britain and France.

In the second place, Germany—not Russia—is still, in the minds of vast numbers of Europeans, the psychological storm-centre of Europe. The French, as well as the Czechs and Poles, see the greatest threat to peace in resurgent, aggressive German nationalism. This fear of Germany may appear as strange and even pathological to many Americans. It exists, nevertheless, and has an important bearing upon the problem of achieving anything like Western European unity.

Finally, Germany—even in defeat—is still the central gear-wheel of the European economy. Before the war Germany fulfilled a quadruple function in the European trading community:

1. It supplied raw material. Germany was the chief source of surplus coal on the Continent, upon which depended the industrial structure of most other European countries. Germany also exported large quantities of potash, which had an important bearing upon European agriculture.

2. Germany contained the greatest industrial concentration and the largest and most compact force of skilled labor on the Continent. It supplied much of the steel, machines, machine-parts and chemicals for the Continent, as well as a considerable proportion of its consumer foods.

3. Germany provided a market—for the raw materials and agricultural produce of Eastern and Central Europe, for the dairy products of Denmark and the Netherlands, and for the specialty manufactures of Switzerland and Czechoslovakia.

4. Germany was an important factor in the European transportation system. Its merchant fleet carried much of the Continent's overseas trade. Its rivers, canals and railroads were the heart of the intra-Continental traffic. German trans-shipment trade created most of the business done by the Dutch and Belgian seaports.

Today, after three and a half years of Allied occupation, Europe's great workshop and market-place is an economic desert. It can neither buy nor sell. An artificially erected barrier separates Eastern and Western Germany, blocking the core of the intra-Continental transport system. On one side of the barrier lies the industrial heart of Germany. On the other side lies the breadbasket. As a result, all of Europe is suffering from lack of German coal, German steel, German machines and machine-parts. Rotterdam and Antwerp lie idle. The recovery of the whole Continent is delayed and impeded because the central gear-wheel of its economy lies broken and rusting in the rubble of inter-Allied disagreement.

Germany itself is a fairly accurate miniature of a disrupted Europe. Its Western half, deprived of its normal source of foodstuffs in the East, depends upon the charity of the Western Hemisphere for sustenance. Its Eastern half, cut off from normal intercourse with the West, suffers from lack of manufactured goods and is enslaved and exploited by the Soviet Union. The same thing is true, in a broad sense, of the entire Continent.

How did this come about?

In part, the German fiasco is due to the short-sighted and vengeful nonsense introduced into Allied planning by the Morgenthau proposal. In part it is due to the equally short-sighted and ruthless preoccupation of Russian leadership with reparations. But, most of all, the present state of Germany is due to the failure of the victorious anti-Axis coalition to reach a workable post-war understanding. This failure first became apparent at Yalta and was later crystallized—so far as Germany was concerned—in the Potsdam Agreement of August 1945.

The Potsdam Agreement was a compilation of compromise and unreconciled contradiction. Yet even this wretched document might perhaps have been developed into a workable plan, had it not been for two great blunders. The first blunder was to permit an excessive Russo-Polish land-grab in Eastern Germany, involving the expulsion of 9,000,000 Germans from their homes, while at the same time leaving the question of Germany's Western frontier undecided. The second blunder was the failure to make France a party to the Potsdam Agreement, while at the same time giving the French a zone of occupation, an equal voice in the four-power management of Germany and, hence, the right to veto any four-power action under the Agreement. Taken in combination, these two blunders gave France good reason for fearing the revival of a united German nation, as well as the means of obstructing the unification called for by the Potsdam Plan.

Contrary to widespread belief, it was not Russia but France which—as the result of these two blunders—vetoed the carrying out of the Potsdam Agreement during the first period of its existence. Unfortunately, it was precisely during this early period of four-power occupation that an understanding with Russia might still have been possible. From the very beginning, the Russians regarded France as a participant invited only out of courtesy at the urgent request of Britain and the United States. They expected Britain and the United States to put an end to French obstructionism in much the same way as they would have dealt with recalcitrance on the part of one of their satellites. It was not until after the United States and Britain had shown that they were neither able to reach an understanding with France nor willing to coerce French cooperation, that Russia began seriously to violate the Potsdam Agreement and to go its own way in its zone of occupation.

From 1946 onward, the failure in Germany has increasingly become merely one manifestation of the worldwide breakdown of Soviet-Western relations. Yet it is important to recognize that the dramatic clash between the Soviet Union and the Western powers has obscured a continuing unresolved dissonance among the Western powers themselves.

Until the Moscow Conference of March 1947, there appeared to be some hope of reconciling the differences among the four occupying powers and of working out some modifications of the Potsdam Plan under which it might become possible to eliminate the zonal barriers and permit Germany to function as an economic and political entity. But whatever hope there had been vanished with the enunciation—during the Moscow Conference—of the Truman Doctrine, and the launching of an American crusade against the Soviet Union. Had the Marshall Plan been put forward at this time—instead of three months later—and had the Western powers been willing to make some concessions with regard to reparations, the whole picture might have changed—not only as to Germany, but throughout the entire world.

Here is a rough idea of what I think we could have said to the Russians about reparations at that time:

"We admit that the Yalta Agreement is ambiguous as to reparations. By its terms you may perhaps consider yourselves entitled to greater and earlier reparations from Germany than you are now receiving. On the other hand, the subsequent Potsdam Agreement—which you signed—clearly limited reparations to specified removals of capital assets and prohibited the taking of reparations out of current German production—certainly so long as Germany remained unable to produce enough to pay for its essential imports.

"In violation of the Potsdam Agreement, you have been taking reparations out of current production from your zone, while we and the British have been pouring money into our zones, to keep the Germans there from starving to death, and in order to bring about recovery. To a much smaller extent, the French too have been making a profit out of their zone, while we have been taking a loss on ours.

"This cannot go on."

Let us try to iron out the differences—political and economic—which have stood in the way of our carrying out our joint plan for treating Germany as an entity. If we can agree on these other matters, we are willing to make a compromise on reparations. In view of the devastation wrought by the Germans in Russia, we are willing to modify the Potsdam formula as follows:

"When a united Germany is again self-supporting, and when it shall have repaid to Britain and to us the amounts we shall have advanced to make recovery possible, then we are willing to let Germany begin paying you reparations out of current production.

"The questions of how much Germany is to pay each year and how much Russia is to receive altogether must be carefully worked out. This involves our reaching an agreement as to what living standard, and what imports to sustain that standard, are to be considered necessary for a peaceable German nation."

Had we made some such proposal in March 1947 and coupled it with a Marshall Plan to aid European recovery, I believe that recent history might well have assumed a different aspect. We should then have been in a position to demand political concessions, not only in Germany, but in all of Europe, which might have ended the cold war before it involved East and West in a vicious circle of mutual provocation. It is true that such an approach might also have failed. Certainly it would not have provided an immediate solution for all the problems which had arisen. But it might well have opened the door to their gradual solution, whereas the Truman Doctrine and our uncompromising attitude on reparations wrote "finis" to the endeavor to find a basis for agreement.

From March 1947 to the present, the course of events in Germany and elsewhere has followed the predictable pattern of a Greek tragedy. Once the Moscow Conference had ended in failure, it was a foregone conclusion that Britain and United States would proceed to relieve themselves of an intolerable burden by a rapid rehabilitation of the West German economy. It was a foregone conclusion that the economic unification of the Western zones would raise the problem of political unification, the idea of creating a West German state, and the notion of making a separate peace with that state. It was a foregone conclusion that such action on the part of the Western powers would provoke some sort of Soviet retaliation—probably in Berlin.

This is not hindsight. In a book written just a year ago, after the London Conference had sealed the earlier failure at Moscow, I stated that it was now certain that Britain and the United States would proceed to organize "Bizonia" as an integral part of that Western Europe in which the truncated Marshall Plan was to operate, and I expressed the belief that this raised four important questions to be answered in 1948:

"First: Would France join her zone to Bizonia? Or would she hold off because of her objection to an even partially unified Germany?

"Second: What were the Anglo-American intentions concerning the Ruhr? Were the Ruhr industries to be turned back to the Germans? And, if so, to what Germans? Were they to be socialized or turned over to German "free enterprise"? These questions about the Ruhr were closely related to the question of future French attitude. If the Ruhr were to be "internationalized", the French would probably join in the unification of Western Germany. But political "internationalization" involved a number of dangerous pitfalls of which the British and Americans seemed well aware . . .

"Third: A very tricky and immediate question was left for Britain and the United States in effecting the economic unification of their zones without, in effect, creating so much of a political entity in Western Germany as to block the road to eventual unification with the East. Even without committing the ultimate folly of slamming the door by making a separate peace and creating a definite West German sovereignty, the Western Allies faced the danger of playing into Russian hands by making it appear to the Germans that they—rather than the Soviet Union—were responsible for keeping Germany divided.

"This question led to the fourth and last: Would the Soviet Union itself slam the door on eventual unification by trying to oust the Western Allies from Berlin, on the grounds that their action in Western Germany had violated the Potsdam Agreement and rendered the Allied Control Commission in Berlin useless and obsolete? And, if the Russians did thus turn the facts upside down and undertake such a move, would they, in the face of Allied refusal to leave, try to carry it out by such sanctions as shutting off power and light from the Allied sectors of the German capital?

"These four questions," I concluded a year ago, "compose a dangerous pile of dry tinder in the heart of the European Continent."

I have not quoted this passage in order to prove my talent as a soothsayer, but rather the contrary. It took no second sight to foresee these problems—including the Berlin crisis—a year ago. The pattern of the future had been established. I have quoted my own observations merely to point out the extraordinary frivolity with which Britain and the United States have walked into a clearly foreseeable crisis, without any idea of how they were going to get out of it.

Instead of shutting off power and light—as I thought they might—the Russians chose to shut off overland communications. This was fortunate, because it gave us a chance to improvize the air-lift and, by an extraordinary feat of organization, not only to meet the challenge but to win a major propaganda victory. But the air-lift has solved no problems. It has merely bought time. The problems which culminated in the Berlin crisis remain to be faced and met.

What are these problems?

First of all, there is the question of the Ruhr. Upon this there is disagreement, not only between Russia and the West, but between France and the Anglo-American policy-makers. There is also considerable disagreement, momentarily glossed over, between Britain and the United States.

France wants the Ruhr physically separated from a new Germany—or even a new West Germany. She wants the whole area politically and economically removed from any German sovereignty and placed under some sort of international trusteeship. What many Frenchmen really want is to annex the Ruhr and the Rhineland, as they have annexed the Saar; but French leaders recognized, soon after the war ended, that this was impossible. The impellng motive behind French policy is not greed but fear—fear that any kind of Germany which controls the Ruhr will once again attack France.

Russia wants the Ruhr to remain part of a "united" German nation—"united", that is, except for the territory annexed by Poland and the Soviet Union. The Russians want a unified Germany primarily because they want a major voice in the control of the Ruhr.

Britain and the United States have, from the outset, also wanted the Ruhr to remain part of Germany. Originally they wanted—and still claim to want—the Ruhr to remain part of a united Germany. But the Anglo-American position has become stultified in recent months by the cold war with Russia. What Britain and the United States now want is for the Ruhr to remain part of a West German state which is fully integrated into the Marshall Plan. They propose a Ruhr Coal Authority, in effect controlled by Britain and the United States, which shall be empowered to allocate the output of the Ruhr coal mines to German and non-German users.

The disagreement between the United States and Britain is at a different level of the Ruhr problem. The British Labor Government wishes to see the Ruhr mines and industries socialized. We would like to see them returned to private German ownership. The matter has been neatly deferred by trusteeship, but in practice it seems to be drifting toward the American solution. France wants neither the British nor the American solution, fearing both public and private German ownership of the Ruhr arsenal.

As stated a moment ago, the cold war against the Soviet Union has made a mess of the Anglo-American position with regard to Germany. Originally, Britain and the United States steadfastly adhered to the sound conviction that a unified Germany presented the only hope of a peaceful and productive Germany. Having made the fateful mistakes of Potsdam, they opposed all French and other demands for annexation of German territory in the West, and belatedly sought an opportunity to revise the Russo-Polish land-grab in the East. But the opportunity for revison in the East was bungled by our then Secretary of State in September 1946; and a few months later the Saar was conceded to France. After the Moscow fiasco and the launching of the Truman Doctrine, Anglo-American insistence upon a unified Germany became largely a matter of form. When Russia walked out of the Marshall Plan, taking her satellites with her, it was no longer possible to maintain even the polite pretense of an Anglo-American desire for unification. The Ruhr had now become the key element in the American Recovery Program for the Sixteen Nations of Western Europe. Britain and the United States had now become definitely afraid of unification, for unification would mean giving Russia a substantial voice in the control of the Ruhr. I, myself, heard an American delegate reporting on the London Conference of December 1947, make the following illuminating statement:

"There was one very bad day", he said, "when it looked as if the Russians might make a substantial concession, so that we would really have to talk. But, fortunately, they didn't."

That is how far the Truman Doctrine and the cold war had taken us a year ago. Since then, we have drifted even further.

Apart from the question of frontiers and the disposition of the Ruhr, clearly foreseeable political problems have arisen in connection with the creation of a West German state. Obviously, economic unification of the Anglo-American zones had to mean some degree of political unification. For reasons already indicated, the hoped-for inclusion of the French zone failed to materialize. Going ahead on their own, the Anglo-American policy-makers were wise enough to avoid the pitfalls of going too far in the direction of creating a West German sovereignty. They resisted the arguments Mr. Herbert Hoover and others, who urged making a separate peace with a fully recognized West German state. Yet even their tentative steps toward creating a state with strictly limited sovereignty, subject to later integration in a unified Germany, were enough to provoke the Berlin crisis. This could hardly have been the cause of legitimate surprise in either London or Washington. Yet both professed utter outrage and amazement when the Russians took the action which any one who had studied their behavior would have expected them to take.

The Russian position was that, by proceeding to create a separate nation in West Germany, the Western Allies had nullified the Potsdam Agreement and made the Allied Control Council a meaningless anachronism. Therefore, the Russians claimed, the Allies had no right to remain in Berlin, since they had been accorded their sectors of the German capital as part of the agreement for the four-power control of Germany. This is not what the Russians said when they first cut off land communications. But, this is what the Russian position boiled down to after all the nonsense about "technical repairs" and so forth had been brushed away in last summer's conversations at the Kremlin.

As pointed out in the official State Department documents, this Russian position is legally indefensible. The rather loose arrangements for the four sectors of Berlin and the corridor leading to the Western sectors were not part of the Potsdam Agreement at all. They antedated the agreement for the four-power government of Germany and were part of a previous deal which fixed the boundaries of the zones of occupation. The Russians would thus have been on very thin ground indeed, had not Western carelessness provided them with a much stronger basis for action than existed in the legalistic aspects of their case.

While proceeding slowly and with considerable caution in the direction of creating a West German state, the Western authorities suddenly decided last Spring to introduce the long-overdue currency reform in the Western zones. No one can criticize this action in itself. Currency reform should have been carried out in all of Germany three years ago —and would have been carried out much sooner had not the French and Russians taken turns at making it impossible. But the timing of the move was ill-considered, and the attempt to introduce the new currency in the Western sectors of Berlin was especially unfortunate. Since Berlin lies in the heart of the Soviet zone, it must have been obvious that the introduction of the Westmark in the Western sectors of the capital would affect not only the Soviet sector but the economy of the entire Soviet zone. This presented the Russians with a just grievance at precisely the moment when they badly needed some sort of justification for slapping on the morally and legally indefensible blockade. It placed the Western Allies in a position from which they quickly saw the need of retreating, but from which they obviously could not retreat under duress.

What has happened since then is essentially very simple. We have wanted to give ground on the currency issue in Berlin; but—quite properly —we have refused to negotiate until the blockade was lifted. The Russians have used one pretext after another to defer lifting the blockade because their real reason for imposing it lies much deeper than the currency issue. A careful study of the protracted conversations held at Moscow during the Summer clearly shows that what the Russians really want is to prevent the setting up of any kind of West German state, and to resume negotiations for the unification of Germany at about the point where they were discontinued a year ago. Failing this, they want to oust the Western Allies from Berlin and to incorporate the entire city in their zone.

We, on the other hand, are now so deeply committed to the cold war and to a West European Recovery Program which demands the integration of a fully controlled Ruhr, that we are unwilling to re-open the subject of Germany as a whole. We cannot agree to the unification of Germany—which we originally wanted, and still want as a long-range objective—without giving the Russians a voice in the control of the Ruhr. This we cannot do without dangerously weakening the Recovery Program for Western Europe, which, in turn, would dangerously weaken our position in the cold war. The alternative is to abandon Berlin; but this we cannot do without working a great injustice upon the people of the Western sectors and losing face everywhere in the struggle against totalitarian communism.

That, as I see it, is the essence of the present crisis in Berlin. I have purposely skipped over a mass of technical detail, including the protracted negotiations under United Nations auspices in Paris, because all this seems to me irrelevant to an understanding of the basic issues involved.

The choice we shall sooner or later have to make in Berlin is the same choice we shall have to make in the Far East and in every part of the world. It is the choice between a continued drift toward war and a reversal in the direction of peace. It is the choice between continuing to spend most of our available resources on armament, military alliances and military preparation for conflict, or—alternatively—devoting our major efforts and resources to a policy such as that once envisioned by Secretary Marshall, when he said: "Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos."

Today our policy is directed primarily against a country and against a doctrine. It is less and less concerned with the elimination of hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos. We are on the wrong road.

There is still time to change.

There is still time to realize that the peace cannot be made so long as the arms race continues; that the arms race will continue until the United Nations is transformed into an effective world government; and that such a transformation cannot come about so long as we continue to oppose it.

There is still time to realize that Secretary Marshall was right, in June 1947, when he said, in effect, that the way to stop communism is to cut the ground of mass discontent from under its feet. There is still time to realize that we are now dangerously wrong in operating on the opposite theory—namely, that the way to stop communism is to contain it by physical force within a physical frontier.

Time does not permit me to discuss in detail just how I believe that our present overall foreign policy should and could be changed. I have publicly put forward specific proposals on several recent occasions. The point I wish to make here is this:

There is no answer to the Berlin crisis as such. There is an answer to the basic problems which have brought about the Berlin crisis, but this involves a fundamental change in our foreign policy.

I cannot tell you what we should or should not do in Germany, if we stick to our present disastrous foreign policy. I do not know, because I cannot see how the German problem can be solved peacefully in the context of a policy which must, in my judgment, inevitably lead to increasing tensions.

In a different context of overall policy, I would venture to put forward once more a few basic principles which I have been steadily advocating for several years. These are:

1. That only a reasonably prosperous German nation will be a peaceful German nation.

2. That a reasonably prosperous German nation is essential to a reasonably prosperous Europe.

3. That a divided Germany cannot be reasonably prosperous, because the Eastern and Western parts of it are interdependent.

4. That Germany could afford to cede the coal mining and the industrial area of Upper Silesia to Poland and still remain reasonably prosperous, provided it retained the Ruhr; that Germany could afford to lose the strategically provocative enclave of East Prussia, provided that it retained the remainder of its agricultural territory in the East. Holding this view, I have long contended that the frontier fixed tentatively at Potsdam should be revised so as to return to Germany Pomerania, Lower Silesia and the amputated slice of Brandenburg.

5. By the same reasoning, I have contended that the Ruhr should remain a part of Germany, but that the output of the Ruhr coal mines should be allocated by an international Coal Authority to non-German and German industries and consumers. In putting forward this suggestion two years ago, I had in mind a truly representative international authority, which would in time allocate not only Ruhr coal but all European coal among the users. This idea has now been partially adopted in the Anglo-American plan, but its chief value has been lost, because—in the context of a cold war policy—the Authority now proposed is to be controlled by Britain and the United States, instead of by a broad consortium of European users.

The five broad principles just enumerated relate to the question of what physical Germany is to be re-created. The following principles relate to the question of security and to the political nature of the reconstituted German nation.

As to security, I have maintained:

1. That German manufacture of planes, tanks, guns and weapons of any sort should be prohibited.

2. That pre-war Germany had erected an industrial capacity—especially in steel—far in excess of German needs, except for purposes of building up military power; that German industry should not again be permitted to expand beyond Germany's peaceful needs; and that this limitation could be achieved by controlling German imports and the amount of coal which Germany might be allowed to retain for her own use.

3. That, beyond these measures, there should be no attempt to de-industrialize Germany—especially since the loss of a large part of her farm lands in the East will compel her to import nearly half of her foodstuffs and to pay for them through exports of manufactured goods.

4. That it is basically not the possession of an industrial war potential but the will to use it for war that makes any nation a threat to peace; and that the all-important security question, as to Germany, is how to destroy the German will to aggression.

5. That the moral regeneration and re-education of the German people is primarily a problem which the Germans must solve for themselves; that they must be kept under surveillance until they have demonstrably solved it; but that the sooner the victorious Allies clear out of Germany and place this responsibility squarely upon the Germans, the sooner will there be any hope of regeneration.

As to the political and social structure of the new Germany, I have held, and still hold, the following basic beliefs:

1. That it is not the structural form which shapes the nature of a people, but the nature of a people which shapes the house in which it lives; and that any structural form is meaningless which does not arise out of the realized needs and ideals of the people who intend to use it.

2. That the proper task of the occupying powers would have been to see that the German people had an opportunity to evolve their own social and political structure, without once again falling into the clutches of the Junker-militarist-industrialist clique which has dominated the German past.

3. That—if Germany had been conquered by one nation—it might have been possible for that one nation to impose a political and social structure upon the vanquished German people; but that any structure so imposed, no matter how excellent, would endure only so long as the conqueror maintained it by force.

4. That any attempt to impose a political, social and economic revolution by four-power edict would founder on the inability of the four powers to agree among themselves; and that—given the division of Germany into four zones of occupation—it was inevitable that each of the four occupying powers would attempt, in its zone, to re-create its own image.

Holding these views—which are, of course, debatable—I have several times put forward the suggestion that the United States should take the initiative in proposing the withdrawal of all armies of occupation from Germany, except for a small mobile police-force to be supplied by a broad international group, or—better yet—by the United Nations.

Last July I carried this thought one step further and suggested that we propose a withdrawal, by Britain, the United States and Russia, of all armed forces from the European Continent west of the Soviet frontier, together with the simultaneous signing of a three power treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of the European Continent.

It is obvious that such a proposal will not be seriously considered by a Government which is more preoccupied with winning than with ending the cold war. But it might well be considered seriously in the context of a basically revised foreign policy.

Right now we stand before our last good opportunity to reconsider our fundamental aims and objectives. We have elected a President in circumstances which give him extraordinary freedom of action and extraordinary responsibility. We face two immediate problems—China, and the question of whether to re-arm Western Europe.

The Far Eastern problem lies outside the scope of our discussion tonight. But the question of re-arming Western Europe is intimately linked to the problem of Germany. Unless the contemplated program of re-arming Western Europe is to be the most cruel hoax ever perpetrated, it is a program which must involve the remilitarizing of Western Germany.

Had you thought of this?

Had you realized that, if Western Europe is to be put in a position to defend itself by physical force, there is only one arsenal and one source of manpower which can be employed to bolster France, the Low Countries,

Scandinavia and Italy? Unless we remilitarize the Ruhr and draw on the forty odd millions of Germans in the Western zones, we shall re-arm Western Europe merely to fight a delaying action—to be once more over-run and conquered, and perhaps eventually to be once more liberated. That would indeed be a cruel hoax upon the peoples of Europe.

On the other hand, consider the probable results if we do re-arm the Germans. Would the Russians sit quietly on the Eastern bank of the Elbe River while this program went into effect? And—even if our action did not provoke the very attack against which it sought to erect a defense—what would be the effect upon the peoples of Europe upon whom we count as our friends? How good would be the morale of a re-equipped French army when it is asked to fight side by side with German soldiers? How good would be the morale of Belgian, Dutch, Norwegian or Italian troops in these circumstances?

This—not the Berlin crisis—is the urgent decision which confronts us at the present moment.

It is true that we face, in Berlin, a difficult and explosive tactical situation. But the real crisis we face lies not in Berlin but in Washington.

The real crisis we face is the necessity of choosing now either to revise our basic policy or to become the prisoner of our past mistakes.

The Soviet threat to peace is a very real threat. But, in thinking of it primarily as a military threat to be met by military means, we dangerously misunderstand its nature. What is more, in thinking of the peoples of Western Europe as pawns to be sacrificed in the opening moves of a worldwide power struggle, we are making a serious miscalculation.

The Soviet threat to peace is primarily a threat of communist penetration or subversion. The way to meet it is not with guns placed in the hands of harassed and unhappy peoples. The way to meet it is to remove the causes of mass discontent—to promote economic recovery and social justice—and thus to strike from the hands of the communists the only dangerous weapon they possess.

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

Recd 3/11/49
Interesting

Dear Ed.
Here she be!
Jim

Note to Editors, Editorial Writers and Commentators:

In the course of recent weeks, I have raised a number of questions concerning the proposed Atlantic Pact and the accompanying program of rearming Western Europe.

Since I am in thorough sympathy with the objective of protecting Western Europe against aggression and merely question the efficacy of the methods proposed, it has seemed appropriate to offer a constructive alternative.

Accordingly, on February 26, I submitted a proposal for modification of the program to the Secretary of State.

On Thursday evening, March 10, I shall publicly state that proposal in an address to be delivered at Philadelphia. Simultaneously, I am submitting the proposal to each member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. (The action of the House will be important in relation to the rearmament program.)

An advance copy of this address is enclosed herewith, The first half summarizes my criticism of the current proposal. The second half - beginning on page 10 - states the alternative suggested.

Whatever action our country may take involves risk. It is my hope that public discussion of the ideas tentatively put forward may lead to the development of a program which will more effectively protect Western Europe, without creating ambiguities likely to provoke miscalculation, or involving the United States in commitments beyond our power to fulfill.

Your attention is invited to the eight points of summary argument presented on page 18, and your comment on their validity would be most welcome.

James P. Warburg

March 7, 1949

THE ATLANTIC DEFENSE PACT

And the Proposal to Rearm Western Europe.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION AND A PROPOSAL FOR MODIFICATION.

By
JAMES P. WARBURG

Address to

UNITED WORLD FEDERALISTS
Philadelphia, Pa.

March 10, 1949.

With your permission, I am going to talk to you tonight about a subject which may appear to some of you as being somewhat remote from World Government; namely, the proposed Atlantic Security Pact and its accompanying program of lend-lease rearmament of Western Europe.

If I were not in full sympathy with the aims of the United World Federalists, I should not be here tonight. But—though I am in full sympathy with your aims—though I have the honor to be a member of your National Executive Council—I have felt for some time that this organization must concern itself with more than the direct pursuit of its ultimate objective, if it is to work effectively toward the realization of that objective. In other words, I feel very strongly that UWF must concern itself, more than it has in the past, with day-to-day events in the world and with the manner in which our Government reacts to and meets these events.

By this I do not mean that UWF should attempt to take a position on every issue that comes up in the conduct of this nation's foreign affairs. But I do mean that, in my judgment, UWF must take a position in favor of any major program which it thinks will lead toward a just and lasting peace, and against any program which it thinks will exacerbate tensions, give added momentum to the armament race and perhaps provoke armed conflict.

Holding these views, I make no apology for speaking to you tonight on the subject of the proposed Atlantic Security Pact and the projected rearmament of the Western European signatories.

The Need for Discussion.

There has been a tendency on the part of our Government to discourage discussion of the Atlantic Pact proposal, on the grounds that one cannot intelligently discuss a treaty one has never seen. There has also been a tendency on the part of our Government to clothe the preliminary negotiations for this treaty in a veil of wartime security. In combination, these two tendencies lead toward a most undesirable result—namely, the eventual presentation to the American people of an accomplished fact. That is precisely what was done in March, 1947 with the Greco-Turkish Aid Bill, with the result that any member of Congress, or any ordinary citizen, who ventured to express doubts as to the wisdom of the proposal, was told that failure to accept it would mean a repudiation of the Chief Executive at a moment of international crisis.

I submit that this is a most unwise way to make foreign policy in a democracy such as ours. It means that a policy is adopted before it is understood and fully debated. It means that high-pressure propaganda must be used to "sell" the policy on an emotional basis, which rarely provides a solid or lasting foundation. Finally, it is likely to mean that the Government becomes the victim and the prisoner of its own propaganda, thereby beclouding its own vision and judgment.

I am not suggesting that the delicate details of treaty negotiation can be carried on in a goldfish bowl. But I am suggesting that the basic assumptions upon which a policy is based, the basic purposes and principles for which it is proposed, and the basic commitments involved or implied in its adoption can and should be frankly disclosed and freely debated.

When it became apparent, toward the end of January, that the negotiations for the Atlantic Pact were already far advanced and likely to advance rapidly to the point of actual commitment without any public discussion whatsoever, it seemed to me appropriate to make an attempt to provoke discussion of some of the issues involved. I proceeded to act as an individual in accordance with what seemed to me not merely the right but the duty of citizenship.

While it was true that the exact terms of the proposal were at that time unknown, enough had been disclosed by the Department of State and by the Chief Executive to warrant some very serious doubts as to the basic assumptions upon which the proposal appeared to be founded. I ventured to raise these doubts in a letter to the Secretary of State, and subsequently in two memoranda sent to a number of Senators and Representatives.

Five Reasons for Reconsideration.

In the first of these memoranda I stated five broad reasons for carefully scrutinizing the proposal. These were:

1. The Geographical Loophole. The proposed treaty will attempt to protect some but not all of the free nations of Western Europe. This implies that the United States and Canada will not protect non-signatories. Thus the treaty invites aggression against the non-signatories.

By inviting aggression against nations not included in the security pact, the proposed treaty endangers the signatories themselves. If, for example, Norway participates while Sweden and Denmark do not, and if either of the two non-signatories should become the victim of aggression, the defense of Norway would become well-nigh impossible. Similarly, if Iran is left exposed, Turkey is endangered; if Turkey is left unprotected, Greece is imperilled; if Greece is not included, Italy becomes vulnerable; and if Italy is not a signatory, the southern flank of France becomes exposed.

---

2. The Constitutional Loophole. Under the proposed treaty Congress will, of course, preserve the right to declare war, to pass upon various means of carrying out our treaty obligations, and to appropriate the necessary funds. This means that, until Congress takes action—which may be a matter of months—there will be no actual certainty whether, when, and in what circumstances the United States will actually throw its full weight into the conflict.

The proposed treaty, therefore, creates precisely the kind of uncertainty which invites miscalculation by a potential aggressor and lulls the nations to be protected into a false sense of security. A similar uncertainty as to the position of Great Britain led the Kaiser to miscalculate in 1914, and Adolf Hitler to repeat the error in 1939.

---

3. The Defense Dilemma. The proposed rearmament of the European signatories will not provide them with adequate defense— because of their insufficient manpower, inadequate present industrial capacity and political instability—unless rearmament includes either

(a) the remilitarization and rearmament of Western Germany, or

(b) the stationing in Europe, before any war starts, of large American contingents.

As to (a), we are committed not to rearm or remilitarize Germany. Moreover, even if we were not so committed, the rearmament of Germany would split Western Europe asunder and destroy its fighting morale.

As to (b), the attempt to build up a great American army in Europe before any war started would certainly provoke countermeasures by the Soviet Union, if not an actual "spoiling attack" to prevent the completion of our preparations.

Thus the proposed treaty will either fail to provide an adequate defense, or—in attempting to provide it—will provoke the very attack which it is designed to deter.

---

4. Defense against what? The primary threat to the free nations of Europe at the present time is political rather than military. The primary threat is that of communist subversion or penetration. This is a serious threat to our own security because, if Russia gained control of Western Europe, the Russain war potential would be increased to a point where Russian leadership might consider that a military challenge to the United States offered a chance of ultimate success.

Therefore, the best defense for Western Europe at this time is the rapid rebuilding of its economic health and political stability. That is the basic assumption of the Marshall Plan.

The proposed treaty stipulates that the European signatories shall rearm themselves and each other as the quid pro quo for American assistance in rearmament. To the extent that Western Europe turns from recovery to rearmament, its defenses against political penetration will be weakened. To the extent that American resources are diverted to rearming Western Europe, American aid to recovery will be diminished.

The proposed treaty creates an ineffective defense against the secondary danger of military aggression at the price of weakening the defense against the primary danger of political penetration.

---

5. The Dunkirk Danger. From the point of view of our own national security, the proposed treaty commits us, in the event of war, to a strategy which would involve the re-enactment of Dunkirk on a gigantic scale, unless we had taken measures prior to the outbreak of hostilities which would insure our being able to hold Western Europe.

Are we prepared to take such measures?

Could we complete them without provoking attack?

If we should suffer a Dunkirk, we would have no one to fall back upon in the sense that Britain had us in 1940. Unless both the foregoing questions can be answered by our military men in the affirmative, have we any right to commit our armed forces to the certainty of initial defeat?

It is now over a month since these questions were raised. To date, not one of them has been satisfactorily answered.

There has been, during the past few weeks, very full discussion of what I called "the Constitutional Loophole". This debate, which has taken place largely behind the diplomatic scenes, has brought about much public discussion—most of it based on speculation as to the exact wording of the so-called "operative clause" in the treaty, which attempts to define what sort of assistance the signatories are to render each other in the event of attack. The word, "military" has wandered in and out of this clause, causing loud misgivings in the Senate when it was inserted and louder screams of anguish from abroad when it was deleted.

There has also been some public discussion of what I have called the "Geographical Loophole". The question of what nations are to be included in the Pact was brought into the open through our Government's efforts to induce the Scandinavian countries to join the Pact before its exact terms had been determined. Although, officially, the proposed treaty is still a "North Atlantic Security Pact", it has now become evident that our Government has already made some sort of approach to Italy, that Britain's Foreign Secretary has been talking to Greece and Turkey, that France wants her North African possessions included, and that we would like to see Portgual and perhaps even Spain among the signatories.

These are important matters and merit the fullest possible debate and consideration. But the most vital questions concern the fundamental assumptions underlying the treaty and the rearmament program. These assumptions have not yet been examined and debated.

The memorandum of February 1, in which I raised the five questions just quoted, ended with the following conclusion:

> The argument up to this point adds up to the contention that the proposed treaty, in its present form, is an unsound and dangerous weapon to use in the cold war.
>
> This raises the broader question of whether the time has not come to re-examine the basic premises of a foreign policy which has led, quite logically, to the present proposal. It raises the question of whether we are not placing too little emphasis upon our constructive efforts for peace and too much emphasis upon a purely negative policy of strategic containment. It brings out the need to re-examine the nature of the threat to peace, to see whether it is, in fact, essentially a threat which can be met by strategic containment, or whether it is essentially a political, or ideological threat to be met by means other than strategic containment.
>
> Finally, the proposal raises the question of whether we have not reached the point in our present policy at which the cold war will cease to be a method of seeking a peace settlement and become, instead, merely the preparation for an atomic war tacitly assumed to be inevitable.

The Defense Dilemma.

In order to focus attention upon some of these basic questions—particularly upon that question which I have called the "Defense Dilemma"—I followed up my first memorandum with another, in which I compiled such published data as I could find concerning the possible defense of the Rhine frontier against Soviet attack. I shall re-state here only a summary of the conclusions.

1. For an immediate attack upon Western Europe, the Russians have available a fully equipped and relatively mobile striking force of at least 30 divisions—probably nearer 50. This force could be doubled by merely bringing additional existing forces to a state of readiness in Poland or just behind the Soviet frontier.

2. To repel an immediate attack upon the Rhine line, there are available in Western Europe at most 18 fully equipped divisions. This estimate rests upon the doubtful assumption that the widely scattered American, British and French Armies of Occupation in Germany could be safely withdrawn under attack and used for the defense of the Rhine position. This estimate also includes 2 French divisions now in North Africa. It does not include French and Dutch forces in the Far East.

3. Allowing for a minimum reserve to guard against a breakthrough, this means that 12 divisions would have to cover a front of almost 500 miles. In 1944-45 the Allies came up to the Rhine line with 7 Armies comprising about 125 divisions. Against this formidable array, the Germans—with most of their forces employed on the Eastern Front—nevertheless brought off an initial breakthrough on a front of 75 miles. It is true that this German breakthrough was aided by weather which grounded all airpower, and that the resulting Battle of the Bulge ended in a costly German defeat. It is also true that the initial Russian striking force would probably not be numerically equal to the German Armies defending the Rhine in 1944-45. It would, however, be the cream of the Russian Army supplied with adequate airpower, whereas the German Army in the West was a badly depleted force, comprising some good and some second-rate divisions and woefully lacking in air support.

Furthermore, the Germans had to spread out their forces to defend the long line of the Rhine, while the Allies could concentrate their major strength at whatever points they might choose for attack. This situation would be reversed. The Allies would have to spread their defense, while the Russians could concentrate their forces at points of their own choosing.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that there is no force in Western Europe today which would be capable of holding the most favorable position from which France and the Low Countries could be defended against the immediately available forces of the Red Army

4. Air Power. At the present time the combined Air Forces of France and the Low Countries would be wholly inadequate even to hold their own against the Soviet Air Power that would be thrown against them. It is doubtful whether the present operational strength of the RAF is sufficient to bring the Western Allies up to parity. It is certainly not sufficient to give the defending forces a superiority in the air which would offset their inferiority on the ground. On the other hand, immediate intervention by the United States Air Forces now in Europe and their rapid reinforcement from the United States—plus the tactical use of atomic bombs—could greatly aid an inferior ground force to hold the line of the Rhine. Even with the assistance of such air support, however, the presently available ground forces would be wholly inadequate.

5. The assumption is submitted—for challenge and correction by competent authority—that a ground force capable of holding the Rhine line would have to comprise at least forty (40) fully equipped divisions, 10 of them armored. In addition, this front line force would have to have full tactical and strategic air support, and air-raid protection would have to be provided for the cities and industrial centres of Western Europe and the British Isles. Furthermore, since Western Europe would depend upon American supplies, and since the Soviet Union disposes of a substantial fleet of modern submarines, the overseas routes of supply would have to be protected by powerful naval and air forces.

6. To create an adequate defense establishment for Western Europe—even if we supplied the greater part of the equipment and undertook to keep the sea-lanes protected—would require a mobilization of manpower and resources sufficient to disrupt the present efforts to achieve recovery and economic self-support. To whatever extent recovery might be impeded, the defense of Western Europe against political penetration would be weakened.

7. And finally, assuming that the sacrifice in political security were accepted, it would take at least a year and probably considerably longer—even with the full cooperation of the United States and Canada—to create a force in Western Europe capable of holding the Rhine frontier against presently available Soviet forces. During this time it would be possible for the Soviet Union to double its initial striking force by merely concentrating and making ready a larger number of its existing forces.

In other words, at the end of a year of stupendous effort on the part of the West, the Red Army would still be in a position to march to the Channel, if it were not deterred from so doing by considerations other than the state of Western European defenses.

One other factor must be borne in mind. France might normally be expected to supply the bulk of the ground forces necessary to defend the Rhine. (In 1939 France was able to put 90 divisions into the field.) But this is now a dangerous illusion. The French military establishment was utterly destroyed in 1940 and must be rebuilt from the ground up. France has practically no modern equipment and very few reserves trained in its use—even if we were to supply the equipment for expansion. Worst of all, if France resorts to conscription, at least one out of every four recruits is likely to be a Communist or Communist sympathizer. The recent utterances of MM. Thorez and Cachin leave little doubt as to the attitude of French Communists in a war against the Soviet Union. Russia would have a far more numerous and more highly disciplined fifth column in France than the Nazis had in 1939-40.

In varying degrees, this same factor must be considered in all the countries of Western Europe.

There are only two ways of escape from this defense dilemma: one is the conscription and rearmament of perhaps 20 German divisions; the other is the stationing in Europe of two full American or Canadian Armies, with their own air support and services of supply.

Either alternative would be provocative in the extreme.

In addition, the remilitarization of Germany would destroy the fighting morale of Western Europe, whereas the commitment of two full Armies to the holding of Western Europe would seriously impair the freedom of action of Canada and the United States, thereby prejudicing their chances of ultimate victory in the event of war.

This will suffice to illustrate what I mean, when I say that the basic premises of the proposed Treaty and rearmament program urgently require re-examination.

Alternative Proposal.

In ordinary circumstances, I do not think it is incumbent upon one, who criticizes a proposal, to offer a substitute. If you see a man about to walk off a precipice, it is enough to shout a warning.

But these are not ordinary circumstances. We are already so deeply committed to some sort of Atlantic Security Pact that a complete reversal of policy is out of the question. Moreover, I have no quarrel with the purpose of the current proposal. I think it is most desirable to deter the Soviet Union from military adventure and to give Western Europe as much reassurance against attack as we possibly can. I merely contend, for the reasons already stated, that the current proposal is more likely to provoke than to deter attack, that it does not give Western Europe anything more than the illusion of military security, and that it seriously weakens the defense against political penetration.

Given these circumstances, I have felt under obligations to state an alternative which I believe would better accomplish a purpose with which I am in full agreement. The following proposal for modification of the Atlantic Security Pact and for the initiation of negotiations for a broader security system was presented to the Secretary of State on February 26. It has not hitherto been published.

I.

Working Hypothesis.

1. Russia wants to gain control of Western Europe. (This is not necessarily true but it is unsafe to start from any other assumption.) In the event of war, it would be Russia's primary objective to capture Western Europe, North Africa and the Middle East.

2. Russian control of Western Europe would be a direct threat to the security of the United States.

3. Without having first gained control of Western Europe, Russia does not want to risk war with the United States.

4. Russia will, therefore, try every means short of risking war to gain control of Western Europe. So far, her effort has been political—an attempt to exploit discontent, to sabotage recovery, to create cleavages and promote civil strife in order to bring Western European Governments under Communist control.

5. Failing in this political effort, Russia will resort to armed force, only if

   a) she thinks that the United States would not intervene, or

   b) she thinks she is strong enough successfully to challenge the United States, or

   c) civil war in Western Europe offers an irresistible opportunity for decisive intervention, or appears to threaten her own security.

II.

Indicated Policy for the United States.

1. To continue and reinforce our present efforts to secure Western Europe against political conquest by promoting economic recovery and political stability.

2. To make it as clear as we can, within the Constitutional process, that a military attack upon Western Europe would be regarded by us as an attack upon ourselves.

3. To make it clear beyond any doubt that Russia cannot hope to win a war against the United States.

4. To avoid crystallizing the division of the world into two orbits and to maintain as much fluidity as possible in the middle areas.

5. To seek, rather than to avoid, an overall settlement of the German problem.

6. To get the Red Army back behind the Soviet frontier.

III.

Suggested Implementation of Such a Policy.

In order to carry out the six aims just stated, I have put forward four specific recommendations:

A. A modification of the proposed Atlantic Security proposal.

B. The re-convening of the Council of Foreign Ministers to settle the East-West dispute over Berlin and to create the conditions in which progress toward a final German peace settlement becomes possible.

C. The initiation of preliminary talks with Great Britain and the Soviet Union leading to the negotiation of a Treaty of Europe.

D. The eventual negotiation of a similar Treaty of Asia.

Let me now take up each of these four points in order.

A.

Modification of the Atlantic Security Proposal.

1. Limit the Pact to the United States, Canada, Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg. Suspend all other conversations or negotiations.

2. Abandon the attempt to force, promote or assist rearmament, except for purposes of internal security, by the four Continental signatories.

3. Provide, instead:

   a) that the Continental signatories, while maintaining armed forces sufficient to preserve internal order, shall cease wasting any of their resources on rearmament against possible Soviet attack, and shall devote their entire energies and resources to the achievement of economic recovery and political stability.

   b) that France and the Netherlands shall agree to accept and abide by United Nations mediation of their current colonial wars and shall repatriate their troops now in the Fast East.

   c) that Great Britain, Canada and the United States shall coordinate their military, naval and air establishments in such a way as to provide jointly the maximum of power which can be brought to bear instantly upon a potential aggressor against any of the signatories.

Note: The purposes of this modification are:

1. To make it clear that the United States, Great Britain and Canada would consider an attack upon the Continental signatories as an attack upon themselves, which would cause them forthwith to treat the attacking power as an enemy, without, however, implying that the United States, Great Britain and Canada would, if they went to war, necessarily fight such an enemy on the European Continent.

2. To relieve the Continental signatories of the burden of rebuilding and maintaining armaments, and to enable them to apply their full energies to the strengthening of their social and economic defenses against political penetration or subversion.

I submit that this proposal conforms to the realities of the situation as it exists today. It avoids ambiguities which might lead to miscalculation by a potential aggressor or false expectations on the part of our friends. If certain objections occur to you, as I am sure they will, I would ask you to withhold judgment until you have heard the whole of my proposal.

I come now to the matter of Germany.

B.

Reconvening the Council of Foreign Ministers.

Proposed Action.

1. Suspend temporarily the attempt to write an Occupation Statute or a constitution for a West German State.

2. Demand the lifting of the Soviet blockade of the Western Sectors of Berlin as a precondition for an overall discussion of the entire problem of Germany.

3. Fix a date within the next three months upon which the Council of Foreign Ministers is to meet in Berlin.

4. Make it clear that our Secretary of State is going to Berlin with the intention of bringing about:

   a) a Four Power Agreement to permit Germany to function as an economic whole;

   b) the removal of the zonal barriers to trade and travel;

   c) the creation of conditions in which the Laender (State) Governments may function under Four Power supervision on a basis similar to that now established with regard to the Austrian Government, and in which the Laender

Governments may gradually work toward the establishment of a Federal Government for all of Germany;

d) the withdrawal of occupation forces other than the minimum contingents required to maintain internal order and to prevent illegal rearmament.

Notes.

1. It should be made perfectly clear that the Council of Foreign Ministers would not now be expected to write a German Peace Treaty.

2. We are at present in the position of seemingly not wishing to resume the attempt to unify Germany on the federal principle, although our official policy has been in favor of unification. If we are now in favor of partition, we should say so. If not, we should deny to the Russians the propaganda advantage of apparently favoring unification while we oppose it.

3. Two major obstacles to agreement with the Russians are:
   a) Control of the Ruhr. If we are willing to permit Germany to function as an economic entity under Four Power supervision, the Russians would automatically obtain a voice in the control of Ruhr industry.
   b) Reparations. If we have the desire to do so, there is a way to reach a compromise on the ambiguous Yalta Agreement, namely: to agree that Germany shall pay certain reparations out of current production, but not until after she is self-supporting and has repaid the United States and Great Britain for the money pumped into the Western Zones.

4. If agreement is reached on the Ruhr and Reparations, it may be possible to obtain Russian agreement to a revision of the Polish-German frontier with respect to some of the purely agricultural territories.

So much for the proposal with regard to Germany. Here, too, I must ask you to consider the suggestions made as part of the plan as a whole, and particularly to bear in mind that this German proposal goes hand in hand with the next item, namely, the Treaty of Europe.

C.

Treaty of Europe.

What is suggested here is a tripartite treaty between the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union, to be proposed to Great Britain and the Soviet Union as an extension to all of Europe of the disarmament idea contained in the modified Atlantic Security Pact.

This treaty would:

1. Guarantee (a) the permanent demilitarization of Germany, and (b) the control of Ruhr coal and steel for the benefit of all of Europe, including Germany. The guarantee of (b) should be contingent upon agreement that the principle of allocating coal and steel should be applied to all European producers of these products, not, however, including Great Britain or the Soviet Union.

Note: This would mean that Russia, Great Britain and the United States, as non-Continental powers, would have no voice—except perhaps as arbiters—in the allocation of coal and steel among the European countries. Continental countries, like France or Poland, would have a voice only if their own production of coal or steel were likewise subject to allocation by the European Coal Authority. (The present Ruhr Agreement is, in the long run, unenforceable, because it denies the Eastern countries any voice in the distribution of Ruhr products and creates for Germany a status of permanent second-class nationhood. Both defects would be remedied by the foregoing proposal.)

2. Provide for the withdrawal from the European Continent West of the Soviet frontier of all United States, British and Russian troops, with the following exception:

   So long as the Occupying Powers deem it necessary to maintain Armies of Occupation in Germany or Austria, or in both, the United States and Great Britain combined may maintain on the Continent the equivalent of not more than 1 armored division and 1 motorized infantry division; and the Soviet Union may maintain a like force if it so desires. (The reason for excluding France from the exception will be apparent from article 3.)

Note: Nothing in this agreement should prevent the United States from stationing whatever forces it might, in agreement with Great Britain, decide to maintain in the British Isles.

3. The Treaty would guarantee all the nations of Europe west of the Soviet Frontier against aggression, as defined by the United Nations Security Council, on condition that these nations themselves would agree to maintain only such military forces as are necessary to preserve internal order, and that they would agree further to permit inspection by United Nations authorities of all military establishments and factories capable of producing offensive weapons.

Note: This would mean that no country on the Continent of Europe would be permitted to create or maintain a military force capable of offensive action against a neighbor, nor to own or manufacture heavy weapons, such as tanks, heavy artillery, bombs or bombing planes.

Conversely, it would mean that the peoples of the entire Continent would be relieved of the burden of maintaining armaments, and would rely, for "police protection" upon the three guarantors.

D.

Treaty of Asia.

It is suggested that the negotiation of a similar treaty with regard to Asia be contemplated at some time in the not too distant future. In this treaty, Australia might perhaps take the place of Great Britain as the third guarantor.

Summary Argument in Support of the Proposal.

You have now heard the whole of the alternative which I have ventured to suggest in place of the Atlantic Pact—Rearmament Proposal sponsored by our Government. In presenting these ideas, I wrote to the Secretary of State as follows:

"These suggestions are put forward—not as an ultimate solution—but as a means of providing the most effective temporary guaranties of peace and security in a world which still operates on the anachronistic principle of power politics. The ultimate solution requires the establishment of a world organization capable of enacting, administering and enforcing world law. In the meanwhile, however, the foregoing procedure might offer the following eight advantages over the course at present contemplated:

1. It would make clear to the Soviet Union and to the world that the cold war has not become an end in itself—that we seek and are willing to reach a peace settlement.

2. It would provide a realistically strong deterrent to Soviet aggression, without creating dangerous ambiguities or provocation.

3. It would get the Russian Army out of Europe (except for 2 divisions in Germany), while still leaving a token American force in Germany, which would have to be over-run if the Red Army moved westward. This is probably the strongest guarantee of immediate military action by the United States.

4. It would result in much faster attainment of economic self-support and political stability in Western Europe, thereby strengthening its political defenses and frustrating the Russian design of conquest by penetration and subversion.

5. It would save the United States not only the cost of rearming Western Europe, but also the cost of an indefinitely protracted ERP.

6. It would free the United States to apply its surplus economic resources at the points of maximum leverage throughout the world, instead of concentrating them only in Western Europe.

7. It would enable the United States, Great Britain and Canada (and perhaps other members of the Commonwealth) to preserve their freedom of action and to build up their military strength where it would count as a deterrent, or, in the last analysis, where it would count in a war—instead of prematurely committing a large part of their strength to the dubious defense of Western Europe.

8. Once the Continent of Europe west of the Soviet frontier were neutralized by the proposed Treaty of Europe, it would become possible for the Western Powers and the Soviet Union to discuss realistically the reduction of their own armaments and the ultimate transformation of the United Nations into an organization capable of enacting, administering and enforcing world law."

That is the case presented to the Secretary of State.

That is the case I present to you. Doubtless it contains flaws and is subject to objections. I have put it forward in the hope that criticism and discussion will shape it into a more useful program than that at present sponsored by our Government.

It may well be that the negotiations have gone so far that a modification of the pact itself is no longer possible. Even if that should be the case, the rearmament program will remain open to discussion and reconsideration. Nor is there anything in the treaty to prevent our undertaking the other parallel actions suggested.

The suggestions put forward add up to nothing more than a method of seeking a relaxation of existing tensions and thus providing a breathing space in which to work for the ultimate solution. Even the best of treaties between sovereign nation-states will not bring about a lasting peace. The fact remains that there is no way to achieve lasting peace without ending the state of international anarchy—no way to end that anarchy or the all-devouring arms race without the establishment of world law and the agencies to enforce it.

This is the goal we must steadfastly keep before us. This is the house we must build, if our children and grandchildren are to live out their lives in peace. But—and here I end where I began—we shall never build that house of peace, if we concern ourselves solely with the blueprints and the builder's contract, while the material we have painfully collected goes up in flames.

We must work now for the assumption of the initiative by our Government toward transforming the United Nations into a World Government. But we must also work for the breathing space in which that transformation can take place.

E. R. MURROW - 3/11/49 - 3-3-3-3-3-3-3-3-3-3-3 EXCERPT - WARBURG INTERVIEW

Today, the representatives of the Protestant Churches meeting in Cleveland called upon the Senate not to take final action on the North Atlantic Pact until the American people have had an opportunity to gain a full understanding of its meaning. What we know about the terms of the Pact has come from a series of statements made by the State Department; and since it is the Department's job to get this Pact approved it cannot be regarded as wholly impartial.

In the interests of stimulating discussion on this important subject, I think you ought to hear from one of the most persistent and able critics of the North Atlantic Pact. James P. Warburg, former banker and expert on international affairs, has been submitting a series of memoranda to Congressmen and to the State Department. On the matter of straightaway military defense, Mr. Warburg holds that, because of insufficient manpower, inadequate industrial capacity - Western Europe can never reach a position where it could beat off a Russian attack, unless we re-arm Western Germany or station American armies in Europe.

But the nub of Mr. Warburg's objection is that the real threat to the free nations of Europe is political rather than military; that instead of spending their money and ours on re-armament they should concentrate on economic recovery and political stability. Having sufficient armed strength to maintain internal security, without trying to build up a military force that in any event couldn't stop the Russians.

Jimmy Warburg has proposed, and in fact has printed an alternative proposition that he thinks would achieve the desired objective. We'll start with a simple question: Jimmy, what's the real essence of your alternative plan?

WARBURG: The real essence is that I believe the present proposal is more likely to provoke than deter aggression, and that my alternative will deter military aggression without opening the door to political penetration.

MURROW: Do you propose that we should go to war if any European nation is attacked?

WARBURG: I propose that we make the clearest commitment we can within the Constitutional process, to go to war against the Soviet Union if it attacks any country in Europe outside the Soviet orbit. But I also propose that we make it completely clear that this is a commitment to avenge, to try to liberate, but not necessarily to defend Western Europe against invasion.

MURROW: Now wait a minute: are you saying that Western Europe can't be defended?

WARBURG: I am saying that the present proposal implies that we shall defend Western Europe, and Mr. Queuille, the French Prime Minister, clearly stated the other day that this is his understanding. Whereas we cannot defend Western Europe without doing one of two things, either of which is likely to provoke the very attack we seek to prevent - re-arming the Germans, or committing two full American armies to the defense of Western Europe, and stationing them there before any war starts. Let's get this clear: there is a Soviet threat to Western Europe which is a definite threat to our own security. But the nature of this threat is primarily political. If it were primarily military, the Red Army could long ago have marched to the Channel.

MURROW: All right, how are you going to meet this political threat?

WARBURG: Whereas our Government's proposal demands as a quid pro quo that the Western European nations shall re-arm themselves, my suggestion is that we demand precisely the opposite - namely, that the Western European nations shall maintain only such military forces as are necessary to preserve internal order; and shall concentrate their entire resources and efforts on building their political defenses, that is, on achieving economic recovery and political stability. You have to bear in mind, Ed, that if we re-arm say forty French divisions today, at tremendous cost, one out of every four men we arm will be a Communist.

MURROW: And the only way to reduce that Communist Fifth Column is not to put them in the army, but to improve their working conditions, their economic stability, and remove the mass discontent on which Communism thrives. Is that what you're saying?

WARBURG: Precisely: and my proposal goes further. In addition to a modified Atlantic Pact I have proposed a Treaty of Europe which applies the same idea of disarmament to all the countries of the Continent - on both sides of the Iron Curtain; and which would get the Red Army back behind the Soviet frontier.

MURROW: I can see that you don't want to talk to the Russians unless you've got something concrete to talk about. But tell me this: how are you going to get that Red Army out of Germany?

E. R. MURROW - 3/11/49 - 5-5-5-5-5-5-5-5-5-5 EXCERPT - WARBURG INTERVIEW

WARBURG: I have made a specific proposal with regard to Germany. I have suggested that we stop running away from the German problem and that we deliberately face it; that we propose the removal of zonal barriers, and the withdrawal of all occupation forces - except for a maximum of two Russian divisions and two Anglo-American divisions. This is what the Russians have been proposing themselves, thereby putting us on a spot - by making it appear that they want to get out of Germany and we don't. I have proposed that we call that hand.

MURROW: Then you would delay the formation of a West German government?

WARBURG: I have specifically proposed that we suspend the creation of a West German State, while we make one more effort to create conditions from which a united democratic federal German State may emerge. If that is no longer our purpose, and if we are now in favor of permanent partition, I have suggested that it is high time we should say so.

MURROW: As I understand it, you agree that Western Europe is threatened by Communism.

WARBURG: Yes, it is threatened by political penetration, and if it succumbs to Communist penetration there will be a very real military threat to the United States which at present does not exist.

MURROW: And you would meet that threat of penetration with economic rather than purely military measures.

WARBURG: I would meet it with both. But the military measures apply to maintaining our own strength and our own freedom of action, whereas the economic measures apply to the countries to be protected. In other words, it is Europe's job to lock the door against political penetration; and our job to deter military aggression by the maintenance of superior power...and the freedom to apply it where it will hurt most - if the Russians come through the door.

MURROW: What chance do you think your proposals have of being adopted?

WARBURG: I would be quite optimistic if I thought the American people would be given a chance to understand the problem, and to apply their native common sense to its solution.

MURROW: That's the reason I asked you to join me tonight, in the hope that what you said would not only illuminate an alternative but start a few first-class arguments.

E. R. MURROW - 3/11/49 - 6-6-6-6-6-6-6-6-6-6

C O M M E R C I A L

MURROW: Well Ernest, since the weekend's coming up here are two quotations instead of one. Either one might fit what Jimmy Warburg had to say. The first is from Longfellow: "We judge ourselves by what we feel capable of doing, while others judge us by what we have already done." The second from Macauley: "Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly, as when they discuss it freely."

Good night and good luck!

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

February 17, 1949

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Dear Ed:

I enclose herewith a follow-up which I am sending today to the same group of Senators and Representatives to whom I sent my first memorandum on the Atlantic Alliance on February 1. This material is marked for release Monday, February 21.

Very sincerely,

Jim

Que penses-tu, mon vieux?

JPW:jmw
Enc.

June 14, 1948

Dear Mr. Warburg:

Your letter of June 3rd was received last week during Mr. Murrow's absence. As you may know, his nightly broadcast is off the air for the Summer, and Mr. Murrow is now out of town on vacation.

Your letter will be called to his attention upon his return to the office.

Sincerely yours,

Dorothy McDonough
Secretary to Mr. Murrow

Mr. James Warburg
70 East 45th Street
Room 2720
New York 17, New York

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

June 3, 1948

Dear Ed:

We don't seem to have much luck reaching each other on the phone. One of the things I had hoped to talk to you about is an item which I think might make a very interesting subject for one of your broadcasts on some night when the hot news is thin.

A Mrs. Potter from Greenwich, whom I got to know through the usual fan mail business, sent me a copy of a letter she had written to President Truman, a copy of which I enclose. The letter struck me as so good that I got in touch with her and went to see her the other night. I was interested both in how she came to write it and what response she got. I will not go into details here about either, except to say that both made a very interesting story, especially the amazing number of thoughtful letters she received from all sorts of business, labor, educational and religious leaders.

The value of the story -- if you are interested -- would be that it shows how much a completely unknown individual citizen can do if he or she really gets down to it. Should you be interested, I think it would be worth-while to get her to tell you her story first-hand, but in any case I would like to know your reaction.

As ever,

Jim

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

JPW:jm
Enc.

Mr. President:-

Each citizen in our country and in Russia has the privilege of defending his land, his institutions and his people on the field of battle. Surely it is equally the right and duty of each citizen to wage defense of any other honest sort. And so I am writing today to the two men most responsible for continued life upon this planet. I am not presumptuous and do not pretend to know as much as you do, or as Marshall Stalin does, but perhaps in one small way I may know more. For I am not beneath fierce pressure of any but one strict constraint - to give my mind, my will, my life to strengthening conditions on this earth which, alone, could justify my having brought two sons to live upon it.

Nor do I for one moment think that something less than gradual improvement for each person everywhere can realize a safe advantage for a person anywhere. Since I am not committed to the maintenance of a system or a party at the expense of other systems and of other parties, I am free to see the limitless advantage of collective effort for a common benefit, and the measureless menace that coils in a frozen, obsolete adherence to self interest, party promotion and myopic nationalism. I can see, sir, that the welfare of my sons is quite dependent on the welfare of a Russian's sons, and that Americans are free to enjoy life, liberty and pursuit of happiness only if there be expanding hope for these same privileges everywhere in terms contributing to each local definition of what those things may mean. There must be men and women who need shelter more than liberty, and food far more than either. We, in our wealth and freedom must indeed be ready to assist the needy without seeking to impose on them an American pattern of happiness or an American Century. And just as surely Russia, with her power and her zeal and her renascent strength must modify her messianic mission to impose her brand of happiness on nations which prefer to move or flounder towards goals that do no envisage a Communistic State. Can you, Mr. Truman, and can Marshall Stalin, in the midst of crushing burdens of responsibility, see as clearly as can an unencumbered citizen, the awful and imperative need to believe NOW, TODAY that you can maintain your nations and your systems only if such maintenance be founded on real faith and not on fear? Can you, as well as I, believe that we must somehow give the Russians confidence in our willingness to be an operating part of an interlocking world in which a Communistic State may play a stellar role, and that to this same extent the Russians must some how find a way to give you confidence that they will co-operate in this all too closely bound up world in which non-Communistic states must soon be freed from reasonable fear of infiltration and of seizure?

For those of us not dominated by a military caste or by big pressure groups and selfish interests, it is all too keenly evident that two nations such as ours, cannot, because we fear each other, push out extending "friendly" spheres in order to protect ourselves, when every such extension is in fact, if not intention, an offensive move against the other. We cannot reach out into areas along the Russian frontiers without alarming them and causing them to grasp another bastion, which in turn intensifies our fear - and so the hideous contest still persists until the tensions grow too taut to bear - and all that they have hoped and worked to build, and all that we have striven to achieve is lost in a vast holocaust of splintered bodies, shattered minds, demolished cities and ravaged countrysides.

And all the dreams of all the Russians, and all the hopes and institutions of America will be dirty silence, fetid quiet. The noise of building will be stilled. The sound of searching will be hushed. The glow of dreaming will be cold and dead. Perhaps some Russians will survive and in the wilderness that would remain, the Communist Party could hardly attract them from the caves, and the Manifesto would have little meaning for the miserable and lonely, terror-ridden creatures slinking from an ash heap to a crater, picking bits of sustenance among the bones of all their dead.

But equally, the few Americans who then would still exist, would watch with terrible bewilderment the ruins of our land - ruins out of which would creep the ones that had been spared. Would all the shining words of our great Constitution have a message for them then?

And every line of every poem not remembered in these minds would all be lost forever. And all the pictures that the gifted men had painted, all the plans great men had carried out, all the spires of all Cathedrals, and all the sounds of symphonies - all lost.

And why?

Because at this late moment neither of you two all empowered men could reach a point of grandeur at which a first beginning could be made towards substituting faith for fear, and confidence for military planning.

I understand, indeed, that Russia must recall the march of British and American soldiers on her soil soon after the first world war, and that they did not trust us. I can see with horrid clarity that they would transform the former Cordon Sanitaire of "unfriendly" states imposed along their borders into states they could control. Nothing could be plainer than that Munich and the Russo-German Pact should spawn a horde of fears and erect a wall of dark distrust - and that Russia should determine grimly that the West would never sell her out again. And as this resolve was translated into ruthless seizures, newly won affection and admiration of large masses of Americans grew colder. Irresponsible hot-heads in their country and in ours began to mutter threats, then shout for war. There was little difference in degree of provocation.

And so we frightened them and they reached further to acquire more protection. That frightened us and you sent out our ships, our wealth, our experts and technicians to protect the ones who would protect the ones protecting us. And there we are - unpoised, unbalanced and afraid.

I plead with both of you - acknowledge that the frightful import of our danger - theirs and ours - transcends at this most fateful moment, the significance of who is first to blame. What is of poignant, critical importance NOW, TODAY, is this - will it be you, or will it be the Russian who will come forth in gleaming armour of great courage and display the valour necessary for that first step in turning back this sinful and so terrible a trend? For, standing here in the valley of annonymity and unimportance, I will not believe that from your mighty heights of unexhausted power, one of you will not make the gesture which will redeem the world from savage desolation - a world admittedly imperfect, often base, and always moving forward towards achievement of the high and luminous goals set for it by the illustrious of all the earth.

Very truly yours,

Belle Haven, Greenwich, Connecticut
March 23, 1948

May 20, 1948

MR. JAMES WARBURG
C/O MRS. GRACE FRY
584 EAST BROAD STREET
COLUMBUS, OHIO

FORGIVE DELAYED ANSWER YOURS MAY 5TH BUT SOMEWHAT RUSHED STOP SORRY UNABLE UPPICK PORTIONS YOUR SPEECH TODAY STOP ANXIOUSEST SEE YOU PLEASE

TELEPHONE WHEN YOU RETURN. REGARDS

ED MURROW

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

May 5,1948.

Hi, Ed, you old spaghetti-hound!

That was a beautiful job of reporting. I've been meaning to get in touch with you before this but I've been so much of an itinerant preacher that I've either been away or getting ready to go somewhere, Some day soon I want to hear some more and also tell you about a really exciting time I had at the University of Colorado. Right now I'm off to the deep South where I've got to do three-a-day for four days next week.

The enclosed speech is a sequel to the one I did in Philly April 3, which you read when we had lunch. That one got remarkable coverage and has really produced some results. For one thing it's being reprinted and used as a text in quite a number of different parts of the country.

This effort is less of a critical analysis of what is and more of an attempt to outline what should be. I'd love to get your reaction to it. Obviously it's too long for radio, but - if you think there's enough in it to make it worth while - I'd be glad to do a short version. If the evening hours are full of other things, you might care to pick me up at noon or thereabouts in Columbus Ohio on the 20th when I have to talk to group which supports the Columbus Town Meeting. I'd have to know in advance because otherwise I'll do that one extemporaneously.

Love to you both.

Jim

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
CBS New York

c/o Mrs Grace Fry
584 East Broad St
Columbus, Ohio

Proof of May 4, 1948.

RELEASE FOR MORNING PAPERS OF MAY 13

LISTEN TO THE PEOPLE

Address to

THE FACULTY AND STUDENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA

Tuscaloosa, Alabama

May 12, 1948

JAMES P. WARBURG

LISTEN TO THE PEOPLE

JAMES P. WARBURG

There is an old saying that, in the long run, a people gets the government it deserves. This may not be true of peoples held in subjugation by force or kept in ignorance by exploitation. But it certainly is true of an informed, free people. If our Government today seems vacillating and incompetent to understand or deal with the complicated problems of a world crisis, this is primarily because it reflects our own uncertainty, our own failure to understand the forces at work in the world and our own inability to envision clearly the task which confronts us as a nation.

In recent months—since my return from abroad last October—I have been privileged to discuss foreign policy with many individuals and groups in widely separated parts of the United States. I have talked with farmers, labor leaders and factory workers—with educators, college students and high school classes—with business men, newspaper men, women's clubs and men's clubs. Wherever I have gone, I have found a common denominator of anxiety and confusion. Wherever I have gone, I have found people eager for facts concerning the world problem, apprehensive concerning our present foreign policy, and suspicious of the propaganda being fed to them from high quarters.

It is probably true that we have today the Government which we deserved on the basis of the state of mind which existed in 1946, when the present Congress was elected. But I am convinced that the state of mind of the American people is now far advanced over what it was in 1946 and —as a consequence—far ahead of the present Congress and Administration.

One cannot travel about this great land of ours without being impressed with three essential qualities which seem inherent in its people. These common characteristics are courage, common sense, and an abiding faith in the future. One should perhaps expect to find these attributes among a people which is the most fortunate on this earth. And yet, re-discovering these qualities at a time like the present is a refreshing experience for one who has seen the fear, the despair, and the resignation one encounters today among many of the peoples of Europe and Asia.

To find courage, common sense and faith in a better future throughout the length and breadth of this land is also a healthy antidote for any citizen who has recently spent much time in our nation's capital. For it is a sad fact that our Government is, to a very large extent, acting out of fear rather than faith and that it is deliberately promoting anxiety among the people in order to obtain a mandate for its fear-inspired policies.

The original concept of the Marshall Plan was a major exception to this broad indictment. This was a project born out of characteristic American courage, common sense and idealistic vision. Yet even this brave project has been furthered through Congress by a deliberate campaign of officially instigated fear. It has been launched upon the world in the context of a panic-inspired negative crusade. As originally designed by Secretary Marshall, the European Recovery Plan was a "policy not directed against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos". It was later sold to Congress primarily as an instrument of power politics to be used in a "cold war" against the Soviet Union and the communist ideology.

But, whereas the Congressional pot was boiled by piling on the fuel of fear and hate, it was not fear and hate which sold the European Recovery Plan to the American people. A Roper Public Opinion Survey, published in April, shortly after the Foreign Aid Bill passed through Congress, stated that "Heavy majorities want to help a sick and hungry Europe and to assist the Western democracies to become self-supporting again. Among the people, the least persuasive reason for backing the Marshall Plan is that it will halt Communism."

This survey corroborates my own impression that the American people are today far ahead of their elected Government. They have no illusions about Russia or Communism. They recognize that both must be checked. They want no part of any policy of appeasement. But they instinctively reject the over-simplified notion that the whole world crisis is caused by Moscow and that American policy should pursue the sole aim of blocking whatever the Russians try to accomplish. The American people seem to feel—without quite knowing why they feel it—that there is something undignified and unworthy of a great nation in our present policy. Beyond that, they feel—if I am any judge of their feelings—that our present policy will lead us sooner or later to war.

In both respects the American people are, I think, profoundly right. There is something undignified and unworthy of a great nation in our present conduct. To put it baldly, American foreign policy is today made in Moscow rather than in Washington. If Moscow pulls or pushes, we pull or push in the opposite direction. If Moscow waits, we wait. If Moscow says that two plus two equals four, we say automatically that two plus two equals something else. The same thing is true in reverse. Russian policy is today made less in Moscow than in Washington, and by the same fear-inspired and undignified process. The two greatest nations on this troubled planet—the two nations upon whose action depends the future of mankind upon this planet—are acting like two angry little boys. . . .

"Yah! Your sister has a wart on her nose!"

"Boo! That's a lie! My mother says your mother never washes her hair!"

Never mind who started it. What matters to you and me is that the Government of the United States of America is conducting an infantile "Yah! Boo!" diplomacy, and that this is unworthy of a mature people.

The American people are also probably right in their intuition that the present course of their Government leads to war. The people are certainly right in their conviction that war is no longer an acceptable instrument of policy, and in their inarticulate but nonetheless firmly rooted belief that what we need is a positive American policy for peace.

The fact that we are in an election year should by rights make it easier for ordinary citizens to assert their will. But, unless the issues are clarified in the coming conventions and during the campaign this summer, there is little chance that the normal electoral process will cure the ills from which we are now suffering. This is because our present foreign policy is the product of both of our two major Parties. It is just as much Senator Vandenberg's policy, or Mr. Stassen's policy, or the policy of Mr. John Foster Dulles as it is the policy of the President, or his Cabinet. Each Party can, and will no doubt, claim as its own whatever it conceives to be good in the bipartisan product and blame the other Party for what it admits to be bad. But the fact remains that both Parties have had a hand in the making of the pudding and both are committed to eating it. The leadership of both Parties is committed to the doctrine that Russia —and Russia alone—has caused the present state of world affairs and that the way to cure the crisis is to stop Russia. Both sides of the aisle would like to stop Russia short of war, but both are ready to employ our own military force, if loud words, lavish dollars and military bluster fail to do the job.

What about the Third Party? In rejecting both the Marshall Plan and the Truman Doctrine, it throws away the good along with the bad. Nevertheless, it recognizes many of the mistakes made by the bipartisan leadership. Mr. Wallace articulates many of the misgivings of the American people concerning our present course of action. But—unhappily—the Third Party's recognition of the basic fallacy in the bipartisan Stop-Russia crusade is more apparent than real. The Third Party merely turns the fallacy upside-down. Where Mr. Truman and his bipartisan advisors assert that our basic aim must be to checkmate the Soviet Union, Mr. Wallace and his followers seem to believe that the whole world crisis can be cured if we make some sort of deal with the Soviet Union.

The point I wish to make is not merely that the details of this proposed agreement remain shrouded in mystery, but that Mr. Wallace, too, has lost sight of the woods for seeing the Soviet trees. The bipartisans blame Russia for everything and think getting together with Russia is not only impossible but, at this point, undesirable. Mr. Wallace divides the blame for the present deadlock between Russia and ourselves. But Mr. Wallace, too, conveys the impression that the world crisis is primarily a Russo-American crisis, which he proposes to cure, if elected President, by sitting down and talking to Mr. Stalin.

Thus, all three of the political Parties have so far ignored the one fact which must be fundamental to any constructive program for peace—the fact that the world crisis cannot be cured either by merely trying to stop Russia or by merely trying to reach a friendly agreement with the Soviet Union.

What we need at last to realize is that the world crisis derives from a number of major causes which are the product of the time in which we live, and which have little or nothing to do with the nature or intentions of either the Soviet Union or the United States.

This is not to say that Mr. Truman is wholly wrong in his accusations against Moscow, nor that Mr. Wallace is wholly wrong in his accusations against our present bipartisan leadership. Both Washington and Moscow have contributed to the sharpening of the crisis and to the present threat to world peace. Mr. Truman is right in his conviction that Soviet expansion must be stopped. And Mr. Wallace is right in his conviction that the cold war must be stopped, and that Mr. Truman's present policy is the road to an atomic war—a war which may check Soviet expansion, but which may also destroy western civilization. But both our bipartisan leaders and Mr. Wallace, who aspires to leadership, exaggerate—not the importance—but the relative importance of the existing tensions between the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. These tensions are dangerous and must be relaxed. But we cannot afford to forget that, though Russia and the United States are now the two most powerful nations on this earth, there remain some 1,500,000,000 people in the world who are neither Americans nor Russians and who—no matter how much we disregard them as power-factors—will nevertheless have a hand in shaping the world's destiny—unless they are ground to pieces in a naked power struggle for world supremacy between the rival giants.

The U. S. and the U. S. S. R. do have the power to launch an atomic and bacteriological war which may well set back the human race to the primitive condition of its earliest beginnings. The U. S. and the U. S. S. R. do have the power to prevent the making of a just and enduring peace. But the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. do not alone have the power to make such a peace. That power rests, to a large extent, in hands which we are all too prone to regard as powerless. That power rests, not only in the two super-states but in the hands of the hard-pressed peoples of Europe, the starving masses of Asia, the young nations of Latin America and of the British Commonwealth—and even in the hands of the dependent peoples now slowly emerging into freedom.

While the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. have been glowering at each other in a state of increasing hostility, these 1,500,000,000 human beings have already set their feet upon the road to peace. We do not have to discover the answer to the world crisis. We have merely to recognize the answer which has already been given and to support the peoples who are leading the way. Broadly speaking, this already indicated answer to the world crisis falls into two main parts.

The first part of the answer consists of a recognition that modern science and technology have made a world formerly divided by oceans, mountains and deserts into One World—one little world in which there can be neither peace nor prosperity for any people unless there is peace and prosperity for all peoples. It consists of a recognition that a world, which has physically become one, cannot long remain politically divided; and that it is going to become unified either—through war—as a Russian-or American dominated world, or else—without war—as a world united under world law enforced by World Government.

Except for the Soviet Union and the United States, most of the nations of the world have already recognized that the only way to achieve One World by peaceful means lies through building the United Nations into a World Government of limited powers, endowed with the sole right to maintain and, if necessary, to use armed force to preserve the peace. They have declared themselves in favor of this course. But we and the Soviet Union are each so obsessed with the nightmare of a world dominated by the other that we each think only of preventing that catastrophe by acquiring world domination ourselves. Russia, being in a minority in the UN, is afraid of a strong world organization which she cannot control. We, who could lead the majority of UN members, consider the whole UN expendable in the interest of stopping Soviet expansion.

The second part of the answer lies in the recognition that we are living in a world-wide revolution—a state of far-reaching and fundamental change, in which the old structural forms of society are gradually being replaced by new forms arising out of present needs.

Outside of the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. few people believe that the time has come when all the inhabitants of this earth must choose to become either good little communists or good little free-enterprise capitalists.

But the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. are each preaching their respective doctrines—like two rival church hierarchies—as the only road to salvation.

Outside of the U. S. and the U. S. S. R. most of the inhabitants of this earth are in the process of developing a way of life—or ways of life—which combine their ideals of liberty with what they conceive to be social justice and reasonable security. They are reaching for the instruments of public power to solve their problems within a framework of belief in the freedom and dignity of the individual. They are trying to do this primarily by two means:

FIRST, by breaking up the oppressive power of the big landlords, who have for centuries enslaved the world's producers of food; and SECOND, by breaking up the oppressive power of the private business monopolists who have for generations exploited the world's industrial workers.

This process of peaceful change—this age-old process of man's striving for a better future—has been accelerated by the destruction and dislocation caused by two great wars. The old power-groups have been destroyed or weakened. The old leaderships have been discredited—the old systems disrupted. Power vacuums have been created throughout the world. And into these power vacuums the distressed peoples of the world have sought to penetrate by much the same means and with much the same hopes which once brought the early settlers to the shores of this continent.

The great failure of our Government—the great failure of all of us as citizens of this "land of the Free"—is that we have not understood this peaceful revolution—that we have not placed ourselves in its vanguard as once we placed ourselves in the vanguard of freedom and justice for all men everywhere. We have had our eyes fixed so hysterically upon the Soviet Union, which we conceive to be our enemy, that we have not recognized or even seen the faces of our friends. We have seen only the faces of those who shared our hatred and our fear of communism. We have embraced these strangely assorted people as our friends, not stopping to realize that they opposed not only communism but all progress—not stopping to realize that in lending them our support we were backing selfish landlords against hungry peasants and corrupt monopolists against the masses of mankind.

We have recently had a much-publicized crisis in Italy. We have recently been dragged by our Government through an emotional orgy of fear lest Soviet communism burst out from behind the Iron Curtain and obtain a foothold in Western Europe. We have seen every kind of American power mobilized in an effort to persuade the Italian people to "vote for the United States against Russia." We have won this battle and are now very pleased with our victory. An anti-communist Government is firmly in the saddle—an anti-communist Government which is as definitely, though more politely, committed to be a satellite of the United States as the Czechoslovakian Government is committed to be a satellite of the Soviet Union. This Government will not sneeze without consulting Washington. What are we going to ask this Government to do?

Are we going to see that it acts to remove the economic causes which made approximately one Italian voter out of every three vote communist in spite of all the influence and pressure we could bring to bear? Are we going to urge Mr. de Gasperi to take drastic action to help the Italian share-cropper become a self-respecting farmer owning his little family-type farm? Or are we going to look the other way while things go on as before, leaving to the communists a monopoly in promising land reform? And what about the people in the towns and cities? Are we going to ask Mr. de Gasperi to take steps to regulate the Italian economy so that two million unemployed will find jobs and so that employment will mean enough food to keep body and soul together? Or are we going to look the other way while things continue as they are, with the masses starving and the privileged few eating black-market luxuries and riding in mahogany motorboats on Lake Como?

These are the questions which the peoples of the world are waiting to see answered by the Government of the United States. The same questions arise in China, in Greece, in Germany and Japan. They arise everywhere, where American power is dominant, and where American power has so far been so concerned with building bulwarks against communism that it has lost sight of the injustices which foster the growth of communism even behind our freshly-erected barricades.

The world revolution in which we are living was not created by any nation or doctrine. It would have occurred if Marx had never written and if Russia did not exist. But, by our failure to understand and help the struggling masses of humanity—by our fear of change and our newly-discovered affinity for the status quo—we have left to the Soviet Union the golden opportunity to exploit the revolution—to create the illusion in the minds of the oppressed that totalitarian communism offers the only road to a better future.

Our statesmen and would-be statesmen go up and down our country telling the American people that their own way of life is threatened by any change in the old order anywhere. They seem to have forgotten that once—when we ourselves were hungry and oppressed—we raised the standard of revolt against an old order, and "fired a shot heard round the world."

What we need is to relax from our present spastic condition of self-induced fear. What we need is a completely new appraisal of the world in which we live. What we need is to turn off the tap which now drips poison into the hearts and minds of the American people.

More than new leaders we need a pause in the struggle for leadership during which the sound sense and the native courage of the people may assert their influence upon all men—irrespective of Party—who aspire to leadership.

We need to pass from fear of communism to faith in democracy—from fear of Russia to confidence in ourselves.

So long as we conceive our sole mission to be the frustration of whatever evil design may or may not be hatched in the Kremlin—just so long shall we continue to fail both ourselves and the whole human race. So long as we let Moscow dictate our policy, we shall continue to become more and more like Moscow in our behavior. We shall increasingly meet intolerance with intolerance—fanaticism with fanaticism—brutality with brutality—and chicanery with chicane.

We are already well on our way toward becoming a garrison state—a nation armed to the teeth, yet constantly looking over its shoulder or under the bed for hidden enemies. Such a nation is easily tempted to resort to the ultimate sanction of armed force. At best, such a nation cannot succeed in harnessing its productive energy to reconstruction and peace. Rich are we are, we cannot spend 50 per cent of our national budget on armament and at the same time lend adequate help to world recovery. Without our help, there can be no world recovery, for two-thirds of the entire world's industrial production at present comes from the United States.

Right now—under our present bipartisan leadership—we are burning the candle at both ends. We are simultaneously pursuing two contradictory philosophies in our foreign policy. We are spending something like $6,000,000,000 a year on a positive program for recovery and peace and probably about three times that amount on preparedness for war. Our present defense budget is $11,000,000,000, to which Congress will very likely add at least $4,000,000,000—perhaps considerably more. In addition, there is now the probability of a new Lend-Lease program to rearm Western Europe.

When all is said and done, we shall probably be betting something like 15 cents out of each taxpayer's dollar on peace and at least 45 cents out of each taxpayer's dollar on war.

.Sir John Boyd Orr, head of the Food and Agriculture Organization of the UN and one of the world's leading authorities in nutrition, recently made a challenging statement. He said that we could do more for peace by spending 5 cents on stimulation of world food production than by spending $1.00 on armaments.

It would be the height of folly to take out no insurance whatsoever against the failure of our efforts to bring about a lasting peace. But surely it is equally foolish to carry such heavy insurance against war as to guarantee the failure of our efforts to build the peace.

Our present Foreign Aid Act provides help only to Western Europe. This is undoubtedly the most crucial sector of the world's economy. But the fact remains that Western Europe cannot fully recover unless reasonable prosperity is restored in Eastern Europe, in Asia, Africa and Latin America. It is true that we cannot do everything. But it is also true that we shall probably have to do considerably more to promote recovery than we as yet realize.

One danger of our present two-way course is that we shall commit ourselves so heavily to military expenditures that we shall be both unwilling and unable to take care of such additions to our recovery program as may turn out to be absolutely necessary to its success.

Another danger is that, once we believe in the probability of war to the extent of spending $15,000,000,000 a year on preparedness, we shall begin to wonder whether it makes any sense to pour money into areas like Western Europe, which are almost certain to fall into Russia's hands the moment war begins.

Before President Truman rang the fire alarm on March 17, we were already spending $11,000,000,000 a year on preparedness. Yet Secretary Marshall testified before Congress that our armed forces are "a hollow shell". It might be appropriate to ask why this should be the case, when we have been spending such vast sums on our military establishments? It might be useful to know how much of the $11,000,000,000 is being wasted on armaments suited to the last war instead of to the next one—how much is being wasted in duplication and competition between our theoretically unified services—how many unnecessary chairborne officers are still on the nation's payroll?

It might be useful to bear in mind that—apart from the need for helping other nations—only $1,000,000,000 more a year would put every school child in our own country through second-year high school, and half of them through two years of college, as well as providing adequately trained teachers and safe and sanitary school rooms. This figure is derived from a recent study by the Twentieth Century Fund. The same source declares that for only $2,000,000,000 more a year we could provide every person in the nation with adequate medical and dental care.

Certainly we must be strong in the face of the present crisis. But we must not lose all sense of perspective. We must, it seems to me, re-appraise the nature of the strength we seek. We must be sure whether we want that strength to be applied primarily to building the peace or primarily to insurance against defeat in the event of war. The one does not altogether preclude the other. But the balance between the two will largely determine whether the great weight of this nation falls into the scales on the side of peace or on the side of war.

It is time for our leaders and would-be leaders to take careful note of the greatest asset which this nation possesses—the courage, the common sense and the belief in man of the American people. The people know—even if their leaders do not—that the only real danger of war is the fear of war and the acceptance of its inevitability.

The way to stop that fear is to have the courage and the vision to make a spectacular bet on peace. That is what Secretary Marshall tried unsuccessfully to do last summer. That is what we must redouble our efforts to do now.

The way to stop Russia is to realize that the security of the United Nations is more important to us than the security of the United States, because there can be no security for the United States until the United Nations becomes the effective guardian of the world's security. The people know—even if most of their leaders do not—that the United Nations must be built into a World Government.

Fifteen of our state legislatures have already responded to the popular demand by adopting resolutions approving World Government. Your state of Alabama and my state of Connecticut are among them. In nineteen other states, one house of the legislature has passed such a resolution. A popular referendum in Massachusetts approved the idea by 9 to 1.

Congress is beginning to consider the problem in this light, although so far merely in terms of limited amendments to the UN Charter. Limited amendments will not do the job, although they may perhaps lead to some improvements. The world faces a choice between an armament race leading to war and total disarmament except for the police power of the United Nations. It has been shown again and again that the idea of limitation of armaments is an illusion.

The way to stop Russia is to unite the non-Soviet world in the determination to establish a world community and then to make every effort to get Russia to see that it is in her interest to join that community.

Our present leadership seems to consider such a course foredoomed to failure. There are always men who deny the future because they clutch the past. There were men who thought that a federal union of the thirteen original states was a utopian, unachievable ideal. But the American people achieved the unachievable, even though they later had to fight a war for the preservation of the union.

It may be that the peoples of the world cannot form a world community without another war for the preservation of the union. Such a war would be no less horrible and destructive than the war which now threatens in the form of a naked power struggle between the United States and Russia. But at least such a war would be fought for a constructive purpose. It would leave the world shattered, but at last united in the one form in which it can be united for enduring peace. It may also be that this great ideal can be achieved without war. It CAN be achieved without war, if the non-communist world can prove its case.

Just as the way to stop Russia is to oppose Russian nationalism—not with American nationalism—but with the determination to achieve the ideal of a world community, so the way to stop communism is to oppose it—not with American dogmatism—but with the determination to realize the ideal of democracy—here at home as well as abroad. This means helping all men everywhere to find their own way toward justice and freedom.

There are many roads that lead to justice and freedom. Naturally, our road seems to us the straightest and best. But other peoples start from vastly different places—some from arid deserts, some from tortuous valleys, some from ice-covered mountains and some from the steaming jungle. Some of the peoples of the world must travel toward justice and freedom in ancient jalopies, in ox-drawn caravans, on muleback, or even on foot. Each people must choose its own road according to its own sense of direction. Each people must travel by its own means. But the goal of justice and freedom is the same—even for those unhappy peoples who must drag chains as they struggle forward.

All these people are our friends. They are—if you like—our fellow-travelers. They need our help. But so do we need their help, their wisdom and their experience born of long suffering.

We knew all this once, when we were still a young nation, before our great wealth and power made us timid and suspicious of all change. The knowledge still lies dormant in the great mass of the American people. The small farmers, the workers in factories and offices, and—above all—the young people of America are not afraid of change, because for them change still means hope—hope for a better future.

The acquisition of great wealth and luxury—like the attainment of power or privilege—often breeds not only intelligent conservatism but blind fear of change and, hence, resistance to all progress. Unfortunately, our present bipartisan leadership is super-sensitive to the fears of the powerful few, has identified itself with these fears and sought to propagate them among the broad masses of the people—frightening them with the hobgoblin that all change threatens their security and undermining their native faith in human progress.

Our leaders and would-be leaders need to refresh their memories of what has made this nation great. I know of no better way to do this than by walking humbly among the American people—listening to what they have to say and realizing that they still have courage, dignity, faith in themselves and faith in the future of mankind.

(9699)

Release for Sunday A.M. April 4, 1948

Address to the American Academy of Political and Social Science
Philadelphia, 8:30 P.M. Saturday, April 3, 1948

The United States and the World Crisis

James P. Warburg

Your President, Ladies and Gentlemen, is a wise man. I say this because it was presumably he who designated as your overall topic "How to Achieve One World." In our present state of anxiety and confusion, this is a refreshingly hopeful and, I think, accurate statement of the world's problem. It implies a realization that the present world crisis requires a positive solution - that it cannot be met by negative means. It implies a recognition that peace is threatened precisely because a world, which has physically become One and can be governed peacefully only as One World, has so far failed to find the means of achieving political unity.

Unfortunately, such vision and wisdom are rare - especially among those who are today shaping the policy of the United States. Had President Truman - or any of his "bipartisan" advisors - been asked to formulate the caption for this conference, the narrower and purely negative definition, "How to Stop Russia", would almost certainly have been suggested. This would have tended to confuse and frustrate your deliberations, much as our policy-makers have confused and frustrated the Congress and the people of the United States.

Make no mistake about it - there is going to be One World. There is going to be One World no matter what foreign policy we pursue. The only question is by which of three possible means our world is going to be unified. We shall shortly see either a Russian-dominated world, or an American-dominated world, or a world united under world law and governed peacefully on the federal principle.

At present, our policy-makers apparently see only the threat of a Russian-dominated world - which, as things are going now, is a very real threat and a most unpleasant one to contemplate. But, in seeking to forestall this danger, the makers of United States policy are unfortunately thinking in purely negative terms - in terms of "How to Stop Russia." This means, in effect, that they are consciously or unconsciously thinking of an American-dominated world as the sole alternative. And this, in turn, means a rapid approach to a trial of physical strength between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. Our policy-makers are so preoccupied with stopping Russia that they have totally disregarded, or at least pushed into the background, the one constructive solution which is still possible - the solution of achieving One World through World Government. I do not say that this solution can be easily or quickly attained. I do say that ultimately it is the only acceptable solution and that it will never be attained if we pursue our present course of action.

If we pursue our present course, it seems almost inevitable that we shall sooner or later come to an armed conflict with the Soviet Union. The fact that our Government now recognizes this conflict as a possibility must be evident to anyone who has carefully followed recent events and studied the President's latest proposals. Even the most unskilful politician would scarcely, in an election year, raise an issue like the re-establishment of Selective Service, unless he felt driven by urgent necessity. It is clear, I think, that our Government hopes to avoid armed conflict. But it is equally clear that it is now preparing to resort to armed force if it fails to stop Russia by means short of war. This being the case, it is high time that we consider what the probable outcome of such a war would be.

The chances are that we should win a war with Russia. As of today our industrial capacity is infinitely greater than that of the Soviet Union - something like four times as great, according to recent estimates. Our Navy controls the seas. We have bases in Alaska, Japan, the Middle East, Britain and Iceland from which our bombers could reach most of the Soviet Union and which would be difficult for Russia to capture from us. Russia has no corresponding bases from which to reach most of the United States. We have at least a substantial head-start in atomic and bacteriological weapons. If the war comes reasonably soon, we are almost certain to win it. The realization that this is true is what makes our present foreign policy reckless and irresponsible.

We are considering war as an undesirable but nevertheless possible alternative to a peaceful solution precisely because we are reasonably sure that we could win a war against Russia.

But - suppose we did win such a war - what should we accomplish? We should, it is true, prevent a Russian-dominated world. We, who have no desire to dominate the world, should emerge from the war as the world's undisputed master. But at what cost?

Let us picture the cheapest victory imaginable. Let us imagine that we could be sufficiently Machiavellian to get the war started in our own way and at a time of our own choosing.

Let us assume that we could loose atomic and bacteriological destruction upon the Soviet Union without Russian retaliation upon the United States. The first thing the Russians would do would be to occupy all of Europe up to the Atlantic seaboard. There would be nothing to stop them. In the same way the Russians would occupy large parts of Northern China and all of Korea. In order for us to force a Russian surrender, we should then have to pulverize not only the Russian centres of production but the cities of Europe as well - we should have to poison not only Russian crops and reservoirs but the crops and water-supply of Europe and the Far East. And then let us be optimistic enough to imagine that we could force a Russian surrender without a costly invasion by our ground-forces of Europe, Africa and Asia.

What would be the result of this cheapest of all imaginable military victories? So far as Western Europe is concerned - and remember, it is Western Europe that we should, in the first instance, be fighting to save - it would immediately be overrun and plundered by the Red Army. Next it would be reduced by us to a condition of ruin far worse than that which exists in Germany today. Its cities would be dust and rubble, its crops and water-supply poisoned, its population decimated and infected with hitherto unheard-of pestilence. The same thing would be true of most of Russia and large parts of China and the Far East.

Can you picture the Western Hemisphere as an island of prosperity in such a world? Can you picture what it would mean to try to rebuild such a world? Can you imagine what it would involve to occupy and police the Soviet Union? Can you envisage what it would be like to be a member of the all-conquering American master race?

This would be the result of the cheapest victory we could win. To believe in so cheap a victory is almost to believe in miracles. This - or worse - will be the result of a continuation of our present foreign policy, which assumes that, if peaceful methods fail, we can always stop Russia by means of war.

What, then, is the alternative?

Certainly the alternative is not to fold our hands and do nothing. Nor is the alternative a policy of appeasement. Either of these courses would mean an unthinkable acceptance of a Soviet or communist-dominated world, or else a war of doubtful outcome fought in desperation to preserve our independence at a time of Russia's choosing.

The alternative that I see is an awakening on our part to the true nature of the present world crisis - a jettisoning of our present foreign policy - and the rapid development of a substitute which could still save Western civilization from the suicide toward which it is now rushing under our leadership.

You are all familiar with the recent history of our foreign policy. You remember the Truman Doctrine of March, 1947, which launched us on an adventure in "containing" Russia by providing arms and dollars to any nation, or to any group within a nation, which opposed communism and the Soviet Union. You remember the apparent shift, last June, from this dangerous experiment to the more sane approach of the Marshall Plan. You remember how Russia declined to accept the good faith of Mr. Marshall's proposal of a policy "not directed against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos." You recall the events of the last eight months, which have in effect been a period of deployment - a period during which the East-West split was recognized as irreconcilable for the time being, and during which each side has proceeded as rapidly as possible to build up its power.

Last year, when the President enunciated the original Truman Doctrine, he appeared as a man somewhat bewildered by his own sudden belligerence. It was not at all clear from his message whether he was launching a world-wide crusade against the communist ideology, or asking this nation to embark single-handed upon a near-military geopolitical struggle with the Soviet Union, or both. His speech was calculated to arouse fear - fear of communism, fear of Russia, and fear of war - though neither Russia nor communism were mentioned. The menace to peace was described as "totalitarian dictatorships imposed from within or without", which a few naive liberals mistakenly took to include the fascist or near-fascist dictatorships in Latin-America and the Iberian peninsula.

A year later, on March 17, 1948, Mr. Truman knew exactly what he wanted to say and said it. His analysis of the world crisis was contained in four brief statements, which I shall quote verbatim.

1. "The situation in the world today is not primarily the result of the natural difficulties which follow a great war. It is chiefly due to the fact that one nation has not only refused to cooperate in the establishment of a just and honorable peace, but - even worse - has actively sought to prevent it."

2. "The agreements we did obtain, imperfect though they were, could have furnished the basis for a just peace - if they had been kept. But they were not kept. They were consistently ignored and violated by one nation."

3. "One nation has persistently obstructed the work of the United Nations."

4. "The Soviet Union and its agents have destroyed the independence and democratic character of a whole series of nations in Eastern and Central Europe. It is this ruthless course of action and the clear design to extend it to the remaining free nations of Europe that has brought about the critical situation of Europe today."

This is the analysis of the world crisis upon which our present foreign policy rests. Believing in its validity, the President and his "bipartisan" advisors hold that the major aim of the United States must be to stop Russia. To stop Russia they demand the prompt passage of ERP, more funds for military aid to Greece and Turkey, some $500,000,000 additional aid to Chiang Kai-shek, and Universal Military Training and Selective Service here at home.

Clearly implicit in this 1948 Truman Doctrine is the admission that our attempt to stop Russia with dollars and military bluff has failed, and that we must now prepare for the possible use of our own military force to accomplish it.

Let me, as one deeply troubled citizen, attempt to show where I think the basic analysis falls down and where the resulting policy defeats its own purpose. I am not one who thinks that our present policy derives from the sins of any one political party - much less from the evil intentions of sinister individuals in or behind our Government. Nor am I - because I stress our own shortcomings - unmindful of the shortcomings of others. My concern is with the facts of the world situation, as I see them, and with certain conclusions which seem to me inescapable even though they are at variance with high authority.

The President said, first, that the world crisis has arisen because one nation - the Soviet Union - has refused to cooperate in the establishment of a just and honorable peace and - even worse - has actively sought to prevent it.

I submit that a partial basis for a just and honorable peace was laid down in the Atlantic Charter and reaffirmed in the United Nations Declaration of January 1942. Russia, Great Britain and the United States signed this declaration, along with all the other nations then fighting the Axis. Among other things, the signatories renounced territorial annexations and any territorial changes which did not conform to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. I submit that these pledges were abrogated at Teheran and Yalta, when the Western Powers purchased Russian help in the war against Japan by agreeing to Soviet annexation of territory in Europe and Asia and to the division of the world into spheres of influence. At the time - because we did not know how near Japan was to the end of its rope - this seemed necessary in order to win the war - or to save lives and win the war more quickly. Mr. Roosevelt had been told, when he went to Yalta, that an invasion of the Japanese Home Islands would cost over half a million American casualties.

Hindsight makes this decision seem of doubtful wisdom, but that is not the point with which we are here concerned. The historical fact is that the basis for a just and honorable peace - in so far as it ever existed - was thrown overboard by mutual consent before the war ended.

Further, I submit that we not only agreed at Yalta to allow Russia to violate the principles of a just peace, but that we ourselves have violated them - by destroying our own project of international trusteeship in the former Japanese-mandated islands - by introducing the vindictive nonsense of the Morgenthau Plan into the German settlement - and by backing Churchill's restorationist intervention in Greece and elsewhere.

Finally - still speaking of the first count in the indictment - I suggest that the true nature of the world crisis is quite different and far more complicated than one might be led to believe by Mr. Truman's over-simplified analysis. Of this I shall speak in a moment, after I have made a few observations concerning the other three counts in the indictment.

In his second charge, Mr. Truman says that the agreements we did obtain, though imperfect, could have furnished the basis for a just peace - if they had been kept. But they were not kept. "They were consistently ignored and violated by one nation."

I have already expressed the conviction that the late wartime agreements not only failed to furnish the basis for a just peace but actually destroyed what basis had previously been created. Does anyone believe that the Potsdam Agreement for the post-surrender treatment of Germany could by any stretch of the imagination have furnished the basis for a just peace? This was, after all, the major agreement reached after the European war ended. It was an agreement which sanctioned the annexation of German territory not only by Poland but by Russia, which permitted the forcible expulsion from their homes of some thirteen million Germans, which failed to fix Germany's Western frontier and left the crucial problem of the Ruhr unsettled, which contained enough remnants of Morgenthauism to wreck the hopes of early European recovery, and which gave to one nation - France - a veto over all four-power action without making that nation a party to the agreement. Does Mr. Truman really believe today that the agreement which he signed with Stalin in August 1945 could have furnished the basis for a just peace? Would he sign it again if he could turn back the clock?

As to keeping agreements - it is true that Russia violated the ambiguous Yalta pledges for "free elections". It is also true that Russia violated the Potsdam Agreement. But it is not true that post-war agreements were "ignored and violated" by only one nation. The Potsdam Agreement, for example, was, first of all, ignored and violated by France, which refused to let it be carried out unless her demands for frontier revision in the West were first satisfied. Then - and only then - was it violated by the Soviet Union. Our own Military Government officials have confirmed this. Our own Military Government officials will also confirm that we ourselves violated and ignored the Potsdam Agreement by stopping reparations in May 1946 in a vain attempt to get France and Russia to see the error of their ways. At present, all four of the occupying powers are violating it.

The third charge is that Russia alone has persistently obstructed the work of the United Nations. It certainly is true that Russia has persistently vetoed, abstained, boycotted and abused the United Nations as a forum for recrimination. But are all others innocent? What about the United States? Have we not undermined the authority of the United Nations by our unilateral action in China, in Greece, in Turkey and in Italy? Have we not ignored the United Nations and set ourselves up in its place? And have we not just recently come perilously close to destroying the United Nations altogether by our incredible gyrations with regard to Palestine? Was it the Soviet Union which obstructed a solution of that tragic problem?

Let me make myself perfectly clear. I am not in the least interested in defending against false or exaggerated charges those masters of distortion and prevarication who sit in the Kremlin. But I am concerned with the fact that we are beclouding our own judgment and reason by attributing all our troubles to the Soviet Union. I am concerned with the fact that, because we blame Moscow for everything that has gone wrong, we prevent ourselves from seeing the truth, at a time when only a clear recognition of the truth can save us from disaster.

We come now to the last charge, which consists of two parts. First: "The Soviet Union and its agents have destroyed the independence and democratic character of a whole series of nations in Eastern and Central Europe." So far as independence is concerned, I submit that not one of these little nations - except Finland - was ever really independent. Before the first World War all but two of them did not exist. Between the two World Wars most of these little nations were members of the French-led Little Entente and depended for their security upon the French Army. It is true that there was a vast difference in degree of independence under French protection and Soviet domination. It is true that France was polite and considerate to her small allies where Russia is rude and exploits them ruthlessly. But the Czechoslovakia of 1928 would have dared to offend France just as little as the Czechoslovakia of 1948 dares to offend the Soviet Union. The same thing is true of Yugoslavia. This has always been the fate of little nations in Europe. Furthermore, we ourselves agreed at Yalta to perpetuate this traditional pattern of dependence. We agreed to spheres of influence. One result of this agreement was that we let the Red Army liberate Czechoslovakia. When the day came, our Third Army sat and waited at Pilsen while the Czechs were rising against the Germans a few miles away at Prague, with the Red Army still unable to come to their rescue.

So much for independence. What about the destruction of the "democratic character" of these nations in the Soviet orbit? I submit that most of these nations never had a truly "democratic character" to destroy. Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Yugoslavia were ruled by feudal squirearchies which exploited their predominantly peasant populations. Poland was not much better. The only two countries now in the Soviet orbit which had a "democratic character" to destroy were Finland and Czechoslovakia. There is no doubt that the communists have brutally destroyed this "democratic character" in Czechoslovakia. They probably will destroy it in Finland. This much of the charge is a true bill. It constitutes a much more powerful indictment of the Soviet-led Cominform when stripped of irrelevant and dubious generalizations.

Finally, Mr. Truman stated: "It is this ruthless course of action and the clear design to extend it to the remaining free nations of Europe that have brought about the critical situation of Europe today." Is there, beyond peradventure of doubt, a clear design on the part of Russia to include all of Europe in her sphere of influence? And, if so, is the threat one of conquest - in other words, to Western Europe's independence? Or is it a revolutionary threat to internal security - in other words, to democracy? Or is it a combination of the two?

These are key questions. I cannot presume to answer them. I suggest only that they require far more study than Mr. Truman and his advisors appear to have undertaken. I suggest only that Russian action to date could be explained on the basis of existing evidence as something quite different from a Hitlerian design for conquest. It could be explained as a gigantic disengagement operation, in which the basic aim is to tighten ruthlessly every nut and bolt in the security belt around the Soviet Union and then retire into complete isolation. There are authoritative anti-communist students of Russian history and Russian policy who incline to this belief. There are also others who believe that Soviet expansionism is a fact, but that it derives at least as much from fear as from a desire to dominate Europe, and that the fear is largely a fear of the United States. This idea that we might attack the Soviet Union is widespread in Europe and Asia, and not only in the Soviet orbit. I myself have encountered it not only among those who dread that it may be true but among those who hope that it is true. There can be no doubt that recent developments in Washington have added to its credibility.

Before I go on to suggest a different analysis of the world problem and a different approach to its solution, let me summarize the case against our present policy as I have stated it thus far.

1. Our present policy rests upon the belief, clearly stated by the President, that the Soviet Union alone has caused and is causing the world crisis. This belief is buttressed by four charges: a) that Russia alone has refused to cooperate in and has actively sought to prevent the making of a just peace; b) that Russia alone has violated agreements which, though imperfect, could have created the basis for a just peace; c) that Russia alone has obstructed the work of the United Nations; and d) that Soviet destruction of the independence and democratic character of the Eastern European nations and Soviet intentions to carry out the same ruthless design in Western Europe are the causes of the present threat to world peace.

2. Starting from this analysis, our present policy pursues the single negative aim of stopping Russia, which we at first tried to achieve with dollars and bluff and are now preparing to accomplish, if necessary, with our own military force.

3. Our present leaders are reasonably sure that we could win a war with Russia, if the issue is not too long postponed. They, therefore, consider that war - though undesirable - is a possible last-resort alternative to a peaceful solution.

I have so far submitted two major points for your consideration:

1. That, if we fight Russia, we shall probably win; that we shall thus prevent a Russian-dominated world and ourselves achieve world domination; but that, in order to defeat Russia, we shall first have to hand Western Europe over to Russian occupation and then destroy it ourselves; that even the cheapest victory imaginable in an atomic and bacteriological war would merely leave us triumphant among the ruins of Western civilization, facing an impossible task of reconstruction and the consequent ruin of our own moral character and physical well-being.

2. I have called your attention to certain facts of history which, to me at least, suggest that the basic analysis upon which our policy rests is over-simplified and in part incorrect. Without in any way justifying what the Russians have done, I have tried to show that it was not Russia alone which destroyed the basis for a just peace; that the inter-Allied agreements reached would not - even if they had been kept - have furnished the basis for a just peace; that Russia was not the only nation which violated them, nor the only nation which undermined the United Nations; that it is only partly true to say that Russia has destroyed the independence and democratic character of a whole series of nations; and finally, that neither the precise nature of the apparent Russian design upon Western Europe nor its origin is clear beyond peradventure of doubt.

That is the case I have tried to make so far. I should now like to submit to you that, whatever the wrongs committed by the Soviet Union and whatever the true motivation and present purpose of Russian policy, the world crisis and the present threat to world peace are caused by four major factors, three of which have nothing whatsoever to do with the Soviet Union.

The first factor, as I see it, is that we are in a technological revolution, at least as far-reaching in its implications upon human society as the industrial revolution of the late eighteenth century. This technological revolution has shrunk a world formerly divided by oceans, mountains and deserts into One World - one little world, in which there can be neither peace nor prosperity for any people unless there is peace and prosperity for all peoples. The technological revolution has also vastly increased the problem of feeding the world's population, because it has greatly prolonged human life, eliminated to some extent the occasional mass slaughter by pestilence, and has in general decreased the death-rate far more rapidly in the world's backward areas than higher living standards have so far reduced the birth-rate. Finally, the technological revolution has made war between nations into a threat of genocide.

The second great factor is that we are living in a socio-economic revolution, accelerated and sharpened by the destruction wrought by two great wars. The whole Eastern Hemisphere is suffering from shortages. Its machinery of production has been worn out or destroyed, its raw materials depleted, its populations exhausted, its managerial power-groups dispersed or dispossessed. The middle-class structure of Europe has been undermined by a series of expropriations, by the depreciation of currencies and by almost totally inhibited formation of new private capital. Similarly, the colonial and feudal structure of society in the world's backward areas, and especially the traditional structure of Asia is tottering. Colonial empires are in the process of liquidation, giving rise to new problems for both the peoples emerging into freedom and the peoples whose living standards were in the past supported by colonial exploitation. In other words, a large part of the world is in a state of fundamental and far-reaching change.

The third factor in the current crisis is that an accelerated process of elimination among the great powers has caused the world's military, political and economic power to become concentrated in only two poles of super-power - the Soviet Union and the United States. This has destroyed the only mechanism for preserving peace which the world has ever known - the mechanism of preventing armed conflict through a precarious balance of power. In the history of the world, we have had peace only so long as an ever-shifting alignment of sovereign nation-states could keep any one nation or group of nations from acquiring a preponderance of power sufficient to let it believe that it could safely resort to a trial of naked force. A balance of power is, in the long run, impossible without room for maneuver among the nation-states. There can be no room for maneuver when power is polarized in only two nation-states. There is then room only for an armament race between the two rival powers. This means that we have come to the end of the long period of international anarchy - that we have come to the end of that part of human history in which men could live within nations under law while nations lived among each other in a state of jungle anarchy.

These, as I see it, are the three primary causes of the present crisis in world affairs. None of them has anything whatever to do with the nature or intentions of the Soviet Union. We should be in a world-wide technological, social and economic revolution if Marx and Lenin had never lived or written. We should be living in a state of no longer tolerable international anarchy if power had become concentrated in any two super-powers other than Russia and the United States.

I do not for one moment deny that there is a fourth and very important cause of the present world crisis. The Soviet Union has without doubt been cynically fishing in troubled waters. It has exploited the world-wide socio-economic revolution in order to propagate the communist ideology. It has exploited the existence of international anarchy among the sovereign nation-states in order to gain every possible advantage for itself. The Soviet Union has obstructed the making of a just peace; the Soviet Union has pursued a ruthless course of action; the Soviet Union must not be permitted to expand its sphere of influence any further.

The trouble is that our Government sees only the Soviet Union's contribution to the present state of world affairs. It does not see its own contribution, nor that of others. Above all, it fails to recognize that the most important causes of the present crisis are no one's fault in particular but are to be sought in the historical developments of the time in which we live.

The consequence of this myopic vision on the part of the Government of the United States is that the Western World, under our leadership, has gone into a state of panic - that it has embarked upon a frenzied course of negative action and become so obsessed with stopping Russian expansion that it has lost sight of the basic factors which make Russian expansion possible.

In the recent past, this had led us to ally ourselves with the forces of reaction throughout the world instead of allying ourselves with the forces of progress. We have driven the masses of Asia toward communism because we have backed anti-democratic and corrupt feudal regimes which oppose land reform, thus giving the communists a monopoly on the one great magnet of political attraction in that teeming continent. We have driven the peasants of Eastern Europe in the same direction by the same foolish means. And we have alienated the urban industrial workers of Europe by looking askance at democratic socialism, fearing it as a step toward totalitarian dictatorship and seeking to restore discarded systems and dispossessed and discredited power groups. Thus, we have left to the Soviet Union the exploitation of the world-wide aspiration for a new and better future. Thus, we have failed to destroy the illusion that communist totalitarianism is the road to a better future. Thus, in our anxiety to stop the spread of communism, we have actually been helping the Soviet Union to fertilize the soil for its growth.

In the same way we have, by default, left to the Soviet Union the inestimable advantage of exploiting the existing condition of international anarchy. We, who have nothing to lose and everything to gain from strengthening the United Nations and building it into a World Government, have undermined the United Nations, have lacked faith in it, have failed to infuse it with our own great strength and have not - even at this late date - made up our minds to achieve One World as once we made up our minds to achieve one nation.

Two positive implications flow from this critical analysis of our present approach to the world crisis. Let me express them in terms of what I think should be the two broad aims of our foreign policy. As I see it, these should be:

First. To throw our great moral and economic strength behind the emerging non-communist progressive movements throughout the world, respecting the native characteristics of those movements, irrespective of whether or not they conform to our particular prejudices and predilections.

Second. To throw the full weight of our military and economic resources behind a United Nations which we openly declare our intention of building into a World Government.

If these were our positive aims - and, if we pursued them with intelligence and determination - a large part of our present limited and negative objective would automatically be realized. We should then have drawn to our side those existing forces which can and will, if supported, stop communism and which can and will achieve One World. We should, in other words, achieve the stopping of communism as a by-product of a positive policy.

I realize that these things cannot be accomplished overnight. In the meantime, there remains the immediate problem posed by the present aggressive attitude and action of the Soviet Union. How are we to deal with it, pending the development of a new and constructive policy?

First. We can declare ourselves. While it is true that we cannot overnight win to our side the progressive forces in the world nor make the United Nations into an effective World Government, we can overnight make up our minds that this is what we want to do. The mere declaration of such a change in our outlook and policy could profoundly and dramatically affect the present sombre world picture. Secretary Marshall's courageous pronouncement of last June had an almost miraculous effect upon the tired, discouraged and frightened peoples of Europe - even though they well knew that there could still be many a slip between promise and fulfillment.

Second. We can make hash of the Kremlin's two fondest hopes. In effect, these two hopes are one and the same - the hope that we shall fail to maintain our social and economic health here at home - and the hope that we shall fail to carry through, over the next few years, our avowed intention to help the rest of the world get back upon its feet. To make hash of these hopes will require not only determination but far more careful planning than we are now doing here at home, together with considerable self-discipline and sacrifice on the part of Americans in every walk of life.

Third. We can stop the armament race. We can cut into the increasingly dangerous vicious circle of preparation for war in which the Soviet Union and the United States are presently engaged. We can do this only if we bring ourselves to realize that the threat to Western Europe - and via Western Europe to our own security - is not primarily a military threat and cannot be met by military force - that it is essentially a moral and political threat which must be met by moral and political means.

What, then, should we do about the President's latest proposals for UMT and Selective Service? These measures alone are, of course, hopelessly inadequate if we are really preparing for a possible war. They were intended in the first instance, I believe, chiefly for psychological effect. They will doubtless be followed by other recommendations for a greatly expanded military budget. Personally, I should favor much fuller preparedness and a declared readiness to fight, if I thought that by fighting we could save Western Europe. I favored precisely this course in 1917 and enrolled as a cadet flyer before we entered World War I. It is a matter of public record that I favored precisely this course against the Nazis even before they entered Prague in March 1939. But today my reason tells me that the danger we face cannot be halted by the threat of armed force because, in the final showdown, we can stop Russia by armed force only if we first destroy the very civilization we should be fighting to save. My reason tells me that preparedness for war is now an illusion. And that - if it is an illusion - it is high time that we stop playing with fire.

There is still a chance for the American people to say to its Government: "Halt! About Face!"

There is still time for us to realize that war is no longer an acceptable alternative to the achievement of One World by peaceful means. There is still time for us to awaken to the fact that, if the fatal drift toward war is to be halted, we, the most powerful and least vulnerable people on this vulnerable planet, must be the ones to arrest it.

It would be irresponsible and futile to try to stop the armament race by opposing the specific measures of preparedness which our President has demanded. To do that at this moment and without bringing about a complete change of policy would merely discredit the dwindling authority of our Government and issue an open invitation to further Soviet aggression.

We can and must stop the armament race by insisting that our Government revise its basic analysis of the world crisis - that it develop and proclaim a new foreign policy and a corresponding domestic policy which will truly harness our great human and physical resources to the peaceable building of One World. Unless we can do this, we shall very shortly be spending something like $20,000,000,000 a year on our military establishments. We are spending over half that amount already. Surely it must be plain that, even without a reduction of taxes, we cannot spend 40 per cent of our national budget on armament and at the same time effectively help the world to recover. If we do this, we shall be on our way to becoming a garrison state. On the other hand, think what it would mean if - instead of adding $10,000,000,000 to unproductive armament - we should add half that amount to a broader and more generous recovery program, aimed at helping the progressive forces throughout the world. Think what it would mean in the way of restoring world stability if, instead of doubling our military budget, we were to double our recovery program at only half the cost to our taxpayers.

If ever there was a moment which should bring together all parties, all candidates and all citizens in a common effort, it is this moment in our history. For at this moment we alone hold the power to turn the world from suicide toward unity and peace.

Our strength in the past has flowed from a native courage and a native vision of a better future. Our power of attraction has flowed from our natural affinity with all peoples everywhere seeking change for the better. Recently, fear of change and a newly-discovered affinity for the status quo have all but drained that reservoir of goodwill of which Wendell Willkie wrote before he died.

Let us halt and about face before it is too late. Let us refill the reservoir of our strength at its ancient sources. Let us recapture courage and common sense and the vision of a future fit for man.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.
485 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

February 13, 1948

Dear Jim:

Your Sarah Lawrence effort was, as usual, magnificent. Thanks for sending it to me. I am now shouting at your publishers trying to get a copy of the book to read over the weekend.

As ever yours,

Mr. James Warburg
70 East 45th Street
New York, New York

COPY

Ed — you'll get the book later this week. Meanwhile here's the major thesis to chew on. Jim Release:

2 P.M.

Address to
The Faculty and Students
of
Sarah Lawrence College
by
James P. Warburg

Feb. 10, 1948

There has never been a time when a single nation held in its hands so much of the world's total effective power as the United States holds today. There has never been a time when any one people carried as great a burden of responsibility for the future of mankind as we carry at this moment. We have not sought this responsibility. We are ill prepared for the problems which it entails. And yet we, as a people, have, I think, come to realize that there is no escape from the burden which history has laid upon us.

Most of us have at present a rather desperate sense of moving toward war while earnestly seeking peace. Our anxiety and our confusion breed a feeling of frustration which leads either to a paralysis of reason or to unreasoning anger and aggression. We cannot afford to remain very long in this condition. We cannot afford to act in unreasoning anger. Nor dare we by our inaction permit the present dangerous deterioration to continue.

We are in a vicious circle. Our so-called experts and political leaders grope in vain for a feeling of support in public opinion. And the average citizen, who makes up public opinion, is bewildered by the confusion which afflicts the experts and political leaders.

There are, I think, two things we can do about this.

The first is to relax. Not in the sense of brushing aside our problems and responsibilities, but in the sense in which any good athlete learns to relax in order to put forth his best effort. The tense batter never knocks out the winning single. The tense half-back never catches a touchdown pass. A tense nation cannot be expected to exert its power effectively in a time of crisis. We are today a tense nation. We need to stretch - to look around for a moment - to acquire a little of that wry humor and sense of comradeship with which a good soldier moves into battle.

The next thing we need to do is to realize that we have been, and are, dealing with two separate problems as if they were only one problem. There is a world economic crisis and a world political crisis. The two are inseparable; but they are also separate. Neither can be cured without the other; but each requires its own separate diagnosis and treatment.

The world economic crisis is a crisis of lagging or wholly impeded production. Because a great war has been fought in Europe and Asia, ravaging those continents, exhausting their peoples, and throwing out of kilter the delicate balance of their economies and social structures, the Eastern Hemisphere - from the British Isles to Japan - is suffering from acute shortages. Peoples who have for centuries been self-supporting find themselves unable to produce enough to sustain life at even the lowest level. Or, if they can produce a surplus of some things, they find themselves unable to exchange this surplus for other necessities which they have never in the past produced for themselves and have always purchased from other countries. The normal incentives for work have been destroyed. Consumer goods are practically unobtainable and saving has become meaningless because there is no longer any guaranty that money saved today will buy goods that might become available tomorrow. These conditions produce unrest and political instability.

We, in the Western Hemisphere, have so far been almost untouched by this economic crisis. Our half of the world has a surplus of food and raw materials. Its productive capacity has increased while that of Europe and Asia has diminished. In money value, the United States alone at present turns out about two-thirds of the world's entire production. Moreover, the United States is at present the sole surplus producer of most of those particular things which are needed in Europe and Asia to re-start the wheels of production.

In dealing with this world economic crisis, we have, broadly speaking, embarked upon the road which leads to recovery and peace. We have given emergency relief assistance and are now trying to use our great resources to push the crucial sectors of the world's stagnating economy off dead-centre. The Marshall Plan may still be wrecked and turned back into a continuing relief operation by foolish penny-pinching and crippling amendments, or by failure to control our own economy, but the basic plan itself is sound. It is a plan to meet the economic crisis in the only way by which it can be met - by helping others to help themselves. This is not merely the product of decent humanitarianism. It is the product of enlightened self-interest - the product of our recognition that prosperity as well as peace has become indivisible.

The same thing is not at all true of our approach to the world political crisis. The Truman Doctrine is not the product of enlightened self-interest. It is the product of ignorance, prejudice and fear. Whereas, in dealing with the world economic crisis, we are, broadly speaking, on the road to peace, in dealing with the world political crisis, we are on the road to war.

The instinctive knowledge that this is the case is what makes us anxious and uncertain. And - because we do not separate one problem from the other - our justified anxiety concerning the ultimate results of the Truman Doctrine makes us unjustifiably apprehensive concerning the Marshall Plan.

It is quite true that the Marshall Plan cannot work - cannot achieve its objective of laying the economic foundations for peace - when coupled with a political policy that leads to war. But the proper conclusion is not, therefore, to question or reject the Marshall Plan. The proper conclusion is to question and - in my opinion - to reject the Truman Doctrine, developing in its place a political policy based upon a calm re-examination of what the world political crisis is really about.

The political crisis today expresses itself in dangerously mounting tension between the two great centres of power - the United States and the Soviet Union. This rising tension is accompanied by increasing pressure upon all the peoples of the world to line up with one or the other of the two growling antagonists. The post-war ideal of One World has more and more receded into the background until we are now faced with the prospect of a world divided into two rival if not openly hostile camps. Since neither half of the world can achieve full prosperity without exchanging goods and services with the other, such a state of affairs inevitably leads to discontent and mutual recrimination. Each half blames the other. Each takes precautions against the other. Armaments drain more and more of the national budgets. The more guns there are, the less butter remains for the people. The less butter, the greater the discontent and the greater the readiness to blame an external enemy.

Our present effort to stop this sort of drift toward war rests upon what seems to me an incomplete understanding of history and a false appraisal of the historical forces which operate in the present. Perhaps even more important is the fact that our present policy is so largely based upon our own fear and so little upon an understanding of the hopes and fears of the other peoples of the world.

The present tensions did not arise overnight. Their origins go back to the original impact upon Western society of the Bolshevik Revolution. They have their roots in the period which produced the rise of fascism, the appeasement of fascism by the West, and the turning away of the Soviet Union into the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. To understand the present state of affairs, one has to trace through the wartime agreements and disagreements of the Nazi-forged anti-Nazi coalition; one has to study the dubious premises upon which the Yalta deal was made and the Atlantic Charter jettisoned; one has to recognize the vagueness and the ambiguity of the understandings reached. Above all, one has to recognize the inherent weakness of a United Nations structure which stops short of World Government in a world where power has become concentrated in only two real centres of power.

Any such approach at once precludes the simple answer that the solution to the world political crisis consists merely in finding a way to stop Soviet or communist expansion. Yet that is essentially the assumption upon which our present political policy is based. Having made that assumption, we proceeded to develop a theory about what makes the Russians expansive, and then worked out a policy to fit that theory.

Our theory was that the primary cause of Russian expansionism is the need of a dictatorial regime to concentrate the attention of the oppressed Russian people upon an external enemy. Only thus - so runs the so-called Kennan thesis - can a regime of terrorism, originally created to stamp out internal opposition to the revolution, maintain itself in power. It follows, since such expansion grows by what it feeds upon, that the Soviet Union must be "contained" before its expansionism can reach such proportions as to cause a war. It follows further that, if Soviet expansionism is contained, there will be a strong possibility that the dictatorial regime will mellow or crumble and perhaps be overthrown.

This was the belief which clearly underlay the thinking of those of Mr. Truman's advisers who drafted the famous message of March 12, 1947. With all due respect to these gentlemen and their intimate knowledge of Russian affairs, this thesis seems far too simple. It omits, for one thing, the possibility that Soviet policy may also have been influenced to a large extent by an actual fear - ridiculous as this may seem to us - of attack by the United States. It omits any consideration of the fact that, in a world in which national sovereignty is the supreme authority and in which power has become concentrated in only two centres of super-power, there is a natural tendency toward mutual hostility between those two centres - quite irrespective of the nature or intentions of either. Finally, the Kennan thesis, while recognizing the oppositeness inherent in the nature of the United States and the USSR, tends to regard this oppositeness as irreconcilable, until such time as a contained USSR changes its nature and becomes what we should consider "more democratic". It omits the possibility that we, too, may have to revise some of our ideas.

This analysis led quite naturally to an American policy of holding firmly to what Mr. Dulles called "our invigorated policies" and keeping the Soviet Union in check until it changed its policies. Such a policy must presuppose: first, that we are able to contain Soviet expansion by peaceful means; second, that, if Soviet expansion is checked, the present regime will mellow or fall; and, third, that, if the present regime falls, the Russian people will turn out to have convictions and predilections so like our own that a reconciliation will be possible.

The first supposition - that we could contain the Soviet Union by peaceful means - can neither be proved nor disproved until it is too late. The second supposition - that containment would cause the Soviet regime to crumble or fall - seems to rest upon the belief that there is a strong latent resistance to the present regime among the Russian people - of which, so far as I know, there is very little evidence. And the third supposition implies a belief that, if the Russian people are free to choose any form of government, they would choose a form which approximated the Western concept of democracy. This seems to be contrary to contemporary evidence as well as to past history.

Like most revolutions, the Bolshevik Revolution was chiefly concerned with achieving a more equitable distribution of the material benefits of society. It was not - like our Revolution - primarily concerned with establishing self-government and the political freedoms. The Russian people threw out the Czar's management because it had oppressed and exploited them - they wanted to be governed more justly - they had not reached the point of wanting to govern themselves. The Russian ideal of "democracy" is still that of a society in which everyone shares more or less equally in the material benefits. This is an ideal typical of a people accustomed through long generations to a low standard of living, while seeing its rulers living in luxury.

Our ideal of "democracy" is that of a society in which each individual has an equal voice in the management, rather than an equal share in the benefits. This is an ideal typical of a fluid society and of a people accustomed to relatively easy access to a high standard of living.

The two ideals are not antithetical. Neither can alone produce the perfect freedom. Both are included in Aristotle's definition: "Freedom is to govern and be governed." We have so far emphasized the first half of that definition. The Russians have emphasized the second. Or, if you prefer Lincoln to Aristotle, both the Russian ideal and the American ideal are included in the perfect democracy, defined as "Government by the people, of the people and for the people." We have so far stressed "by the people". The Russians have stressed "for the people".

These national ideals, or emphases, will change only when the conditions change out of which they grew. If our system continues to produce booms and busts, if it continues periodically to expose the majority of the people to hardship and insecurity, if it continues increasingly to freeze the strata in our society so that access to wealth is no longer open except to the privileged few - then we shall again face a rising demand for more economic or social democracy. In the last great depression we saw how the majority of people were willing to sacrifice some of the fetishes of political "freedom" in order to obtain economic security and greater social justice. But with a return of prosperity, we have reverted to our traditional emphasis. It would probably take not one but several more major depressions to make us permanently change our emphasis from political to economic democracy.

In the same way, it will take many years of economic security and a relatively high living standard to make the Russian people change their emphasis from the economic to the political ideal. If there is any present threat to the Soviet regime, it is not likely to be found in a latent revolt against political oppression, but rather in dissatisfaction with a management which fails to raise the living standards of the worker and peasant.

But - so long as the Russian people believe that there is any threat to the security of the Russian nation - there is little chance that they will revolt against a management which holds down their living standard in order to build up and protect the national security. So long as American policy lends any reality to the claim of the Soviet regime that the USSR is in danger, American policy is in fact protecting the regime against whatever domestic trouble might otherwise be in store for it.

Let us now consider a somewhat different theory than that upon which our Government has been proceeding. Let us consider the theory that the Russians have a long-range aim of creating a communist world, but that - unlike Hitler - they have no time schedule and no fixed objectives which they are determined to gain, if necessary by force of arms. Let us consider the theory that Soviet aggressiveness derives in large measure from fear and feeds upon fear. This does not necessarily make Russia any less dangerous, but it alters our approach to the danger. It would make our policy aim at removing the causes of Russian fear, in so far as it lies within our power to do so without taking foolish risks with our own security.

The two major Soviet fears with which we have to deal are: fear of war with the United States; and fear that we may use our economic power to force our kind of economic system upon so much of the world as to isolate and encircle the Soviet Union. This would postpone into infinity the realization of the still powerful Russian dream of an eventual world revolution. We may consider the mere existence of such a dream dangerous. But we should be wise to recognize that a totally frustrated dream would be far more dangerous at this moment. For a suddenly frustrated deep-seated aspiration can become a grim and irrational determination.

As to Russian fear of war, we know that we do not want to make war upon the Soviet Union. But we must realize that we have in the past year conveyed the impression, not only to the Russians, but to many Europeans and Asiatics that we think we may have to fight the Soviet Union. Many Frenchmen think - and many Czechs, too - that our German policy is primarily designed to create a bulwark against Russia in Central Europe. Many Asiatics think that our policy in Japan, Korea and China is shaped to the same sort of purpose in Asia. Our Latin-American policy, our huge military expenditures, our sole possession of the atomic bomb, and our continued stock-piling add to this impression. To brush all this aside as the figment of Russian propaganda is to fool no one except perhaps ourselves.

The truth of the matter is that while we are trying sincerely to avoid a clash with the Soviet Union, we are, at the same time, taking out all sorts of insurance against possible failure to do so. Our policy in Germany is not designed to create a bulwark against Russia - which would be foolish in any case - but it is influenced by the consideration that we may have to fight Russia. So is our policy in Japan, China, Korea, Greece, Turkey and Latin America.

This is a very dangerous business. It is doubly dangerous because the Soviet Union is playing precisely the same game. Never mind who started it. The important thing to realize is that this two-sided policy of taking out insurance against war is the road to war. What constitutes insurance for us is a threat to the Soviet Union. What constitutes insurance to the Soviet Union is a threat to us.

Moreover, most of this insurance business is a very silly business. If we ever do fight the Soviet Union, most of our mutual provocations will have insured neither of us against anything. In an atomic and bacteriological war, fought largely by air across the polar region, what good will it have done us to have armed Senor Peron? What good will it have done the Russians to have insisted upon pushing out their frontier into Central Europe? The Red Army is not going to land in Argentina and we shall be swept out of Europe overnight. We are both of us taking out insurance against the last war - not against the next one. But, by taking out these useless, expired policies, we each lend reality to the distrust and fear of the other.

I am not suggesting that we should be so foolish as to disarm ourselves unilaterally. We did that once with disastrous results. We must remain strong in scientific research, in Polar aviation and wherever strength would count in an atomic war, until we can bring about universal disarmament. But I am suggesting that we make it much clearer than we have to date that we desire to disarm, and that we look to the United Nations to take over the job of policing the world at the earliest possible moment. I am suggesting that we stop thinking in strategic terms which are now meaningless. And, above all, I would like to suggest that we, as citizens, think more about how to prevent the next war and less about what we shall do if war comes. The greatest danger of an atomic war is the widespread acceptance of its inevitability.

We have able military and naval leaders. It is their business always to be prepared for the worst, until the day comes when all the nations lay down their arms. But it is not the business of our military and naval leaders to guide our policy in trying to make a lasting peace. Their thinking must not be allowed to shape the thinking of the American people. The American people must learn to think for peace if they want peace.

So much for the military aspect. What can we do to allay Soviet fear of what we might do with our great economic power? This fear rests, I believe, upon considerably more than the fertile imagination of a dictatorial regime trying to maintain itself in power. It rests upon the conviction that the United States is determined to maintain an economic system which must either lead to imperial exploitation (and ultimate war) or collapse. We are perhaps more concerned with a different and more reasonable version of this fear which affects most of the peoples of Europe and Asia. This version, which one finds articulately expressed by Western Europeans, runs as follows.

The United States is determined to preserve its own free enterprise economy. It believes that it can preserve its free enterprise economy only in a preponderantly free enterprise world. It will, therefore, use its great economic power to bludgeon the other peoples of the world into a return to laisser-faire capitalism.

We, as a nation, are at present making the dangerous mistake of meeting communist fanaticism with a doctrinaire fanaticism of our own. One becomes acutely aware of this in talking to almost any thinking person in Europe or Asia. Traveling about outside this country, one encounters everywhere a resentment - directed at us almost as much as against the Soviet Union - resentment at being forced to choose between the undesirable and the impossible - to line up either on the side of communist dictatorship or free enterprise laisser-faire.

Most Americans do not realize that our alternative is impossible outside of our own hemisphere - that people cannot re-establish private capitalism in countries where private capital has been dispersed or destroyed. Nor do most Americans realize that the majority of Europeans have reached the conviction that a certain amount of government planning and control over a nation's economy is to be desired, even though it may restrict the free initiative of the individual.

The fear that we may try to tie strings to our aid which would force people, against their own judgment and will, back into a system they have discarded, is not a fear one finds only in the Soviet orbit. One finds it everywhere abroad, except among the tenacious remnants of the former economic power groups. Coupled with this fear, one finds a resentment at being told what to do, even by the most benevolent outsider.

We have the power to help and guide the world in the direction in which the masses of mankind desire to move. We do not have the power to reverse the direction.

On this ground at least, we can kill two birds with one stone. We can, to some extent, put Russian fears to rest and at the same time vastly improve our relations with the non-communist world.

There is another reason why we should be wise to abandon our present doctrinaire tendency. Intolerance and coercion are an integral part of the present Soviet system. They act as a foreign body when introduced into the philosophy of life upon which this nation was founded - a foreign body which could poison our whole system and rob it of its power.

The burning issue of our time is economic rather than political. Food, fuel and shoes are, for the moment, more important than political freedoms. But there is a moral issue, which will some day become more important as the economic crisis subsides. If the great moral issue of our time is belief in the Rights of Man - and especially the right of man freely to choose the form of society in which he wants to live - then we cannot effectively fight for that issue and at the same time peddle our own form of society as the only road to salvation. In doing so, we stultify our case and throw away our greatest power of attraction. For our greatest power of attraction in the ideological competition, which seems likely to follow the present economic competition with the Soviet Union, is our traditional belief - imperfectly fulfilled though it be - in the great propositions laid down in our Declaration of Independence.

The change of policy here suggested requires, first of all, an unequivocal statement of our changed position - a statement which the world will understand as a final repudiation of the underlying thesis of the Truman Doctrine and of the policy derived from that thesis. This policy - to put it baldly - is a policy of appointing ourselves the world's judge and the world's policeman - of considering the United Nations expendable in the interest of containing Soviet expansion - and of seeking to effect that containment by backing with dollars and military bluff any and all governments or groups which oppose communism, no matter how corrupt or anti-democratic they may be.

Next, the suggested change of policy requires the recognition that - whether we like it or not - we shall have to transact a large part of our foreign trade with governments rather than with private firms or individuals. It suggests further that we may have to channel through our own Government a considerable portion of our commercial dealings with other countries. There is no doubt that this would have certain implications for our domestic economy. But these carry no further than the implications already inherent in our European Recovery Program. To carry out that program we must in any case permit our Government to plan and control certain sectors of our economy. We may not like moving in this direction. We may not like admitting that there can be no world-wide restoration of "free enterprise" and that, even in our own country, private initiative may be somewhat further restricted. Nevertheless, these are some of the facts of life we have to face. We cannot turn back the clock.

If there were time, I should like to spell out the possible effects of such a change of overall policy upon what are now the individual hotspots in the making of the peace, such as Germany, Austria, Korea and Japan. I should like to point out the implications of such a policy in our dealings with Greece and China. Most important of all, I should like to show how a different overall approach might move the key log in the log-jam which now prevents the United Nations from developing gradually into a world government. This is what I have attempted to do in the book which is about to be published and to which your President has referred.

In closing, let me re-emphasize what seems to me fundamental in any discussion of our foreign policy problem.

We have a good plan for dealing with the world economic crisis. Let's stick to it, fight for it, get it adopted and carry it out.

We have a bad plan for dealing with the world political crisis. Let's have another look at the problem and see whether we cannot develop a more satisfactory answer.

Because we need to re-examine and, in my opinion, revise our political plan, let us not become confused and uncertain about the nature of the economic crisis. It is true that the Marshall Plan cannot work in the context of the Truman Doctrine. But that does not affect the validity of the Marshall Plan. On the contrary, the Marshall Plan is essential to whatever new and better political program we may develop.

One final word about our dealings with the USSR. The men in the Kremlin are difficult, arbitrary, and often - by our standards - just plain ornery. Patience and friendliness will not necessarily overcome this difficulty. Both are too often misunderstood as weakness. And yet there is no alternative to patience and friendliness, because - if we, too, become ornery - the result will be war - the kind of war in which one man can carry in a suitcase the means of poisoning or destroying the entire population of a great city.

We are living in a time which requires the most difficult formula of statesmanship. It demands courage tempered by wisdom, determination conditioned by respect for the rights of others, and strength made gentle by a sense of responsibility for mankind. A terrible burden rests upon our public servants. A single word spoken carelessly or in anger may have fateful consequences. The more our public servants feel behind them the pressures of prejudice and fear, the greater will be their temptation to yield to weariness and irritation. The more they feel behind them the calm confidence of an informed people, the greater will be their serenity and effectiveness. If they are to be patient in the face of impatience, tolerant in the face of intolerance, and wise in the face of unwisdom, we too must learn patience, tolerance and restraint.

I have called my new book, "Put Yourself in Marshall's Place", because that is what I think all of us need to do, if we are to fulfill the obligations of democratic citizenship.

Mr. James P. Warburg

announces the marriage of his daughter

Kay James

to

Mr. Robert A. Levin

on Friday, the thirty-first of October

Nineteen hundred and forty-seven

New York

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.
485 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

October 23, 1947

Dear Jim:

You really rang the bell in Baltimore but, by God, you're still a banker—the papers say so! I think we ought to do the next one with our heads in the same barrel. Saw Lucius Clay at lunch the other day who spoke right kindly of our effort.

As ever yours,

Mr. James P. Warburg
70 East 55th Street
New York 17, New York

COPY

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

October 16,1947.

Dear Ed:

Many thanks for the recording. I'm glad you were happy with our joint effort. I've rarely enjoyed anything more than chicking merrily along with you.

Enclosed is a major effort I'm making next Monday at the Foreign Policy Association meeting in Baltimore. I've packed in too much for one speech,I think, but I want to get all of this off my chest somewhere. So they'll have to take it. Perhaps some of this might be material for another conversation piece. (What about doing the next one in a Louis XVI chaise de conversation in powdered wigs?)

As ever,

Jim

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
New York City.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE WORLD CRISIS.

Address by James P. Warburg
to Foreign Policy Association
Baltimore, Maryland
October 20, 1947

Release for Morning Papers
October 21, 1947

It is difficult for us in the United States to realize that we are in the midst of an acute world crisis. We live in a comfortable well-stocked house, high up on a hill which overlooks the plain where dwell the other peoples of the world. Down on the plain there are floods and pestilence and famine. We know this. We are saddened by it. We send medicine and food. We do what we can to help the neediest c ases. But we do not fully realize that the floods are rising and will, unless arrested, engulf our own hill-top. We are not fully aware that, without meaning to do so, we have collected on our hill-top practically all the available equipment for fighting and controlling flood-waters and that, unless we make this equipment available, the people in the valley are helpless.

The world crisis is a crisis of lagging or wholly impeded production. Because a great war has been fought in Europe and Asia, ravaging those continents, exhausting their peoples and resources and throwing out of kilter the delicate balance of their economies, the Eastern Hemisphere - from the British Isles to Japan - is suffering from acute shortage and much of it is in a state of political unrest.

Peoples, who have for centuries been self-supporting, find themselves unable to produce enough to sustain life at even the lowest subsistence level. Or, if they can produce some things, they find themselves unable to exchange them for other necessities which they have never in the past produced for themselves and have always purchased in other countries.

We, in the Western Hemisphere, have so far been untouched by this crisis. Our half of the world has a surplus of food and raw materials. Its productive capacity has increased while that of Europe and Asia has diminished. In money value, the United States alone at present turns out about two-thirds of the entire world's production. Moreover, the United States is at present the sole surplus producer of most of those particular things which are needed in Europe and Asia in order to re-start the wheels of production.

The needs of Europe and Asia fall into three categories: I shall name them in order of immediate necessity, although this is the reverse of their order of ultimate importance.

First, there is the need for food, fuel and fibres. Unless Western Europe and large parts of Asia receive food and coal from overseas, as well as some textile raw materials, this winter will bring disease and starvation to millions of people. Medical supplies also belong in this category.

Second, there is the need for all sorts of incentive goods. That is, the necessities beyond the minimum of food and fuel, which all men desire for themselves and their families and for which they will work. I mean such things as shoes, clothes, household utensils, simple tools and simple materials with which to repair and rebuild. One must realize that throughout large parts of Europe and Asia today people can see no use in working beyond the point required to eke out a bare living. The things they would like to buy with the money they might earn simply do not exist - or exist only on a small black market which is hopelessly out of their reach. They see no point in saving money because they have lost confidence in its future purchasing power. The chief reason why people seem to have lost the will to work is that they are deprived of the means for translating their work into either the satisfaction of their present needs or insurance against a rainy day in the future.

Third and last, there is the need for the tools of production and especially for the tools or equipment with which to make other tools. Modern industry begins with coal. Coal means power, transportation, steel, machines, machine-parts and every sort of manufacturing equipment. Coal also means food through fertilizer; it means metal containers for preserving food; it means fuel for homes, and thus enables men to work in factories. But, to supply an industry with coal, you need mining machinery, you need men with tools in their hands and the incentive to use them, you need a transportation system to get the coal from pithead to factory and home. If you supply the tools and machinery to rehabilitate your coal mines and to get your transportation system working - if you supply your workers with food and the incentive to work - then you have moved the key log in the log jam.

The next thing is iron. Once you have coal and iron, you can make steel. With steel you can rebuild or repair factories of all sorts. Given a certain number of machine-tools to begin with, you can then make factory equipment. You can make steel rails and rolling stock.

All along the line, as you get started, you will find yourself up against an increasing number of problems. Each factory will require certain raw materials or semi-manufactured goods in order to get going. For each factory that gets under way you need more incentive goods in order to have more workers willing to work. As the process of rehabilitation continues, each country finds that it is more and more dependent upon being able to obtain certain things from other countries. These imports have to be paid for by a corresponding volume of exports. Very soon it becomes apparent that, unless recovery in the various countries of major importance goes more or less hand in hand, no single country or group of countries can get very far along the road to normal health. On the other hand, it also becomes apparent that, if recovery sets in at a number of key points in the world's economy, a powerful push is given to the world economy as a whole.

The purpose of this homely and oversimplified description of the present crisis of production is merely to indicate the nature of the economic problem which we face at the present time. Unfortunately the crisis is sharpened and its cure made more difficult by political factors of which we are made more aware every day.

In the last six months we have moved away from a world-wide cooperative effort to repair the ravages of war - away from the attempt to create a ~~simple~~ SINGLE community of peoples based upon the rea lization that not only peace but prosperity had become indivisible. We have moved far in the direction of a world divided into two competing, if not hostile camps, each trying to overcome the economic crisis in its own sphere of influence, in its own way and with little consideration for the other. It may not be a popular thing to say, but I think it is important for us to realize that in the eyes of other peoples the blame for this tragic development does not rest exclusively upon the Soviet Union.

Most Europeans and many Asiatics feel about the recent attitude and actions of the Soviet Union much as we do. The Soviet leadership seems to them - as it seems to us - needlessly harsh, inconsiderate and doctrinaire. They are aware of many of the distortions of Soviet propaganda. In spite of this, what we consider Russian expansionism and aggression is not always regarded in quite the same light by Europeans or Asiatics. They are more inclined than we to regard Russian annexations of territory as merely the recapture of lands which once belonged to Czarist Russia. They are more aware than we of Russia's sufferings and needs, and less fearful of her present military power.

We, on the other hand, appear to most of the peoples of Europe and Asia both as the one ray of light in the present darkness and, at the same time, as one of two great thunderclouds on the horizon. We are the ray of hope because we alone possess the resources which, if used, can push the world's economy off dead-center. We are one of two thunderclouds because, under Russian provocation, we seem at times to become provocative ourselves. It is a curious experience for an American studying conditions abroad to discover that the United States, while on the whole better liked than the Soviet Union, is almost equally feared. In trying to discover why this should be true I have run into a number of recurring themes.

First - due to the separation of powers between our Executive and Legislative Branches, people abroad feel that they cannot count on assurances or declarations of policy by our President or Secretary of State. Furthermore, they feel that, in an election year, our foreign policy is likely to be swayed by considerations of domestic partisan politics. This arouses both fear and resentment that so huge a power factor in the world should be almost completely unpredictable.

Second - the belief is widely held that we are becoming as doctrinaire and fanatical about free enterprise capitalism as the Russians are about totalitarian communism. We seem at times bent on attaching such political strings to economic aid as would force other peoples to remodel themselves in the American image.

Undoubtedly this is true to some extent. Many of our leaders - and perhaps many of our people - seem to feel that there is no real distinction between totalitarian communism and the kind of democratic socialism or semi-socialism which is now emerging in most of the Eastern Hemisphere. One has only to visit Scandinavia or Britain - or for that matter, Finland or Czechoslovakia - to see how great is the difference between a totalitarian police state, such as Yugoslavia, and a country in which people can write and talk and think as they please, even though the big landed estates have been broken up and big business has been put under public ownership. It is hard for us to understand that a system which has brought us so many benefits may not be applicable to other peoples. It is even harder to understand that most Europeans and most Asiatics are less afraid of public control or ownership than they are of private monopoly. But it should not be difficult for us to understand that no self-respecting people likes to be told by even the most benevolent outsider how it should run its domestic affairs.

The fact is that a restoration of our kind of free enterpise capitalism in Europe or Asia is a physical impossibility - even if it were desired by the peoples concerned. The old power groups have been weakened or destroyed. There is little chance for the formation of new private capital. You can't have capitalism without capitalists .

If we intend to pursue a constructive foreign policy, we cannot afford to lose any more time in recognizing that democratic socialism is on our side in the struggle to preserve human freedom and dignity. If we fail to recognize this fact, we shall drive some of our best friends into the totalitarian wilderness. It is worth noting in this connection that the recent manifesto of the new Communist International singled out the leaders of democratic socialism in Europe for an attack, more violent even than that upon our so-called economic imperialism. We may not recognize these Socialist leaders as our friends, but the totalitarians recognize them as their most dangerous enemies.

The third recurring theme I found abroad was the impression that a strong, if not dominant, segment of United States opinion considers war with Russia inevitable, and that an important part of this group is actually contemplating a preventive attack upon the Soviet Union with atomic weapons. I do not believe that any responsible official of our Government - or, for that matter, any sane citizen - is seriously thinking of such action. Surely it is all too obvious what an atomic war would mean to victor as well as vanquished. Surely it is clear that, even were we to conquer Russia without receiving a scratch in return (which is a most unlikely hypothesis), we should then merely have saddled ourselves with the job of occupying a country considerably larger than our own and of policing a people vastly more numerous. We have some measure of what such an undertaking would mean in our current experience with our zone of Germany, where less than twenty million people are involved.

Nevertheless, upon returning from an absence of two months abroad, I myself have been shocked by the pre-occupation of the press and the man in the street with the question of whether and when there is to be war with Russia. I have been shocked at the extent to which we seem to take for granted the continuation of what is now called "the cold war" with the Soviet Union - the extent to which we seem to have forgotten the key sentence in Secretary Marshall's now famous speech at Cambridge last June.

That sentence - which cut like a keen fresh wind through the fog of confusion over the so-called Truman Doctrine- read as follows:

"Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos."

I hope those words are still the key to our foreign policy. No matter what the Kremlin may say or do, I am convinced that this sane approach is still the only road to recovery and peace. It is time that we re-affirmed it - in words and in action.

The fourth and last reason I was given, to account for fear of our influence in the world, was our inclination to take unilateral action, and thus to undermine the prestige and effectiveness of the United Nations. The two examples most frequently cited were our intervention in Turkey and Greece, and our present apparent desire not to route Marshall Plan aid through the United Nations machinery. The danger of delay and obstruction in the United Nations channels is recognized, but the fear persists that, by avoiding present difficulties, we may be storing up trouble for the future.

So much for how we look to our friends across the water. This is more important, I think, than how we look to those who may for the moment be blinded by hostile sentiment.

And now let me put before you, very briefly, what seem to me the essential principles we must follow during the next few months, in order to make a sane policy successful.

First of all, there are certain things we must do here at home. We cannot supply even the world's most urgent needs out of our present exportable surplus of consumer's goods and capital resources. We shall have to re-direct a part of our productive efforts into channels other than those dictated by normal business considerations of making a reasonable profit out of satisfying domestic consumer demand. We shall have to manufacture things that others need at the expense of not making some things that we want ourselves. We shall not only have to produce more, but produce differently - and we shall also have to consume less ourselves.

I believe that, if the American people were given a clear picture of the facts, and what the facts mean in terms of intelligent self-interest, they would be wise enough and generous enough to accept the implications. These implications are not pleasant. I see no sense in being other than completely frank about them.

As I see it, we cannot successfully tackle the job which lies before us unless we recognize and remedy the mistakes we have made in the recent past. Immediately after hostilities ceased, we did three irresponsible things: we cut off Lend Lease without any attempt to work out some sort of a post-war bridge to normal conditions; and we went off food rationing. A few months later we removed price controls and priority allocations. The result of these three actions was to impede the post-war recovery of our friends abroad, and to let our own economy run hog-wild into an unhealthy inflationary spiral. Every housewife knows what this has meant in terms of her market basket.

Let us not waste time over trying to fix the blame for these mistakes. In a sense we were all responsible for them. What concerns us now is to recognize that they were mistakes and that they must be rectified. In plain language - and I think we must use plain language even in an election year - we shall have to re-establish some degree of overall planning and control by Government, business and farm and labor leadership working together, as they did in war-time. We shall have to control prices and maintain a stable purchasing - power wage level. We shall have to make some things even scarcer than they are today in order to do our job abroad, and this means that we must not only control the price of what remains for the domestic consumer but see to it that what remains is fairly distributed. You cannot do that by any voluntary rationing. But I believe that the American people would gladly accept both food rationing and price controls, as well as a certain amount of actual deprivation, if they understood the facts - if they were talked to as grown-ups and not as children - and if they felt that whatever system was put into effect would operate efficiently and, above all, fairly.

Whether or not we face this issue squarely - whether or not the people are given a chance to face it at all in an election year - will, I think, be the supreme test of our two-party system.

The other great test which faces our bi-partisan leadership in the next few months is whether it will have the courage to tell the American people the real facts about the situation which confronts them in the world. Let me give you an example:

In the spring of 1946, Congress authorized a loan of $3,500,000,000 to Great Britain, which was supposed to bridge over the gap of re-conversion. Britain was faced not only with reconversion to peace-time production, but also with an adjustment to the permanent loss of most of her former income from foreign investments. These investments had been sold to buy planes and tanks and guns in order to hold the fort until we made up our minds about Lend-Lease aid. The British knew and said at the time that the amount was insufficient for the purpose. But our negotiators believed that Congress would refuse to appropriate more because, supposedly, the American people wouldn't stand for it. So we built a bridge three-quarters of the way across the river - which is no bridge at all. Had the American people known the facts, I believe they would have wanted to do the whole job - or else nothing.

And that is not all. I am not going into the unwise technical conditions attached to the loan. But an important simple fact - which few people here realize - is that, having made the insufficient loan, we then proceeded to cut it by another 27%. Not because we meant to do any such thing, but because we removed price controls and let our price level skyrocket out of sight, which meant that the $3,500,000,000 which the British had borrowed would buy only about $2,500,000,000 worth of our goods.

The same sort of thing will happen again to any loans we may make, unless we control our home economy. These are the kind of facts which I think the people are entitled to have placed before them.

Our Government is at this moment struggling with an extremely difficult two-fold problem. In order of ultimate importance the two halves are:

First - how to re-activate world production and world trade so that the various nations and peoples may again become self-supporting.

Second - how to prevent a further calamitous deterioration of world conditions in that interim which must elapse before any recovery plan can be worked out and put into effect.

Chronologically these problems come in the reverse order. If too little is done now in the way of immediate relief at the crucial sectors of the world's economy, the recovery plan will be still-born. If too much is done merely to stave off catastrophe, not enough resources will be left to prime the pump of world recovery.

Any one who examines the dire needs of the Eastern Hemisphere is at once forced to the grim conclusion that, if United States aid toward putting the world back upon its own feet is to be effective, United States relief of human misery must in itself be held down to the absolute and cruelly insufficient minimum.

Our resources - though great, if we mobilize them under careful control - are not unlimited. We could spend them all on relief, and there would still remain countless cold and hungry millions, with world recovery still just as far away as ever. There is no surer way to fail than to attack the secondary problem of relief as if it were primary.

In allocating our resources to immediate relief and to later recovery measures we must not only carefully restrict the first but also apply to both types of operation the principle of throwing in our weight only at carefully selected points of maximum leverage. Our help must be concentrated at those points from which recovery is most likely to spread into other areas. Once these points are selected, we must make up our minds to throw in at each crucial spot an amount of help which will really accomplish the desired purpose. It will be better to pick fewer spots, and really do the job where we decide to tackle it, than to overreach ourselves in the number of bridges we try to build at the risk of again leaving some of them spanning only part-way across the river.

The qualifications for a point of maximum leverage will necessarily be both economic and political. They might be defined roughly as follows:

1. Countries or areas which, when re-activated, will become important suppliers or markets for other countries or areas.

2. Countries or areas which are capable of rapidly reactivating their machinery of production and which require only a type of aid that can be quickly supplied.

3. Countries which are not going to use external aid to build up or maintain excessive military establishments, or to distort their economies for political reasons (such as striving for autarchy), or merely to improve their living standards at the expense of achieving economic health. And, finally,

4. Countries which have achieved sufficient political stability to attract private capital. This means not merely the absence of civil strife but the existence of a government which does not permit the draining off of the fruits of production into the pockets of either corrupt officials or predatory private monopolists.

It goes without saying that nations desiring our assistance must qualify by making their maximum efforts at self-help and mutual aid amongst each other- that they must put their financial houses in order and, above all, firmly establish the confidence of their peoples in their governments and in themselves.

These are not absolute yardsticks. Nor can it be expected that any one country or area will conform to all the criteria. But the criteria must exist in order to establish the priorities without which we shall merely waste our resources in a scatter-gun attack, where precision target-shooting is required.

Unfortunately, the simple arithmetic upon which our calculations must be based - especially now, at the beginning - will not always correspond to our predilections nor even to our sense of justice. In Europe, Great Britain is our most obvious point of maximum leverage. Distasteful though it may be, western Germany is probably, because of its coal, the next point from which a limited recovery could most quickly spread into other areas. I say "a limited recovery" because I do not mean to suggest that we re-build Germany beyond the point necessary quickly to restore the health of her neighbors. Other points in Europe at which a small amount of assistance would probably produce maximum results are the Low Countries, Czechoslovakia and Poland. In Asia there areprobably two points of maximum leverage: the rehabilitation of the surplus food producers - Burma, Siam and Indo-China; and - again distastefully - the reactivation of Japanese light industry to produce incentive goods for the entire Continent.

From a political point of view, France, Italy and Greece are the hot-spots of Europe, while China, Korea, India and Pakistan occupy a similar position in Asia. These political hot-spots constitute a two-fold danger to our whole undertaking: first, because their internal instability makes it extremely difficult to appraise just what and how much could be accomplished by a given amount of expenditure; and, second, because our own attitude toward the political issues at stake in these countries is confused by ignorance and prejudice or predilection. In the case of India and China an additional difficulty arises from the sheer magnitude of immediate need on the part of the vast, chronically undernourished populations.

One thing is clear: whatever stop-gap aid we render in these humanly and politically important but economically doubtful areas, must be rigorously held within that global sum which we feel can safely be subtracted from the total resources available to finance world recovery. If we allow political anxiety or even humanitarian sympathy to carry us beyond that point, we shall fail both the world and ourselves.

These are some of the unpalatable realities with which, I think, we must quickly become familiar, if we intend to harness our strength to the task in hand.

There remains one other important element - a psychological factor of which an American becomes acutely aware in conversations with Europeans and Asiatics alike. If we are to discharge the great responsibility, which we have not sought but which history has laid upon us, we must learn not to expect gratitude. We must know - and act as if we knew - that we are giving what we give, not out of unselfish generosity or pity, but out of wise self-interest in the common cause of mankind. Saving men's lives matters less than helping them to save their self-respect.

This is perhaps the most difficult requirement we shall have to meet. Here too we shall not fail - if the American people are given the information to which they are entitled and the chance to make their own decision.

****

The United States and the World Crisis

Address by

JAMES P. WARBURG

to

FOREIGN POLICY ASSOCIATION
Baltimore, Maryland

October 20, 1947

THE UNITED STATES AND THE WORLD CRISIS

It is difficult for us in the United States to realize that we are in the midst of an acute world crisis. We live in a comfortable well-stocked house, high up on a hill which overlooks the plain where dwell the other peoples of the world. Down on the plain there are floods and pestilence and famine. We know this. We are saddened by it. We send medicine and food. We do what we can to help the neediest cases. But we do not fully realize that the floods are rising and will, unless arrested, engulf our own hill-top. We are not fully aware that, without meaning to do so, we have collected on our hill-top practically all the available equipment for fighting and controlling flood-waters and that, unless we make this equipment available, the people in the valley are helpless.

The world crisis is a crisis of lagging or wholly impeded production. Because a great war has been fought in Europe and Asia, ravaging those continents, exhausting their peoples and resources and throwing out of kilter the delicate balance of their economies, the Eastern Hemisphere—from the British Isles to Japan—is suffering from acute shortage and much of it is in a state of political unrest. Peoples, who have for centuries been self-supporting, find themselves unable to produce enough to sustain life at even the lowest subsistence level. Or, if they can produce some things, they find themselves unable to exchange them for other necessities which they have never in the past produced for themselves and have always purchased in other countries.

We, in the Western Hemisphere, have so far been untouched by this crisis. Our half of the world has a surplus of food and raw materials. Its productive capacity has increased while that of Europe and Asia has diminished. In money value, the United States alone at present turns out about two-thirds of the entire world's production. Moreover, the United States is at present the sole surplus producer of most of those particular things which are needed in Europe and Asia in order to re-start the wheels of production.

The needs of Europe and Asia fall into three categories: I shall name them in order of immediate necessity, although this is the reverse of their order of ultimate importance.

First, there is the need for food, fuel and fibres. Unless Western Europe and large parts of Asia receive food and coal from overseas, as well as some textile raw materials, this winter will bring disease and starvation to millions of people. Medical supplies also belong in this category.

Second, there is the need for all sorts of incentive goods. That is, the necessities beyond the minimum of food and fuel, which all men desire for themselves and their families and for which they will work. I mean such things as shoes, clothes, household utensils, simple tools and simple materials with which to repair and rebuild. One must realize that throughout large parts of Europe and Asia today people can see no use in working beyond the point required to eke out a bare living. The things they would like to buy with the money they might earn simply do not exist—or exist only on a small black market which is hopelessly out of their reach. They see no point in saving money because they have lost confidence in its future purchasing power. The chief reason why people seem to have lost the will to work is that they are deprived of the means for translating their work into either the satisfaction of their present needs or insurance against a rainy day in the future.

Third and last, there is the need for the tools of production and especially for the tools or equipment with which to make other tools. Modern industry begins with coal. Coal means power, transportation, steel, machines, machine-parts and every sort of manufacturing equipment. Coal also means food through fertilizer; it means metal containers for preserving food; it means fuel for homes, and thus enables men to work in factories. But, to supply an industry with coal, you need mining machinery, you need men with tools in their hands and the incentive to use them, you need a transportation system to get the coal from pithead to factory and home. If you supply the tools and machinery to rehabilitate your coal mines and to get your transportation system working—if you supply your workers with food and the incentive to work—then you have moved the key log in the log jam.

The next thing is iron. Once you have coal and iron, you can make steel. With steel you can rebuild or repair factories of all sorts. Given a certain number of machine-tools to begin with, you can then make factory equipment. You can make steel rails and rolling stock.

All along the line, as you get started, you will find yourself up against an increasing number of problems. Each factory will require certain raw materials or semi-manufactured goods in order to get going. For each factory that gets under way you need more incentive goods in order to have more workers willing to work. As the process of rehabilitation continues, each country finds that it is more and more dependent upon being able to obtain certain things from other countries. These imports have to be paid for by a corresponding volume of exports. Very soon it becomes apparent that, unless recovery in the various countries of major importance goes more or less hand in hand, no single country or group of countries can get very far along the road to normal health. On the other hand, it also becomes apparent that, if recovery sets in at a number of key points in the world's economy, a powerful push is given to the world economy as a whole.

The purpose of this homely and oversimplified description of the present crisis of production is merely to indicate the nature of the economic problem which we face at the present time. Unfortunately the crisis is sharpened and its cure made more difficult by political factors of which we are made more aware every day.

In the last six months we have moved away from a world-wide co-operative effort to repair the ravages of war—away from the attempt to create a single community of peoples based upon the realization that not only peace but prosperity had become indivisible. We have moved far in the direction of a world divided into two competing, if not hostile camps, each trying to overcome the economic crisis in its own sphere of influence, in its own way and with little consideration for the other. It may not be a popular thing to say, but I think it is important for us to realize that in the eyes of other peoples the blame for this tragic development does not rest exclusively upon the Soviet Union.

Most Europeans and many Asiatics feel about the recent attitude and actions of the Soviet Union much as we do. The Soviet leadership seems to them—as it seems to us—needlessly harsh, inconsiderate and doctrinaire. They are aware of many of the distortions of Soviet propaganda. In spite of this, what we consider Russian expansion and aggression is not always regarded in quite the same light by Europeans or Asiatics. They are more inclined than we to regard Russian annexations of territory as merely the recapture of lands which once belonged to Czarist Russia. They are more aware than we of Russia's sufferings and needs, and less fearful of her present military power.

We, on the other hand, appear to most of the peoples of Europe and Asia both as the one ray of light in the present darkness and, at the same time, as one of two great thunderclouds on the horizon. We are the ray of hope because we alone possess the resources which, if used, can push the world's economy off dead-center. We are one of two thunderclouds because, under Russian provocation, we seem at times to become provocative ourselves. It is a curious experience for an American studying conditions abroad to discover that the United States, while on the whole better liked than the Soviet Union, is almost equally feared. In trying to discover why this should be true I have run into a number of recurring themes.

First—due to the separation of powers between our Executive and Legislative Branches, people abroad feel that they cannot count on assurances or declarations of policy by our President or Secretary of State. Furthermore, they feel that, in an election year, our foreign policy is likely to be swayed by considerations of domestic partisan politics. This arouses both fear and resentment that so huge a power factor in the world should be almost completely unpredictable.

Second—the belief is widely held that we are becoming as doctrinaire and fanatical about free enterprise capitalism as the Russians are about totalitarian communism. We seem at times bent on attaching such political strings to economic aid as would force other peoples to remodel themselves in the American image.

Undoubtedly this is true to some extent. Many of our leaders—and perhaps many of our people—seem to feel that there is no real distinction between totalitarian communism and the kind of democratic socialism or semi-socialism which is now emerging in most of the Eastern Hemisphere. One has only to visit Scandinavia or Britain—or for that matter, Finland or Czechoslovakia—to see how great is the difference between a totalitarian police state, such as Yugoslavia, and a country in which people can write and talk and think as they please, even though the big landed estates have been broken up and big business has been put under public ownership. It is hard for us to understand that a system which has brought us so many benefits may not be applicable to other peoples. It is even harder to understand that most Europeans and most Asiatics are less afraid of public control or ownership than they are of private monopoly. But it should not be difficult for us to understand that no self-respecting people likes to be told by even the most benevolent outsider how it should run its domestic affairs.

The fact is that a restoration of our kind of free enterprise capitalism in Europe or Asia is a physical impossibility—even if it were desired by the peoples concerned. The old power groups have been weakened or destroyed. There is little chance for the formation of new private capital. You can't have capitalism without capitalists.

If we intend to pursue a constructive foreign policy, we cannot afford to lose any more time in recognizing that democratic socialism is on our side in the struggle to preserve human freedom and dignity. If we fail to recognize this fact, we shall drive some of our best friends into the totalitarian wilderness. It is worth noting in this connection that the recent manifesto of the new Communist International singled out the leaders of democratic socialism in Europe for an attack, more violent even than that upon our so-called economic imperialism. We may not recognize these Socialist leaders as our friends, but the totalitarians recognize them as their most dangerous enemies.

The third recurring theme I found abroad was the impression that a strong, if not dominant, segment of United States opinion considers war with Russia inevitable, and that an important part of this group is actually contemplating a preventive attack upon the Soviet Union with atomic weapons. I do not believe that any responsible official of our Government—or, for that matter, any sane citizen—is seriously thinking of such action. Surely it is all too obvious what an atomic war would mean to victor as well as vanquished. Surely it is clear that, even were we to conquer Russia without receiving a scratch in return (which is a most unlikely hypothesis), we should then merely have saddled ourselves with the job of occupying a country considerably larger than our own and of policing a people vastly more numerous. We have some measure of what such an undertaking would mean in our current experience with our zone of Germany, where less than twenty million people are involved.

Nevertheless, upon returning from an absence of two months abroad, I myself have been shocked by the pre-occupation of the press and the man in the street with the question of whether and when there is to be war with Russia. I have been shocked at the extent to which we seem to take for granted the continuation of what is now called "the cold war" with the Soviet Union—the extent to which we seem to have forgotten the key sentence in Secretary Marshall's now famous speech at Cambridge last June. That sentence—which cut like a keen fresh wind through the fog of confusion over the so-called Truman Doctrine—read as follows:

"Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos."

I hope those words are still the key to our foreign policy. No matter what the Kremlin may say or do, I am convinced that this sane approach is still the only road to recovery and peace. It is time that we re-affirmed it—in words and in action.

The fourth and last reason I was given, to account for fear of our influence in the world, was our inclination to take unilateral action, and thus to undermine the prestige and effectiveness of the United Nations. The two examples most frequently cited were our intervention in Turkey and Greece, and our present apparent desire not to route Marshall Plan aid through the United Nations machinery. The danger of delay and obstruction in the United Nations channels is recognized, but the fear persists that, by avoiding present difficulties, we may be storing up trouble for the future.

So much for how we look to our friends across the water. This is more important, I think, than how we look to those who may for the moment be blinded by hostile sentiment.

And now let me put before you, very briefly, what seem to me the essential principles we must follow during the next few months, in order to make a sane policy successful.

First of all, there are certain things we must do here at home. We cannot supply even the world's most urgent needs out of our present exportable surplus of consumer's goods and capital resources. We shall have to re-direct a part of our productive efforts into channels other than those dictated by normal business considerations of making a reasonable profit out of satisfying domestic consumer demand. We shall have to manufacture things that others need at the expense of not making some things that we want ourselves. We shall not only have to produce more, but produce differently—and we shall also have to consume less ourselves.

I believe that, if the American people were given a clear picture of the facts, and what the facts mean in terms of intelligent self-interest, they would be wise enough and generous enough to accept the implications. These implications are not pleasant. I see no sense in being other than completely frank about them.

As I see it, we cannot successfully tackle the job which lies before us unless we recognize and remedy the mistakes we have made in the recent past. Immediately after hostilities ceased, we did three irresponsible things: we cut off Lend Lease without any attempt to work out some sort of a post-war bridge to normal conditions; we went off food rationing; and, a few months later, we removed price controls and priority allocations. The result of these three actions was to impede the post-war recovery of our friends abroad, and to let our own economy run hog-wild into an unhealthy inflationary spiral. Every housewife knows what this has meant in terms of her market basket.

Let us not waste time over trying to fix the blame for these mistakes. In a sense we were all responsible for them. What concerns us now is to recognize that they were mistakes and that they must be rectified. In plain language—and I think we must use plain language even in an election year—we shall have to re-establish some degree of overall planning and control by Government, business and farm and labor leadership working together, as they did in war-time. We shall have to control prices and maintain a stable purchasing-power wage level. We shall have to make some things even scarcer than they are today in order to do our job abroad, and this means that we must not only control the price of what remains for the domestic consumer but see to it that what remains is fairly distributed. You cannot do that by any voluntary rationing. But I believe that the American people would gladly accept both food rationing and price controls, as well as a certain amount of actual deprivation, if they understood the facts—if they were talked to as grown-ups and not as children—and if they felt that whatever system was put into effect would operate efficiently and, above all, fairly.

Whether or not we face this issue squarely—whether or not the people are given a chance to face it at all in an election year—will, I think, be the supreme test of our two-party system.

The other great test which faces our bi-partisan leadership in the next few months is whether it will have the courage to tell the American people the real facts about the situation which confronts them in the world. Let me give you an example:

In the spring of 1946, Congress authorized a loan of $3,500,000,000 to Great Britain, which was supposed to bridge over the gap of reconversion. Britain was faced not only with reconversion to peace-time production, but also with an adjustment to the permanent loss of most of her former income from foreign investments. These investments had been sold to buy planes and tanks and guns in order to hold the fort until we made up our minds about Lend-Lease aid. The British knew and said at the time that the amount of $3,500,000,000 was insufficient for the purpose. But our negotiators believed that Congress would refuse to appropriate more because, supposedly, the American people wouldn't stand for it. So we built a bridge three-quarters of the way across the river—which is no bridge at all. Had the American people known the facts, I believe they would have wanted to do the whole job—or else nothing.

And that is not all. I am not going into the unwise technical conditions attached to the loan. But an important simple fact—which few people here realize—is that, having made the insufficient loan, we then proceeded to cut it by another 27%. Not because we meant to do any such thing, but because we removed price controls and let our price level skyrocket out of sight, which meant that the $3,500,000,000 which the British had borrowed would buy only about $2,500,000,000 worth of our goods.

The same sort of thing will happen again to any loans we may make, unless we control our home economy. These are the kind of facts which I think the people are entitled to have placed before them.

Our Government is at this moment struggling with an extremely difficult two-fold problem. In order of ultimate importance its two halves are:

First—how to re-activate world production and world trade so that the various nations and peoples may again become self-supporting.

Second—how to prevent a further calamitous deterioration of world conditions in that interim which must elapse before any recovery plan can be worked out and put into effect.

Chronologically these problems come in the reverse order. If too little is done now in the way of immediate relief at the crucial sectors of the world's economy, the recovery plan will be still-born. If too much is done merely to stave off catastrophe, not enough resources will be left to prime the pump of world recovery.

Any one who examines the dire needs of the Eastern Hemisphere is at once forced to the grim conclusion that, if United States aid toward putting the world back upon its own feet is to be effective, United States relief of human misery must in itself be held down to the absolute and cruelly insufficient minimum.

Our resources—though great, if we mobilize them under careful control—are not unlimited. We could spend them all on relief, and there would still remain countless cold and hungry millions, with world recovery still just as far way as ever. There is no surer way to fail than to attack the secondary problem of relief as if it were primary.

In allocating our resources to immediate relief and to later recovery measures we must not only carefully restrict the first but also apply to both types of operation the principle of throwing in our weight only at carefully selected points of maximum leverage. Our help must be concentrated at those points from which recovery is most likely to spread into other areas. Once these points are selected, we must make up our minds to throw in at each crucial spot an amount of help which will really accomplish the desired purpose. It will be better to pick fewer spots, and really do the job where we decide to tackle it, than to over-reach ourselves in the number of bridges we try to build at the risk of again leaving some of them spanning only part-way across the river.

The qualifications for a point of maximum leverage will necessarily be both economic and political. They might be defined roughly as follows:

1. Countries or areas which, when re-activated, will become important suppliers or markets for other countries or areas.

2. Countries or areas which are capable of rapidly re-starting their machinery of production and which require only a type of aid that can be quickly supplied.

3. Countries which are not going to use external aid to build up or maintain excessive military establishments, or to distort their economies for political reasons (such as striving for autarchy), or merely to improve their living standards at the expense of achieving economic health. And, finally,

4. Countries which have achieved sufficient political stability to attract private capital. This means not merely the absence of civil strife but the existence of a government which does not permit the draining off of the fruits of production into the pockets of either corrupt officials or predatory private monopolists.

It goes without saying that nations desiring our assistance must qualify by making their maximum efforts at self-help and mutual aid amongst each other—that they must put their financial houses in order and, above all, firmly establish the confidence of their peoples in their governments and in themselves.

These are not absolute yardsticks. Nor can it be expected that any one country or area will conform to all the criteria. But the criteria must exist in order to establish the priorities without which we shall merely waste our resources in a scatter-gun attack, where precision target-shooting is required.

Unfortunately, the simple arithmetic upon which our calculations must be based—especially now, at the beginning—will not always correspond to our predilections nor even to our sense of justice. In Europe, Great Britain is our most obvious point of maximum leverage. Distasteful though it may be, western Germany is probably, because of its coal, the next point from which a limited recovery could most quickly spread into other areas. I say "a limited recovery" because I do not mean to suggest that we re-build Germany beyond the point necessary quickly to restore the health of her neighbors. Other points in Europe at which a small amount of assistance would probably produce maximum results are the Low Countries, Czechoslovakia and Poland. In Asia there are probably two points of maximum leverage: the rehabilitation of the surplus food producers—Burma, Siam and Indo-China; and—again distastefully—the reactivation of Japanese light industry to produce incentive goods for the entire Continent.

From a political point of view, France, Italy and Greece are the hot-spots of Europe, while China, Korea, India and Pakistan occupy a similar position in Asia. These political hot-spots constitute a two-fold danger to our whole undertaking: first, because their internal instability makes it extremely difficult to appraise just what and how much could be accomplished by a given amount of expenditure; and, second, because our own attitude toward the political issues at stake in these countries is confused by ignorance and prejudice or predilection. In the case of India and China an additional difficulty arises from the sheer magnitude of immediate need on the part of vast, chronically undernourished populations.

One thing is clear: whatever stop-gap aid we render in these humanly and politically important but economically doubtful areas, must be rigorously held within that global sum which we feel can safely be subtracted from the total resources available to finance world recovery. If we allow political anxiety or even humanitarian sympathy to carry us beyond that point, we shall fail both the world and ourselves.

These are some of the unpalatable realities with which, I think, we must quickly become familiar, if we intend to harness our strength to the task in hand.

There remains one other important element—a psychological factor of which an American becomes acutely aware in conversations with Europeans and Asiatics alike. If we are to discharge great responsibility, which we have not sought but which history has laid upon us, we must learn not to expect gratitude. We must know—and act as if we knew—that we are giving what we give, not out of unselfish generosity or pity, but out of wise self-interest in the common cause of mankind. Saving men's lives matters less than helping them to save their self-respect.

This is perhaps the most difficult requirement we shall have to meet. Here too we shall not fail—if the American people are given the information to which they are entitled and the chance to make their own decision.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.
485 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

October 14, 1947

Dear Jim:

This is my belated thanks for your contribution the other evening—I have not ceased to hear favorable comments about it. My colleagues here in the News Room were particularly impressed with your crisp, concise answers to questions, and as you can imagine, they are not easily impressed. I have caused a record of the interview to be sent you. We must do it again.

Sincerely yours,

COPY

Mr. James P. Warburg
70 East 45th Street
New York 17, New York

E. R. M.
F. 1155

36 EAST 70TH STREET

Dear Ed:

I haven't your and your home address or telephone number so must send this to the office.

Robert Lutyen and his wife have just arrived from England. He is Barbie Jaeger's brother - They would like to meet you and Janet so I am wondering if you would both dine at my flat next Tuesday, October 1st at 7.15?

Do hope you can.

Sincerely,

Phyllis (Warburg)

September 23, 1947

My telephone number is Regent 7-3250.

Warburg Ap

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

EDWARD R. MURROW AS BROADCAST

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1947

7:45 - 8:00 PM

CUE: (COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM)
(..... 30 seconds .....)

CHAPPELL: (COMMERCIAL)

Now, Edward R. Murrow!

MURROW: This is the news! The United States believes that the Communists in Europe are trying to prevent, if they can, the economic recovery of Europe. This country's reaction to the so-called propaganda bureau set up by the nine Communist Parties in Europe was made known by Under-Secretary of State Lovett and he had this advice for Europeans -- don't be taken in by the Communists' malicious and unscrupulous distortion of American policies, and this advice for the American people. This is a time for coolness and clarity of judgment. We must stick to our course and continue to study with sympathy and realism how we can best help Europe.

Another State Department official added this. Assistant Secretary Willard L. Thorpe told the United Nations Committee: "If the United States does not provide extensive aid to Europe, we are told we are heartless and irresponsible.

fdm (more)

MURROW
Cont'd:

If we do give assistance, we are said to be acting politically and invading the sovereignty of others."

And in London, Sir Stafford Cripps, the new Economics Minister, says: "Unless some form of dollar aid is made available to Great Britain by America this year, Britain must again cut her imports from America, but if Britain is told the Marshall Plan can be ready by next June then she can get along till then."

Andrei Vishinsky made another strong attack against American policies in the Balkans - to no avail.

The General Assembly's Political Committee has voted to set up a new commission to keep an eye on what's going on in the Balkans, particularly along the borders of Greece. Thirty-four nations voted for this American proposal and six voted against it, all members of the Soviet bloc. The Committee also called on Bulgaria, Jugoslavia, and Albania to cooperate with the new Commission, and if they agree to that the United States will drop its charges of aggression against each of them. The Committee may take up the "aggression" charge tomorrow.

Now the word is out at Lake Success that the United States has decided to support the partition of Palestine, with some reservations.

fdm

(more)

MURROW (CTD): The second big test of the food-saving campaign comes up tomorrow, - no eggs, no poultry. Mr. Luckman, the Chairman of the Food Committee, feels the campaign got off to a first rate start yesterday and a few minutes ago he announced that the nation's distillers will close down for two months, a move that he estimates will save between 10 and 20 billion bushels of grain, perhaps as much as a fifth of the overall goal of a hundred million bushels.

The President made two appeals today on behalf of the food campaign. In a letter to the American Federation of Labor Convention in San Francisco he called on all workers to conserve food and to cooperate with management to increase pdoduction and in a radio broadcast to women members of the Democratic Party he said: "Housewives can help their country and the world by saving food."

In London there was more excitement over the secret of the design of Princess Elizabeth's wedding gown than a test flight of a small pilotless rocket plane launched from a bomber high above the Atlantic. British experts say it is reasonable to assume that the plane may have surpassed the speed of sound - 760 miles per hour. It may have approached a thousand miles an hour. It will take at least a week of checking records to tell.

fdm

(more)

MURROW (CTD): And the FBI tonight announced that two more former servicemen have been arrested on charges of stealing photographs and film from Los Alamos, the Atomic Energy Plant. The material has been recovered and now George Thompson, of Riverside, New Mexico, and Ernest Paparello, of Albuquerque, New Mexico, face maximum penalty of five years in jail, five-thousand-dollar fine, or both.

And, now, a friend of mine, James P. Warburg, has just returned from Europe. He's a former banker, an economist, and expert on European affairs. The latest of his several books is called "Germany, Bridge or Battleground." I've asked him to come along to the studio tonight and answer a few questions.

Jimmie, how long were you over this time?

WARBURG: Two months, Ed! Some of it I spent behind the so-called "iron curtain," as I did last year.

MURROW: Well, let's start with Germany. You know that country and its people as well as any American I know. What were your impressions this year against last year?

WARBURG: The quickest way for me to answer your question, Ed, is to say - the same only more so!

MURROW: Well, that's a little too quick! Explain, please.

fdm

WARBURG: There really isn't much change, Ed, except a slow deterioration. The country is still an economic desert and a moral morass. The Four Power snarl remains more hopelessly tangled than ever. Much of the rubble has been cleared away from the streets, but little of the rubble has been cleared away from the German mind.

MURROW: And whose fault is that?

WARBURG: It's not the fault of the man on the spot. Our own man, General Clay, continues to face his impossible task with great courage and determination!

MURROW: Well, that's a strong statement! Why is his task impossible?

WARBURG: Because the Big Four, Ed, -the occupying powers, are as far away from agreement as ever and not only about Germany.

MURROW: Well, the four Foreign Ministers are going to try to agree about Germany in that meeting in London in November. Do you think they will?

WARBURG: I doubt it very much, Ed! What will probably happen is that, as a result of Anglo-American failure to agree with Russia, the three western zones of Germany will be merged and rehabilitated.

MURROW: And then the division of Germany and of Europe will be complete and probably final, won't it?

fdm

WARBURG: No ... I don't think so! .. In fact, I think the only hope now for a united Germany and a united Europe lies in our going our own way, always keeping the door open for the Russians and letting them go their way until they are ready to come in.

MURROW: And just exactly what makes you think they will want to come in?

WARBURG: At present the Russians have a going concern in their zone. We have a bankrupt concern in ours. The Russians are gradually milking their cow dry. If we make western Germany self-supporting, I believe the Russians will want to have a voice in its control and eventual complexion. I say this especially because they will want a voice in the future of Ruhr coal and industry.

MURROW: Now, Jimmie, you're an economist, aren't you?

WARBURG: Well, I wouldn't call myself an economist!

MURROW: Well, how much will it cost us to make Germany a going concern and can we afford it?

WARBURG: Well, that's not a question to ask even a fake economist! The original estimate for the Anglo-American zones alone was, as I remember, one billion dollars.

MURROW: I think that was optimistic!

fdm

WARBURG: If we figure on adding the French zone and allow for the deterioration and delay since that estimate was made, my own guess (for what it is worth!) would be nearer two billion, most of which will probably have to be paid by us.

MURROW: I notice that you say we will have to pay most of it. Don't we get any help?

WARBURG: Not much, Ed. Neither Britain nor France are going to be able to contribute very much, especially dollars or things that have to be bought with dollars.

fdm

MURROW: Well, Jimmie, there are a lot of people who think the British could do more if they wanted to and others who think that Britain is in a mess because they have a Socialist Government. What do you think?

WARBURG: Ed, I could talk for an hour about that. To hit only the highest high spots; first -- I think the British are going everything they could possibly do. Second - I do not think that their present predicament, which is very serious, results from anything they have done or failed to do since the war ended. The British internal economy is healthy. Production is at a higher level than pre-war. There is no unemployment. Wages and prices are in good balance. The only bad spot in this internal picture is coal and this is an old story that goes back twenty years. Britain is in trouble for one very simple reason. She is like a man who always worked hard and lived well because, in addition to his earnings, he had an income from invested capital. Then a family emergency arose and he had to spend all his capital to meet it. The emergency in Britain's case was the war, which made her sell most of her foreign investments to buy planes and tanks and guns till Lend-lease came into operation. Today, Britain finds herself without foreign exchange income from foreign investments and, therefore, can buy abroad only as much as she can sell.

(MORE)

WARBURG: CONT'D: This means that the British people have to do two things -- cut down their standard of living and find ways and means of earning much more than they did in the past. That takes time, Ed, and it isn't easy. To make the adjustment, Britain has to borrow, just like an individual would.

MURROW: Now, do you, as an ex-banker, regard Britain as a good risk?

WARBURG: In banker's terms, Ed, no European country is a good risk, but Britain is, in my judgment, the best. In addition, Britain is the political and economic center of the position we have decided to hold. If Britain goes under there can be no recovery in western Europe.

MURROW: Well, how far east do you think that position goes? Does it include any of the countries behind the so-called "iron curtain"? Specifically, what about Czechoslovakia?

WARBURG: I was in Czechoslovakia this summer. There isn't any "iron curtain" around the Czechs, unless we put it there. It is true that the Czechs are dependent on Russia in foreign policy as they used to be dependent on France before the Munich betrayals, but the Czechs are by no means Sovietized and don't want to be. Their present internal set-up is a very interesting half-way house, between eastern and western ideas.

(MORE)

WARBURG CONT'D : Most of the reforms which have taken place were planned by the Czechs in the days of the first republic or by their exiled government in London.

MURROW: But, Jimmie, the Czechs refused to go to Paris to help draw up the requirements for the Marshall Plan and the Czech Communist Party is a memeber of the new nine-power Communist International. Wouldn't American assistance for Prague be, in effect, help for Moscow and contrary to the Marshall Plan?

WARBURG: Ed, one of the things that worries me most since I've come home is the extent to which Americans are thinking in terms of what is now called a "cold war" with the Soviet Union and the extent to which they have forgotten the key sentence in that Marshall speech. That sentence read: "Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine, but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos." I think the best way to avoid war and keep the free peoples of the world free is to stick to that basic idea. So far as the Czecks are concerned, a very small amount of money would go a long way to help them maintain their precarious position. The Czecks themselves feel that their greatest danger of being really Sovietized comes not so much from anything the Russians may do as from the possibility that the west may cut them off from their natural trade channels and that would certainly drive them into the Soviet wilderness.

fdm

MURROW: Well, Jimmie, one question. Why is it that so many European nations that are friends of ours are so critical of us and of our policies?

WARBURG: Before answering that let me say one thing, Ed. If we are going to tackle the job of helping the world to get back on its feet, we must learn not to expect gratitude. We must know, and act as if we knew, that we are giving whatever we give not out of unselfish generosity but of wise, self-interest. Saving men's lives matters less than helping them to save their self-respect.

MURROW: Jimmie, what do you think is the real crux of this whole problem in Europe?

WARBURG: Ed, I think the crux of the matter is this. The Marshall Plan is worth the sacrifice (and it's a big sacrifice!) only if it is designed to help the world to go in the direction in which the masses of mankind want to go. That direction is certainly not totalitarian Communism, but neither is it our own particular brand of free enterprise democracy.

MURROW: Thank you, Jimmie Warburg, for answering questions so frankly.

Mr. James Warburg, former banker, economist, and writer on foreign affairs, who has just returned from one of his trips to Europe, has been answering questions for us here this evening.

fdm

(more)

CHAPPELL: (Commercial)

Now, Ed Murrow and the word-for-today.

MURROW: The word-for-today is this, quote: "Our difficulties are, indeed, great but when viewed in comparison to those of Europe they are the joys of Paradise." For some reason or other, the European has rarely been able to see America except in caricature. We do not ask to be sprinkled with rose water, but may perhaps fairly protest to being drenched with the r rinsings of an unclean imaginationl" (unquote) Those words represent the combined views of two Americans - John Lowell and Thomas Jefferson, and still stand up though they were written nearly a hundred and fifty years ago.

Good night and - good luck.

CHAPPELL: (COMMERCIAL)

This is CBS, the COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

- fade theme 15 seconds -

WCBS.....NEW YORK

fdm

ROOM 2720

TELEPHONE
MURRAY HILL 4-0163

JAMES P. WARBURG
70 EAST 45TH STREET
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

August 27, 1947

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Colubmia Broadcasting System
Madison Avenue and 52nd Street
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Mr. Warburg has written from Prague asking that I send you a copy of his series of articles written for the Chicago Sun Syndicate, on his impressions of Czechoslovakia during his recent stay there. The articles have not yet appeared in print.

Sincerely yours,

Margaret Adams
Secretary to
Mr. Warburg

REPORT ON CZECHOSLOVAKIA

I.

James P. Warburg

The little Republic of Czechoslovakia - in area about the size of Illinois - may well turn out to be the pilot plant of the European future. Given a chance to work out their problems in peace, 12,500,000 Czechoslovaks very likely hold in their hands the key to the major problems of that troubled and troublesome continent.

In spite of numerous domestic handicaps - in spite of an incredibly difficult foreign policy problem - the Czechs appear to be evolving a new type of political and economic organization which may prove to be the very much missing link between East and West.

Whether or not they succeed will depend partly upon themselves, partly upon the Soviet Union, and partly upon the Western democracies - especially upon the United States.

This series of articles is concerned primarily with the role of the West, and particularly with the impact of United States policy upon the Czechoslovak future.

Any American who visits Czechoslovakia today will first of all wish to test the validity of three widely held Western beliefs:

1. That present-day Czechoslovakia is a police-state modelled in the Soviet image and that its people live behind an iron curtain.

2. That free enterprise has been abolished in favor of a Soviet-style totalitarian economy. And

3. That Czechoslovakia is now a Russian satellite which, by not attending the Paris Conference last July, abdicated its independence and chose its side in a permanently divided Europe.

Before presenting the evidence for this observer's conclusions that these three beliefs are fallacious, a little background may be useful.

1. On the map Czechoslovakia looks like a somewhat mis-shapen fish land-locked in the heart of Europe. The head and upper body of the fish, comprising the Czech Lands of Bohemia and Moravia, lie embedded between Germany and Austria. Its lower body - Slovakia - lies between Poland and Hungary. Its truncated tail rests against the Soviet Union. Except for one short stretch touching upon the United States Zones of Germany and Austria, all of Czechoslovakia's long frontier borders on areas now under Soviet control or influence.

2. Czechoslovakia is a bi-national state. Its population consists of nearly 10,000,000 Czechs and over 2,500,000 Slovaks. Almost 3,000,000 former Sudeten Germans citizens have been expelled because they betrayed the Republic. Over 98% of them voted before the Hitler invasion for annexation to Germany and later collaborated with the German occupation.

The Czechs and Slovaks are very different from each other. The Czechs are a politically sophisticated people, proud and tenaciously determined to regain the freedom lost in 1620 to the Hapsburg monarchy. When their dream was realized in 1918 they successfully emancipated themselves from their former German ruling class. They became in spirit a free people.

The Slovaks are for the most part feudal-minded peasants accustomed for a thousand years to passive acceptance of an inferior status. The Hungarians played a role in Slovakia similar to that played by the Austro-Germans in the Czech lands. When the Republic was established in 1918 the Slovaks remained partly under the thumb of the old Hungarian-minded aristocracy, reinforced by the Catholic Church, and partly under the newly established Czech leadership at Prague.

From an economic point of view the Germans in the Czech lands and the Hungarians in Slovakia clung to a large part of their privileged position, even under the Republic. They acted as an ex-ruling class arrogantly and stubbornly trying to maintain their former position. They never identified themselves fully with the Czechoslovak State.

Under the German occupation the vast majority of Czechs remained loyal to their oppressed country. During the six terrible years of Nazi rule they maintained a courageous and stubborn resistance. There were, of course, some Czech collaborators, especially among the big businessmen and landholders, but these were the exception. The story of Slovakia under the occupation was less creditable. Under the Fascist leadership of Father Tiso the majority of Slovaks formed a Nazi puppet state, and sent a sizeable army to fight the Russians. A minority formed a partisan resistance movement. It is only by courtesy to the Czechs that Slovakia is now considered an Allied rather than an ex-enemy nation.

Today, because the Czechs need Slovak manpower and resources to rebuild their country, all this is largely forgotten. The Slovaks now are being encouraged to shake off their feudal habits, to help modernize agriculture, to establish new industries, to re-settle the Sudeten territory, and to assume a position of political equality.

3. The Czechoslovak Republic's pre-war economy depended very largely upon its ability to import raw materials and to export finished products. Agriculture was insufficient to supply all foodstuffs. High-grade coking coal and motor fuels were imported as well as cotton, rubber and other raw materials. Textiles, shoes, china, glass and furniture were large items of export as well as machinery and certain products of the iron and steel industry. Big Business was largely German-controlled. The six years of Nazi occupation served to incorporate the Czech economy almost wholly into that of the Reich.

4. In foreign affairs Czechoslovakia was, until 1938, chiefly oriented toward the West - particularly toward France and Britain. It relied for security upon the League of Nations as well as upon its French alliance and membership in the Little Entente. Its relations with the Soviet Union were friendly but not paramount. It was regarded with some envy by Poland and with some hostility by Hungary. After the betrayal of Munich, Czechoslovakia's orientation changed, as might be expected, to one of primary reliance upon the Soviet Union, the only friend who had stood by in Czechoslovakia's hour of need.

The United States occupied a special position in the pre-war feelings of the Czechoslovak people. The Republic had been founded in America and conceived very largely in the image of American democracy. Hundreds of thousands of Czechs and Slovaks lived in the United States. Trade flourished between the two countries. The role of the United States in the betrayal of Munich, although secondary, considerably damaged American prestige, yet this damage was more than offset by President Roosevelt's subsequent leadership in the fight for freedom.

When the day of liberation came, in May 1945, the people of Czechoslovakia would perhaps have been even happier had American troops rather than Russian first entered their capital. As a matter of fact, two of General Patton's tanks did enter Prague during the uprising of May 5thh - and then withdrew for reasons which are still mysterious to the inhabitants of the city.

One of the things that troubles and puzzles many Czechs today is that they believe - perhaps not without reason - that we agreed at Yalta to let the Red Army liberate Czechoslovakia.

But - as we shall see - other things about our policy since the war ended trouble and puzzle them even more.

Czechoslovakia shows few outward signs of having passed through a war. In Western Bohemia the great Skoda plant at Pilsen, which our bombers partially destroyed, is being rebuilt. In Prague a few buildings in the heart of the beautiful "old city" were heavily damaged during the uprising of May 1945. And then there is the obscene scar left by the wanton total destruction of the little town of Lidice. But Czechoslovakia's worst war wounds lie beneath the surface of her ancient cities, her neat little villages and her fertile fields.

II

Iron Curtain?

The first thing one learns upon entering Czechoslovakia today is that, as Mark Twain would have said, "One knows a lot of things that ain't so."

Having spent some time in the Russian Zone of Germany a year ago, and having followed recent Western accounts of developments in Central Europe, this observer expected to find at least a modified form of police state and considerable evidence of what is commonly called "living behind the Iron Curtain."

A few hours served to dispel this illusion, and a week confirmed the first impression beyond any doubt.

To begin with, landing at the Prague airport is rather like landing at the La Guardia Field in New York. In the usual inefficient hurly-burly of newly arrived passengers struggling to get their baggage assembled and passed through customs, one hears every language of Europe. Planes arrive from the Balkans, from France, Britain, Scandinavia and the Low Countries - from the Near East, the Far East - from Germany, Russia and the United States. The multi-lingual Czech passport officials ask only a few polite questions - fewer and politer than are asked by our own officials. Fifteen minutes after arrival the visitor is free to wander where and how he pleases through the entire country.

The hotel is crowded - mostly with foreign visitors - but a reservation in Prague means that one's room is actually available on arrival. The personnel speak a little English or French, or - if need be as a last resort - German. A standard joke is to say - when all else fails - "do you speak a little Swiss?"

On the particular afternoon of this visitor's arrival the streets were crowded. Groups of teen-agers were wandering about in various uniforms - some of them singing. A youth congress was in town with delegations from all over Europe.

Wandering along Vaclavske Namesti - Prague's "main-stem" - one is struck by the number of book-shops and news-stands. One particularly large shop of this sort had over its door the name of the leading Communist newspaper "Rude Pravo." Inside was a long table displaying various periodicals and newspapers. Expecting to find Communist literature, one was not surprised to find - alongside of various local newspapers - the "London Daily Worker", "Humanite" from Paris and "The New Masses" from New York. But there were also - displayed with equal prominence - the "Paris Herald Tribune," the "London Daily Mail," the "London Times," and other French, English and Swiss newspapers of every political hue. What is more they were the issues of that same day. Browsing along further back one came upon recent issues of "Time, Inc." , "Business Week," "The New Republic" and the "London Economist."

The Czechs are v oracious newspaper readers, and since a large part of the population reads at least one foreign language, they are an extremely well-informed people concerning events and opinions outside their own country.

Their own press is uncensored. There is an agreement that the native press must not criticize Czechoslovakia's ally, the Soviet Union, but this does not prevent very free criticism of the local Communist Party by the more conservative/news papers.

Each political party - there are four in the Czech lands and four in Slovakia - has its own daily newspaper. Other Prague dailies are published by the Trade Union Movement, the Union of Czech Youth, the Legionaries Association, the Czech Army, the Federation of Cultural Associations and the Union of Agriculturalists.

Under the new law the principle is established that "newspapers and periodicals must not be the object of profitable enterprise by individuals and anonymous groups." In addition to recognized political parties, government departments and public corporations, only bodies of importance for the whole nation are qualified to apply for licenses. The only exception is in the fields of art and science.

This is one of the ways in which Czechoslovakia is very interestingly breaking new ground and finding a link between Western laisser faire and Soviet Communism. It seems to be a satisfactory experiment, avoiding the evils of private irresponsibility and monopolistic control without falling into the pitfalls of a parrot press expressing only the views of the Government.

It is true that the citizen of Czechoslovakia who depends only upon the native press at the present time reads no criticism of the Soviet Union. It is also true that he gets a somewhat distorted view of the West because here there is no corresponding ban. But Western criticism of the Soviet Union circulates freely through the imported foreign press and by word of mouth to those who cannot read it.

Speaking of word of mouth, one cannot find in Czechoslovakia today the slightest sign of fear to express any opinion or tell any joke at no matter whose expense. There is, one is told, a secret police. But no one seems to be in the least aware of its existence. The Communists, although they are the strongest party in the Czech lands, are the butt of constant humorous criticism. A shop-keeper, when asked for something not in stock, is likely to shrug and say: "Sorry, we've got nothing in stock but a lot of Communism." One of the most popular reviews pokes fun at the Communist Party. Quite a few of the Communists themselves have something which they sadly lack in other countries - a sense of humor.

If there is today an Iron Curtain around Czechoslovakia, it has not been placed there by the Czechs nor by the Soviet Union. There is perhaps something of that nature created by the false assumptions of the West and by the actions of the West taken upon the basis of those assumptions. Believing that Czechoslovakia lives under Russian domination, has become a police state and re-modelled its economy in the Russian image, the West - particularly the United States - has recently tended to ostracize the Czechoslovak Republic. Not wanting to help the Soviet Union in the present state of affairs, many Westerners object to helping what they consider a satellite of the Soviet Union. Sometimes we go even further. Not only do we not want to help Czechoslovakia, we seem at times not to want to have anything to do with her.

Our State Department, for example, refused to allow a representative delegation of American youth to attend the Youth Congress at Prague presumably because it was to be held under Communist auspices. Yet this did not prevent a motley crew of American leftist youth from coming here on individual passports and making a miserable impression. While other groups put up impressive exhibitions, the United States exhibit contained such posters as one sees at a Communist rally in Union Square - posters critical of the United States and of the American way of life. The Russians and the Yugoslavs "stole the show."

Things such as this cause the Czechs to wonder and sadly shake their heads. And when a Czech buyer wishing to go to the States is refused a passport because he belongs to the Czech Communist Party - the party of his Prime Minister - the Czechs begin to feel that they are behind an Iron Curtain - an Iron Curtain drawn by their former friends in the West.

III

Political Scene

What sort of a state is the new Czechoslovakia? Is it turning its back upon Western democratic principles and becoming a Communist dictatorship? Let us examine first its political and then its economic aspect.

The political evolution now taking place in Czechoslovakia did not begin with liberation by the Red Army. It did not even begin with Munich and the Nazi occupation. It began in the days of the First Republic, when it became apparent that the government of the new state under its Wilsonian Constitution faced two serious difficulties. These were: the minority problem; and the growth of a top-heavy and somewhat inflexible bureaucracy. Even before the advent of Hitler the Czechs were considering various innovations to overcome these difficulties.

The minority problem arose over the inclusion in the new Republic of not only 2,500,000 backward Slovaks, 3,000,000 disgruntled Germans and a substantial number of disaffected Hungarians, but also of Carpatho-Ukrainians in the extreme eastern tip of the country. The frontiers of the new Republic were drawn at Versailles with an over-heavy emphasis upon strategic considerations. The Carpatho-Ukraine was included in order to seal the Carpathian gateway against Russia. The Sudetenland was included in order to secure the Moravian gateway against Germany. (The Sudetenland was also important because of its coal and industry.)

The bureaucracy problem derived in large measure from the old Austro-Hungarian machinery taken over and re-staffed by the Czechs. It was cumbersome, antiquated and required far too large a proportion of the population. It did not provide sufficiently for local home rule. The Czechs were slow in introducing reforms but not unaware that reforms were needed. This was especially true of the school system which continued in the rigid and outworn Austro-German pattern.

The parliamentary institutions of the First Republic worked, on the whole, rather well, although the Senate never achieved its intended position of authority and importance. The Presidency, due to the prestige and ability of Thomas Masaryk and his successor, Eduard Benes, ably fulfilled its constitutional functions; so did the Judiciary.

The political reforms which we now see going into effect had their origin more in the factors just mentioned than in recent history. During the Nazi occupation the Czechoslovak Government in Exile at London worked out the beginnings of a reformed Second Republic. In April 1945 the various elements of the resistance movement within Czechoslovakia met with the Government at Kosice and worked out their own program of political and economic reform. In London and at Kosice most of the decisions were reached which later were carried out first by the Fierlinger Government and now by the Gottwald administration.

These decisions included a settlement of the minority problem by expelling the Germans from the Sudetenland and the Hungarians from Slovakia, while ceding the Carpatho-Ukraine to the Ukrainian Republic of the Soviet Union. Except for the still pending question of a Hungarian minority, these steps have since been carried out.

The Kosice program provided for the creation of a system of popularly elected local, district and provincial National Committees to supplant the system of appointive District Executive Officers and Provincial Governors inherited from the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

This step - likewise envisaged by the Exile Government in London - has now been taken. The first Committees were appointed by the political parties in accordance with their respective votes polled. They are functioning fairly well in spite of the inexperience of most of the members.

A Constitutional Assembly was elected shortly after liberation and this body is now working on a new Constitution. In the meantime, the Assembly is functioning as a Legislature. The new Constitution will in all probability provide for a unicameral legislature, abolishing the old Senate. Otherwise, it is expected to make few changes.

So much for the formal side of the political evolution. What has happened and what is happening within this formal framework?

It must be understood, first of all, that liberation after six years of occupation was equivalent in itself to a revolution. The organs of Government had to be completely purged of the officials who had served under the Germans. This applied as well to the school system and to other social serv ices. Liberation - no matter by whom - supplied the impetus for reform.

Second, the nature of the revolutionary reform undertaken immediately after liberation would, of course, be strongly influenced by the nature of the liberating forces. The fact that it was the Red Army which liberated Czechoslovakia - that the Government returned, not from London but from Moscow, gave additional authority and prestige to the Czechoslovak Communist Party. Even though the Czechoslovak uprisings constituted a large measure of self-liberation, the composition of the National Committees, as well as the setting up of the political party machinery bore evidence of Soviet influence.

This is not to say that Soviet influence perverted or radically altered the development, which was essentially indigenous. It means, however, that the native leftward trend was somewhat accelerated and, in some respects, given a more ruthless character. It is a fact worth noting that all the Ministers who composed the Government in Exile are in the present Gottwald cabinet. The same continuity does not exist in Poland or in Yugoslavia.

In the Czech lands there are now four political parties. In order of present strength they are:

The Communist Party, of which Premier Klement Gottwald is the leader.

The National Socialists (President Benes' party which proudly retains its pre-Hitler name) of which Deputy Prime Minister Zenkl is the leader.

The Social Democrats, of which Deputy Prime Minister Fierlinger is the leader.

The Catholic People's Party, headed by Deputy Prime Minister Jan Sramek.

In Slovakia there are likewise four parties in the following order of strength:

Democrats, (conservative church party)

Communists

Social Democrats

Freedom Party, (which represents an attempt to form a liberal Catholic party).

In the National Constitutional Assembly the Communist Party has 40% of the seats, the next strongest being the National Socialists. The Social Democrats, however, under Fierlinger's radical leadership, have tended to cast their 11% of the vote with the Communists, thus frequently giving the latter an actual majority. On the other hand, it must be said that Premier Gottwald is far from a radical Communist. Under his leadership the party has so far shown little tendency to ride rough-shod over opposition. In fact, the more conservative leaders find it easier to deal with Gottwald than with his more fiery and unpredictable Social Democratic predecessor.

Pending the adoption of a Constitution and the election of a legislature the four parties have formed a National Front. The Communists, having polled the largest vote, hold the Prime Ministership and several important portfolios including the Ministry of Information and the Ministry of the Interior. The Foreign Office, under the brilliantly able Jan Masaryk, is non-political. The other parties each have a Deputy Prime Minister and one or more Cabinet positions. The Cabinet operates on the principle that decisions shall require unanimity of the four parties.

Obviously this set-up favors the Communists, but they have so far not abused their advantages, except perhaps in their use of the Ministry of Information. They have tolerat ed outspoken opposition and made compromises to conform to majority opinion. They will probably continue to act in this manner so long as the nation remains, as it is now, solidly united behind the major aims of the Government's program.

Anti-Communist Czechs, much as they hate many Communist methods and tactics, do not as a rule question the loyalty to Czechoslovakia of most of the Czech Communists. They fight them tooth and nail as Czechs with whom they disagree; they do not consider them a fifth column serving the interests of Moscow.

These high-spots of the political scene in Czechoslovakia indicate that the Czechs have by no means turned their backs upon the political principles of Western democracy. Above everything else, the Czechs want to remain free men. But the evidence also shows that the Czechs are moving with the times, modifying their methods and, where necessary, their institutions in order to meet practical necessity. Where the Czechs, including the Czech Communists, differ most from the Russians is in that they are intensely practical without being cynical. Where they differ most from us is in that they are idealistic without being naive.

The Czechs will not have an easy time maintaining the integrity of their national character against external pressures from West as well as East. But, unless force is used against them, they will in the end work out that political system which best conforms to their ideals and their political needs. That system will not be the Russian system of one-party dictatorship.

That it will not be our system either will become clear when we next consider the economic aspect of present-day Czechoslovakia.

IV

Economic Picture

The economic development of present-day Czechoslovakia - like the political evolution - has its roots in the past. It too is a native phenomenon, accelerated but not essentially distorted by external factors.

The two outstanding changes in the economic order - Land Reform and partial Nationalization of industry - were seriously contemplated in the days of the First Republic. The demand for both sprang from three strictly indigenous factors: the legacy of Austro-Hungarian feudal land ownership; the fact that industry and "Big Business" were largely in the hands of a German-speaking and German-oriented clique; and a growing distrust of laisser faire capitalism after the Great Depression.

The German occupation and the collaboration of big landowners and industrialists with the enemy, plus the rising tide of socialist thinking throughout Europe, brought the pot to a boil. Liberation let loose the accumulated forces. And - as in the political arena - liberation by the Soviet Union tended to accelerate the reform and to add a certain element of ruthlessness to its nature.

The Kosice Program called for the expulsion of the Sudeten Germans and the confiscation of land held by all land-holders, irrespective of nationality, who had given aid to the enemy. This has resulted in the confiscation of over 6,000,000 acres of land, more than half of which is agricultural. The Government has taken over the forest lands. Some 500,000 Czechs and Slovaks are being re-settled on over 3,500,000 acres of confiscated farm land. Deeds conferring hereditary possession are being issued to the settlers. The large estates are being broken up and the small farms taken over and increased in size when they comprise less than fifty acres. According to the plan, Czechoslovak agriculture is to be based upon independent, self-supporting families farming their own land with as little hired labor as possible. At the same time efficiency is to be increased by the wider use of machinery owned by the farmers or through cooperative societies. The latter have long been well established in Czechoslovakia. Under the Two Year Plan of the Gottwald Government a special effort is being made to increase animal husbandry and dairy farming. The only serious food shortages in Czechoslovakia today are meat, fats and citrus fruits. This year's grain harvest will be about cut in half by drought and hail-storms.

The Exile Government in London, long before liberation established the principle of nationalizing "Big Business". A large part of Czechoslovak industry had belonged to Germans before the occupation. An even larger part had been stolen or acquired by the Germans through quasi-legal means. And a considerable portion belonged to collaborators. In October 1945 President Benes issued a decree conforming to the previous London pronouncement under which the Republic took over the ownership of the mines and key industries.

Properties formerly owned by the German or Hungarian States or by persons who collaborated with them were simply to be confiscated. Loyal Czechoslovak owners or Allied nationals were to be given full compensation for the value of their properties. An exception was made in the case of unexploited mineral wealth since this was held not to have come into being through the owner's efforts.

The decree described in detail which industries were to be nationalized. Broadly speaking these were: enterprises of vital importance to the nation, such as mines, banks, public utilities or armament plants; enterprises of cultural importance to the nation such as the film industry or the manufacture of phonograph records; and lastly enterprises of more than a certain size and importance in any given field. The formula devised for establishing this latter factor of size and importance is not an altogether happy one. It is based primarily on the number of people employed in a given enterprise - varying from 300 to 500 in most industries.

Outside of the three categories mentioned private enterprise is not only tolerated but encouraged. This applies to shops, trading concerns and small manufacturing establishments.

Most anti-Communist Czechs seem whole-heartedly to approve of the general principles of the nationalization program. In some cases the manner in which it is being carried out is criticized as being done somewhat too much by rule of thumb. There is also some grumbling about the delay in fixing values and paying out compensation and, in some instances, about selection of management for political reasons. These are the exceptions. On the whole, the plan seems to correspond to the freely expressed wishes of the great majority of the people. Even the more conservative businessmen admit that, given the historical development of Czechoslovakia and the conditions created by the occupation, no other course was practicable. The Communists are perhaps the least satisfied with the program since, from their point of view, it does not go far enough.

Having put through land-reform and partial nationalization of industry, the Government announced, in June 1946, its Two Year Plan for bringing production back to slightly better than the 1937 level by January 1, 1949. The plan was adopted in July 1946 and went into effect on the first day of this year. The goals set vary slightly for different parts of the economy. There is a heavy emphasis upon manufacturing for export in order that the country may be able to pay for the necessary food, raw materials and machinery. This means rather severe restriction upon domestic consumption, which is cheerfully accepted. It means also a careful allocation of raw materials and capital expenditure by overall planning and control. Finally, the success of the plan requires the proper use of available manpower. Although the plan depends entirely upon the voluntary cooperation of the workers, the fact that the people are solidly behind the Government's program has so far made the rather difficult ex periment fairly successful. The only serious blemish upon an otherwise remarkable record of achievement in the first six months of operation under the plan, appears to be the still heavily over-staffed civil service.

There is a black market in Czechoslovakia, as in all countries where there is rationing and price control. But black market prices are comparatively reasonable - in a few cases actually below the officially established figures. The worst feature is the black market in foreign exchange which more than doubles the official rate for dollars. This is perhaps because of considerable confusion in the minds of the Czech people as to the somewhat complicated currency reform recently undertaken.

Contrasted with the record of some of the larger Western European countries, Czechoslovakia's recovery program makes an excellent showing. This is not because Czechoslovakia possesses any particular advantage in natural resources. She suffers, in fact, from an acute shortage of manpower due to the expulsion of almost one-fifth of her pre-war population. She suffers also from the loss of a large part of her former foreign markets and her former sources of raw material supply.

Two factors offset these handicaps: newly developed trade with the Soviet Union; and, by far the most important, the solidarity and determination of her people. The elimination of the nationality problem, land reform, and nationalization have very largely removed the sources of inner conflict. The people of Czechoslovakia face a tough problem, but they face it as a united nation determined to work shoulder to shoulder until the job is done.

That is how the economic picture looks to this observer at the present time.

There is one cloud upon the domestic horizon. So far the Trade Union Council, largely under Communist domination, has thrown its great power behind the program. Should reaction set it, should the conservative groups - possibly under Western pressure - seek to undo what has been done or arrest progress, the Communist Party may turn ruthlessly radical. In that case strikes will occur and the Two Year Plan may fail. But the chances of a strong reactionary movement in Czechoslovakia are not very great, since most of the former reactionary power groups eliminated themselves by their behavior under the occupation.

The only other great danger to the Czechoslovak future lies beyond the borders of the Republic, which brings us to a consideration of Czechoslovakia's knotty foreign policy problem.

V
Soviet Satellite?

We might sum up the preceding analysis of internal conditions in present-day Czechoslovakia in the words of Foreign Minister Jan Masaryk: "We are a socializing state but we are free men."

How correct is the Western belief that Czechoslovakia has become a Soviet satellite in foreign affairs?

In the first place it is true that so long as the world is divided into a number of large and small nation-states - so long as there is no supra-national world authority - all small nations are to a greater or less extent satellites of one of the great powers. This has been true in the past and is even more true today when the number of great powers in the world has been reduced from five or six to perhaps half that number. As a practical matter there are in the world today only three great poles of power, one focusing around the Soviet Union and the others around the United States and the British Commonwealth. Even that statement must be modified to the extent that the British Commonwealth is at present heavily dependent upon the United States.

The first Republic of Czechoslovakia was born out of the defeat of Germany and Austria-Hungary in World War I. It was created upon Wilsonian principles. Had the American people not disavowed Wilson's peace treaty and withdrawn from European affairs, Czechoslovakia would in all probability have looked to the United States as its closest friend among the great powers. When the United States failed to enter the League of Nations and failed likewise to guarantee French security in the future, the whole European picture changed. One result was that France in addition to her Treaty with Britain, built a system of European alliances which became known as the Little Entente. Thus France became the protector of Central Europe both against Germany and, to a certain extent, against the ostracized Soviet Union. From the birth of the first Czechoslovak Republic until the rise of Hitler, Czechoslovakia was, in the sense in which we are using the word, a satellite of France. That is to say, she depended upon France to come to her assistance in case of trouble. This being the case, Czechoslovak foreign policy was naturally based upon taking account of French interests.

But when trouble came in 1938, France was torn by internal dissension. And Britain, upon whom France in turn depended for help, was caught morally and physically unprepared. The Western world, including the United States, was equally if not more afraid of the rise of Communist Russia than of the Fascist Axis. The result was the shameful betrayal of Munich.

During the anguished period leading up to Munich, Czechoslovakia found that she had only one friend among the great powers ready to march to her assistance - the Soviet Union. In those days, when Carpatho-Ukraine was still a part of Czechoslovakia, the Red Army would have had to cross either Polish or Rumanian territory to reach Czechoslovak soil. Neither Poland nor Rumania were prepared to countenance this, since both were at that time flirting with Hitler. Betrayed by France and Britain, cut off from their only source of help by hostile neighbors, the Czechs were left alone to fight a suicidal war or grimly to accept Nazi occupation.

These facts of history are already dim in the minds of many Americans. They are vivid in the memory of the Czechoslovak people.

Since the war ended, the Czechs have thrown themselves wholeheartedly behind the United Nations. Experience has taught them, perhaps more than any other European people, that peace is indivisible and that national security cannot be achieved by any old-fashioned system of alliances. Today they view with alarm the increasing tension between Russia and their friends in the West. They do not want a divided Europe and a divided world. They know what this meants to them, even if it does not mean the ultimate horror of another war.

Czechoslovakia cannot achieve prosperity for her people if she is forced to choose between trading only with the East or only with the West. The Soviet Union in pre-war days accounted for only a little over 1% of Czechoslovakia's foreign trade. Poland, Hungary, Rumania and B ulgaria were likewise not of primary importance. The bulk of Czechoslovakia's imports came from Germany or the West and the great part of her exports flowed back in the same direction. Today a very substantial portion of Czechoslovak foreign trade is with the Soviet Union and with Poland. Under the new trade agreement Czechoslovakia obtains Russian grain, cotton and other raw materials in exchange for manufactured goods such as electric motors, iron pipe, shoes and narrow-guage railway equipment for use in the Russian forests. She obtains coal from Poland and sells a certain amount of her products there. But the outlet for Czechoslovakia's old-established industries still lies in the West, and the Western European countries need the textiles, ceramics and machinery which the Czechs can make. Nor can Russia fully supply Czech needs of foodstuffs and raw materials. Unless Czechoslovakia can trade freely in both directions she cannot achieve a decent standard of living for her people nor make her full contribution to European recovery.

From an emotional point of view, the Czechs feel that they belong fully neither to East nor West. They are Slavs but they are also Europeans. Here again they cannot fulfil themselves if they are forced to choose between two alternatives. Their language is of the East, yet their music, their art and their literature are largely of the West.

The present attitude of the Czech people, in so far as one can learn to understand it in a short time, is one of determination to resist being forced to accept a divided world and to make a choice between the Soviet Union and the United States. They like the United States, but fear the results of its present foreign policy. They admire and feel grateful to the Soviet Union, like it less than they do the United States, but also fear it less than they do America.

The Czechs know that if, contrary to their hopes, they should one day be forced to choose sides, their choice will be purely academic. The Red Army stands at their borders.

Nevertheless, strange as it may seem to Americans, the Czechs are less apprehensive that the Soviet Union will force a showdown than that an eventual decision may be forced upon them by well-meaning but bungling foreign policy of the United States.

This brings us to the main point of this series of articles.

VI

U.S.Policy

If it is correct to say that the Czechs like the United States as well or better than the Soviet Union but nevertheless fear the United States more than they fear the Soviet Union - why is this the case?

The reasons, so far as this correspondent was able to discover them, are as follows:

The Czechs as a whole do not regard Russia as an aggressively expansionist world power. They consider that most of the actual territorial annexations by the Soviet Union are nothing more than a recapture of lands which once belonged to Czarist Russia. This applies to the Polish Ukraine east of the Curzon Line, to Bessorabia and Bukovina taken from Rumania, and even to the Baltic States. Significantly it also applies to the Carpatho-Ukraine which the Czechs themselves have ceded to the Soviet Uion. The Czechs, even when the First Republic was set up, had misgivings about the inclusion in Czechoslovakia of this eastern region.

So far as Russian interference in the internal affairs of the Balkan countries is concerned, the Czechs do not apparently regard this as imperialistic expansion. They will explain to you that the peoples of Bulgaria, Rumania and Yugoslavia never had democracy or political freedom and were oppressed, politically and economically, by selfish and corrupt ruling cliques. Insofar as the Russians have aided or inspired Communist-led revolutionary movements in these countries, many if not most Czechs consider that they have helped the peoples of these countries to better their conditions. The Czechs may not like communist techniques and methods - they certainly do not want totalitarian dictatorship at home - but the Czechs are a pragmatic as well as an idealistic people. From their point of view the people of Yugoslavia - whom they like - are better off under Tito than they were under the Kara-georgovic dynasty. As to recent events in Hungary, the Czechoslovaks know that the so-called allegedly democratic Small Landholders Party, ousted from power by the Communists, was dominated by their old enemies, the feudal Hungarian landlords. They do not like the unconstitutional procedures of the Communists, but they do not get very excited about them so long as they take place in Hungary.

This is not to say that the Czechoslovaks do not fear Russia. They do. They can never forget for one moment that the Red Army is only a few hours away from any part of their country. They are made apprehensive by the frequently arbitrary and always extremely tough attitudes of Soviet negotiators. But they do not feel that the Russians have designs upon them nor upon their freedom, so long as they themselves do not slip into reaction or become tools of reactionary forces outside of their own country.

The Czechs are really afraid of Russia in only one eventuality - if they are forced to choose sides in a divided world. In that case they know that they have no choice and that the march of events will bring them under Soviet domination.

The Czechs fear the United States precisely because they fear that the United States may bring about this very eventuality. Their apprehensions are based upon a number of factors.

1. The Czechs read the Western press and their direct familiarity with the waves of Russophobia which break out from time to time, especially in the United States, is distorted out of proportion by Soviet propaganda exploitation of the more extreme examples. Many Czechs believe, for example, that the United States is not only preparing for an eventual conflict with Russia but is seriously contemplating starting a preventive war quite soon. This question is frequently raised with an American visitor.

2. The Czechs are acutely sensitive to the fact that the West has very largely written them off as a Soviet satellite after their failure to attend the Paris Conference. As a matter of fact it was the West - not the Soviet Union - which forced the Czechs to reverse their original decision. Both the Czechs and the Poles had decided to attend the Paris meeting, even though the Soviet Union had declined to participate. Certainly they had not reached this decision without consulting the Soviet Union. But the Western press, especially the conservative American press, played up the Czech decision as a break on the part of Czechoslovakia with its Soviet ally. When this happened the Czechoslovak Government had no choice but to reverse its decision, just as it would have had no choice before the war but to avoid any action which would have been interpreted as a break with France. Foreign Minister Masaryk was not "ordered to come to Moscow" as reported at that time. He went to Moscow, as arranged a month before, to negotiate a trade treaty. Before he left for Moscow he must have known that the Western press had made his trip to Paris impossible. The Czech people are not the kind of people, and least of all is Jan Masaryk the kind of man, who takes orders from any other country - no matter how great and powerful that country may be. By failure to understand this the West not only offended the Czechs, but drove them closer to the Soviet Union.

3. The Czechs are worried by the attitude frequently expressed in the United States that democratic socialism is merely a step on the road to Communist dictatorship. One example is a statement recently made on the floor of the Senate to the effect that "If the choice in Europe is between Socialism and Communism, we had better have nothing to do with it." To the Czechs - in fact to any European, including the most conservative Europeans - such an attitude is not only incomprehensible but frightening. It indicates that the United States is planning to use its great economic power to turn back the clock of history, or at least to refuse aid to countries which are moving toward some degree of democratic socialism. The American loans to Socialist Britain and Socialist France show that this is not entirely true of our present policy. But some of the statements appearing in America and some of our actions - as in Greece and China - arouse the fear that it may become true.

4. Finally, the Czechs fear the United States because of what they consider to be our policy in Germany. They believe - and the Communist press hammers this into them - that we are determined not only to rehabilitate Germany ahead of Germany's victims, but to re-build a reactionary "free enterprise" Germany as a bulwark against the Soviet Union and against the rising tide of Socialism. The native Czech attitude toward Germany is not one of vengefulness. The Czechs do not want a starving or bankrupt Germany as a neighbor. But they fear that if we obstruct socialization and return German industry to private German control, the old aggressive Germany is certain to be re-created.

It would be a wise move on the part of our Government to take considerable trouble to explain to the Czechs just what our German policy really is. At present it is being interpreted to them by the Russians.

There are many other things we could do to help the cause of peace in this small but important country, where a little moral support and a little economic help would go a long way. It is not a question of billions or even hundreds of millions of dollars. Nor is it a question of a gift for relief. A revolving credit of $50,000,000 for the purchase of American cotton would accomplish miracles.

As stated at the outset, Czechoslovakia, if permitted to work out its own destiny in its own way, may hold the key to a united Europe. As this correspondent sees the picture, aid and moral support to the Czechs at this time would neither give aid to Soviet expansionism nor to the spread of Communist totalitarianism. Nor would a more friendly attitude toward Czechoslovakia provoke Russian hostility. On the contrary, Prague might prove a meeting-ground of East and West.

REPORT ON CZECHOSLOVAKIA

By

JAMES P. WARBURG

James P. Warburg

REPORT ON CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The little Republic of Czechoslovakia—in area about the size of Illinois—may well turn out to be the pilot plant of the European future. Given a chance to work out their problems in peace, 12,500,000 Czechoslovaks very likely hold in their hands the key to the major problems of that troubled and troublesome continent.

In spite of numerous domestic handicaps—in spite of an incredibly difficult foreign policy problem—the Czechs appear to be evolving a new type of political and economic organization which may prove to be the very much missing link between East and West.

Whether or not they succeed will depend partly upon themselves, partly upon the Soviet Union, and partly upon the Western democracies —especially upon the United States.

This series of articles is concerned primarily with the role of the West, and particularly with the impact of United States policy upon the Czechoslovak future.

Any American who visits Czechoslovakia today will first of all wish to test the validity of three widely held Western beliefs:

1. That present-day Czechoslovakia is a police-state modelled in the Soviet image and that its people live behind an iron curtain.

2. That free enterprise has been abolished in favor of a Soviet-style totalitarian economy. And

3. That Czechoslovakia is now a Russian satellite which, by not attending the Paris Conference last July, abdicated its independence and chose its side in a permanently divided Europe.

Before presenting the evidence for this observer's conclusions that these three beliefs are fallacious, a little background may be useful.

1. On the map Czechoslovakia looks like a somewhat mis-shapen fish land-locked in the heart of Europe. The head and upper body of the fish, comprising the Czech Lands of Bohemia and Moravia, lie embedded between Germany and Austria. Its lower body—Slovakia—lies between Poland and Hungary. Its truncated tail rests against the Soviet Union. Except for one short stretch touching upon the United States Zones of Germany and Austria, all of Czechoslovakia's long frontier borders on areas now under Soviet control or influence.

2. Czechoslovakia is a bi-national state. Its population consists of nearly 10,000,000 Czechs and over 2,500,000 Slovaks. Almost 3,000,000 former Sudeten German citizens have been expelled because they betrayed the Republic. Over 98% of them voted before the Hitler invasion for annexation to Germany and later collaborated with the German occupation.

The Czechs and Slovaks are very different from each other. The Czechs are a politically sophisticated people, proud and tenaciously determined to regain the freedom lost in 1630 to the Hapsburg monarchy. When their dream was realized in 1918 they successfully emancipated themselves from their former German ruling class. They became in spirit a free people.

The Slovaks are for the most part feudal-minded peasants accustomed for a thousand years to passive acceptance of an inferior status. The Hungarians played a role in Slovakia similar to that played by the Austro-Germans in the Czech lands. When the Republic was established in 1918 the Slovaks remained partly under the thumb of the old Hungarian-minded aristocracy, reinforced by the Catholic Church, and partly under the newly established Czech leadership at Prague.

From an economic point of view the Germans in the Czech lands and the Hungarians in Slovakia clung to a large part of their privileged position even under the Republic. They acted as an ex-ruling class arrogantly and stubbornly trying to maintain their former position. They never identified themselves fully with the Czechoslovak State.

Under the German occupation the vast majority of Czechs remained loyal to their oppressed country. During the six terrible years of Nazi rule they maintained a courageous and stubborn resistance. There were, of course, some Czech collaborators, especially among the big businessmen and landholders, but these were the exception. The story of Slovakia under the occupation was less creditable. Under the Fascist leadership of Father Tiso the majority of Slovaks formed a Nazi puppet state, and sent a sizeable army to fight the Russians. A minority formed a partisan resistance movement. It is only by courtesy to the Czechs that Slovakia is now considered an Allied rather than an ex-enemy nation.

Today, because the Czechs need Slovak manpower and resources to rebuild their country, all this is largely forgotten. The Slovaks now are being encouraged to shake off their feudal habits, to help modernize agriculture, to establish new industries, to re-settle the Sudeten territory, and to assume a position of political equality.

3. The Czechoslovak Republic's pre-war economy depended very largely upon its ability to import raw materials and to export finished products. Agriculture was insufficient to supply all foodstuffs. High-grade coking coal and motor fuels were imported as well as cotton, rubber and other raw materials. Textiles, shoes, china, glass and furniture were large items of export as well as machinery and certain products of the iron and steel industry. Big Business was largely German-controlled. The six years of Nazi occupation served to incorporate the Czech economy almost wholly into that of the Reich.

4. In foreign affairs Czechoslovakia was, until 1938, chiefly oriented toward the West—particularly toward France and Britain. It relied for security upon the League of Nations as well as upon its French alliance and membership in the Little Entente. Its relations with the Soviet Union were friendly but not paramount. It was regarded with some envy by Poland and with some hostility by Hungary. After the betrayal of Munich Czechoslovakia's orientation changed, as might be expected, to one of primary reliance upon the Soviet Union, the only friend who had stood by in Czechoslovakia's hour of need.

The United States occupied a special position in the pre-war feelings of the Czechoslovak people. The Republic had been founded in America and conceived very largely in the image of American democracy. Hundreds of thousands of Czechs and Slovaks lived in the United States. Trade flourished between the two countries. The role of the United States in the betrayal of Munich, though secondary, considerably damaged American prestige, yet this damage was more than offset by President Roosevelt's subsequent leadership in the fight for freedom.

When the day of liberation came, in May 1945, the people of Czechoslovakia would perhaps have been even happier had American troops rather than Russian first entered their capital. As a matter of fact, two of General Patton's tanks did enter Prague during the uprising of May 5th—and then withdrew for reasons which are still mysterious to the inhabitants of the city.

One of the things that troubles and puzzles many Czechs today is that they believe—perhaps not without reason—that we agreed at Yalta to let the Red Army liberate Czechoslovakia.

But—as we shall see—other things about our policy since the war ended trouble and puzzle them even more.

Czechoslovakia shows few outward signs of having passed through a war. In Western Bohemia the great Skoda plant at Pilsen, which our bombers partially destroyed, is being rebuilt. In Prague a few buildings in the heart of the beautiful "old city" were heavily damaged during the uprising of May 1945. And then there is the obscene scar left by the wanton total destruction of the little town of Lidice. But Czechoslovakia's worst war wounds lie beneath the surface of her ancient cities, her neat little villages and her fertile fields.

II.

IRON CURTAIN?

The first thing one learns upon entering Czechoslovakia today is that, as Mark Twain would have said, "One knows a lot of things that ain't so."

Having spent some time in the Russian Zone of Germany a year ago, and having followed recent Western accounts of developments in Central Europe, this observer expected to find at least a modified form of police state and considerable evidence of what is commonly called "living behind the Iron Curtain."

A few hours served to dispel this illusion, and a week confirmed the first impression beyond any doubt.

To begin with, landing at the Prague airport is rather like landing at the LaGuardia Field in New York. In the usual inefficient hurly-burly of newly arrived passengers struggling to get their baggage assembled and passed through customs, one hears every language of Europe. Planes arrive from the Balkans, from France, Britain, Scandinavia and the Low Countries—from the Near East, the Far East—from Germany, Russia and the United States. The multi-lingual Czech passport officials ask only a few polite questions—fewer and politer than are asked by our own officials. Fifteen minutes after arrival the visitor is free to wander where and how he pleases through the entire country.

The hotel is crowded—mostly with foreign visitors, but a reservation in Prague means that one's room is actually available on arrival. The personnel speak a little English or French, or—if need be as a last resort—German. A standard joke is to say—when all else fails—"Do you speak a little Swiss?"

On the particular afternoon of this visitor's arrival the streets were crowded. Groups of teen-agers were wandering about in various uniforms —some of them singing. A youth congress was in town with delegations from all over Europe.

Wandering along Vaclavske Namesti—Prague's "main-stem"—one is struck by the number of book-shops and news-stands. One particularly large shop of this sort had over its door the name of the leading Communist newspaper "Rude Pravo". Inside was a long table displaying various periodicals and newspapers. Expecting to find Communist literature, one was not surprised to find—alongside of various local newspapers —the "London Daily Worker", "Humanite" from Paris and "The New Masses" from New York. But there were also—displayed with equal prominence—the Paris Herald Tribune, the "London Daily Mail" the "London Times" and other French, English and Swiss newspapers of every political hue. What is more they were the issues of that same day. Browsing along further back one came upon recent issues of "Time, Inc.", "Business Week", "The New Republic" and the "London Economist".

The Czechs are voracious newspaper readers, and since a large part of the population reads at least one foreign language, they are an extremely well-informed people concerning events and opinion outside their own country.

Their own press is uncensored. There is an agreement that the native press must not criticize Czechoslovakia's ally, the Soviet Union, but this does not prevent very free criticism of the local Communist Party by the more conservative newspapers.

Each political party—there are four in the Czech lands and four in Slovakia—has its own daily newspaper. Other Prague dailies are published by the Trade Union Movement, the Union of Czech Youth, the Legionnaires Association, the Czech Army, the Federation of Cultural Associations and the Union of Agriculturalists.

Under the new law the principle is established that "newspapers and periodicals must not be the object of profitable enterprise by individuals and anonymous groups." In addition to recognized political parties, government departments and public corporations, only bodies of importance for the whole nation are qualified to apply for licenses. The only exception is in the fields of art and science.

This is one of the ways in which Czechoslovakia is very interestingly breaking new ground and finding a link between Western laisser faire and Soviet Communism. It seems to be a satisfactory experiment, avoiding the evils of private irresponsibility and monopolistic control without falling into the pitfalls of a parrot press expressing only the views of the Government.

It is true that the citizen of Czechoslovakia who depends only upon the native press at the present time reads no criticism of the Soviet Union. It is also true that he gets a somewhat distorted view of the West because here there is no corresponding ban. But Western criticism of the Soviet Union circulates freely through the imported foreign press and by word of mouth to those who cannot read it.

Speaking of word of mouth, one cannot find in Czechoslovakia today the slightest sign of fear to express any opinion or to tell any joke at no matter whose expense. There is, one is told, a secret police. But no one seems to be in the least aware of its existence. The Communists, although they are the strongest party in the Czech lands, are the butt of constant humorous criticism. A shop-keeper, when asked for something not in stock, is likely to shrug and say: "Sorry, we've got nothing in stock but a lot of Communism." One of the most popular reviews pokes fun at the Communist Party. Quite a few of the Communists themselves have something which they sadly lack in other countries—a sense of humor.

If there is today an Iron Curtain around Czechoslovakia, it has not been placed there by the Czechs nor by the Soviet Union. There is perhaps something of that nature created by the false assumptions of the West and by the actions of the West taken upon the basis of those assumptions.

Believing that Czechoslovakia lives under Russian domination, has become a police state and re-modelled its economy in the Russian image, the West—particularly the United States—has recently tended to ostracize the Czechoslovak Republic. Not wanting to help the Soviet Union in the present state of affairs, many Westerners object to helping what they consider a satellite of the Soviet Union. Sometimes we go even further. Not only do we not want to help Czechoslovakia, we seem at times not to want to have anything to do with her.

Our State Department, for example, refused to allow a representative delegation of American youth to attend the Youth Congress at Prague presumably because it was to be held under Communist auspices. Yet this did not prevent a motley crew of American leftist youth from coming here on individual passports and making a miserable impression. While other groups put up impressive exhibitions, the United States exhibit contained such posters as one sees at a Communist rally in Union Square—posters critical of the United States and of the American way of life. The Russians and the Yugoslavs "stole the show."

Things such as this cause the Czechs to wonder and sadly shake their heads. And when a Czech buyer wishing to go to the States is refused a visa because he belongs to the Czech Communist Party—the party of his Prime Minister—the Czechs begin to feel that they are behind an Iron Curtain—an Iron Curtain drawn by their former friends in the West.

III.

POLITICAL SCENE.

What sort of a state is the new Czechoslovakia? Is it turning its back upon Western democratic principles and becoming a Communist dictatorship? Let us examine first its political and then its economic aspect.

The political evolution now taking place in Czechoslovakia did not begin with liberation by the Red Army. It did not even begin with Munich and the Nazi occupation. It began in the days of the First Republic, when it became apparent that the government of the new state under its Wilsonian Constitution faced two serious difficulties. These were: the minority problem; and the growth of a top-heavy and somewhat inflexible bureaucracy. Even before the advent of Hitler the Czechs were considering various innovations to overcome these difficulties.

The minority problem arose over the inclusion in the new Republic of not only 2,500,000 backward Slovaks, 3,000,000 disgruntled Germans and a substantial number of disaffected Hungarians, but also of Carpatho-Ukrainians in the extreme eastern tip of the country. The frontiers of the new Republic were drawn at Versailles with an over-heavy emphasis upon strategic considerations. The Carpatho-Ukraine was included in order to seal the Carpathian gateway against Russia. The Sudetenland was included in order to secure the Moravian gateway against Germany. (The Sudetenland was also important because of its coal and industry.)

The bureaucracy problem derived in large measure from the old Austro-Hungarian machinery taken over and re-staffed by the Czechs. It was cumbersome, antiquated and required far too large a proportion of the population. It did not provide sufficiently for local home rule. The Czechs were slow in introducing reforms but not unaware that reforms were needed. This was especially true of the school system which continued in the rigid and outworn Austro-German pattern.

The parliamentary institutions of the First Republic worked, on the whole, rather well, although the Senate never achieved its intended position of authority and importance. The Presidency, due to the prestige and ability of Thomas Masaryk and his successor, Eduard Benes, ably fulfilled its constitutional functions; so did the Judiciary.

The political reforms which we now see going into effect had their origin more in the factors just mentioned than in recent history. During the Nazi occupation the Czechoslovak Government in Exile in London worked out the beginnings of a reformed Second Republic. In April 1945 the various elements of the resistance movement within Czechoslovakia met with the Government at Kosice and worked out their own program of political and economic reform. In London and at Kosice most of the decisions were reached which later were carried out first by the Fierlinger Government and now by the Gottwald Administration.

These decisions included a settlement of the minority problem by expelling the Germans from the Sudetenland and the Hungarians from Slovakia, while ceding the Carpatho-Ukraine to the Ukrainian Republic of the Soviet Union. Except for the still pending question of a Hungarian minority, these steps have since been carried out.

The Kosice program provided for the creation of a system of popularly elected local, district and provincial National Committees to supplant the system of appointive District Executive Officers and Provincial Governors inherited from the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. This step—likewise envisaged by the Exile Goverment in London—has now been taken. The first Committees were appointed by the political parties in accordance with their respective votes polled. They are functioning fairly well in spite of the inexperience of most of the members.

A Constitutional Assembly was elected shortly after liberation and this body is now working on a new Constitution. In the meantime the Assembly is functioning as a Legislature. The new Constitution will in all probability provide for a unicameral legislature, abolishing the old Senate. Otherwise it is expected to make few changes.

So much for the formal side of the political evolution. What has happened and what is happening within this formal framework?

It must be understood, first of all, that liberation after six years of occupation was equivalent in itself to a revolution. The organs of Government had to be completely purged of the officials who had served under the Germans. This applied as well to the school system and to other social services. Liberation—no matter by whom—supplied the impetus for reform.

Second, the nature of the revolutionary reform undertaken immediately after liberation would, of course, be strongly influenced by the nature of the liberating forces. The fact that it was the Red Army which liberated Czechoslovakia—that the Government returned, not from London but from Moscow, gave additional authority and prestige to the Czechoslovak Communist Party. Even though the Czechoslovak uprisings constituted a large measure of self-liberation, the composition of the National Committees, as well as the setting up of the political party machinery bore evidence of Soviet influence.

This is not to say that Soviet influence perverted or radically altered the development, which was essentially indigenous. It means, however, that the native leftward trend was somewhat accelerated and, in some respects, given a more ruthless character. It is a fact worth noting that all the Ministers who composed the Government in Exile are in the present Gottwald cabinet. The same continuity does not exist in Poland or in Yugoslavia.

In the Czech lands there are now four political parties. In order of present strength they are:

The Communist Party, of which Premier Klement Gottwald is the leader.

The National Socialists (President Benes' party which proudly retains its pre-Hitler name) of which Deputy Prime Minister Zenkl is the leader.

The Social Democrats, of which Deputy Prime Minister Fierlinger is the leader.

The Catholic People's Party headed by Deputy Prime Minister Jan Sramek.

In Slovakia there are likewise four parties in the following order of strength:

Democrats (conservative church party).

Communists.

Social Democrats.

Freedom Party (which represents an attempt to form a liberal Catholic party).

In the National Constitutional Assembly the Communist Party has 40% of the seats, the next strongest being the National Socialists. The Social Democrats, however, under Fierlinger's radical leadership, have tended to cast their 11% of the vote with the Communists, thus frequently giving the latter an actual majority. On the other had, it must be said that Premier Gottwald is far from a radical Communist. Under his leadership the party has so far shown little tendency to ride rough-shod over opposition. In fact, the more conservative leaders find it easier to deal with Gottwald than with his more fiery and unpredictable Social Democratic predecessor.

Pending the adoption of a Constitution and the election of a legislature the four parties have formed a National Front. The Communists, having polled the largest vote, hold the Prime Ministership and several important portfolios including the Ministry of Information and the Ministry of the Interior. The Foreign Office, under the brilliantly able Jan Masaryk, is non-political. The other parties each have a Deputy Prime Minister and one or more Cabinet positions. The Cabinet operates on the principle that decisions shall require unanimity of the four parties.

Obviously this set-up favors the Communists, but they have so far not abused their advantages, except perhaps in their use of the Ministry of Information. They have tolerated outspoken opposition and made compromises to conform to majority opinion. They will probably continue to act in this manner so long as the nation remains, as it is now, solidly united behind the major aims of the Government's program.

Anti-Communist Czechs, much as they hate many Communist methods and tactics, do not as a rule question the loyalty to Czechoslovakia of most of the Czech Communists. They fight them tooth and nail as Czechs with whom they disagree; they do not consider them a fifth column serving the interests of Moscow.

These high-spots of the political scene in Czechoslovakia indicate that the Czechs have by no means turned their backs upon the political principles of Western democracy. Above everything else, the Czechs want to remain free men. But the evidence also shows that the Czechs are moving with the times, modifying their methods and, where necessary, their institutions in order to meet practical necessity. Where the Czechs, including the Czech Communists, differ most from the Russians is in that they are intensely practical without being cynical. Where they differ most from us is in that they are idealistic without being naive.

The Czechs will not have an easy time maintaining the integrity of their national character against external pressures from West as well as East. But, unless force is used against them, they will in the end work out that political system which best conforms to their ideals and their political needs. That system will not be the Russian system of one-party dictatorship.

That it will not be our system either will become clear when we next consider the economic aspect of present-day Czechoslovakia.

IV.

ECONOMIC PICTURE.

The economic development of present-day Czechoslovakia—like the political evolution—has its roots in the past. It too is a native phenomenon, accelerated but not essentially distorted by external factors.

The two outstanding changes in the economic order—Land Reform and partial Nationalization of industry—were seriously contemplated in the days of the First Republic. The demand for both sprang from three strictly indigenous factors: the legacy of Austro-Hungarian feudal land ownership; the fact that industry and "Big Business" were largely in the hands of a German-speaking and German-oriented clique; and a growing distrust of laisser faire capitalism after the Great Depression.

The German occupation and the collaboration of big landowners and industrialists with the enemy, plus the rising tide of socialist thinking throughout Europe—brought the pot to a boil. Liberation let loose the accumulated forces. And—as in the political arena—liberation by the Soviet Union tended to accelerate the reform and to add a certain element of ruthlessness to its nature.

The Kosice Program called for the expulsion of the Sudeten Germans and the confiscation of land held by all land-holders, irrespective of nationality, who had given aid to the enemy. This has resulted in the confiscation of over 6,000,000 acres of land, more than half of which is agricultural. The Government has taken over the forest lands. Some 500,000 Czechs and Slovaks are being re-settled on over 3,500,000 acres of confiscated farm land. Deeds conferring hereditary possession are being issued to the settlers. The large estates are being broken up and the small farms taken over and increased in size when they comprise less than fifty acres. According to the plan, Czechslovakian agriculture is to be based upon independent, self-supporting families farming their own land with as little hired labor as possible. At the same time efficiency is to be increased by the wider use of machinery owned by the farmers or through cooperative societies. The latter have long been well established in Czechoslovakia. Under the Two Year Plan of the Gottwald Government a special effort is being made to increase animal husbandry and dairy farming. The only serious food shortages in Czechslovakia today are meat, fats and citrus fruit. This year's grain harvest will be about cut in half by drought and hail-storms.

The Exile Government in London, long before liberation, established the principle of nationalizing "Big Business". A large part of Czechoslovak industry had belonged to Germans before the occupation. An even larger part had been stolen or acquired by the Germans through quasi-legal means. And a considerable portion belonged to collaborators. In October 1945 President Benes issued a decree conforming to the previous London pronouncement under which the Republic took over ownership of the mines and key industries.

Properties formerly owned by the German or Hungarian States or by persons who collaborated with them were simply to be confiscated. Loyal Czechoslovak owners or Allied nationals were to be given full compensation for the value of their properties. An exception was made in the case of unexploited mineral wealth since this was held not to have come into being through the owner's efforts.

The decree described in detail which industries were to be nationalized. Broadly speaking these were: enterprises of vital importance to the nation, such as mines, banks, public utilities or armament plants; enterprises of cultural importance to the nation such as the film industry or the manufacture of phonograph records; and lastly enterprises of more than a certain size and importance in any given field. The formula devised for establishing this latter factor of size and importance is not an altogether happy one. It is based primarily on the number of people employed in a given enterprise—varying from 300 to 500 in most industries.

Outside of the three categories mentioned, private enterprise is not only tolerated but encouraged. This applies to shops, trading concerns and small manufacturing establishments.

Most anti-Communist Czechs seem whole-heartedly to approve of the general principles of the nationalization program. In some cases the manner in which it is being carried out is criticized as being done somewhat too much by rule of thumb. There is also some grumbling about the delay in fixing values and paying out compensation and, in some instances, about the selection of management for political reasons. These are the exceptions. On the whole, the plan seems to correspond to the freely expressed wishes of the great majority of the people. Even the more conservative businessmen admit that, given the historical development of Czechoslovakia and the conditions created by the occupation, no other course was practicable. The Communists are perhaps the least satisfied with the program since, from their point of view, it does not go far enough.

Having put through land-reform and partial nationalization of industry, the Government announced, in June 1946, its Two Year Plan for bringing production back to slightly better than the 1937 level by January 1, 1949. The plan was adopted in July 1946 and went into effect on the first day of this year. The goals set vary slightly for different parts of the economy. There is a heavy emphasis upon manufacturing for export in order that the country may be able to pay for the necessary food, raw materials and machinery. This means rather severe restriction upon domestic consumption, which is cheerfully accepted. It means also a careful allocation of raw materials and capital expenditure by overall planning and control. Finally, the success of the plan requires the proper use of available manpower. Although the plan depends entirely upon the voluntary cooperation of the workers, the fact that the people are solidly behind the Government's program has so far made the rather difficult experiment fairly successful. The only serious blemish upon an otherwise remarkable record of achievement in the first six months of operation under the plan, appears to be the still heavily over-staffed civil service.

There is a black market in Czechoslovakia, as in all countries where there is rationing and price control. But black market prices are comparatively reasonable—in a few cases actually below the officially established figures. The worst feature is the black market in foreign exchange which more than doubles the official rate for dollars. This is perhaps because of considerable confusion in the minds of the Czech people as to the somewhat complicated currency reform recently undertaken.

Contrasted with the record of some of the larger Western European countries, Czechoslovakia's recovery program makes an excellent showing. This is not because Czechoslovakia possesses any particular advantage in natural resources. She suffers, in fact, from an acute shortage of manpower due to the expulsion of almost one-fifth of her pre-war population. She suffers also from the loss of a large part of her former foreign markets and her former sources of raw material supply.

Two factors offset these handicaps: newly developed trade with the Soviet Union; and, by far the most important, the solidarity and determination of her people. The elimination of the nationality problem, land reform, and nationalization have very largely removed the sources of inner conflict. The people of Czechoslovakia face a tough problem, but they face it as a united nation determined to work shoulder to shoulder until the job is done.

That is how the economic picture looks to this observer at the present time.

There is one cloud upon the domestic horizon. So far the Trade Union Council, largely under Communist domination, has thrown its great power behind the program. Should reaction set in, should the conservative groups—possibly under Western pressure—seek to undo what has been done or arrest progress, the Communist Party may turn ruthlessly radical. In that case strikes will occur and the Two Year Plan may fail. But the chances of a strong reactionary movement in Czechoslovakia are not very great, since most of the former reactionary power groups eliminated themselves by their behavior under the occupation.

The only other great danger to the Czechoslovak future lies beyond the borders of the Republic, which brings us to a consideration of Czechoslovakia's knotty foreign policy problem.

V.

SOVIET SATELLITE?

We might sum up the preceding analysis of internal conditions in present-day Czechoslovakia in the words of Foreign Minister Jan Masaryk: "We are a socializing state but we are free men."

How correct is the Western belief that Czechoslovakia has become a Soviet satellite in foreign affairs?

In the first place it is true that so long as the world is divided into a number of large and small nation-states—so long as there is no supranational world authority—all small nations are to a greater or less extent satellites of one of the great powers. This has been true in the past and is even more true today when the number of great powers in the world has been reduced from five or six to perhaps half that number. As a practical matter there are in the world today only three great poles of power, one focusing around the Soviet Union and the others around the United States and the British Commonwealth. Even that statement must be modified to the extent that the British Commonwealh is at present heavily dependent upon the United States.

The first Republic of Czechoslovakia was born out of the defeat of Germany and Austria-Hungary in World War I. It was created upon Wilsonian principles. Had the American people not disavowed Wilson's peace treaty and withdrawn from European affairs, Czechoslovakia would in all probability have looked to the United States as its closest friend among the great powers. When the United States failed to enter the League of Nations and failed likewise to guarantee French security in the future, the whole European picture changed. One result was that France in addition to her Treaty with Britain, built a system of European alliances which became known as the Little Entente. Thus France became the protector of Central Europe both against Germany, and, to a certain extent, against the ostracized Soviet Union. From the birth of the first Czechoslovak Republic until the rise of Hitler, Czechoslovakia was, in the sense in which we are using the word, a satellite of France. That is to say, she depended upon France to come to her assistance in case of trouble. This being the case, Czechoslovak foreign policy was naturally based upon taking account of French interests.

But when trouble came in 1938, France was torn by internal dissention. And Britain, upon whom France in turn depended for help, was caught morally and physically unprepared. The Western World, including the United States was equally if not more afraid of the rise of Communist Russia than of the Fascist Axis. The result was the shameful betrayal of Munich.

During the anguished period leading up to Munich, Czechoslovakia found that she had only one friend among the great powers ready to march to her assistance—the Soviet Union. In those days, when Carpatho-Ukraine was still a part of Czechoslovakia, the Red Army would have had to cross either Polish or Rumanian territory to reach Czechoslovak soil. Neither Poland nor Rumania were prepared to countenance this, since both were at that time flirting with Hitler. Betrayed by France and Britain, cut off from their only source of help by hostile neighbors, the Czechs were left alone to fight a suicidal war or grimly to accept Nazi occupation.

These facts of history are already dim in the minds of many Americans. They are vivid in the memory of the Czechoslovak people.

Since the war ended, the Czechs have thrown themselves wholeheartedly behind the United Nations. Experience has taught them, perhaps more than any other European people, that peace is indivisible and that national security cannot be achieved by any old-fashioned system of alliances. Today they view with alarm the increasing tension between Russia and their friends in the West. They do not want a divided Europe and a divided world. They know what this means to them, even if it does not mean the ultimate horror of another war.

Czechoslovakia cannot achieve prosperity for her people if she is forced to choose between trading only with the East or only with the West. The Soviet Union in pre-war days accounted for only a little over 1% of Czechoslovakia's foreign trade. Poland, Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria were likewise not of primary importance. The bulk of Czechoslovakia's imports came from Germany or the West and the greater part of her exports flowed back in the same direction. Today a very substantial portion of Czechoslovak foreign trade is with the Soviet Union and with Poland. Under the new trade agreement Czechoslovakia obtains Russian grain, cotton and other raw materials in exchange for manufactured goods such as electric motors, iron pipe, shoes and narrow-gauge railway equipment for use in the Russian forests. She obtains coal from Poland and sells a certain amount of her products there. But the outlet for Czechoslovakia's old-established industries still lies in the West, and the Western European countries need the textiles, ceramics and machinery which the Czechs can make. Nor can Russia fully supply Czech needs of foodstuffs and raw materials. Unless Czechoslovakia can trade freely in both directions she cannot achieve a decent standard of living for her people nor make her full contribution to European recovery.

From an emotional point of view, the Czechs feel that they belong neither to East nor West. They are Slavs but they are also Europeans. Here again they cannot fulfill themselves if they are forced to choose between two alternatives. Their language is of the East, yet their music, their art and their literature are largely of the West.

The present attitude of the Czech people, in so far as one can learn to understand it in a short time, is one of determination to resist being forced to accept a divided world and to make a choice between the Soviet Union and the United States. They like the United States, but fear the results of its present foreign policy. They admire and feel grateful to the Soviet Union, like it less than they do the United States, but also fear it less than they do America.

The Czechs know that if, contrary to their hopes, they should one day be forced to choose sides, their choice will be purely academic. The Red Army stands at their borders.

Nevertheless, strange as it may seem to Americans, the Czechs are less apprehensive that the Soviet Union will force a showdown than that an eventual decision may be forced upon them by well-meaning but bungling foreign policy of the United States.

This brings us to the main point of this series of articles.

VI.

U. S. POLICY.

If it is correct to say that the Czechs like the United States as well or better than the Soviet Union but nevertheless fear the United States more than they fear the Soviet Union—why is this the case?

The reasons, so far as this correspondent was able to discover them, are as follows:

The Czechs as a whole do not regard Russia as an aggressively expansionist world power. They consider that most of the actual territorial annexations by the Soviet Union are nothing more than a recapture of lands which once belonged to Czarist Russia. This applies to the Polish Ukraine east of the Curzon Line, to Bessorabia and Bukovina taken from Rumania, and even to the Baltic States. Significantly it also applies to the Carpatho-Ukraine which the Czechs themselves have ceded to the Soviet Union. The Czechs, even when the First Republic was set up, had misgivings about the inclusion in Czechoslovakia of this eastern region.

So far as Russian interference in the internal affairs of the Balkan countries is concerned, most Czechs do not apparently regard this as imperialistic expansion. They will explain to you that the peoples of Bulgaria, Rumania and Yugoslavia never had democracy or political freedom and were oppressed, politically and economically, by selfish and corrupt ruling cliques. Insofar as the Russians have aided or inspired Communist-led revolutionary movements in these countries, many if not most Czechs consider that they have helped the peoples of these countries to better their conditions. The Czechs may not like communist techniques and methods—they certainly do not want totalitarian dictatorship at home—but the Czechs are a pragmatic as well as an idealistic people. From their point of view the people of Yugoslavia—whom they like—are better off under Tito than they were under the Kara-georgovic dynasty. As to recent events in Hungary, the Czechoslovaks consider that the so-called allegedly democratic Small Landholders Party, ousted from power by the Communists, was dominated by their old enemies, the feudal Hungarian landlords. They do not like the unconstitutional procedures of the Communists, but they do not get very excited about them so long as they take place in Hungary.

This is not to say that the Czechoslovaks do not fear Russia. They do. They can never forget for one moment that the Red Army is only a few hours away from any part of their country. They are made apprehensive by the frequently arbitrary and always extremely tough attitudes of Soviet negotiators. But most Czechs, rightly or wrongly, do not feel that the Russians have designs upon them nor upon their freedom, so long as they themselves do not slip into reaction or become tools of reactionary forces outside of their own country.

Most Czech officials as well as ordinary citizens seem to be really afraid of Russia in only one eventuality—if they are forced to choose sides in a divided world. In that case they know that they have no choice and that the march of events will bring them under Soviet domination.

The Czechs fear the United States precisely because they fear that the United States may bring about this very eventuality. Their apprehensions are based upon a number of factors.

1. The Czechs read the Western press and their direct familiarity with the waves of Russophobia which break out from time to time, especially in the United States, is distorted out of proportion by Soviet propaganda exploitation of the more extreme examples. Many Czechs believe, for example, that the United States is not only preparing for an eventual conflict with Russia but is seriously contemplating starting a preventive war quite soon. This question is frequently raised with an American visitor.

2. The Czechs are acutely sensitive to the fact that the West has very largely written them off as a Soviet satellite after their failure to attend the Paris Conference. Foreign Minister Masaryk maintains that it was the West—not the Soviet Union—which forced the Czechs to reverse their original decision. Both the Czechs and the Poles had decided to attend the Paris meeting, even though the Soviet Union had declined to participate. Certainly they had not reached this decision without consulting the Soviet Union. But the Western press, especially the conservative American press, played up the Czech decision as a break on the part of Czechoslovakia with its Soviet ally. When this happened the Czechoslovak Government felt that it had no choice but to reverse its decision, just as it would have had no choice before the war but to avoid any action which would have been interpreted as a break with France. Foreign Minister Masaryk was not "ordered to come to Moscow" as reported at the time. He went to Moscow, as arranged a month before, to negotiate a trade treaty. Before he left for Moscow he must have known that the Western press had made his trip to Paris impossible. The Czech people are not the kind of people, and least of all is Jan Masaryk the kind of man, who takes orders from any other country—no matter how great and powerful that country may be. By failure to understand this the West not only offended the Czechs, but drove them closer to the Soviet Union.

3. The Czechs are worried by the attitude frequently expressed in the United States that democratic socialism is merely a step on the road to Communist dictatorship. One example is a statement recently made on the floor of the Senate to the effect that "If the choice in Europe is between Socialism and Communism, we had better have nothing to do with it." To the Czechs—in fact to any Europeans, including the conservative Europeans—such an attitude is not only incomprehensible but frightening. It indicates that the United States is planning to use its great economic power to turn back the clock of history, or at least to refuse aid to countries which are moving toward some degree of democratic socialism. The American loans to Socialist Britain and Socialist France show that this is not entirely true of our present policy. But some of the statements appearing in America and some of our actions—as in Greece and China—arouse the fear that it may become true.

4. Finally, the Czechs fear the United States because of what they consider to be our policy in Germany. They believe—and the Communist press hammers this into them—that we are determined not only to rehabilitate Germany ahead of Germany's victims, but to re-build a reactionary "free enterprise" Germany as a bulwark against the Soviet Union and against the rising tide of socialism. The native Czech attitude toward Germany is not one of vengefulness. The Czechs do not want a starving or bankrupt Germany as a neighbor. But they fear that if we obstruct socialization and return German industry to private German control, the old aggressive Germany is certain to be re-created.

It would be a wise move on the part of our Government to take considerable trouble to explain to the Czechs just what our German policy really is. At present it is being interpreted to them by the Russians.

There are many other things we could do to help the cause of peace in this small but important country, where a little moral support and a little economic help would go a long way. It is not a question of billions or even hundreds of millions of dollars. Nor is it a question of a gift for relief. A revolving credit of $50,000,000 for the purchase of American cotton would accomplish miracles.

As stated at the outset, Czechoslovakia, if permitted to work out its own destiny in its own way, may hold the key to a united Europe. As this correspondent sees the picture, aid and moral support to the Czechs at this time would neither give aid to Soviet expansionism nor to the spread of Communist totalitarianism. Nor would a more friendly attitude toward Czechoslovakia provoke Russian hostility. On the contrary, Prague might prove a meeting-ground of East and West.

GERMANY RE-VISITED

By

JAMES P. WARBURG

GERMANY RE-VISITED

A quick impression of Germany today, as compared to Germany one year ago, could be expressed in one phrase—the same only more so. The country is still an economic desert and a moral morass in the heart of Europe. The four-power snarl remains more hopelessly tangled than ever. The four doctors still disagree about the patient's malady and the treatment required. The patient is slowly getting weaker—less able and less willing to cooperate in bringing about his own cure. Much of the rubble has been cleared away from the streets of cities. But little, if any, of the rubble has been cleared away from the German mind.

One year ago the disease of apathy and hopelessness had not yet greatly affected the four conquerors. The Allied Control Council was fighting against the frustration imposed by the failure of the Big Four Foreign Ministers to reach a working agreement. One year ago the Berlin Komandatura was functioning as a miniature model of what the Allied Control Council might some day be for all of Germany. Today the Allied Control Council has sunk into purely formal existence and even the four-power government of Berlin has lapsed into apathy and inaction.

The men on the spot are not to blame for the demoralization of what was intended to be a four-power government of Germany. In fact, our own man on the spot, General Clay, continues to face his impossible task with indomitable courage and determination—one might even say with a certain amount of wry optimism. But no amount of hard work by military government can arrest the slow wasting away of the physical and moral strength of a people which lacks both the vision of a future and the incentive to work for anything more than the immediate necessities of life. No amount of courage and determination can fully counteract the wastage of morale among the conquerors themselves, nor the loss of prestige which results from their inability to work together.

Last year one found among the Allied officials the hope that before too long Paris, London, Moscow and Washington would iron out their differences. Today the prevailing mood is one of pessimism as to four-power cooperation. If the November meeting of the Foreign Ministers results in another failure to agree, the men on the spot will not be surprised.

So far as British and American officials are concerned, two schools of thought predominate. The more pessimistic are inclined to accept the division of Germany into East and West, with the French Zone ultimately being joined to the Anglo-American area. Men who hold this view are impatient to get on with the job of making West Germany capable of supporting itself and thus relieving the strain upon British and American taxpayers.

The more optimistic school of thought still believes that an eventual unification of Germany is possible; that, while agreement to unify is unlikely in November, it will eventually come about as the result of Russia's desire to have a voice and a share in the future control of the Ruhr coal and industry. This school is equally anxious to get going in the rehabilitation of the Bi-zonal area—but for a different reason. The sooner we have a going concern, they argue, the sooner the Russians will want to come in.

The first group, which regards the East-West division as inevitable, is anxious to obtain French adherence as soon as possible and therefore more inclined to listen to French claims and demands. The second group, which aims at overall unification, tends to pay less attention to the French, believing that they, like the Russians, will be easier to deal with once the Bi-zonal area is on a profitable basis.

This is the background to the recent Anglo-American decision to revise upward the level of German industry in the Bi-zonal area, over the protest of France and the Soviet Union.

French reaction to this decision has been fully reported in the press, although part of the French position is perhaps somewhat obscured by the diplomatic language of the official statements. The French wanted, first of all, the promise of a greater share of Ruhr coal than they were entitled to receive under the sliding-scale agreement reached at Moscow last April. This might be arranged. But, in addition to a greater immediate share in Ruhr coal, the French actually wanted the assurance that raising the permitted level of German steel production from 5,800,000 tons per annum to 10,000,000 would never permit German steel production to exceed that of France. This is more far-reaching than it sounds.

French steel capacity is at present about 7,000,000 tons. German capacity, which used to be over 21,000,000 tons is still—in spite of war damage—considerably in excess of the 10,700,000 tons now to be permitted. Due chiefly to shortage of coal, German steel production is now only about 3,000,000 tons per annum. The French demand therefore means that German steel production should be held back not until French production reaches present capacity, but until French capacity is increased by roughly 50%. To effect such an increase would require the building of new French plants, which in turn would require a large quantity of steel and a considerable length of time. To meet the French approval therefore would mean that the whole of European recovery would be delayed by lack of steel in order to give France the lead over Germany which she desires. That is one reason why Britain and the United States could not wholly meet French desires.

Another reason not yet obvious to the American newspaper reader is that transportation is rapidly becoming as great a bottleneck in European recovery as the mining of coal. The rehabilitation of European railways requires large quantities of steel. The quickest and cheapest way to get steel is by using the plants now standing idle in the Ruhr Valley. No one wants to build up Germany ahead of France but the quickest way to get out the coal so desperately needed by all of Europe to heat homes, to get factories started, and to make fertilizer in order to bring up food production is to prime the pump in the Ruhr.

But why, one may ask, was it necessary to bring up the matter of steel production now, when Germany is producing only a little more than half of the steel it was permitted to make under the old level of industry plan? Why raise this thorny question when production is held back by factors other than the limit imposed by the occupying powers? The answer given by the British-American authorities is that the whole question of reparations was involved in the level of industry. Until it was definitely decided what the level of industry was to be, there could be no decision as to which plants were to be retained and which dismantled. And until this was known there could be no rehabilitation of plants.

The Russians had agreed last April that the German level of industry should be raised. Nevertheless, the Russians likewise protested against the Anglo-American decision to proceed without waiting for the four-power conference in November. The Anglo-American reply was that the decision concerned not Germany as a whole but merely the Bi-zonal area; that Britain and the United States had tried ever since the Potsdam Declaration over two years ago to get France and the Soviet Union to carry out the agreement to treat Germany as an ecomonic whole; and that the French and Russians are still welcome to join whenever they are ready to do so. In the meantime the United States and Britain declared that they were unwilling further to delay the rehabilitation of their part of Germany at least to the point where it would become self-supporting.

Shortly after the decision was announced this writer was able to obtain a first-hand and rather frank reaction from an excellent Soviet source. "You are closing the door on the unification of Germany", this individual said. "Why couldn't you wait till November?" The writer pointed out that we had been waiting two years, and paying in some half a billion dollars a year to sustain our part of Germany while Russia was milking Germany at the other end. The reply was, first, the usual statement as to Russia's desperate need for reparations, her sacrifices and losses in the war, and her chagrin at Anglo-American failure to take these factors into account; second, and far more interesting, the assertion that we did not need to pour money into Germany if we would properly manage the economy of our zones. "You don't have to build up industry to make your zones self-supporting," the Russian said. "All you have to do is to make the Germans grow and deliver more food." He had his case well documented too. He knew just what percentage of West German arable land was producing food and how much of it was in forest or pastures. He insisted that, if we made the Germans cut down some of the forest and plow up some of the pasture land, the Bi-zonal area could produce enough food to provide a low calorie diet for its population.

The next day the writer tried this out on a high American official. This American did not altogether deny the Russian's case—in theory. But in practice, he said, it would take years and a lot of expensive machinery to cut down forests; and, as for changing the whole traditional nature of the West German agricultural economy, nothing short of force would accomplish any such purpose. "So long as we are trying to teach the Germans democracy," he said, "we cannot treat them as coolie labor."

The last sentence contains the key to much of our dilemma. It also indicates the reason why Russia is probably not yet ready to integrate her zone with Western Germany. The Soviet Zone is not yet milked dry. When it is—and when Western Germany shows a profit balance instead of a huge annual loss—the Russian attitude may change. The danger is that by that time we too may change our attitude about unifying Germany. If we do, it will most likely not be because our representatives in Germany will have lost sight of their objective, but because of sentiment at home and developments in other parts of the world.

The men on the spot know the danger which lurks in a divided Europe and a divided world. But at this moment they can see no better way to hasten the process of unification than to do the best job they can in restoring to reasonable prosperity that part of Germany which they control.

To accomplish this requires more than the adoption of a new plan. It requires unending patience and perseverance. Above all it requires the solid support of public opinion at home.

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH BRITAIN?

By

JAMES P. WARBURG

WHAT'S THE MATTER WITH BRITAIN?

I.

The average American cannot help but be puzzled by the speed with which events in Britain are moving toward a crisis. What has gone wrong? Why has the loan been exhausted so soon? What reason is there to suppose that additional help will not simply mean pouring money down a rathole?

There are any number of glib answers to these questions, such as: the Labor Government has cluttered up the British economy with red tape and ill-advised experiments; the British coal miners refuse to dig coal; the British Treasury officials miscalculated their country's position; or, the British are spending too much money and wasting too much of their manpower in maintaining unnecessary military forces. There is some truth in each of these answers, but not the whole truth. Nor can the whole truth be arrived at by merely adding the answers together.

It is important for us to try to understand the British picture because—whether we like it or not—we are going to have to reach a decision which will affect not only the future of the British people but our own future as well. In 1940 and 1941, when Britain stood alone against the rising tide of Nazi conquest, we alone held the power which, if used, could enable resistance to continue—and which, if withheld, could force the last island of resistance to go under. In 1947 we alone hold the power, which, if used, can enable Britain to surmount a different kind of crisis and lead Europe toward economic recovery and peace—and which, if withheld, will doom Britain to economic collapse and Western Europe to economic chaos and political anarchy.

In 1941 our interest in Britain's survival was interest in our own survival. In 1947 our interest in preserving Britain from economic disaster is interest in preserving our own prosperity. If Britain collapses, the whole economy of the Western world suffers a catastrophe which will mean the cutting off of most of our foreign markets; and, if our foreign markets are closed, our own economy will head straight into a major depression. Helping Britain to ride out the storm will not alone set the economy of the Western world on the road to recovery. But failure to help Britain to right itself will render whatever assistance we extend elsewhere of no avail.

More than our prosperity is at stake. For better or worse, we have embarked upon a course of helping those peoples of the world whom we consider free to remain free. We have made this decision because we believe that only thus can we preserve our own freedom. Britain is the keystone of the structure we have chosen to support. It is the central political and economic front of our world strategic position. The political flanks of this position lie in China and in France. Its economic flanks rest upon Germany and Japan. The flanks are difficult to hold; they are each a problem in itself. But, if we lose our political and economic center in Britain, our whole position becomes untenable.

That is why we must try to understand the red hot problem which now confronts us in the British Isles.

The crucial aspects of this problem are psychological, rather than political or economic. The end of World War II has left Britain in a position which neither the British people nor most of its leaders have yet fully realized. The truth of the matter is that World War II has economically bled Britain white, much as World War I physically bled France white. Britain still thinks of itself—and we still think of Britain—as one of the three or four great powers in the world. It may well again occupy such a position in the future. It would be in our interest that it should regain such pre-eminence. But the fact is that Britain today is not a great world power in the sense in which Russia is a world power, or the United States. It has become for the moment a small nation carried on in part by the momentum of its great past, in part by the loyalty of the independent Dominion peoples, and in part by its own indomitable courage. Britain today is "keeping up to the Joneses", trying to maintain itself at a level beyond its reach and seeking to carry commitments beyond its strength. This is our fault as much as Britain's.

Both we and the British people are still living in an illusion created by the last war. We are living in the illusion of an equal partnership. Morally this conception was justified in 1941. Britain had held the fort alone while we made up our minds and mobilized our strength. Had it not been for British courage and British sacrifice, we should have fought a very different and more costly war—a war from which we might not have emerged as the strongest and most fortunate nation on this earth. But the fact remains that our wartime fifty-fifty partnership with Britain came about, not as the result of equal power deployed in our joint endeavor, but as the result of the earlier and more dangerous employment of relatively small British power and the later and safer employment of far greater power by the United States. There was nothing wrong with the translation of these contributions into a fifty-fifty management of our combined effort. The difficulty arose after victory had been won.

Because they had purchased at enormous sacrifice a position beyond their actual power, the British have been slow to realize that with their diminished power this position has become untenable. And we, because we have been reluctant to assume responsibility commensurate with our increased power, have continued to expect the British to carry commitments beyond their means which we desired to see maintained.

Germany and Palestine serve to illustrate the point. In Germany, Britain and the United States together are responsible for over 40,000,000 Germans, living in an area which contains that nation's chief raw material and industrial resources but which cannot supply itself with foodstuffs. To make the area self-supporting will require several years of intensive effort and considerable capital investment. At present it takes over half a billion dollars a year merely to feed the population at a bare subsistence level. It requires the maintenance of expensive military government organizations as well as sizeable armies of occupation. Altogether the cost comes to more than a billion dollars a year. Because we marched into Germany as fifty-fifty partners (in spite of the preponderance of American troops), we have maintained the fifty-fifty basis in the management of our zones of occupation. The British have wanted us to take a greater share of the financial burden, which we have until now declined to do. We would have liked to have had a greater share in the management of the Ruhr, which, until recently, was strictly a British preserve. This arrangement is now in the process of being readjusted. For different reasons each of us has wanted to preserve the fiction of a fifty-fifty relationship. Britain has been unwilling to face the fact that the commitment involved exceeded her power. We have been unwilling to face the fact that Britain's diminished power placed a greater burden upon us.

The Palestinian situation is more complex and more obscure. But here too Britain is committed beyond her means and we, while unwilling to assume even a part of the commitment, and while loudly criticizing the British performance, still want British protection of the Middle East oilfields to be maintained.

This is the psychological handicap under which British-American relationships labor at the present time. Its unfortunate consequences appear in a number of ways. Each of us is becoming unduly critical of the other. The British fail to make allowances for the fact that the false front which they themselves maintain stands in the way of greater American understanding and greater willingness to assume a larger share of the burden. We, in turn, fail to make allowances for the fact that, just because the British have been carrying a burden beyond their capacity, they are desperately tired and unable to perform according to their usual high standard. In setting the terms of the British loan from the United States, both parties made mistakes and miscalculations. These were based largely upon the illusion which prevailed on both sides of the water as to Britain's inherent position. The mistakes and miscalculations were aggravated by an abnormally severe winter. And now the British are inclined to regard the terms of the loan as having been forced upon them, whereas we are inclined to regard British failure to live up to the impossible as a default or as a sign of suddenly developed weakness.

If we are to meet the crisis which now confronts us in the British Isles, we must first of all rid ourselves of the misconception which has so largely contributed to its making. We in the United States must be on our guard not to be impatient, over-critical and—above all—patronizing. The British must be on their guard not to be oversensitive to ill-founded criticism and to the American habit of blunt speech. It is a platitude to say that our two peoples differ most in their traditional modes of expression. During the war they learned to understand each other's habits and customs. We must not again let British understatement become misunderstood as hypocrisy, nor American hyperbole as boastfulness.

Bearing these psychological factors in mind, we shall perhaps more profitably examine the hard facts of Britain's present predicament.

II.

What are the hard facts with regard to Britain's present economic picture? Are they such as to warrant the belief that, with a certain amount of help, the United Kingdom can surmount the present crisis? Or do they indicate that further assistance will only postpone the inevitable day of reckoning?

From having blandly assumed until a short time ago that Britain was still as solid a credit risk as in the days before the war, many people have now rushed headlong into the belief that the British economy is all but bankrupt. Ever since the dollar crisis became acute—or rather, ever since its acuteness was at last openly recognized in London and Washington—there has been a growing impression that something has suddenly gone radically wrong. Nobody seems to know exactly what it is.

The facts show, first of all, that there is relatively little the matter with the United Kingdom's internal economy. Physical production is higher than pre-war production—the London Economist estimates it at 110-120% of 1938. Steel production, the key factor in British industry, is running at better than 125% of 1938. Ship-building, another vital industry, has doubled over pre-war. Much of the chemical industry is producing more than ever before in peace-time. The manufacture of trucks and automobiles is making new high records. Some of the light industries are doing less well, and the declining coal production is a very serious problem, which we shall consider in a moment. But the overall picture is one of remarkable achievement. The national budget shows a substantial surplus. There is practically no unemployment. Factory workers are earning high wages. Farmers are getting good prices by reason of subsidies which keep food prices in line with wages. Most businesses are making profits. Except for the coal industry, labor disputes are few. In short, the facts about Britain's internal economy reveal what looks like an extraordinarily healthy condition.

As for coal production, it must be realized that there is little new in this distressing picture. British coal production has been declining for many years. In 1913 Britain exported 78,000,000 tons of coal. Since then coal exports have more or less steadily declined, partly because of increased domestic consumption and largely because of declining production. Production has decreased—not because the mines were worked out—but because, by and large, British coal mine owners milked their properties. Not enough of the earnings were ploughed back into developing the mines themselves nor into equipping them with modern machinery. Another factor, which is world-wide, has been the increasing difficulty in finding men willing to earn their living by digging coal. Failure to modernize has made this difficulty more acute in Britain.

Despite the long-term trend the first six months of 1947 showed a coal production of 4,000,000 tons more than the corresponding period of 1946, even though the first part of this period belonged to the coldest winter on record. Ice and blizzards not only impeded production but hopelessly tied up transportation.

After this excellent record in the first half of the year, production fell off in July and is now seriously impeded by the strike in Yorkshire. The drop in coal production, coming as it did at the moment when the dollar crisis was finally brought into the open, served to create somewhat of a red herring. Coal is the only major industry which has been nationalized by the Labor Government. It is also the worst blemish on Britain's economic picture. The obvious inference is tempting. But the facts lend little support to the conclusion that nationalization has disrupted the mining of coal. Not all the facts are readily available. Quite possibly the Coal Board has been inefficient in some aspects of management. The Government has moved hesitantly and has made mistakes. But the Government inherited the position left by the former private owners; and the first half year's production figures are sufficient rebuttal of any glib accusation of overall mis-management. Likewise, the figures concerning the recruitment of coal miners show 20,000 men added in the first half of 1947 against a loss of almost 10,000 men in the first half of 1945 when the mines were still under private ownership.

The facts take us, then, to two preliminary conclusions: the internal British economy is not at all in bad condition except for unsatisfactory coal production; and unsatisfactory coal production is not due to "socialist experimentation" or to any other new factor, but to a condition which has been staring every one in the face for at least twenty years.

If these conclusions are correct, why is Britain in trouble?

Primarily for one very simple reason. Pre-war Britain was like a man who lives partly on his current earnings and partly on the income from inherited or previously earned capital. Post-war Britain is like this same man who has had to spend his capital in order to take care of a serious emergency in the family, and who now must live on his current earnings alone. There are only two things such a man can do: he can try to maintain his standard of living by working much harder than before; or he can drastically cut down his expenses by moving into a smaller house or apartment, denying himself and his family luxuries, some of which habit had made into necessities, and perhaps for a time even cutting down on real necessities. Neither alternative, nor any combination of the two is easy or pleasant. To find a way of earning more money or to cut down expenditure may take time, and, to accomplish his purpose, our hypothetical individual may have to try to borrow some money to tide him over the period of re-adjustment.

That is almost exactly what has happened to Britain.

The pre-war United Kingdom paid for its imports from other countries partly out of its exports (which are equivalent to the individual's current earnings), and partly out of interest and dividends on its foreign investments (equivalent to the individual's invested capital). When the war came, Britain had to spend its capital in order to survive until American Lend-Lease aid could be mobilized. In other words, Britain had to take over the foreign investments of its nationals in order to sell them abroad to pay for planes and tanks and guns. From that moment Britain's status changed. From that moment Britain had no income from capital and would have to pay for its imports by what it could currently make and sell to other nations.

The realization of this ugly fact and of its consequences was delayed and obscured by the operation of Lend-Lease during the next four and a half years. When—after VJ Day—Lend-Lease aid was summarily cut off, the British Government knew it must face a drastic reorganization of its economy. It would have to increase its exports as much as possible and close the remaining gap by decreasing its purchases abroad. To do these things would take time, particularly with a people and an industrial machine exhausted by six years of war. That was why Britain came to us for a loan, to tide over the period of readjustment.

In arranging the amount and the terms of this loan both sides miscalculated. We, as most lenders will, tried to hold down the amount and to exact such terms as we thought would best aid world recovery. Britain, as most borrowers in need will do, agreed to the best terms she could obtain, even though they made her task of reorganization difficult and precarious. Had greater wisdom prevailed on both sides of the table much subsequent trouble could have been avoided. (The fact that a Labor Government had come into power had its effect upon the negotiations as well as upon subsequent developments, but the political aspect of Anglo-American post-war relations will be discussed in a separate article.)

The loan was granted in the spring of 1946. By the last quarter of that year Britain had already shown great progress. By hard work exports had been increased to over 110% of pre-war in volume—over 125% in money value. Imports were being rigidly controlled and curtailed. The gap left by the missing income from investments was being closed. And then two things happened.

Britain was hit by the worst winter in modern history; and price control ended in the United States. The weather reduced British production and cut down the painfully built-up exports, while at the same time increasing the need for imports. The ending of price control in the United States caused a rise in prices which cut down by something like 25% the purchasing power of Britain's borrowed dollars in the American market.

The slim margin by which it had been calculated that the loan might be sufficient disappeared almost overnight. As early as April 1947, when Britain began to dig itself out of the winter set-back, it should have been evident to both the British and American Governments that further assistance would be needed. But neither Government would face the issue until almost the last drop of the loan had been drained away. The reasons for this failure are to be found in political factors on both sides of the ocean.

Before we come to the consideration of these political aspects of the problem, it may be well to summarize our economic conclusions. In this observer's opinion they might be stated as follows:

1. Since the war ended, Britain's internal economy has performed as well, if not better than could be expected of it. In spite of exhaustion and continued conditions of war-time austerity, production has been brought back to better than the pre-war level.

2. The one major exception to this general finding, lagging coal production, has been caused by pre-war mistakes and omissions rather than by post-war shortcomings. (A protracted work stoppage, should it develop, would be an exception to this statement.)

3. Since the war ended, Britain's external economy has been in an extremely precarious position due to the loss of income from foreign investments. The present dollar crisis is due less to failure on the part of Britain to do everything in her power to close the resulting gap than to three extraneous factors:

(a) the insufficient amount of the American loan and the terms attached to it;

(b) the harsh winter of 1946-1947; and

(c) the price rise in the United States.

The present gap between imports and exports is about two hundred million dollars per month.

4. Failure to face facts in time has precipitated a crisis, which might have been avoided and which will now in itself retard British recovery and increase the amount of American assistance required.

These overall conclusions—if correct—leave little excuse for wasting time over mutual recrimination. This is not to say that an objective critic could find no fault with what the British have done or failed to do since the war ended. A strong case can and has been made against the present Government for indecision, for the imposition of too many controls and restrictions, and for creating an inflationary trend—not by deficit finance, but by permitting wages and earnings to rise when consumer goods were kept in short supply. Yet it is hard to see how most of these things could have been avoided, especially by a Labor Government pledged to a certain amount of centralized control over the economy. In fact, an equally strong case can and has been made by the more radical members of the Labor Party itself—on precisely the same grounds—that not enough control has been established and not enough planning done and carried out.

No British Government—whatever its political complection or economic orientation—would probably have done much better or much worse. Given the extremely difficult and distasteful task which the war forced upon the inhabitants of these islands, it is hard to imagine how any other people could have performed as uncomplainingly or as well.

III.

While the fundamental nature of the present British crisis is economic, the crisis itself is the result of political factors—partly internal, but to a much larger extent external to the United Kingdom.

By far the most important of these political factors is the failure of the victorious coalition to cooperate in laying the firm foundations of enduring peace. One aspect of this failure is clearly expressed in the United Nations Charter. The inherent fault of the old League of Nations was that, in the last analysis, it was little more than a multilateral treaty between sovereign states; it failed to create a world authority over and above the contracting parties endowed with power to enforce. The United Nations Charter failed to cure this defect. It did not create a league of sovereign peoples nor a parliament of man. It merely created formal machinery for united action in certain defined circumstances. It substituted for the notion of equality among sovereign states the concept of Great Power authority and responsibility.

Britain was named as one of the five great powers to whom there was entrusted a super-responsibility for the maintenance of peace. So were China and France, along with the United States and the Soviet Union. The power formula is at best a very questionable one. But, if this formula was to be adopted, the inclusion of Britain, France and China as powers co-equal with the Soviet Union and the United States placed upon each of these three nations a burden of responsibility exceeding its effective strength. So far as Britain is concerned, her nomination as a super-power could be justified if the power of the Dominions were added to that of the United Kingdom and its possessions. But the fact is that Britain does not control the power of the free Dominions; each of them is free to make its own foreign policy and to dispose of its own armed forces. Thus Britain's position, already precarious due to the loss of her overseas investments, was rendered more unbalanced by the assumption of new and far-reaching commitments.

Another political factor affecting the position of the United Kingdom was the impact of the war upon colonial imperialism in general and upon the peoples of the British Empire in particular. It precipitated the long-smoldering question of Indian independence and of the liberating of Burma and Ceylon. Post-war Britain had to make the difficult transition from Winston Churchill's famous, "I did not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of His Majesty's Empire," to the Labor Government's policy of freeing India, Burma and Ceylon. The decision to adopt this policy was all the more courageous because—irrespective of its justice and long-range wisdom—it involved a further weakening of the already strained resources of the United Kingdom.

We have already mentioned the political problems of Palestine and Germany and the burdens which they impose upon British manpower and the British Treasury. We must add the British contribution to the effort to establish political stability in the Far East and in the Mediterranean Basin, as well as the cost involved in transferring from Egypt southward the strategic center of British colonial power.

These are some of the external political elements which have combined to create Britain's present economic crisis. We are as much responsible as any other nation for whatever mistakes may have been embodied in the United Nations Charter, and especially for the creation of the veto power. Certainly we can only commend the decisions made by Britain with regard to India, Burma and Ceylon. If Britain has made mistakes in Greece, we have taken over the essential elements of British Mediterranean policy ourselves. And, if Britain has acted both unwisely and unjustly with regard to Palestine, we have contributed more to the difficulty than to its solution.

In facing the problems involved in Britain's present dollar crisis, it is only fair to Britain and to ourselves for us to bear in mind that, to a very large extent, Britain has become over-extended because we as well as the British themselves have operated upon a false appraisal of the physical and financial resources of the United Kingdom.

This brings us to a consideration of the internal political factors which have had some influence upon the present crisis. These must be examined from two points of view: first, the direct effects of the election of a Labor Government upon the British economy; and, second, the indirect effects of the election through its repercussions in the United States.

It is extremely difficult for an American to appraise the extent to which Britain's internal economic picture has been affected by the political overturn of 1945. In the last analysis, this is a question of whether the change has been good or bad for public morale—that is, whether it has given the British people more or less of what it wanted. It is probably safe to say that the British people themselves would find it difficult to answer this question. The essential post-war problems would have been the same under any Government. The road would have been difficult and austere, no matter which party was in power. Nevertheless, it is perhaps possible to make a few general observations.

Perhaps the most important difference between a Labor Government and one which might have been organized by the Conservatives lies in the emphasis upon the use of government powers and controls to ensure full employment. The Labor Government has made its primary objective the maintenance of wage-price stability while restricting home consumption of goods in order to build up exports. A Conservative Government would probably have placed greater emphasis upon the formation of capital through profits, by allowing wages and employment to drop off in certain sectors of the economy, and hoping thus to increase the supply of labor in others. In other words, a Conservative Government might have produced goods at somewhat lower prices. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether a Conservative Government could have obtained as complete popular acceptance of the self-denial imposed by the restriction of consumption, especially if it had permitted some degree of unemployment to set in. Given the temper of British workers at the time of the election, it is also doubtful whether a Conservative victory would not have caused a considerable amount of work stoppage and labor disputes.

Paradoxically, it is probably also correct to say that a Conservative Government, while opposed to "planning", would have planned somewhat more consistently and efficiently within the framework of its policy. But, while its policy would have pleased the upper income groups more, it is doubtful whether it would have pleased the broad mass of the people as well.

Perhaps the most severe criticism directed against the Labor Government is that it has not brought home to the people the seriousness of the present crisis. Some go further and say that the Government itself has not realized the acute nature of its dilemma. The answer seems to this observer to lie largely in the nature of the crisis itself. Given the healthy state of the internal economy, with full employment and high production, it is difficult for the ordinary citizen to comprehend that all is not well. He is, of course, aware of the scarcity of food and of all consumer goods. But such scarcity is associated in the public mind with war conditions; it is not a traditional symptom of economic crisis such as, for instance, a glut of goods or unemployment.

These seem to be the main points of direct political impact upon the British economy. It will be noted that "socialization" is not, in this writer's opinion, one of them. It seems very doubtful that the nationalization of the coal mines or of the Bank of England has had any real plus or minus effect upon the present position. On the other hand, the uncertainty as to how far nationalization is to be carried undoubtedly exercises a dampening influence—both upon those who want it to go further quickly and those who want it to go no further at all.

The indirect effect of "socialization"—through its repercussion upon the attitude of the United States—is a factor of considerable importance. At the time of the loan negotiations, in early 1946, a vocal section of American opinion opposed granting any loan "to help a Socialist Government." Undoubtedly this attitude was not without influence upon the American negotiating officials and upon the Congress. It could not stop the loan; but it did undoubtedly contribute toward cutting it down and toughening its conditions. Insofar as this is true, the effect of the Labor victory via its impact upon the United States has made the present crisis more acute.

Far more important than what has happened in the past is the fact that there is considerable danger of the same thing happening again. The opinion that we should not give aid to any socialist government has been gaining rather than losing ground. It has recently been expressed in Congress by a leading Senator, who is neither a reactionary nor an isolationist. Still more recently it was expressed by the most internationally-minded of the Republican candidates for the Presidency. The latter went so far as to suggest, as a condition of further aid, that Britain agree to halt any further socialization.

Apart from the fact that such utterances are likely to produce just the opposite of the desired effect in other countries, there is great danger to the ultimate success of the whole "Marshall Plan" in this type of thinking. If we fail to draw a distinction between totalitarian Communism and the type of democratic socialism which is tending to evolve not only in Britain but in most of Western and even some of Central Europe, the "Marshall Plan" is finished before it has been put into action. The fact is that the free peoples, whose freedom we wish to help preserve, today either cannot afford or do not wish our kind of economic freedom. It does not follow that they are any less deeply committed to the maintenance of their political freedom. If we fail to recognize this fact—if we adopt the slogan that democratic socialism is "the road to serfdom"—we shall write off as enemies the only friends who can help us to do the job. And, if we write off our friends in Europe and in Asia, we shall end up by supporting only the rickety remnants of reaction and thus drive our friends into the very wilderness from which we seek to preserve them.

The recognition, before it is too late, that our particular form of "free enterprise" economy is not the only road toward human dignity and freedom is the key with which we can unlock the door to peace.

CAN OUR RELATIONS WITH RUSSIA BE IMPROVED?

Put Yourself in Marshall's Place

by James P. Warburg

Author of "FOREIGN POLICY BEGINS AT HOME"

Put Yourself in Marshall's Place

BY

JAMES P. WARBURG

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, NEW YORK

1948

Acknowledgments

I AM DEEPLY GRATEFUL to President Bryn Hovde, of the New School for Social Research, for the impulse which caused this study to be undertaken. Dr. Hovde honored me with an invitation to give a six-weeks course on "Secretary Marshall's First Year." The preparation of the lectures for the New School led to the writing of this book.

I am indebted to the Chicago Sun Syndicate for permission to use in Chapter Three—"Britain and the United States"—some material originally contained in a series of articles on Britain written by me for the Syndicate in the summer of 1947; and to Harcourt Brace & Company for permission to use in Chapter Four—"Deadlock over Germany"—some material from my book, Germany—Bridge or Battleground, published by them last August.

Finally, I wish to thank Miss Joan Melber for her able assistance in the preparation of the manuscript.

J. P. W.

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED INCLUDING THE RIGHT OF REPRODUCTION
IN WHOLE OR IN PART IN ANY FORM
COPYRIGHT, 1948, BY SIMON AND SCHUSTER, INC.
PUBLISHED BY SIMON AND SCHUSTER, INC.
ROCKEFELLER CENTER, 1230 SIXTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 20, N. Y.

MANUFACTURED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
ART COLOR PRINTING CO., DUNELLEN, N. J.

CONTENTS

FOREWORD 3

ONE: WHAT MARSHALL INHERITED 5

1. The Absence of Policy. 2. Background of U.S.-U.S.S.R. Relations. 3. Bipartisanism.

TWO: MILITARY POSTURE 11

1. The Baylor Speech. 2. The Truman Doctrine.

THREE: BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES 14

FOUR: DEADLOCK OVER GERMANY 17

1. Background. 2. Reasons for Failure. 3. The Moscow Conference.

FIVE: RETURN TO REASON 24

1. The Acheson Speech. 2. Marshall at Harvard. 3. Molotov's Walkout.

SIX: PERIOD OF DEPLOYMENT 30

1. Deployment of the West. a. Three Truths Ignored. b. Slow Motion in Washington. c. The Sixteen Nation Report. 2. Deployment in the East. 3. Effect on Europe. 4. The London Conference.

SEVEN: WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE? 37

1. Taking Stock. 2. A New Approach. 3. Getting Down to Cases. 4. Possible Results of a New Approach. 5. Soviet Intransigence. 6. The Job in Hand.

APPENDIX 46

I. Excerpts from President Truman's Address at Baylor University: On Foreign Economic Policy, Mar. 6, 1947 46

II. President Truman's Message to Congress: The "Truman Doctrine," Mar. 12, 1947 47

III. Secretary Marshall's Radio Report to the Nation: On the Moscow Conference, Apr. 28, 1947 49

IV. Undersecretary Acheson's Speech at Cleveland, Miss.: The Requirements of Reconstruction, May 8, 1947 52

V. Mr. Hoover's Letter to Mr. Taber: On the Peace Treaties and Recovery, May 26, 1947 . 54

VI. Secretary Marshall's Address at Harvard: The "Marshall Plan," June 5, 1947 55

VII. Secretary Marshall's Address to the United Nations Assembly, Sept. 17, 1947 56

VIII. Report of the Sixteen Nations at Paris, Sept. 23, 1947 58

IX. The Cominform Documents, Oct. 5, 1947 . . 60

X. Summary of the Krug Committee's Report: On U. S. Capacity to Give Aid, Oct. 18, 1947 62

XI. Report to the Nation by President Truman: Need for Calling Special Session, Oct. 24, 1947 66

XII. Summary of Economic Advisers' Report: On Effect of Foreign Aid on U. S., Nov. 1, 1947 67

XIII. Summary of Harriman Committee's Report: On Foreign Aid, Nov. 8, 1947 69

XIV. Secretary Marshall's Statement to Congressional Committees: On European Aid, Nov. 10, 1947 73

XV. Conditions of Aid Suggested by National Association of Manufacturers, Nov. 10, 1947 . . 76

XVI. President Truman's Message to Congress: Proposing Foreign Aid and Inflation Controls, Nov. 17, 1947 76

XVII. Senator Taft's Attack on Truman Proposals, Nov. 17, 1947 79

XVIII. Secretary Marshall's Address at Chicago: On London Conference On Germany, Nov. 18, 1947 81

XIX. Secretary Marshall's Report to the Nation: On the Failure of the London Conference, Dec. 19, 1947 84

XX. President Truman's Message to Congress: Recommending European Recovery Plan, Dec. 19, 1947 85

XXI. A Constitution for World Trade 91

FOREWORD

WE, THE AMERICAN PEOPLE, are in a tough spot. We are charged with an inescapable responsibility which we have not sought and which seems to many of us remote from our own daily lives. This responsibility has two broad aspects.

It is difficult for us to realize that we are in the midst of an acute world crisis. We live in a comfortable, well-stocked house, high up on a hill which overlooks the plain where dwell the other peoples of the world. Down on the plain there are floods and pestilence and famine. We know this. We are saddened by it. We send medicines and food. We do what we can to help the neediest cases. But we do not fully realize that the floods are rising and will, unless arrested, engulf our own hilltop. We are not fully aware that, without meaning to do so, we have collected on our hilltop practically all the available equipment for fighting and controlling flood waters and that, unless we make this equipment available, the people in the valley are helpless.

The world crisis is a crisis of lagging or wholly impeded production. Because a great war has been fought in Europe and Asia, ravaging those continents, exhausting their peoples and resources and throwing out of kilter the delicate balance of their economies and their social structures, the Eastern Hemisphere—from the British Isles to Japan—is suffering from acute shortages. Peoples who have for centuries been self-supporting find themselves unable to produce enough to sustain life at even the lowest subsistence level. Or, if they can produce a surplus of some things, they find themselves unable to exchange this surplus for other necessities which they have never in the past produced for themselves and have always purchased from other countries. These conditions produce unrest and political instability.

We in the Western Hemisphere have so far been almost untouched by this crisis. Our half of the world has a surplus of food and raw materials. Its productive capacity has increased while that of Europe and Asia has diminished. In money value, the United States alone at present turns out about two-thirds of the world's total production. Moreover, the United States is at present the sole surplus producer of most of those particular things which are needed in Europe and Asia in order to re-start the wheels of production.

This is one of the two great responsibilities which history has placed upon us.

The other great responsibility is that we, as militarily the strongest nation on this earth, hold in our hands the delicate balance between war and peace. This, too, is hard for us to realize. It is true that there is another great power which shares this responsibility with us, but not quite in equal measure, for we are the more mature and, for the moment, the more powerful. If we and the Soviet Union can find the road to peace, the world may at last find itself free of the recurrent curse of armed conflict. If we fail, atomic and bacteriological war may well return the human race to the primeval slime of its earliest beginnings.

The twofold task of helping to rebuild the world's shattered economy and of finding the road to peaceful reconciliation with the Soviet Union is your task and mine. If we believe in the principles upon which this nation was founded, then we know that our Government is our servant and not our master. The servant cannot tell the master what decisions to make nor what action to take in a time of crisis.

We, as citizens, must try to discover what we think our nation should do and why. To do this, we need to learn or brush up on the facts of recent history.

As one citizen, conscious of this responsibility, I have tried my hand at gathering facts here at home and abroad. The official documents of 1947 alone make a fascinating story. The most important of them are included in the Appendix.

In studying and writing about our foreign policy problems over a period of years, I have come to a few conclusions. These are stated in the last chapter and are wide open to discussion and criticism.

One major conclusion is that it is absolutely essential that the United States should provide continuing aid to re-start the wheels of production in the crucial sectors of the world's economy. Without such aid there can be no real recovery; and without recovery there can be no political stability, or—in the long run—peace. Furthermore, unless the United States acts rapidly to help reactivate production in other parts of the world, the United States itself will face a major depression.

A second broad conclusion is that the present European Recovery Program, while essential as a first step, cannot possibly succeed in its ultimate purpose unless it operates in a climate of greatly improved relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. This leads to a re-examination of those relations, the causes of the existing tensions, and the premises upon which our present policy is based. This re-examination brings me, in turn, to a different analysis and a specific recommendation for a different basic policy.

In reaching these conclusions and recommendations, it may well be that I have overlooked certain factors of importance or failed to see others in their right perspective. If so, I shall welcome being set right. Whatever the validity of my conclusions, the important thing is the factual background study out of which they grew. This study, too, is subject to correction, as is any attempt to catch history in the making, but it may, nevertheless, help others to find out where they stand, what they think, and what they feel about the fateful decisions which are theirs to make.

No public servant of this nation has ever carried a heavier burden nor had a greater right to expect every American citizen to support him than George Catlett Marshall. The help he needs is not that of blind allegiance but of loyal, constructuve criticism and guidance. We private citizens are not just a cheering section. We are on the team.

You, as a fellow member of the team, may find it helpful to try to put yourself in Secretary Marshall's place for a few hours—to understand the position he inherited, to trace what he has done, and to see clearly the problems he now faces. These problems will not be solved in the next few weeks or months, but the clock is fast ticking away the hours in which we may acquire the information we need in order to play our part as free citizens.

JAMES P. WARBURG

January 7, 1948

CHAPTER ONE

What Marshall Inherited

WHEN GEORGE CATLETT MARSHALL was appointed Secretary of State, on January 8, 1947, he was not merely entrusted by the President with the conduct of this nation's foreign affairs—he was placed by the hand of history in a position of almost terrifying responsibility for the future of mankind. When he took office on January 20, after being confirmed by the Senate, Secretary Marshall assumed a burden concocted of all the human mistakes and failings which had first produced a devastating war and then had brought the newly won peace into immediate jeopardy.

The task Mr. Marshall faced was far more difficult than that of a doctor who is called in to save a patient dangerously weakened by wrong treatment and unnecessary operations; for, in such a case, the new doctor is in a position to demand complete authority. He does not have to explain his diagnosis to the entire family, persuade them that it is correct, and then get vouchers signed for each bottle of medicine. He sizes up the case and goes ahead with such treatment as each moment may dictate.

Mr. Marshall took charge of a patient—World Peace—who might at any moment die or lapse into an incurable condition. He had to make a quick diagnosis. But, having made it, he was unable to take action until he had won the consent and support of Congress and of the American people.

In his first year in office, Mr. Marshall has made his appraisal of world conditions—he has laid out the first part of the course he wishes to pursue—he has taken such preliminary action as could be taken on the great but limited authority of the Executive. He is now engaged in the difficult task of trying to win the consent of Congress and the American people to his program of action, while at the same time trying to gain the confidence and help of the peoples of the world.

In spite of enforced delay, the patient has neither died nor become incurable. His physical condition has somewhat improved, but his nervous system and psychological state have deteriorated. He is still in a highly critical condition—a condition which demands that the doctor be freed of family arguments and permitted to proceed with a treatment of artificial nourishment and gland stimulation. Only after this emergency treatment has been successfully applied for some time will it be possible for the doctor to explain the real nature of the illness. The doctor himself may not yet fully understand the whole trouble, but he knows what has to be done now in order to keep the patient alive.

To help free the doctor for action is your job and mine. Not by blindly accepting his recommendation, for that is not the way our democracy works, but by carefully studying the full and patient explanation we have already been given. The first step in that process is to understand the problems Secretary Marshall inherited.

1. THE ABSENCE OF POLICY

Since the war ended, we had been drifting. We had lost the inspiration of a high purpose. We had no clearly defined plan. Our action and our inaction at home and abroad had been dictated by fluctuating fears, contradictory desires, partisan politics, and changing circumstance. This was not merely due to lack of vision and skill in high places. It was due primarily to the state of mind in which we as a people found ourselves at the time. This state of mind was caused, to some extent, by the suspension of Presidential fireside chats and the failure of President Truman's Administration to make any serious and continuing effort to inform the people about the problems faced by their Government. Even more, our state of mind was brought about by the fact that we did not fully realize how radically our position in the world had changed since the war ended.

We, as a people, had never fully understood what the war was about. It took most of us some time to realize that Nazi Germany and its Axis satellites had deliberately set out to conquer the world. Then we thought for a time that Hitler's design of conquest could be frustrated without our armed intervention. When Japan entered the arena on the side of Germany and attacked us, we had—I think—almost reached the conclusion that our first premise had been wrong and that we would have to take up arms to prevent an Axis victory. Be that as it may, once we were booted into the war, we understood very clearly that we were up to our necks in a war of survival. We fought that war determinedly and well. But we never fully understood that we were also up to our necks in a worldwide revolution—not a revolution with any particular ideological label, but a revolution of peoples throughout the world against various forms of exploitation and oppression.

This revolution, or civil war, was hard to see clearly because it crossed all national frontiers and took different forms in different countries. It was hard to understand because it became hopelessly entangled with the war of survival. Moreover, the war of survival made strange bedfellows, ranging dictatorships along with democracies and democracies with dictatorships.

Once military victory in a war of survival becomes a nation's sole aim, military expediency dictates objectives and procedures. Thus we found ourselves for a time in alliance with the traitorous Vichy dictatorship against the people of France. We found ourselves later supporting Marshal Badoglio and King Victor Emmanuel against the Italian people. We found ourselves buying Spanish so-called neutrality by supplying Francisco Franco with the means of continuing to oppress the Spanish people. These were all policies determined by the sometimes abused argument of military expediency to save lives and to hasten victory in the war of survival. Some of them did, for the moment perhaps, hasten victory and save lives. But they left a heritage of confusion which later brought victory without peace—a confusion out of which there began immediately to loom the threat of another and more terrible war.

Our own dim vision of what was actually happening in the world was further obscured by the fact that our closest ally, Great Britain, was fighting a different kind of war of survival. Survival meant to us literally keeping our rather remote hemisphere free from invasion or penetration. But for Churchill's Britain, survival meant preserving the far-flung British Commonwealth and Empire. It meant not only preserving the British Isles, the Dominions, India, and the Empire from invasion or penetration; it meant also safeguarding the long lines of communications which held the Empire together. Thus the British alliance ranged us for a time with an already outworn and dying British colonialism—as well as Dutch and French colonialism—and muddled our entire position toward the peoples of the East. Even more important, it brought our strategy in Europe under strong British Tory influence.

It is no secret that Winston Churchill would have vastly preferred to carry the war to Germany via what he called "the soft underbelly of the Axis" rather than by a cross-Channel invasion of France. This was not merely because Churchill considered a drive through the Balkans the most effective road to Berlin. It was because Empire strategy demanded that Britain fight Germany with one eye on Russia—fight Germany in such a way as to prevent at the same time a Russian break-out into the eastern Mediterranean basin and the "life-line" to the Middle East. Much the same reasons prompted Churchill's angry protest against General Eisenhower's decision in the last days of the German war to swing south and cut up the remaining German armies, instead of driving on to Berlin before the Red Army could reach that coveted goal.

In both cases Churchill was overruled by President Roosevelt and the United States High Command—but not without leaving his mark upon the sum total of Anglo-American strategy.

Finally, our vision of what the war was about was beclouded by the enigma of our other great ally, the Soviet Union. So long as the war was on, the ultimate position of Russia troubled us far less than it troubled Britain. We did not pretend to understand Russia. Until a few months before Pearl Harbor, she had appeared to have cast her lot against the civilized world in a gangster alliance with Nazi Germany. Then suddenly she had become the most powerful stumbling block in Adolf Hitler's path. Once Pearl Harbor came, the only thing that seemed to matter was that the Red Army miraculously continued to kill Germans. For most Americans, the only worry about Russia was that she might be defeated or make a separate peace.

As the war against Germany drew toward a clearly foreseeable victory, our military and naval leaders began to think in terms of getting Russian help against Japan. President Roosevelt, misled by faulty intelligence, almost certainly had no idea at the time of the Yalta Conference in February 1945 how close Japan was to the end of its rope. He had been told by our High Command that the invasion of Honshu would cost 500,000 American casualties. In order to save lives and shorten the war, he paid what now seems an exorbitant price for the promise of Russian assistance. This price was the scrapping of much of our moral position in the war through the abandonment of some of the basic principles of a just peace to which we had pledged ourselves in the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations Declaration. In order to assure ourselves of Soviet intervention in the Far East, we tore up the pledges against annexation and against "territorial changes that do not conform to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned." We went in for connivance in an old-fashioned victor's peace with its spoils of conquest, spheres of influence, and power politics. Our military leaders were well satisfied with the Yalta deal. But that was where much of our later trouble began, both in Europe and in Asia. It is only fair to add, however, that the Russians had the physical power in the Far East and in Eastern Europe to take pretty much what they wanted, with or without an agreement, and that Yalta did set certain limits to their expansion.

President Roosevelt was not happy with Yalta. What he might have done to recapture some of the moral ground lost—had he lived—will forever remain a matter of conjecture. What happened after his death is a matter of history.

Germany surrendered May 8, 1945. On July 17, 1945, President Truman met Generalissimo Stalin at Potsdam. By this time, the Japanese fleet had been destroyed, the Philippines, Iwo Jima, and Okinawa captured, and the Japanese Home Islands isolated. Stalin informed Truman that he had, sometime previous to their meeting, received a request from Japan to negotiate for peace on its behalf. On July 26, the Big Three issued a formal proclamation, advising Japan of the terms upon which she might surrender.

It was clear that Soviet help against Japan, so urgently required and so dearly purchased six months earlier, was now scarcely needed. But the bargain had been made. President Truman sealed it on August 2, when he signed the Potsdam Agreement.

Four days later, the first atomic bomb fell on Hiroshima. On August 8, the Soviet Union declared war upon Japan, and six days afterwards, Japan surrendered.

Mr. Byrnes has reported that during the Potsdam Conference President Truman told Premier Stalin about the atomic bomb. Opinions vary as to whether he did this in such a manner as to convey the full significance of the disclosure. The fact is, however, that the two bombs were dropped in circumstances which could suggest that at least part of the purpose was to bring about surrender before Russia could rightfully claim any part in the victory. It was almost as if we said: "All right, we have been had. We've made a bad bargain, and we'll stick to it. But by all that's holy, we will let the world know that we have been cheated."

This, of course, did not regain any of the moral ground lost nor improve our relations with the Soviet Union. Any bargain which, though made in good faith, turns out to have been based on false assumptions, produces resentment and a sense of guilt on both sides. Any action taken by either side out of resentment only deepens the sense of guilt of the other and widens the cleavage.

Shortly after V-J Day, we had a rude awakening. We woke up to find that we had won the war of survival, but that we were still up to our necks in a world revolution. And we still did not understand the revolution. We half expected that people throughout the world would so admire our tremendous industrial and military contribution to victory that they would say: "Yes, sir! The Americans have the system. Let's remodel ourselves in the American image."

But gradually we came to realize that nothing of the sort was happening. People didn't seem in the least interested in adopting our system of free-enterprise democracy. Most of them couldn't afford it—couldn't even afford to think about it. They were too busy wondering where they would get tomorrow's breakfast, or a pair of shoes, or a few lumps of coal. Throughout Western Europe and even in the British Isles, people were turning to the instruments of public power—to the agencies of government—to solve their hopelessly tangled problems. The whole concept of a society based upon property rights and individual profit-seeking initiative seemed to be crumbling before the mass onslaught of elemental human needs.

Much to our surprise, we saw Western Europe moving into socialism—a socialism determined to preserve political freedom in the Western sense, but ready in the economic sphere to accept the bankruptcy of free-enterprise capitalism. This brought us squarely up against the question:

Would a socialist or semi-socialist Europe become a threat to the continued existence of a free-enterprise system in our own country? And if so, would we wish to use our great economic resources to arrest the manifest trend? And finally, could we, even with our great resources, arrest it if we so desired?

These questions posed by the social-economic revolution became confused in our minds by another and more pressing problem arising immediately after V-J Day. This was the problem of mounting tension between Russia and the United States. Once the United Nations machinery had been erected, there was a widespread feeling that the definite means for the maintenance of peace had been found. No sooner had the war ended than we discovered that peace had to be made before it could be maintained, and that peace had not been made by the mere cessation of hostilities.

The drafting of the peace treaties had been entrusted to the Council of Foreign Ministers of the so-called Big Five. During his incumbency as Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes devoted most of his time and energy to this task. At the very first meeting of the Council, in September 1945, it became apparent that there existed between the Soviet Union and the West not only wide differences of opinion and purpose but also wide disagreement as to the precise meaning of the understandings reached at Yalta and Potsdam. Instead of attempting to reconcile these differences in an over-all understanding, the Foreign Ministers adopted a curious course. They proceeded to avoid the central over-all problems and to deal with those less important matters upon which agreement seemed easiest to attain. Thus, they spent over a year working out the peace treaties for Italy, Finland, Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria, without ever coming to grips with the problems of Germany and Austria. This method of working from the periphery toward the center had a number of unfortunate consequences.

The first result was the rapid deterioration of the whole European economy. This was due largely to the complete failure of the Potsdam plan for the quadripartite government of Germany and the continued shelving of that pressing problem while the satellite treaties were being negotiated. As a consequence, Germany—once the economic hub of a prosperous continent—became an economic plague center, and recovery throughout Europe was delayed and impeded. This in turn affected Africa, Asia, and even the Western Hemisphere.

The second result—closely related to the first—was that political unrest throughout Europe was increased by the protraction of human suffering and discontent.

And finally, the failure to come to grips with the central over-all problem of U.S.-U.S.S.R. relationships caused those relationships themselves to deteriorate and to make any solution of any problem anywhere in the world increasingly difficult. To cite just one example: the stalemate in Korea and the division of that unhappy country into two watertight compartments, against the will of the Korean people and against every precept of economics or common sense, came about as the direct result of unresolved U.S.-U.S.S.R. tensions.

It was not until December 1946 that the Council of Foreign Ministers finally finished the satellite treaties and turned its attention to the central problem of making the peace. Even then, it did no more than draft an agenda for a meeting to be held at Moscow in March 1947.

The situation in the Far East was equally discouraging. Indonesia and Indo-China seethed with revolt. The new British Labor Government was struggling with the thorny problems of granting independence to Burma, Ceylon, and a divided India. Recovery throughout the Asiatic continent was delayed and impeded by every kind of shortage, especially of shipping and consumer goods formerly supplied by Japan. Questions were being raised about our highly press-agented "success" in managing the Japanese occupation. An apparently hopeless stalemate in Korea deprived the Asiatics of a normal exportable surplus of food. The industries of Manchuria were either working for the Soviet Union or not working at all. China was ravaged by civil war and a runaway inflation. In a report published only a few days before he became Secretary of State, General Marshall himself had set forth with admirable clarity the complete failure of our own efforts, first to support the Central Government of Chiang Kai-shek and later to bring about a peaceful settlement between it and the Chinese Communists.

These are the broad outlines of the picture which Mr. Marshall inherited when he stepped into the former Chiefs of Staff Building, recently remodeled as the new Department of State.

The era of drifting and peripheral horse-trading had ended. The time had come for meeting the central issues of the peace settlement.

2. BACKGROUND OF U.S.-U.S.S.R. RELATIONS

Since so much of the problem inherited by Mr. Marshall was that of straightening out the tangle of misunderstanding between ourselves and the Soviet Union, it may be useful to recall a few high-spots of relevant recent history.

The Soviet Union has existed for less than a generation. It came into being as the result of a revolution which took Russia out of World War I, thereby making it more difficult for the Western Allies to achieve victory over Germany and Austria. Quite naturally, this aroused Western hostility. Furthermore, the Soviet Union came into existence as the result of a successful conspiracy against the most reactionary and oppressive form of that type of so-called capitalistic society which had emerged in varying forms and degrees out of medieval European feudalism. Although Czarist Russia had been a backward and none too popular member of the Western family of nations, it had been a member of the family. The Kerensky Revolution might have made Russia a more popular member of the family. But the Kerensky Government's overthrow by violence in favor of extreme Bolshevism aroused widespread anxiety and resentment. The Bolshevik Revolution appeared as a threat not only to established law and order, but to the whole ethical and religious structure of Western society. It directly challenged the economic foundations upon which that society rested. Thus, the Soviet Union acquired at birth the determined hostility of the Western world. It was hated because it had left the Allies in the lurch. It was feared because its doctrine of world revolution threatened the Western world's basic structure of belief and behavior.

It is, therefore, not surprising that British, French, Japanese, and United States armed forces should have been employed in an unsuccessful attempt to aid the overthrow of the early Bolshevik regime. Nor that diplomatic recognition of the Soviet Union should have been long withheld and at length grudgingly given. Nor is it surprising that Western enmity should have added fuel to the flames of communist hostility already nourished by the Marx-Lenin doctrine that communism and capitalism could not peacefully coexist in the same world.

A second factor worth bearing in mind is that Russia as a nation suffered the loss of important territory—in East Asia as the result of the Russo-Japanese War, and in Europe as the result of World War I and the Bolshevik Revolution. In the Far East, Russia had in 1905 lost control over Manchuria and Korea, and had ceded certain island territory to Japan. When the Soviet Union was born in 1918, Russia was again considerably reduced in size by the loss of Finland, the Baltic states, Poland, and parts of Rumania. Thus, the new Soviet state fell heir to a Russian nationalist revisionism quite similar to the revisionist sentiment in France after it had lost Alsace-Lorraine.

These were some of the early ingredients of trouble between the Soviet Union and the West.

During the first fifteen years of the Soviet's existence, the tension slowly decreased. President Roosevelt's recognition in 1933 probably marked the high point of this favorable development. But with the advent of Hitler, with Italian aggression against Ethiopia, and with the Spanish Civil War, a new deterioration of relations set in. From 1935 to 1938, Western diplomacy stultified itself by increasing appeasement of fascist aggression, while Soviet diplomacy, on the whole, stood firmly for collective security and resistance to fascism. An essential part of the Western policy of appeasement was the attempt to turn Nazi aggression eastward against the Soviet Union. The betrayal of Czechoslovakia by the West brought this period to its climax.

To admit these facts of history is not to overlook or condone the subversive revolutionary activities carried on throughout the world by the Comintern, nor, above all, the cynical pact made by the Soviet Union with Nazi Germany in 1939. These were Moscow's own contributions toward a state of mutual distrust and suspicion which continued in submerged form even after Nazi Germany turned upon the Soviet Union. During the period of the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, the Soviet Union did very well for itself in satisfying Russian nationalist sentiment. It reacquired a large part of Poland, the three Baltic states, a slice of Rumania, and several important pieces of Finland. Captured Nazi documents show that German fear of Russian territorial ambitions had much to do with Hitler's decision to fight a two-front war.

Be that as it may, once Russia was attacked, the latent antagonisms between the Nazi-forged anti-Nazi Coalition were obscured, only to reappear once the war of survival had been won. The wartime policies of military expediency, the dubious premises upon which the Yalta deal was made, and the lack of precision in the understandings reached during the war reawakened mutual suspicion and hostility.

An added factor making for strain in U.S.-U.S.S.R. postwar relations was the greatly changed balance of world power. Germany, Japan, and Italy had been eliminated. China was in the throes of a civil war and the beginnings of runaway inflation. France had lost much of its power and prestige. Great Britain was impoverished and faced a drastic reorganization of its Empire.

The Soviet Union itself came out of the war with greatly increased prestige; but it had suffered huge losses of manpower and the almost total devastation of most of its western territories.

Only the United States had emerged from the struggle stronger than ever before. Our lands and cities were unravaged. Our manpower and productive capacity had increased enormously while the resources of most other nations had been seriously impaired. We were far ahead of other nations in the development of air-power. Our Navy was more powerful than all the combined fleets of the world. We were the sole possessors of the atomic bomb. While most of the other peoples of the earth were scrabbling for the bare necessities of life, our people had jobs, food, clothes, money, and things to buy with money. It soon became clear that we alone possessed the resources to get the world economy off dead center and started toward recovery.

The United Nations structure for the maintenance of peace had been erected upon the assumption of "great-power co-operation," with Great Britain, France, China, the Soviet Union, and the United States recognized as the five great powers. Actually, there were, for the moment, only two great powers. Actually, the peace of the world was confided into the hands of Washington and Moscow.

In the first few months of peace, no one seemed less aware of the power and responsibility which had devolved upon the United States than the people of the United States and their Government.

The immediate postwar policy of the Soviet Union was one of nationalistic expansion combined with revolutionary penetration. Both were designed to take the fullest possible advantage of the wartime agreements.

Throughout the Continent of Europe, and especially in those countries which had been occupied by the enemy, the Communist Parties had gained enormously in prestige and influence. In part this was due to the reflected glory of the Red Army; but in large measure it was because, throughout occupied Europe, communists had been the spearhead of the resistance and its most disciplined element. Just as Russia's temporary alliance with Nazi Germany was for a time obliterated by the superb performance of the Red Army against the Hitlerites, so the Communist Parties of Europe redeemed earlier sabotage of the war effort by their later courageous and effective contribution. In addition, the collapse of the European middle class, the absence of any clear-cut pro-democratic war policy on the part of Britain and America, plus the various Allied compromises of expediency, made it all the easier for communism to become the symbol of liberation for a large part of the European population. Thus, the tools for a Soviet policy of expansion and penetration were ready to hand.

At Potsdam, the Soviet Union obtained agreement for the annexation of the northern half of East Prussia and made final its reacquisition of eastern Poland. The Finnish peace treaty gave Russia Petsamo in the north of Finland and Karelian territory in the south. The Rumanian treaty returned Bessarabia to the Soviet Union and ceded North Bukovina, which had never been Russian. Revolutionary pressures were exerted in Rumania, Poland, and throughout the Balkans.

In 1946, an attempt at nationalistic expansion into Iran was blocked by prompt appeal to the United Nations. But the Western powers were able to do little more than protest against the continuing campaigns of penetration in the various Central European and Balkan countries. The protests lost much of their force because they were based upon the interpretation of a more or less meaningless promise of "free elections" obtained from Stalin at Yalta. What were "free elections" in a country like Rumania, where no such elections had ever been held? What, for that matter, was "freedom"? What was "democracy"? The Big Three had used these words in their wartime agreements, but the Big Three had left them undefined.

The same sort of trouble developed in the Security Council and in the United Nations Assembly. The United States put forward a proposal for international control of atomic energy. The Soviet Union countered with a proposal for international disarmament. Both were lost in the confusion of a debate which had little to do with the merits of either proposition. More and more, the United Nations became merely a forum for recrimination—a healthy safety valve, to be sure, but not a functioning, constructive force.

The more Western policy became obsessed with the necessity of containing Soviet expansion, the more negative became its effect, and the greater became the vacuum into which Soviet pressure could penetrate.

On March 5, 1946, Winston Churchill made his famous speech at Fulton, Missouri, with President Truman sitting by his side and apparently beaming approval. Shorn of its characteristic embellishments, the speech amounted to this: The world is divided into capitalist and communist blocs. To check the expansion of the communist bloc, the English-speaking peoples—a sort of latter-day "master race"—must sooner or later form a union. They should immediately contract a military alliance and co-ordinate their military establishments. They must (shades of the man with the little mustache!) lead "Christian civilization" in an anti-communistic crusade. They must hold on to the secret of the atomic bomb. Only thus, said Mr. Churchill, could a probable war be averted, because the Soviet Union respects strength and would probably come to terms with a powerful and determined Anglo-American alliance. What Churchill was really saying was that the United States must underwrite the British Empire—at the very moment when Britain itself had repudiated Mr. Churchill's old-fashioned imperialism.

This speech was immediately disavowed by the British Labor Government. It was widely criticized here and abroad. There was considerable speculation as to whether, by his apparent sponsorship, the President had meant to convey his agreement or approval. Any such intention was denied, but the curious circumstances under which the speech had been made remained a part of history. A year later the impact of Mr. Churchill's philosophy upon the Truman Administration was to become manifest. At the time, it was considered an unfortunately disturbing factor in the Administration's then current effort to obtain Congressional approval for the British loan.

Toward the end of 1946, a long-germinating precarious situation began to come to a head at the eastern end of the Mediterranean. Sensing that the British might not much longer be able to maintain their somewhat dubious position in Greece and that we were not prepared to take it over, the Kremlin renewed the ancient Russian pressures upon Turkey for concessions in the control of the Dardanelles, and upon Greece, via convenient Bulgarian and Yugoslav demands for frontier revisions. This brought from us a naval demonstration in the eastern Mediterranean and the beginnings of a policy which was soon to develop into the so-called Truman Doctrine.

It was at this point that General Marshall stepped upon the scene.

The fact that Mr. Truman was, at this time, still trying to think primarily in terms of reconciliation rather than in terms of what was soon to be called a "cold war" emerges from the following passage in his message on the State of the Union, delivered on January 7, 1947:

> The delay in arriving at the first peace settlements is due partly to the difficulty of reaching agreement with the Soviet Union on the terms of settlement. Whatever differences there may have been between us and the Soviet Union, however, should not be allowed to obscure the fact that the basic interests of both nations lie in the early making of a peace under which the peoples of all countries may return, as free men and women, to the essential tasks of production and reconstruction. The major concern of each of us should be the promotion of collective security, not the advancement of individual security.
>
> Our policy toward the Soviet Union is guided by the same principles which will determine our policies toward all nations. We seek only to uphold the principles of international justice which have been embodied in the charter of the United Nations.
>
> We must now get on with the peace settlements. . . .

3. BIPARTISANISM

It remains now to mention one other legacy of doubtful value to which the new Secretary of State fell heir. This was the concept of what had come to be called a bipartisan foreign policy. The practice had originated in the successful efforts made by Secretary Hull and the then Assistant Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, to work closely with a small group of legislative leaders in the formulation of wartime foreign policy. Out of this informal effort, there developed a close working relationship, especially with three Senators—Connally (D) of Texas, Austin (R) of Vermont, and Vandenberg (R) of Michigan. Senator Connally was, at the time, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Vandenberg became its senior Republican member, after Austin resigned to become United States delegate to the United Nations. During the wartime election campaign of 1944, Governor Dewey delegated his adviser, John Foster Dulles, to consult with the Roosevelt Administration on foreign affairs in order to prevent foreign policy from becoming a campaign issue. This was when the term "bipartisan foreign policy" became current. Later, President Roosevelt appointed a bipartisan committee to represent the United States at the San Francisco Conference.

Under the Truman Administration, the practice was continued and amplified. Senator Austin and Mr. Dulles played a leading part in the United Nations. Senators Connally and Vandenberg accompanied Mr. Byrnes to most of the meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers. They continued to serve, with their respective majority and minority roles reversed, after the Republicans gained control of Congress in the election of 1946. From this point on, until Mr. Byrnes' resignation, two Republicans—Senator Vandenberg and Mr. Dulles—exercised an influence upon the making of foreign policy almost as great as that of the Secretary of State.

The virtue of this arrangement—especially in wartime, or when a President has lost control of Congress—is clear. It makes for smoother co-operation. Its defect is also clear. It leads to compromise rather than decision—to halfway measures and a fluctuating course rather than to the firm pursuit of clearly defined aims.

During most of his thirteen years in the White House, President Roosevelt acted as his own Secretary of State. It was he who made important policy decisions, who took action, who explained his decisions and actions to the people of the United States and often to the people of the world. To say this is not to belittle the services rendered by Secretary Hull, for it was Hull who often supplied the tenacity with which Roosevelt's ideas were carried through in the weary grind of daily routine operations. Nor does the statement that President Roosevelt provided the strategy of foreign policy detract from the merit of such men as Sumner Welles, Edward Stettinius, and especially Dean Acheson, who reduced ideas to practical programs and carried the burden of getting Congressional support for their adoption.

The fact remains that from 1933 to 1945 our Ship of State was commanded and navigated by one of those natural helmsmen, whose genius consists not so much in the knowledge of charts and tide-tables as in the ability to sense a shift in the wind or smell the presence of unseen and uncharted shoals.

From Franklin D. Roosevelt's death in April 1945 to the end of 1946, President Truman endeavored less to shape United States foreign policy than conscientiously to hold it to the course laid by his predecessor. This proved to be difficult, partly because the international scene shifted rapidly and partly because Mr. Roosevelt's course of action had been very largely a series of improvisations to meet circumstances as they arose.

After the San Francisco Conference, at which the United Nations came into being, President Truman appointed James F. Byrnes as his Secretary of State. In making this move, it may or may not have been the President's intention to re-establish a greater degree of independence for the Secretary of State. The fact is that Mr. Byrnes did become a more independent originator of policy than either Mr. Hull or Mr. Stettinius. He did not, however, change the traditional method of proceeding by instinct, negotiation, and improvisation rather than according to any predetermined plan. Moreover, Secretary Byrnes developed the habit of carrying the State Department around the world in his brief case, from one international conference to another, frequently leaving his associates in Washington in the dark as to developments of which they learned only through the press.

The appointment of General Marshall as Secretary of State was clearly an effort on the part of the President to effect a change—not so much from one policy to another, as from a method of making policy day by day "on the cables," as dictated by events, to a method of meeting events in accordance with a preconceived plan of action.

The military mind is accustomed to orderly procedure. First, certain broad aims must be established. Second, immediate objectives or concrete steppingstones along the way toward these aims must be selected. And finally, procedures toward the accomplishment of the immediate objectives must be worked out and put into effect. Thus, a consistent planned course of action is evolved. The same principles can be applied to the planning of peacetime foreign policy.

Once broad aims are clarified, it becomes necessary to assess realistically the extent and limits of the effective power available for their realization. Failure to base plans upon an accurate estimate of the contending forces invites disaster. As Chief of Staff, General Marshall had shown himself a past master at realistic appraisal. As Secretary of State, he now faced the infinitely more difficult problem of evaluating conflicting forces in a field where force is not measured merely in terms of production, transportation, and fire-power, but also in terms of food, fuel, and shelter and, above all, in terms of ideas and conflicting human aspirations.

CHAPTER TWO

Military Posture

As might be expected, the new Secretary of State devoted most of his first month in office to a necessary reorganization of the top echelons in the Department and to obtaining for himself a thorough briefing for the forthcoming Moscow Conference. One of his first acts was to invite Mr. John Foster Dulles to accompany him on this mission.

On February 10, Mr. Dulles made a speech in Chicago which varied considerably in spirit from President Truman's conciliatory State of the Union message. Mr. Dulles warned that any attempt to "appease" the Soviet Union might bring dire consequences—possibly another war. "There is risk that we may provoke war," he said, "by a retreat which would cause Soviet leaders to push on recklessly. The greatest danger of war is from Soviet miscalculations." In another passage he said: "I believe that Soviet dynamism will keep within tolerable bounds; but that will be because it encounters strength rather than mushiness. . . . Peace lies not in compromising but in invigorating our historic policies."

At about this time we had been indulging in a little expansive dynamism of our own, demanding sole trusteeship and the right to exclude others from the former Japanese Mandated Islands in the Pacific. Many people abroad, and in this country as well, felt that, by making such a demand, we were undermining the principle of international trusteeship which we ourselves had sponsored. It was almost a foregone conclusion that the Russians would object and raise their favorite cry of "American imperialism." Surprisingly enough—and almost as if to prove Mr. Dulles' contention—the Soviet Union backed our demand wholeheartedly on the ground that we were entitled to this reward for our greater sacrifices in the Pacific war. Actually, the incident showed—although it was not so interpreted—that there was at least one cynical arrangement by which we should have no trouble whatsoever in getting along with the Soviet Union; namely, a basis of "You let me do as I like in my back yard, and I'll let you do as you like in yours." This, however, was something quite different from containing Russia by inducing a respect for what Mr. Dulles called our "invigorated historic policies."

Before Mr. Marshall left for Moscow, he let it become known that he considered the growing economic crisis in Greece a very serious matter and one with which we would have to deal in some manner to be determined by the President. The British had by this time definitely stated that they could not continue their support of the Greeks beyond March 31. This was about all the public knew of the impending bombshell.

1. THE BAYLOR SPEECH

President Truman's now famous message to Congress enunciating what has since been called the Truman Doctrine was delivered on March 12. Six days earlier, the President had made an important but little-noted speech at Baylor University on the subject of foreign economic policy. (For full text see Appendix, page 46.) His main theme on this occasion was that our abandonment of political isolationism meant also the abandonment of economic isolationism. "We are," he said, "the giant of the economic world. Whether we like it or not, the future pattern of economic relations depends upon us. The world is waiting and watching to see what we shall do." The President then discussed the need for freeing world trade from artificial barriers and restrictions and spoke hopefully of the new International Trade Organization, whose Preparatory Commission was soon to meet at Geneva, Switzerland.

Having asserted that the future pattern of world economic relations rested in our hands, the President then proceeded to outline what he thought that pattern should be. The relevent paragraphs warrant careful study. Briefly, what the President said was this: Political freedom is bound up with freedom of individual enterprise; that pattern of international trade which promotes individual enterprise and leaves the direction of the international movement of goods and services to private individual initiative is the pattern which leads to peace; that pattern of international trade in which governments direct or control the flow of goods and services between nations is the pattern which leads to war. Therefore, we, the economic giant, are going to use our power to set a world pattern of free-enterprise capitalism.

Mr. Truman was not merely reaffirming the American belief in the American system as the best system for America. He made it quite clear that he believed that the whole world should adopt the American system, first, because it was the best system and, second, because the American system could survive in America only if it became the world system. This was an unequivocal challenge not merely to those governments or peoples who believed in the Marxist doctrine but also to the far greater number of nations which had come either to believe in or to accept as necessary some form of national economic planning and some degree of government control over their respective economies. The challenge —though little noticed or understood at the time in this country—was very much noted abroad and formed an important part of the background against which the Truman Doctrine of March 12 was interpreted.

2. THE TRUMAN DOCTRINE

The March 12 message is too important to paraphrase. It should be read carefully by any student of this period in our history. (See Appendix, page 47.) The President asked Congress for $400,000,000 to be spent in assisting Greece and Turkey to "maintain their national integrity." He described both countries as being in great danger unless they were given immediate aid to bolster their economies and their military establishments. In addition to funds, the President asked Congress "to authorize the detail of American civilian and military personnel to Greece and Turkey" and to provide "for the instruction and training of Greek and Turkish personnel." This was the concrete proposal. The President said that he was "fully aware of the broad implications involved" and proceeded to speak of them at length. The following passage is quoted verbatim:

> One of the primary objectives of the foreign policy of the United States is the creation of conditions in which we and other nations will be able to work out a way of life free from coercion. This was a fundamental issue in the war with Germany and Japan. Our victory was won over countries which sought to impose their will, and their way of life, upon other nations.
>
> To insure the peaceful development of nations, free from coercion, the United States has taken a leading part in establishing the United Nations. The United Nations is designed to make possible lasting freedom and independence for all its members. We shall not realize our objectives, however, unless we are willing to help free people to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes. This is no more than a frank recognition that totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples, by direct or indirect aggression, undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States.
>
> The peoples of a number of countries of the world have recently had totalitarian regimes forced upon them against their will. The Government of the United States has made frequent protests against coercion and intimidation, in violation of the Yalta agreement, in Poland, Rumania, and Bulgaria. I must also state that in a number of other countries there have been similar developments.
>
> At the present moment in world history nearly every nation must choose between alternative ways of life. The choice is too often not a free one.
>
> One way of life is based upon the will of the majority, and is distinguished by free institutions, representative government, free elections, guaranties of individual liberty, freedom of speech and religion and freedom from political oppression.
>
> The second way of life is based upon the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority. It relies upon terror and oppression, a controlled press and radio, fixed elections and the suppression of personal freedoms.
>
> I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

The President ended his message with these words:

> This is a serious course upon which we embark.
>
> I would not recommend it except that the alternative is much more serious.
>
> The United States contributed $341,000,000,000 toward winning World War II. This is an investment in world freedom and world peace.
>
> The assistance that I am recommending for Greece and Turkey amounts to little more than one-tenth of 1 per cent of this investment. It is only common sense that we should safeguard this investment and make sure that it was not in vain.
>
> The seeds of totalitarian regimes are nurtured by misery and want. They spread and grow in the evil soil of poverty and strife. They reach their full growth when the hope of a people for a better life has died.
>
> We must keep that hope alive.
>
> The free peoples of the world look to us for support in maintaining their freedoms.
>
> If we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of our own nation.
>
> Great responsibilities have been placed upon us by the swift movement of events.
>
> I am confident that the Congress will face these responsibilities squarely.

The March 12 message seemed to me at the time—and still seems—an ill-considered, unwise, and ambiguous document—a document calculated to arouse fear and aggressive hatreds rather than one designed first to inform the Congress and the people and then to persuade them to adopt a course determined by reason and understanding.

First of all the Truman Doctrine was the lineal descendant of our policy of expediency toward Franco, Pétain, Badoglio and King George of Greece. The proposal involved an undertaking on our part to determine wherever and whenever in the world any "free" people might be in danger of having a totalitarian regime forced upon it by "the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority." The President mentioned Poland, Rumania, and Bulgaria as recent examples of where this had happened, and Greece and Turkey as examples of where it would happen unless we intervened.

But what about Spain, Portugal, and Argentina? Was Franco less a dictator than Tito? Was Perón's Argentine Government less totalitarian than the newly installed Government of Poland? Was the President talking about all totalitarian regimes, or only about a certain variety of totalitarian regime imposed by a certain kind of minority? Was this a call to arms in defense of all human freedom against all forms of tyranny? Or was it merely a call to arms against communist tyranny imposed by minorities which we considered to be inspired or supported by the Soviet Union? If the President meant to announce a Churchillian policy of restoration or of stopping Soviet expansion, and only that, why did he not say so?

Second, if we were to commit ourselves to a policy of stopping Soviet expansion, why pretend that we were acting in Greece and Turkey to help suffering peoples, or to preserve the freedom of peoples whose freedom was threatened? The Greeks had suffered no more than the people of Spain; nor would we ease their suffering by bolstering up the rickety, corrupt, and anti-democratic Government which was largely responsible for their troubles. And, if we were concerned about freedom, the people of Turkey had never in their history been a free people. They had been living, quite prosperously, under a slightly streamlined dictatorship which had skillfully played both ends against the middle. When the chips were down in the war of survival, the Turks sat back and sold their chromium to the Nazis or to us—whichever would bid the highest price. Whom were we trying to deceive with fine moral phrases? The world? The Russians? Or ourselves?

Third, if the President meant that we were to embark upon stopping Soviet expansion, just what did this mean?

Did it mean that we were out to stop the spread of the communist ideology in all parts of the world by supporting anyone who opposed it? Did it mean once more reversing our policy in China and again throwing our weight behind forces which we ourselves had just characterized as corrupt and reactionary?

Or did it mean merely that we intended to stop the Soviet Union from setting up so-called friendly governments—communist or non-communist—around its borders? And, if we meant the latter, did we mean merely to stop the creation of more such friendly governments, or also to challenge the existence of those already created?

These were questions which the Congress and the people had a right to ask and have answered. Obviously, the President was not talking about just $400,000,000. He was talking about the first step in a program which would cost billions of dollars—and perhaps millions of lives. If so, the people had a right to know just what that program might be.

And finally, what about power? What about the relation of our effective power to our aim? Were we to tackle this thing alone or with help? And, if with help, whose help? And at what price?

If we proposed to take on the job of stopping Soviet expansion—not through the United Nations but by ourselves—upon whom could we count in the event of a showdown? Upon France, where the communists had recently polled a plurality? Upon a Britain which had repudiated Churchill and was now in the throes of an economic crisis which had helped to precipitate our political crisis? Upon China, torn by a civil war?

The President declared the situation to be so urgent that we dared not wait for the United Nations to handle it. Yet the United Nations had managed to handle the Soviet threat to Iran, compelling the withdrawal of Soviet troops which were actually in that country. What was so urgent that we must act alone, without consultation, without knowing how far our first step would take us, and in such a way as to undermine the very structure of peace which we had been struggling to erect? Were there any facts we did not know? If so, we had a right to know them. . . .

These were some of the questions which seemed to me appropriate at the time. Many of them were subsequently asked in Congress. Few of them were answered. Senator Vandenberg came to the rescue of the Administration with an amendment which at least made our action in Greece and Turkey subject to United Nations disapproval. With this and certain other limitations and safeguards, Congress approved the grant of $400,000,000. But the debate clearly showed that the final overwhelming vote in favor of the specific authority by no means constituted an acceptance of the over-all Truman Doctrine. Actually, the nation-wide debate and the action of Congress indicated both a widespread disapproval of the Truman Doctrine and a reluctant recognition that a public disavowal of the Chief Executive might, at that moment, have fatal consequences. Thus, while approving limited aid to Greece and Turkey, Congress and the people made it plain that they were reluctant to embark upon a world-wide crusade against communism, or to undertake single-handed a geopolitical struggle against the Soviet Union. They rejected the idea that, in disregard of the United Nations, this country should appoint itself the world's judge and the world's policeman.

Unfortunately, the President's original proposal not only confused the minds of most Americans and of many people abroad; it also opened a Pandora's box of ugly emotions. Here at home it won loud acclaim from the extreme Russia-haters, red-baiters, and reactionaries of all sorts, while evoking protest from a strange mixture of idealistic progressives and cynical, irreconcilable isolationists. Worst of all, it alienated the great majority of middle-of-the-road Americans, whose common sense warned them against hasty abandonment of the United Nations and of the hope of reconciling our differences with the Soviet Union.

Abroad, the result was much the same. The Soviet Union and its followers in various countries interpreted the Truman Doctrine as a declaration of ideological war. The ultra-conservative, anti-democratic elements in the various countries rejoiced and climbed on our band-wagon. The great mass of patient, suffering peoples shuddered with fear as they felt pushed nearer and nearer to a forced choice between what appeared to them as the rival imperialisms of East and West.

Whatever our next move might be, it would take time to undo the damage which had been done.

One may wonder how this strange and ill-advised pronouncement ever came to be uttered. Apparently, it came about as follows:

The State Department had for some time been receiving alarming reports from the Greek Government and from its own observers on the spot. The British had for months been telling us that they could not afford to continue pouring money into the maintenance of their position in the eastern Mediterranean. The President and Secretary Marshall had become convinced that, if the Moscow Conference on Germany was to succeed, the Russians would have to be given some sort of concrete evidence that their days of pushing against what Mr. Dulles had called "mushiness" were over. General Marshall felt that such evidence could best be given by assuming what he is reported to have described as a "military posture."

The problem was laid before a small group of Congressional leaders by the President and his advisers, with a proposal that the United States take over the British position in Greece and Turkey. After listening to the story, Senator Vandenberg is reported to have said: "All right, Mr. President, if that's what you want, there's only one way you can get it. That is to make a personal appearance before Congress and scare the hell out of the country."

The attribution and the quotation may be inaccurate, but it is reasonably certain that this is about what actually took place. The message of March 12 was deliberately drawn to "scare the hell out of the country," in order to obtain the desired Congressional action.

Economic aid to Greece, and perhaps even to Turkey, might have been constructive, if presented in an entirely different context of planned reconstruction. Because of the military, political, and ideological context in which the proposal for economic aid was presented, the Truman Doctrine brought the precariously balanced structure of peace to its moment of greatest jeopardy.

From the point of view of the Kremlin, the Baylor speech and the March 12 message, taken together, could hardly be understood as anything less than a deliberate challenge. The timing was such as to produce the worst possible effect. When the President delivered his message to Congress, the Moscow Conference had barely begun and Secretary Marshall had only just met his colleagues in the Council of Foreign Ministers. Since the debate over the Truman proposal lasted well into May, the impact upon the Moscow Conference was chiefly that of the original unmodified Truman proposal.

The result was less a demonstration of "military posture" than one of highly emotional confusion. The world could not help but wonder whether or not Winston Churchill, rather than Harry S Truman, had succeeded President Roosevelt as the architect of United States foreign policy.

While the debate raged in Washington Mr. Marshall proceeded calmly with the agenda of the Moscow Conference as if nothing had occurred to change the context in which the discussion of the German and Austrian peace treaties was to take place.

CHAPTER THREE

Britain and the United States

BEFORE WE PROCEED to examine the German problem and the Moscow Conference of March-April 1947, it may be useful to consider briefly the state of Anglo-American relations at that time, since these bear significantly upon the further development of our own foreign policy.

The Churchill influence upon our wartime and immediate postwar policy has already been noted. It is important to understand as well the later impact of the British Labor victory, and also the reverse—namely, our own influence upon the early policy of the Labor Government.

The British overturn of August 1945 had an unsettling influence not only upon the British representation at the then current Potsdam Conference but also upon the new and untried American negotiators. This may well have had something to do with the tragic mistakes made at Potsdam, which we shall discuss presently. A more lasting consequence of the Labor victory was the aggravation of American apprehensions concerning the world-wide trend toward socialism. These apprehensions became manifest in the early months of 1946, when the British Government applied for an American loan. They were responsible in part for the niggardly attitude of the American negotiators and for the inclusion of conditions which were later to become troublesome.

While fear of "helping a socialist government" adversely influenced American conservatives, American liberal opinion was alienated by other factors. The new Labor Government had not yet broken clearly with the foreign policy of its predecessor. The decision to free India, Burma, and Ceylon had not yet been taken, nor had British troops been evacuated from Egypt. The problem of Palestine was acute, and here in America there had been some sharp criticism of British restrictions of Jewish immigration. These criticisms were deeply resented by Mr. Bevin and many of his associates. It was felt in Britain that the agitation of American Jews was partly responsible for the critical situation in Palestine and that the United States had no right to criticize unless it was willing to accept a share of the responsibility for finding a solution.

In this none-too-happy atmosphere, negotiations were undertaken for a loan to tide Britain over her period of reconversion. Matters were not helped by Mr. Churchill's coming to this country at just that time to put forward the idea of an Anglo-American alliance against the Soviet Union.

The economic facts confronting the two Governments were very simple. The prewar United Kingdom had been a wealthy nation. It had paid for its large imports of food, raw materials, and foreign goods partly out of its own exports, partly out of shipping and other services, and partly out of the interest and dividends it received from its very substantial foreign investments. When the war came, Britain had to spend its capital in order to survive until American Lend-Lease aid could be mobilized. In other words, the British Government had to take over the foreign investments of its nationals and sell them abroad to pay for planes and tanks and guns, as well as food and raw materials. From that moment, Britain's whole status changed. From that moment, the United Kingdom had no appreciable income from capital and would have to pay for its imports by what it could currently produce and sell to other nations.

The realization of this completely changed status and of its consequences was delayed and obscured by the operation of Lend-Lease during the next four and a half years.

Almost immediately after V-J Day, President Truman summarily shut off Lend-Lease—without any consultation with our former allies and without any explanation to the American people that some method would have to be devised to help carry our friends over the period of reconversion. While we were gaily flinging off our mild wartime rationing, the British Government was faced overnight with the necessity of imposing even greater austerity and of undertaking an immediate drastic reorganization of the whole United Kingdom economy. It would have to increase its exports as much as possible and close the remaining gap by decreasing its purchases abroad to the absolute minimum. To reconvert to peace production and at the same time make these drastic readjustments would obviously take time—especially with a people and an industrial machine exhausted by six years of war. That was why the British came to us for a loan—to tide over the period of reconversion and readjustment.

In arranging the amount and terms of this loan, both sides miscalculated. We, as most lenders will, tried to hold down the amount of the loan and to exact such terms as we thought would best aid world recovery. Britain, as most borrowers in need will do, agreed to the best terms she could get, even though they made her task of reorganization difficult and precarious. Had greater wisdom prevailed on both sides of the table, much subsequent trouble could have been avoided. The British knew—and said at the time—that the amount of $3,500,000,000 was insufficient for the purpose. But our negotiators believed that Congress would refuse to appropriate more because—supposedly—the American people would not stand for it. And so we built a bridge three-quarters of the way across the river—which is no bridge at all.

Furthermore, in order to promote our idea of what would best serve the interests of world recovery, we insisted upon attaching conditions to the loan which came very close to wrecking the British economy altogether. We insisted upon the free convertibility of the pound sterling as of July 15, 1947, and upon certain anti-discrimination clauses designed to fit into the pattern of freer multilateral trade which we were attempting to promote throughout the world. The chief trouble about these conditions was that they ignored the realities of the British position and were, therefore, impossible of fulfillment. Whether the anti-discrimination clauses were wise in themselves, or justly drawn even as long-run objectives, is another matter. The simple fact is that we unwisely insisted and the British unwisely agreed to a contract which could only lead to mutual disappointment and recrimination.

Unfortunately, this was not all. The loan was granted in the spring of 1946. By the last quarter of that year, Britain had already shown great progress. By hard work, exports had been increased to over 110 per cent of prewar volume—over 125 per cent in money value. Imports were being rigidly controlled and curtailed. The gap left by the missing income from foreign investments was being closed. And then, two things happened.

Britain was hit by the worst winter in modern history; and price control ended in the United States. The weather reduced British production and cut down the painfully built-up exports, while at the same time increasing the need for imports. The irresponsible termination of price controls in the United States caused a rapid rise in prices which cut down by more than 25 per cent the purchasing power of Britain's borrowed dollars in the American market.

The slim margin by which it had been calculated that the loan might be sufficient disappeared almost overnight. As early as March 1947, when Mr. Marshall was setting out for Moscow, it should have been evident to both the British and American Governments that some remedial action would have to be taken. Neither Government would face the issue. Nothing was done until some months later, when almost the last drop of British dollars had been drained away.

There were, I think, three psychological factors which detracted from the normal health of Anglo-American relations and which were largely responsible for the mistakes and failures of Anglo-American policy at this time.

First, there was British preoccupation with the maintenance of the political status quo. This had been the key to Mr. Churchill's wartime policy, deriving its major impetus, not from ideological considerations as such, but from a pragmatic determination to preserve the British Empire. It took some time for the Labor Government to effect the transition from Mr. Churchill's "I did not become the King's first minister in order to preside over the liquidation of His Majesty's Empire" to a policy of gradually converting the Empire into an expanding Commonwealth of free nations.

Second, there was American preoccupation with the maintenance of the economic status quo. This was the key to that American foreign policy which began to emerge when Mr. Roosevelt shifted in 1942 from "Dr. New Deal to Dr. Win-the-War," became more clearly defined after Mr. Roosevelt's death, and blossomed into full flower when Mr. Truman, having lost the Congressional elections of 1946, took more and more counsel of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—especially Admiral Leahy—and of his "bipartisan" conservative advisers.

The paths of these two trends crossed at just about the time we are now discussing. That is to say, Britain began to develop the beginnings of a forward-looking policy at just about the time when we came down off the fence and began to look backward in earnest.

The third psychological factor might be characterized as an Anglo-American conspiracy in self-deception. Both we and the British were living in an illusion created by the war. We were living in an illusion of equal partnership. Neither we nor the British fully realized the fact that World War II had economically bled Britain white, much as World War I had physically bled France white. Britain still thought of itself—and we still thought of Britain—as one of the three or four great powers in the world. The fact was that, for the time being, Britain had become a small nation carried on in part by the momentum of its great past, in part by the loyalty of the Dominion peoples, and in part by its own indomitable courage. Whatever might be one's hopes for Britain's future return to a position of pre-eminence, the Britain of early 1947 was "keeping up to the Joneses"—trying to maintain itself at a level beyond its reach and seeking to carry commitments beyond its strength. This was our fault as much as it was Britain's.

The concept of equal partnership had not always been an illusion. Morally it was justified in 1941. Britain had held the fort alone while we made up our minds and mobilized our strength. Had it not been for British courage and British sacrifice, we should have fought a very different and more costly war—a war from which we might not have emerged as the strongest and most fortunate nation on this earth. But the fact remains that our wartime fifty-fifty partnership with Britain came about, not as the result of equal power deployed in a joint endeavor, but as the result of the earlier and more dangerous employment of relatively small British power and the later and safer employment of far greater power by the United States. There was nothing wrong with the translation of these contributions into a fifty-fifty management of our combined war effort. The difficulty arose after victory had been won.

Because they had purchased at enormous sacrifice a position beyond their actual power, the British were slow to realize that with their diminished power this position had become untenable. And we, because we were reluctant to assume responsibility commensurate with our vastly increased power, continued to expect the British to carry commitments beyond their means which we desired to see maintained.

Both Germany and Palestine serve to illustrate the point. In Germany, Britain and the United States together were responsible for over 40,000,000 Germans, living in an area which contained that nation's chief raw material and industrial resources but which could not supply itself with foodstuffs. To make the area self-supporting would require several years of intensive effort and a considerable capital investment. Feeding the population, maintaining armies of occupation, and rehabilitating the area would cost well over a billion dollars a year. Because we marched into Germany as fifty-fifty partners in victory, we maintained the fifty-fifty basis in post-surrender management. Britain was long unwilling to face the fact that the commitment involved exceeded her power—which meant that she must recede from a position of equality, even though she had vital commercial interests at stake in the Ruhr. And we were unwilling to face the fact that Britain's diminished power placed a greater burden upon us—which meant that we must assume more than half of the cost. It was not until a short time ago that this situation was realistically adjusted.

Similarly in Palestine, we, no less than the British, have wanted Western protection of the Middle East oil fields to be maintained. This is a matter quite apart from the Arab-Jewish problem. Here, too, the commitment was clearly beyond British postwar power. Here, too, vital commercial interests were involved, for us as well as Britain. Yet this did not cause us to show any desire to share the burdens and responsibilities. Nor were the British any too anxious to have us do so.

Both examples illustrate how the British failed to realize that the false front, which they themselves maintained, stood in the way of greater American understanding and greater willingness to assume a larger part of the burden. They show equally how we in turn failed to make allowances for the fact that, just because the British had been carrying a burden beyond their capacity, they were desperately tired and unable to perform according to their usual high standard.

These elements are important to bear in mind as we pursue the main thread of our story.

In our dealings with Germany, the British and we developed a number of procedural differences in our two zones of occupation, but we also had one major difference in basic approach to the German problem. The British Labor Government wanted to nationalize the Ruhr coal mines and perhaps later the steel industry. Some of the Colonel Blimps in British Military Government did not share this aim. Our predilection being for the maintenance of free-enterprise capitalism, we officially favored breaking up the big German monopolies rather than socializing them. But trust-busting, or decartelization, as it came to be called in occupation jargon, was subject to the same limitations that we had discovered in our own country. It ran counter to technological development and to the emotional attitudes of most of the men who were supposed to enforce it.

This major divergence in Anglo-American aims remained largely academic in the chaotic conditions which existed in Germany up to the time of the Moscow Conference. It was obscured by the more dramatic differences with the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, it was a latent factor of important disagreement and one which was closely related to the over-all problem raised by the anti-discrimination clauses in the British loan, the Truman speech at Baylor University, and the Geneva negotiations for an international trade agreement.

CHAPTER FOUR

Deadlock Over Germany*

1. BACKGROUND

WHAT HAPPENED—or failed to happen—at the Moscow Conference of March-April 1947 cannot be discussed without a considerable amount of background information. It is difficult quickly to summarize the many and complex factors which combine to create this central problem of the European peace settlement.

Perhaps the most useful approach would be: a first-hand report of how things looked in Germany at the time when Secretary Marshall inherited the problem; next, a brief summary of how the condition of Germany affected the rest of Europe and the world; and finally, an analysis of how this state of affairs came about.

Here, then, is the picture as of early January 1947.

It is not quite two years since the Allied Armies crossed the Vistula and the Rhine—one year and eight months since Hitler's Germany surrendered and ceased to exist. What was once the German nation, before the annexation of Austria, is now partitioned into six pieces. One piece has been annexed by Russia. A much larger and more important part has been annexed by Poland. And the remaining rump, lying roughly between the Oder and the old western frontier, has been cut up into four separate zones of occupation.

As a result of this partition, the economic life of Germany is paralyzed. The parts annexed to Russia and Poland, as well as the Soviet zone of occupation, are working to produce reparations for Poland and the Soviet Union. The French zone is similarly being milked by France, though on a much smaller scale. The British and American zones are living on subsidy to the extent of half a billion dollars a year paid out of the pockets of British and American taxpayers. At this moment, they are in the course of economic unification—a process which will cost several billion dollars before the two zones alone can become self-supporting.

Between the Anglo-American area and the French zone there is but little exchange of food, raw materials, or manufactured goods. Between eastern Germany and the western zones there is practically no natural commerce at all, no movement of people to and fro, no exchange even of information. It is more difficult for a German to get from Leipzig to Munich or Hamburg than for a British subject to go from Montreal to Calcutta.

Eastern Germany, which used to supply the food for itself and for a large part of western Germany as well, is now exporting all its foodstuffs to the East, except for a bare subsistence ration retained at home. Its industries are working for Russia; but they are gradually running down, because of war damage, removals of plant equipment, lack of effective manpower, and absence of parts and raw materials formerly derived from the West.

Western Germany is in even worse condition. Never self-sufficient in food and now deprived of the normal surplus from the East, it lives on French leavings and Anglo-American charity. Disease and death from malnutrition are frequent, hunger edema prevalent, infant mortality high. Industry is at a low level of production—some plants at a total standstill and few operating at more than a fraction of normal capacity. In part this is due to war damage, but even more to shortage of manpower and the low productivity of available skilled labor. Most of all, it is due to shortage of coal.

The great Ruhr coal fields, capable of producing something like 130,000,000 tons per annum, are turning out less than half of that amount. Most of this is needed to run the railroads and public utilities, to supply the armies of occupation, and for export to the coal-hungry countries of Western Europe. Only a trickle is reaching German industry—not enough to make steel for even the most needed construction and repair.

Throughout all of Germany, consumers' goods are practically unobtainable. Foodstuffs (apart from rationed items), clothing, household utensils, furniture, or even the simplest hand tools are not to be found anywhere except in limited quantities and at fantastic prices on the black market. Those who have goods refuse to sell them for currency, because even the most simple-minded citizen knows that the German currency is inflated and intrinsically worthless. Cigarettes—at a dollar per cigarette—have become the accepted medium of exchange. Farmers hoard their produce, hungry hordes of gleaners invade their fields, and those who work for wages can buy nothing for their money except the scant allowance of food called for by their ration cards.

Millions are homeless. But scarcely a new house has been built in Germany since the surrender. Even window glass is practically unobtainable. Families are crowded together in available housing, with a whole family frequently compressed into a single room. Many are still living in cellars. Here and there a windowbox with blooming geraniums indicates where someone lives in the still habitable portion of a ruined building.

* A large part of this chapter is a condensation of parts of Germany—Bridge or Battleground, J. P. Warburg, Harcourt Brace & Company, 1947.

To make matters worse, some thirteen million Germans are in the process of being expelled from the lands annexed by Poland and Russia, from the Sudetenland, and from parts of Hungary. These "expellees"—preponderantly old men, women, and children—have no place to go except into the already overcrowded homes in the rump of Germany.

And—to cap the climax—as the occupying powers have begun to bring in the families of troops and officials stationed in Germany, more and more of the better housing facilities have been taken over to serve their needs. Often as many as four or five German families are evicted to make room for one Allied household.

The Germany of 1947 is an economic desert. Not because it was planned that way, but because the four occupying powers failed to carry out their agreed plan. This plan—the Potsdam Agreement—called for treating Germany as an economic unit, instead of cutting it up into four separate water-tight compartments. We shall consider presently how and why this plan miscarried.

For the moment, we are concerned with an appraisal of what has happened and what it means. From this point of view, it seems fair to say that Allied occupation set out to accomplish three immediate objectives, only one of which it has so far accomplished. It set out to disarm, to demilitarize, and to democratize Germany.

Disarmament has been accomplished. Except for German police operating under Allied supervision, not a single German legally possesses firearms of any sort—not even a shotgun to kill rabbits. The Wehrmacht, the SS, the SA, and the Gestapo have ceased to exist. German ships are banned from the seas, and German airplanes from the skies.

As for demilitarization, very little has been done. War damage to German industry is not nearly so great as one might suppose from a casual inspection of the ruined cities of the Ruhr. Bombing could temporarily put out of action a steel mill or a huge synthetic plant for the manufacture of oil or rubber. But such damage was more often to easily repaired structures than to vital machinery. Since the surrender, a few shipyards and war plants have been destroyed. But the planned process of destruction or removal of war potential has proceeded at a snail's pace, because of Allied bickering and because of the realization that this program was in direct conflict with the immediate and pressing problems of rehabilitation.

Little, too, has been accomplished in the far more important field of demilitarizing the mind and spirit of the German people. The Allies have learned that it is difficult to teach democracy to men struggling for a bare existence—particularly when the four occupying powers have not reached any agreement on what this democracy is that they desire to teach.

The political vacuum in Germany is almost as complete as the economic vacuum, and closely related to it.

So much for the condition of Germany. And now for a quick contemporary appraisal of the effects of that condition upon the rest of Europe.

Germany—the chronic troublemaker of Europe—had also been the hub of the whole European economy. Geography, geology, and technology combined to bring this about. German rivers and railways are the gateway to the heart of the Continent. German coal fields are the sole producers of surplus coal in Western Europe. The German people were—and are still, even in defeat—the largest single compact mass of skilled labor on the Continent. These three elements combine to make Germany a major factor in Europe's productive capacity as well as a major market-place for the raw materials and goods produced by other nations. Before Hitler came to power, Germany ranked third—after the United States and Britain—in total world trade.

It is clear to the new Secretary of State that, while it is neither necessary nor desirable that Germany should ever regain the position of preponderant economic strength which she acquired through the deliberate overexpansion of her heavy industries, it is nevertheless true that, unless Germany does regain a large measure of economic health, there can be no European recovery. He sees that the failure to recognize this unpalatable but nonetheless inescapable fact has been the cause of much of the world's postwar trouble.

Perhaps Mr. Marshall recalls how, in 1941, when Nazi bombs were raining upon Britain, Anthony Eden, then Foreign Secretary, had the vision and the courage to make a declaration of British policy after Germany should have been defeated. "Our conditions for peace with Germany," he said, "will be designed to prevent a repetition of Germany's misdeeds. But, while these military measures must be taken, it is not part of our purpose to cause Germany . . . to collapse economically. I say that, not out of any love for Germany, but because a starving and a bankrupt Germany in the midst of Europe would poison all of us, who are her neighbors. That is not sentiment; it is common sense."

And here is what General Marshall sees six years later—a Germany which is starving and bankrupt; her neighbors on all sides frightened and demanding a voice in what shall be done in the future. They are frightened not only of a rebuilt Germany but also of living next door to a moral morass and an economic desert—a plague-center, which has come into being in place of an area which once supplied them with much of what they needed and bought from them much of what they produced. And this applies not only to Germany's small neighbors. French reconstruction is delayed and imperiled by lack of German coal. The same thing is even more true of Italy. The British, after seven years of privation, are still compelled to remain on wartime rations. And even we—remote and fortunate—are becoming aware that a coal strike or a shipping strike in this country may mean the death of cold and hungry thousands across the sea.

The economic collapse of Germany, and especially the cutting off of German coal, may turn out to be the worst physical disaster that has befallen Western Europe.

More serious still is the effect of all this upon the prospects for lasting peace. Not only is reconstruction being delayed, misery protracted, and the seed of unrest sown, but confidence in the whole planned structure of a great-power peace is being undermined. If the four-power failure in Germany continues, people throughout the world will begin to lose what faith they had in the ability of the great powers to reach and carry out agreements—especially in the more troublesome parts of the world.

This is about how the picture must have been unfolded to General Marshall in his pre-conference briefing by his associates in the Department of State. No doubt he wanted to know just how such a catastrophic state of affairs had come about. Perhaps you, too, would like an abbreviated version of the story.

2. REASONS FOR FAILURE

The reasons for the failure were to be found in the historical development of Allied policy toward Germany and especially in the major blunders made at the Potsdam Conference. The failure was not attributable to faulty execution of policy but to policy itself.

In August 1941, before the United States entered the war, President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill issued the first definition of Allied policy toward the Axis powers, once these should have been defeated. They renounced any desire for territorial or other aggrandizement, expressed the wish that there should be "no territorial changes that do not correspond to the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned," and in general set forth the broad principles of a just rather than a vengeful peace. Shortly after Pearl Harbor, the eight principles of this Atlantic Charter were embodied in a declaration signed by all the United Nations. The United Nations Declaration was never revoked or modified.

Apart from announcing their determination to bring about the "unconditional surrender" of the Axis powers (at Casablanca in January 1943), the Allied leaders made no further major joint pronouncements of policy toward Germany until Roosevelt, Stalin, and Churchill met at Yalta in February 1945. But before we consider what was done at Yalta, it is necessary to fill in a few rapid strokes of background.

In September 1944, Roosevelt and Churchill met at one of their joint staff war councils at Quebec. The then United States Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, placed before this meeting a plan for the post-surrender treatment of Germany. This "Morgenthau Plan" was an extremely drastic proposal for the "deindustrialization" of Germany; it set out to destroy or remove from that country all industrial plant and equipment capable of being used for war production. The plan provided that Germany should become primarily an agricultural nation with only the so-called light, or consumer-goods, industries continuing to operate. The plan even went so far as to propose that all equipment should be removed from the Ruhr coal mines, "and the mines closed."

Both the War and State Departments had been working on quite different plans for the treatment of Germany. They were based upon the conviction that what makes a nation a threat to peace is not the possession of a war potential, but the will to use it. The Secretaries of War and State took sharp issue with the Morgenthau proposal, pointing out, among other things, that—as shown by our own remarkable conversion from peace to war production—any industry is potentially a war industry. The experts of the Foreign Economic Administration stated, moreover, that the Morgenthau Plan was based on erroneous assumptions of fact, particularly as to the availability in Germany of sufficient arable land to make "pastoralization" practicable. The verbal battle raged in Washington throughout the winter of 1944-45. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff finally adopted a compromise plan that endeavored to find a middle ground between Mr. Morgenthau, who wished to destroy or remove all heavy industry, and the War and State Departments, who thought that German industry should be strictly controlled, but that actual destruction of productive capacity, other than that for direct armament production, would seriously impede the rehabilitation of Europe as a whole.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff compromise (JCS 1067) was presented by General Eisenhower to the European Advisory Council in London. It was opposed before the same body by the representatives of the Department of State and the Foreign Economic Administration. Thus, instead of taking a constructive lead toward the shaping of coalition policy, the United States merely provided its allies with a spectacle of internal dissension and an excuse for postponing once more the necessity for reaching agreement.

This was the background against which the Big Three met at Yalta three months before the German surrender. The communiqué which they issued showed clearly, by what it did not say, that the Big Three were far from seeing eye to eye in matters concerning the post-surrender treatment of Germany. They did, however, reach and announce several important decisions:

1. They fixed the Russo-Polish boundary approximately along the so-called Curzon Line, and promised that Poland should be "compensated by substantial accessions of territory in the North and West." This meant that Roosevelt and Churchill had in effect allowed Stalin to persuade them to abandon two important principles of the Atlantic Charter and the United Nations Declaration: namely, the renunciation of territorial aggrandizement and of "territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned."
2. They confirmed their decision—because Roosevelt supported Stalin against Churchill in regard to this—to divide Germany into separate zones of occupation co-ordinated and controlled through an Allied Control Council in Berlin. (Churchill fought for the joint occupation of Germany as a whole.)
3. They agreed — because Roosevelt here supported Churchill against Stalin—that France should be invited to take over a zone of occupation and to participate as a fourth member of the Control Council.

4. They determined the broad principles of denazification, demilitarization, and disarmament, and decided to "eliminate or control [my italics] all German industry that could be used for military production." Thus they adopted the Joint Chiefs' watered-down version of the Morgenthau Plan.

Finally, the Big Three expressed the determination to bring all war criminals to justice and "exact reparations in kind for the destruction wrought by the Germans." This vague language merely indicated that no real agreement on reparations had been possible. The Russians apparently demanded $10,000,000,000 in reparations and have since claimed that President Roosevelt tentatively agreed to that figure.

Meanwhile, as the Allied Armies pressed on into Germany, there was still no joint directive to govern the four commanders. JCS 1067 was issued to General Eisenhower in April and became binding upon his United States forces, but not upon the British and French armies under his command. (This was not known at the time, because the JCS directive remained a "top secret" document until several months after the Potsdam Agreement.) There was in fact no agreed policy or directive for the converging armies of occupation until the Potsdam Agreement was signed on August 2, 1945, almost three months after the German surrender. The absence of any such agreement during the first three months of occupation complicated the later problems of quadripartite government, because it permitted divergent trends and policies to become firmly established in the various zones.

Within this framework of predetermined decisions and lack of over-all policy, the conferees at Potsdam sought to produce a practical operating directive. Of the original Big Three only Stalin remained. Roosevelt was dead and Churchill was supplanted in the middle of the conference by Attlee. Given the uncertainties and contradictions in American policy, as expressed in JCS 1067, the political overturn in Britain, and the purposeful determination of Stalin, the new leaders of Britain and America faced a difficult task. On the whole, so far as the operating directive was concerned, the conferees produced a reasonably good document, setting forth procedures for disarmament, demilitarization, and denazification; but in dealing with the broader aspects of European policy, they made two very serious and far-reaching blunders.

First: The British and American delegations allowed themselves to become parties to a Polish-Russian land-grab in eastern Germany that went far beyond any reasonable interpretation of what had been agreed to at Yalta. Under the Yalta formula of "compensating" Poland for the loss of her eastern territories, one might have expected her to receive the industrial area of Upper Silesia with its rich mineral deposits and its partly Polish population, and perhaps East Prussia for strategic reasons, even though East Prussia had never been anything but German. But the Potsdam conferees established the German-Polish frontier at the Oder-Neisse Line, taking away from Germany not only Upper Silesia and East Prussia, but most of Pomerania and Lower Silesia as well as important parts of Brandenburg. All these territories, containing some nine million Germans and producing food for about seventeen million—or one-quarter of the whole German population—were awarded to Poland, except for the upper half of East Prussia, which was awarded to Russia for no better reason than that Stalin demanded it.

It is true that these awards were made subject to the final determination of the peace settlement, but this did not deter the Russians and Poles from proceeding immediately to drive out the German populations, thus greatly prejudicing any chance of later rectification.

Second: While the British and American delegations insisted on the inclusion of France in the four-power management of Germany, as provided by the Yalta Declaration and the Potsdam Agreement, they neglected to obtain the French signature to the Potsdam Agreement itself, thus leaving the French in a position where they were not bound by the terms of the agreement and yet were in a position to veto their execution.

These two blunders are very largely responsible for the dangerous deterioration of the position in Germany and the consequent threat to the whole structure of peace through big-power co-operation.

The immediate result of the two great blunders made at Potsdam was to fortify that section of French opinion which favored the annexation of all German territory west of the Rhine plus the political and economic separation from Germany of the Ruhr industrial area. There were two reasons for this: first, the very simple reaction that, if Poland and Russia were going to grab territory in the east, why not France in the west? And, second, the feeling that the amputation of the eastern territories would in effect create the conditions precedent to another German invasion of France. Therefore, the French argued, if a new German revisionism was to be created and if population pressures were to be piled up in the rump of Germany, then France must protect itself by holding the Rhine frontier and by denying Germany the use of the Ruhr arsenal.

In order to enforce these demands, the French proceeded to veto in the Allied Control Council every move which might lead to the treatment of Germany as a political or economic whole and thus lead to the reestablishment of a German nation. They refused to allow free interzonal trade and economic unification. They even vetoed a proposal to allow the German trade unions to organize on a national basis, and another to issue uniform postage stamps.

The result of these obstructive tactics was the frustration of the whole Potsdam design for quadripartite management, and the division of Germany into four separate compartments, with the consequent deterioration of the country as a whole and the severe straining of the four-power coalition.

It would appear that three basic fallacies found their way into four-power planning with regard to Germany long before the German surrender. These fallacies, along with the two major blunders made at Potsdam, constitute the heart of the difficulty.

The first fallacy was the basic assumption that it would be the proper function of the victorious Allies to remake Germany, re-educate the German people, and fit the new Germany into a world organized for peace. Actually the regeneration of the German people could come about only as the result of their own repentance and resurgent will toward decency and freedom under law; it could not be imposed from without. We could only create a climate in which regeneration could take place, meanwhile making new aggression impossible.

Even if this were not true—even if it were possible for a victorious nation to impose regeneration upon the vanquished—the theory would break down when the victor is not one nation but a coalition of nations.

This brings us to the second fallacy: namely, the division of Germany into arbitrary zones of occupation. Since it was the purpose of the victorious coalition not merely to render Germany harmless but to undertake as well the social, economic, and political reorganization and reorientation of the German people, the creation of separate zones of occupation must be recognized as a well-nigh fatal error.

Given the combination of the two fallacies, it was almost inevitable that each of the four occupying powers would try to remake a piece of Germany in its own image, and that, instead of becoming the great laboratory for the reconciliation of divergent aims and ideals, Germany would tend to become a buffer, if not a battleground.

The third fallacy was the basic thesis of the Morgenthau Plan, which crept into JCS 1067 and the Potsdam Agreement, even though the Plan itself was rejected. This was the thesis that one can render an aggressive nation peaceful and law-abiding merely by seeing to it that no weapons ever come within its reach, even though this may also involve turning back the clock several centuries and reducing the living standards of a whole continent. The fundamental absurdity of this type of thinking would have become more apparent had the original Morgenthau proposal been adopted. Had the Ruhr mines really been dismantled and closed down, as Mr. Morganthau proposed, it would soon have been universally recognized that the "pastoralization" of Germany would disrupt the entire European economy and create explosive discontent in almost every Continental country.

Until the autumn of 1946, the initiative concerning Germany's future had been allowed to rest almost entirely with the Soviet Union and, to a lesser extent, with France. The Russians knew what they wanted and took it. The French knew what they did not want and obstructed it. Neither Britain nor the United States had a clear policy with regard to Germany. Both vacillated between sympathy and irritation toward Russian and French stubbornness.

In April 1946, Mr. Byrnes had put forward a proposal for a long-term four-power treaty of mutual assistance to prevent renewed German aggression. This would have been at least a guarantee of continued American participation in European affairs. But neither this nor the Secretary's patient perseverance in driving toward the settlement of the peripheral problems of Europe constituted an attack upon the central problem—what to do with Germany.

On July 10, Mr. Molotov again seized the initiative. He placed the Soviet Union on record as opposing any French annexations of German territory, favoring the early creation of an anti-fascist central German Government, and insisting upon the carrying out of the Potsdam Agreement. In taking this stand, the Soviet Foreign Minister antagonized French opinion and embarrassed the powerful French Communist Party; but he also struck a shrewd blow on behalf of Soviet prestige among the German people. In German eyes, the Soviet Union had now become the champion of German unity and the defender of German soil against annexation in the west.

To a certain extent the effect of this declaration was nullified by the reluctance of the Soviet authorities to merge their zone economically with those of the Western powers. The Soviet Union had readjusted its original policy when it became evident in the winter of 1945-46 that French obstructionism would continue. Instead of taking plant and equipment for reparations account, as per Potsdam, it switched to leaving the plants in Germany and taking out a large part of their current production. The Russians had, in effect, said to Britain and to us: "If you are going to let the French sabotage the Potsdam Agreement, we can get along very nicely without it. We have the only zone which produces more than it needs, and we can make excellent use of the surplus. You can make up deficits in your zones as long as you like."

As a matter of fact, this was painfully true. Continuation of the zonal barriers meant that, while Russia was taking out millions of dollars at one end of Germany, Britain and the United States were compelled to pour their own money in at the other end—to the tune of $500,000,000 a year.

In July 1946, Mr. Byrnes made one more effort to achieve economic unification without facing the basic issues. He offered an economic merger of the American zone—without political merger—to all of the three other powers, or to any of them. Britain alone accepted the proposal. The Soviet Union ignored it, and France made a counterproposal which amounted to polite rejection. On September 6, Mr. Byrnes moved at last toward a basic solution.

Speaking at Stuttgart in the American zone to a primarily German audience, the Secretary of State publicly declared that the Potsdam Agreement for the four-power government of Germany had so far been a failure. Although he seemed to criticize the Allied Control Council, Mr. Byrnes was well aware that this failure had been due to the absence of effective four-power policy; and that this, in turn, had been caused by the two Potsdam blunders and by our own slowness in making clear where we stood. With these facts in mind, Mr. Byrnes addressed himself to the rectification of the two Potsdam blunders and the clarification of United States policy.

The Secretary sought to put an end to French obstructionism by defining for the first time the United States position with regard to Germany's western frontier; and he placed his Government on record as insisting upon a partial readjustment of the Polish annexations in the east.

Tacitly admitting that it had become impossible to adhere to the Atlantic Charter pledge of no annexations, Mr. Byrnes conceded that the Russians should retain the northern half of East Prussia, that the Poles should retain some, but not all, of the eastern provinces, and that France should be permitted to annex the Saar coal basin. On the other hand, he firmly insisted that the Rhineland and the Ruhr should remain a part of Germany.

In taking this position, Mr. Byrnes recognized that Ruhr coal is the heart of the German economy, without which it would be impossible to create a peaceful and reasonably prosperous German nation. For security, Mr. Byrnes placed his reliance upon over-all controls of the whole German economy, rather than upon any device of artificial political or economic separation of the Ruhr.

Regarding revision of the eastern frontier, Mr. Byrnes was less specific, confining himself to a general insistence that this settlement had been made subject to the determination of a peace conference and could not be considered final. The clear implication was that some territory should be returned to Germany. Unfortunately, Mr. Byrnes did not say what territory.

Having thus moved toward clarifying at least in part what Germany the United States wanted to see recreated, Mr. Byrnes proceeded to discuss what kind of Germany he envisaged, politically and economically.

On the political side, Mr. Byrnes insisted that the Potsdam provisions for treating Germany as a whole be put into effect forthwith. He seconded the motion, previously made in July by Mr. Molotov, that a central government be established and a constitution drafted at the earliest possible date. The language in this section of his speech was regrettably vague. Some commentators, notably Russian, criticized it as advocating a weak federal government, while others, mostly American, lamented that it meant the abandonment of the federal principle in favor of an overstrong central government. Speaking at Paris on October 3, 1946, Mr. Byrnes clarified this point, stating that the United States hoped to see a central government established on the federal principle by the states.

The ambiguity of his references to the gradual withdrawal of large occupation armies gave rise to a further interpretation—probably unjust—that Mr. Byrnes thought the time had come when complete political power could safely be turned over to the Germans.

In defining United States economic policy, Mr. Byrnes reaffirmed four basic principles which had been agreed to at Potsdam by Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States. These were:

1. That Germany is to be treated as an economic entity;
2. That the German economy is to be permanently demilitarized—partly by the removal of war plants, and partly by the limitation and control of industries which create a war potential;
3. That reparations are to be taken in physical removal of designated plants and not out of current production; and
4. That the result of demilitarization and reparations should be so calculated as to leave a German economy capable of supporting a peaceful German nation on at least an average West European standard of living.

Perhaps the most important statement made by Mr. Byrnes was this: "It is not in the interest of the German people or in the interest of world peace that Germany should become a pawn or partner in a military struggle for power between the East and the West."

This statement—no doubt made in deep seriousness and sincerity—was almost entirely overlooked by commentators here and abroad. The Stuttgart speech was hailed or condemned, according to the individual commentator's point of view, as a move in a diplomatic struggle with Russia for the control of Germany. There were two major reasons for this.

The first reason was the ambiguity of Mr. Byrnes' proposals, especially with regard to the eastern frontier. Instead of specifying that he had in mind leaving the coal and industry of Upper Silesia to Poland and returning to Germany only a part of the agricultural territory, Mr. Byrnes left himself open to the interpretation—immediately made by the Poles—that he proposed to give Germany back its eastern arsenal.

The second was the unfortunate stage-management of the speech, which had the effect of making it appear to most observers as merely a maneuver in a struggle of power politics. The American press so interpreted it. In Britain, the speech received mildly favorable comment. In France, it caused consternation—and in Poland, an outburst of anti-American demonstrations.

It was not until September 16 that Mr. Molotov took cognizance of the speech at all—and then in characteristic fashion. He addressed a memorandum to the Polish Information Bureau stating that, in Russia's view, the Potsdam annexations must remain final because the Western powers had acquiesced in the expulsion of the Germans from these areas. Treating the provision for ratification by the peace conference as merely "a formal aspect of the problem," he maintained that the Potsdam decision "cannot be reversed, for the facts prove it is impossible now to do so." That was the Russian answer to Mr. Byrnes' final effort. It left the basic German tangle unchanged, for, without a return to Germany of some of its breadbasket, the whole Byrnes proposal could not be logically sustained.

The Council of Foreign Ministers' meeting in December 1946 did nothing to alter the picture. It merely fixed the date for the Moscow meeting. That was where Secretary Marshall came in.

3. THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE

Mr. Marshall and his delegation spent a little over six weeks in Moscow. The net result was utter and complete failure to reach any sort of compromise or agreement on either Germany or Austria. There was, however, one important and constructive achievement. Whereas previous conferences on Germany had merely skirted or evaded the issues to such an extent that none of the four participants had ever clearly and precisely defined its position, this conference did produce a more or less precise understanding of what the major disagreements were. This was in large measure due to Mr. Marshall's own clarity in presenting the United States' point of view in a series of admirably precise statements and his tenacious insistence upon like precision from the other three Foreign Ministers.

The issues were reported to the American people by the Secretary of State upon his return. (See Appendix, page 49.) After first explaining the over-all importance of German coal in the whole European recovery picture, with particular emphasis upon French requirements, the Secretary listed the major points of disagreement with regard to Germany and Austria.

The obstacles to agreement on Germany were: first, as to the nature and power of a new central German government; second, as to the nature and limits of a unified German economy; third, as to reparations; fourth, as to boundaries; and fifth, as to what nations should participate in the making of the German settlement.

In most of these matters, there had been substantial agreement between Britain and the United States. The French position remained different from that of the Anglo-Americans in that the French continued to demand decentralization amounting to partition, with particular emphasis on the separation of the Ruhr, and special consideration for France in the allocation of Ruhr coal. Britain and the United States were prepared to grant the French demand to annex the Saar. Russia rejected it.

The Soviet representatives had demanded: first, a more highly centralized German government than contemplated by the United States and Britain, with greater participation by labor and political organizations as such; second, the nullification of the Anglo-American bizonal merger and agreement as to continuing reparations out of production as a pre-condition to economic unification; third, the freezing of the German frontiers as fixed at Potsdam; fourth, reparations for the Soviet Union in the amount of $10,000,000,000; and fifth, the exclusion from the peace negotiations of countries which did not actually participate in the fighting against Germany.

Failing to reach agreement on any of these issues, Mr. Marshall reported that he had tried to secure at least the adoption of Mr. Byrnes' four-power pact to guarantee continued demilitarization of Germany. The Russians, however, had attached to this treaty a series of amendments by which the amended treaty would have settled in their favor practically all the major matters of contention.

The report on Austria was equally discouraging. The chief difficulties here were again reparations and, even more, the question of which former German assets in Austria were properly subject to Soviet seizure under the Potsdam Agreement. The Western Allies sought to exclude Austrian assets seized by the Germans under duress; the Russians insisted upon including them, which would have given the Soviet Union permanent control over the economic life of Austria.

Perhaps the most basic point of disagreement between the Soviet Union and the Western powers was that involved in an apparently real misunderstanding as to what reparations had been agreed upon at Yalta. The Russians insisted that they had obtained agreement in principle to payment of $10,000,000,000 from Germany. They clung to this demand, even though it must have become clear to them that it could never have been the intention of either Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Churchill that reparations to Russia should be paid out of a continuing Anglo-American subsidy. It is my own opinion that, in meeting this position, the Anglo-American negotiators at Moscow showed very little resourcefulness or imagination. There was, it seems to me, room for a compromise proposal—one which would have provided that Russia should receive reparations whenever the Anglo-American subsidies were no longer necessary and past subsidies should have been repaid. Mr. Marshall did put forward a counterproposal which tended slightly in this direction, but its scope was too limited to make it of any value in bridging the gap.

In concluding his report, Secretary Marshall expressed the view that "we must not compromise on great principles in order to achieve agreement for agreement's sake. Also, we must sincerely try to understand the point of view of those with whom we differ."

He revealed to the American people that in his private talk with Generalissimo Stalin the latter had expressed the view that "these were only the first skirmishes and brushes of reconnaissance forces" and that "after people had exhausted themselves in dispute, they then recognized the necessity of compromise . . . that compromises were possible on all the main questions . . . it was necessary to have patience and not become pessimistic."

To this statement Secretary Marshall reported his own reaction. "I sincerely hope," he said, "that the Generalissimo is correct in the view he expressed and that it implies a greater spirit of co-operation by the Soviet delegation in future conferences. But we cannot ignore the factor of time involved here. The recovery of Europe has been far slower than had been expected. Disintegrating forces are becoming evident. The patient is sinking while the doctors deliberate. So I believe that action cannot await compromise through exhaustion. New issues arise daily. Whatever action is necessary to meet these pressing problems must be taken without delay."

In his clear, clipped summary, the Secretary confined himself to an orderly factual presentation. He showed little effect of the prolonged and trying acrimony which had pervaded the Moscow discussions. Only once did he refer to the tactics employed by his chief adversary.

"At Moscow," he said, "propaganda appeals to passion and prejudice appeared to take the place of reason and understanding. Charges were made by the Soviet delegation and interpretation given to Potsdam and other agreements, which varied completely from the facts as factually known by the American delegation. There was naturally much uncertainty regarding the real intention or motives of the various proposals submitted or of the objections taken to the proposals. This," he philosophically concluded, "is inevitable in any international negotiation."

The real intentions and motives were, I think, not entirely obscure. From the Soviet point of view, Mr. Truman had on March 12 adopted the Churchill formula and declared ideological and political war. Whatever might have been the Kremlin's intentions with regard to Germany when the Moscow Conference opened on March 10, two days later Germany had become merely one of many battle fronts upon which this cold war would have to be fought. Undoubtedly, the Russians figured that time would be on their side and that, if European recovery were sufficiently delayed, the confidently expected collapse of the whole Western capitalistic system would solve their problem. The Russians had been difficult precisely because they wanted to be difficult and to delay a solution. Meanwhile, they sought to use the Conference as another convenient sounding-board for their propaganda to Germany and to other parts of the world.

Where Mr. Marshall failed was in sticking too closely to the agenda on Germany and Austria, instead of using the Conference as an opportunity to explore the possibilities of reaching an over-all understanding with the Soviet Union. Mr. Marshall did precisely what Mr. Byrnes should have done and failed to do in 1946; that is, he tried to grapple with what had originally been the central problem of the European peace. But the trouble was that Germany was no longer the key log in the log jam. A settlement in Germany had become dependent upon a world-wide understanding between the Soviet Union and the United States.

CHAPTER FIVE

Return to Reason

1. THE ACHESON SPEECH

THE SHOCK of the Truman pronouncement and the subsequent failure of the Moscow Conference left the whole world in a state of acute anxiety. The two giants—Russia and the United States—seemed headed toward a collision which neither wanted yet neither seemed able to avoid—a collision in which even the most innocent bystanders would quite obviously be maimed if not destroyed.

And then, suddenly, a ray of light and hope cut through the somber darkness. On May 8, at the little-known town of Cleveland, Mississippi, Dean Acheson, then Undersecretary of State, delivered an address on "The Requirements of Reconstruction" before an organization known as the Delta Council. This speech marked what might have been a major turning point in United States foreign policy. (See Appendix, page 52.)

Mr. Acheson presented what he called "the basic facts of life with which we are primarily concerned today in the conduct of foreign relations."

He outlined, first of all, the staggering disparity which had come about between production in the United States and that of the rest of the world. Three factors had caused this, he said: the devastation and dislocation of war; unforeseen disasters in the shape of abnormal winters, droughts, and floods; and the fact that the two great workshops of Europe and Asia—Germany and Japan—were held idle by the absence of peace settlements.

The Undersecretary then outlined the postwar relief efforts of the Administration through the various international agencies. He pointed out that mere relief could not solve the problem of unbalanced world production. He showed that in 1947 the United States would export about $16,000,000,000 worth of goods—four times its prewar export and about one-twelfth of its huge 1947 production. At the same time, he pointed out that United States imports were running at only about half the total of exports, leaving an export surplus of $8,000,000,000. "How," Mr. Acheson asked, "are foreigners going to get the United States dollars to cover this huge difference? And how are they going to get the dollars to cover a likely difference of nearly the same amount next year?"

Having pointed out these "facts of life," Mr. Acheson translated them into a program of necessary action.

First, he said, we must increase our imports to the maximum extent. To make this possible we must reduce our tariffs. That was why the Geneva Conference must succeed in establishing an International Trade Organization and in working out reciprocal agreements for the reduction of barriers to trade.

Second, we must undertake further emergency financing of foreign purchases and of foreign reconstruction.

Third, "Since world demand exceeds our ability to supply, we must concentrate our emergency assistance in areas where it will be most effective in building world political and economic stability, in promoting human freedom and democratic institutions, in fostering liberal trade policies, and in strengthening the authority of the United Nations." (I shall comment on this paragraph in a moment.)

Fourth, Acheson said, we must push ahead with the reconstruction of Germany and Japan—if necessary even without four-power agreement.

And finally, "We must give our Government certain executive powers over the domestic sale, transportation, and exportation of a limited list of commodities."

This speech contained more sound sense than any previous utterance on postwar foreign policy by an American official. Nevertheless, it contained one serious flaw.

In his third proposal—namely, that for applying our aid selectively—Mr. Acheson said that we would have to concentrate our efforts in areas where it would be deemed most effective according to five standards of judgment: 1. In creating world political stability; 2. In creating world economic stability; 3. In promoting human freedom and democratic institutions; 4. In fostering liberal trading policies; and 5. In strengthening the authority of the United Nations.

Certainly there could be no quarrel with concentrating our aid where it would best promote world economic stability, nor where it would strengthen the United Nations. But such phrases as "creating political stability," "promoting human freedom and democratic institutions," and "fostering liberal trading policies" were unfortunate reminders of the Truman message and the Truman speech at Baylor University. The succeeding paragraph, which I shall quote, suggested that, in spite of his truly constructive contribution, Mr. Acheson was still only clarifying, amplifying, and improving—but not completely rejecting—the Truman Doctrine. The paragraph reads as follows:

> This [proposal for selective concentration of effort] is merely common sense and sound practice. It is in keeping with the policy announced by President Truman on March 12 on aid to Greece and Turkey. Free peoples who are seeking to preserve their independence and democratic institutions and human freedoms against totalitarian pressures, either internal or external, will receive top priority for American reconstruction aid. This is no more than frank recognition, as President Truman said, "that totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples by direct or indirect aggression undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States."

The Moscow Conference had clearly shown—if it had not been sufficiently demonstrated before—that "human freedom" and "democratic institutions" were subjective terms. In a discussion between Washington and Moscow, they either meant nothing whatsoever, or else they meant one thing to Moscow and quite another to Washington. A declaration by the United States that it would give priority in economic assistance on the basis of these terms could only mean that we would aid those countries which conformed to our idea of what the terms meant. In other words, that we would use our preponderant economic strength to enforce our concept of "human freedom" and our concept of "democratic institutions."

The same thing is true of the phrase "liberal trading policies," which harks back to the President's speech at Baylor University. It meant that we would aid only those countries which conformed, or promised in future to conform, to our interpretation of what constituted liberal trade policies. According to Mr. Truman, this implied leaving the direction of international trade in the hands of private individual initiative. It ruled out countries in which governments directed or controlled the flow of trade. It is almost certain that Mr. Acheson did not mean to rule out Britain or France or other non-communist countries where the government did control or direct the flow of trade and would necessarily continue to do so for some time. He probably considered this in the nature of a temporary disease or aberration. But this is not what he said.

It was the same old trouble of not wanting to call a spade a spade. Both Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson, in this one passage, were really saying that we would help those countries which would side with us against the Soviet Union, and that we would not help countries which sided with the Soviet Union against us.

In spite of these remnants of the Administration's earlier confused thinking, the Acheson speech, taken as a whole, represented a great step forward in American foreign policy. It was immediately so interpreted in most of Europe. Curiously enough, it was scarcely noticed in the American press until after the European reaction aroused a belated realization of its importance. The entire world breathed a sigh of relief. The unfortunate passage upon which I have commented went almost unnoticed in the general rejoicing over the change of over-all emphasis from emotional anti-Soviet crusading to a common-sense approach to economic reconstruction.

Unfortunately, the original Truman Doctrine was still kept in the forefront of the news by the continuing debate in Congress until the Greek aid bill was finally passed and signed by the President on May 22.

The anti-communist Truman Doctrine produced two important results in Europe. On May 7, the French Government of Premier Ramadier dropped the Communist Ministers from the Cabinet. On June 1, the de Gasperi Government in Italy followed suit. This ended in both countries the postwar united front which had grown out of the resistance movements.

Meanwhile, there had been a healthy reaction in England against the Truman Doctrine and its Churchillian implications—a reaction which clearly showed that Britain would not willingly accept a role of dependence upon the United States and would seek rather to steer an independent middle course between the United States and the Soviet Union.

After his return from Moscow, Secretary Marshall was kept busy reorganizing the Department. Robert A. Lovett replaced Dean Acheson as Undersecretary. A planning board was set up under the leadership of the Russian expert, George Kennan.

At this time, Latin-American affairs also came in for some attention. The long-pending wrangle over Argentine policy was liquidated by the resignation of both Assistant Secretary Braden and Ambassador Messersmith. This seemed to indicate a friendlier United States attitude toward the neo-fascist Government of Perón. The veteran Norman Armour returned as Assistant Secretary. And the President asked Congress to pass a bill providing for military collaboration with the other countries of this hemisphere. The standardization of training, equipment, and organization of the armed services of the American Republics had long been a pet project of our military leaders. It seemed to rest upon the strange assumption that we could count upon the Latin-American Republics as friends, irrespective of whether they had democratic, semi-fascist, or fascist governments. Our previous policy had rested upon the pronouncement by Secretary Hull in April 1944 that "we have moved from an easy tolerance of evil institutions to the realization that free governments and Nazi or fascist governments cannot exist together in this world." Apparently we had now changed our minds.

Another sign of ill omen was the re-emergence as an influence in foreign policy of former President Herbert Hoover. Mr. Truman had asked him, in the preceding winter, to go abroad and present his views on the European food situation and on the problem of Germany. Now Mr. Hoover blossomed forth with a letter to Congressman Taber, putting forward a proposal that, failing immediate agreement with the Soviet Union, the United States and other friendly nations should proceed to make a separate peace with both Germany and Japan. (Appendix, page 54.) Mr. Hoover did not indulge in subjective terms like "freedom" and "democracy." He got down to brass tacks, stating in so many words that what the United States ought to do was to make the world safe for laissez-faire capitalism. The trouble with Europe, according to Mr. Hoover, was that "in reaching for Utopia" virtually every country had embraced some form of "collectivism," and that shortened hours of work and "loss of initiative in the managerial class" were retarding recovery. This meant, in effect, the same thing as Mr. Churchill's Fulton speech—namely, backing a return to power of European conservatism, both as a thing to be desired in itself and as a way of combatting the Soviet Union. Moreover, Mr. Hoover proclaimed the thesis that we should help get Europe back upon its feet only if it was not too expensive—a thesis reminiscent of his pre-Pearl Harbor isolationism.

Meanwhile, the Kremlin had remained strangely silent—though not inactive. Its verbal response to the Truman utterances had been made in the intransigence displayed at the Moscow Conference. But other wheels were in motion, and now things began to happen in Hungary. Using the established techniques of communist penetration, a so-called reactionary plot was discovered, the elected middle-of-the-road Government was forced to resign, and a new "democratic" regime installed. Whatever the case against the Nagy Government, the ruthless and extra-constitutional tactics employed by the Hungarian Communists led President Truman to make one of his ill-timed little outbursts of unconsidered emotion. His denunciation of the Hungarian coup as "a terrible outrage" was an unhappy example of what a well-known commentator had called the Truman habit of first shaking his fist, then shaking his finger, and finally ending up by shaking his head. Nevertheless, the Presidential outburst stole the banner headlines of June 6 from a far more important pronouncement made on the preceding day by his Secretary of State.

2. MARSHALL AT HARVARD

Speaking at Harvard University on June 5, Mr. Marshall took up where Mr. Acheson had left off a month earlier. (See Appendix, page 55.) He outlined the precarious state of affairs in Europe and the various factors which had delayed recovery. He emphasized especially the danger arising from shortage of consumer goods—particularly those needed as an incentive to work—and lack of confidence in the various currencies, which caused farmers to withhold their food production from normal channels.

The truth of the matter is [he said] that Europe's requirements for the next three or four years of foreign food and other essential products—principally from America—are so much greater than her present ability to pay that she must have substantial additional help, or face economic, social, and political deterioration of a very grave character.

The remedy lies in breaking the vicious circle and restoring the confidence of the European people in the economic future of their own countries and of Europe as a whole. The manufacturer and the farmer throughout wide areas must be able and willing to exchange their products for currencies, the continuing value of which is not open to question.

Aside from the demoralizing effect on the world at large and the possibilities of disturbances arising as a result of the desperation of the people concerned, the consequences to the economy of the United States should be apparent to all. It is logical that the United States should do whatever it is able to do to assist in the return of normal economic health in the world, without which there can be no political stability and no assured peace.

Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos. Its purpose should be the revival of a working economy in the world so as to permit the emergence of political and social conditions in which free institutions can exist. Such assistance, I am convinced, must not be on a piecemeal basis as various crises develop. Any assistance that this Government may render in the future should provide a cure rather than a mere palliative.

Any government that is willing to assist in the task of recovery will find full co-operation, I am sure, on the part of the United States Government. Any government which maneuvers to block the recovery of other countries cannot expect help from us. Furthermore, governments, political parties, or groups which seek to perpetuate human misery in order to profit therefrom politically or otherwise will encounter the opposition of the United States.

It is already evident that, before the United States Government can proceed much further in its efforts to alleviate the situation and help start the European world on its way to recovery, there must be some agreement among the countries of Europe as to the requirements of the situation and the part those countries themselves will take in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be undertaken by this Government. It would be neither fitting nor efficacious for this Government to undertake to draw up unilaterally a program designed to place Europe on its feet economically. This is the business of the Europeans. The initiative, I think, must come from Europe. The role of this country should consist of friendly aid in the drafting of a European program and of later support of such a program so far as it may be practical for us to do so. The program should be a joint one, agreed to by a number, if not all European nations.

An essential part of any successful action on the part of the United States is an understanding on the part of the people of America of the character of the problem and the remedies to be applied. Political passion and prejudice should have no part. With foresight, and a willingness on the part of our people to face up to the vast responsibility which history has clearly placed upon our country, the difficulties I have outlined can and will be overcome.

The Marshall speech was immediately acclaimed here at home and throughout Western Europe. It seemed to denote a definite change toward a positive policy of promoting reconstruction and recovery everywhere, as against a negative policy dictated by fear of Soviet expansion. This impression was strengthened a week later by a speech delivered at Ottawa by President Truman, the important passages of which were:

At this critical point in history, we of the United States are deeply conscious of our responsibilities to the world. We know that in this trying period, between a war that is over and a peace that is not yet secure, the destitute and the oppressed of the earth look chiefly to us for sustenance and support until they can again face life with self-confidence and self-reliance.

We are keenly aware that much depends upon the internal strength, the economic stability, and the moral stamina of the United States. We face the challenge with determination and confidence.

Free men everywhere know that the purpose of the United States is to restore the world to health and to re-establish conditions in which the common people of the earth can work out their salvation by their own efforts.

We seek a peaceful world, a prosperous world, a free world, a world of good neighbors, living on terms of equality and mutual respect, as Canada and the United States have lived for generations.

We intend to expend our energies and invest our substance in promoting world recovery by assisting those who are able and willing to make their maximum contributions to the same cause.

We intend to support those who are determined to govern themselves in their own way, and who honor the right of others to do likewise.

We intend to aid those who seek to live at peace with their neighbors, without coercing or being coerced, without intimidating or being intimidated.

We intend to uphold those who respect the dignity of the individual, who guarantee him equal treatment under law, and who allow him the widest possible liberty to work out his own destiny and achieve success to the limit of his capacity.

We intend to co-operate actively and loyally with all who honestly seek, as we do, to build a better world in which mankind can live in peace and prosperity.

Certainly this was a very much milder tone than the March 12 message.

The Administration seemed to have recognized two basic misconceptions in its earlier policy. It seemed to have learned:

First, that the real threat to peace was not the communist idea but the existence of conditions which make men in distress turn to any remedy which offers apparent relief from intolerable fear, want, and oppression.

And second, that an idea cannot be stopped by physical force nor at any physical frontier, no matter how strongly fortified.

If it was true that these lessons had been learned—and this was by no means certain—it seemed of the utmost importance that the drastic change be encouragingly recognized both here and abroad. Here is the essence of a contemporary broadcast made in the hope of contributing toward that realization.

"On March 12, President Truman, in his now famous message to Congress, proposed one foreign policy. More recently, the Secretary of State has put forward another and quite different proposal. Whereas the Truman Doctrine apparently abandoned the concept of One World and blew the bugle for a political and perhaps military struggle between East and West, Secretary Marshall has now announced a program of planned United States aid to all of Europe including Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. To quote his own words: 'Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation, and chaos.'

"Unfortunately, it will take time to undo the damage done by the earlier proposal and to recapture at home and abroad the confidence and support which the new program deserves and needs in order to succeed.

"Not only the Russians but people throughout the world must be brought to realize that the Truman Doctrine is dead; that the question now before the house is the Marshall program; and that the Marshall program is basically different in objective as well as in approach. The existing climate of tension and confusion has obscured our dramatic change of direction.

"It is, of course, quite possible that we may see another sudden reversal and a return to the original ideological or geopolitical emphasis. Such a regression might come about either through failure on the part of Soviet leadership to appreciate and trust the change of heart which has occurred here—or through failure on the part of our Government to stand by the principles which it has now affirmed.

"Whatever the future may hold, the fact is that the Truman Doctrine was proposed and debated in such a way as to produce heat rather than light. What we need now is the opposite kind of study and discussion.

"We have come to a moment of history rather like that which preceded the great Lend-Lease debate of early 1941, when Britain stood alone against the rising tide of Nazi conquest.

"Then we held in our hands the power which, if used, could save the world from conquest and oppression; and which, if withheld, could doom the world to slavery. Today we hold in our hands the power which, if used, can start the world on the road to economic recovery and peace; and which, if withheld, can doom the world to protracted misery and perhaps to extinction.

"There is another point of similarity. Then as now, Russia was the great unknown factor. We had to make, and did make, our Lend-Lease decision without knowing what Russia's final position in the war would be.

"The same thing is true today.

"The greatest virtue of the Marshall program—apart from its basic soundness and common-sense approach—is that by its very nature it is a co-operative program. Instead of single-handed hit-or-miss action in various parts of the world, it requires first of all a careful appraisal of the world's economic needs and resources, by those who need help and those who are able to supply it. This means that the peoples of Europe must assess their needs, establish priorities, and come to us with the result of their calculations. It means that we in turn must find out which of these needs we can supply out of surplus, which we can supply only if we produce more than we are now producing, and which we can supply only if we produce more and also consume less ourselves.

"That is where the new foreign policy involves a new domestic policy. To be effective, the Marshall program must include a careful appraisal of our national resources, of our productive capacity, and of the possibilities of increasing and redirecting a part of our productive efforts. This implies some degree of over-all economic planning and control, similar to though not as rigid and far-reaching as that which we used so successfully to win the war.

"Some of our extreme conservatives will view this prospect with alarm. It is useful to remember that these same ultra-conservatives objected to any sort of planning and control to save this nation from disaster in 1933 and again in 1941.

"The Marshall program will also greatly affect our fiscal policy. It will cost a lot of money—perhaps as much as six or seven billion dollars a year for a period of years. But we are now spending almost twice that amount each year on our military and naval budgets. These can certainly be reduced once peace is more firmly established. And even if, over the next ten years, we should spend as much as seventy billion dollars to reactivate world recovery and establish peace—which is unlikely—this huge sum would be only a fraction of what we should lose in the major depression which would follow a European collapse—only a pittance compared to what we should lose and spend in fighting another war.

"Some of our right-wing economizers and isolationists will not like spending all this money. They will scream that we are overexporting—that we are squandering our heritage on foreigners whose fate does not concern us—that, if saving the world costs too much, we had better save ourselves—forgetting that we cannot save ourselves except by helping the world to save itself. Again, these are the same voices uttering the same arguments by which they wrecked the peace after World War I, brought on the Great Depression, and thus sowed the seeds of World War II.

"Yet even from a purely selfish, nationalistic point of view, the six or seven billion dollars a year, which we shall be called upon to lend-lease for peace, will be the hottest kind of hot money if we fail to spend it. It will burn the hide off our own hands. Holding on to it means deliberately shutting off our export markets and thus deliberately creating unemployment and reduced production here at home. Holding on to it means denying to the world its only available means of getting back upon its feet. And, unless the world does get back upon its feet soon, there will be little chance of preserving human freedom anywhere—or of building an enduring peace.

"For the first time since V-J Day we, the American people, face a clearly drawn basic issue. Here it is:

"It took courage to put forward the Marshall program. Shall we make good on the promise? Shall we use our great strength to lead the world toward recovery and peace?

"Or shall we disavow the Marshall promise—as once we disavowed the Wilson promise—and, by attempting to hoard our power, render it as useless as a miser's gold?

"The Russians cannot change this issue.

"They too have a decision to make. But their decision cannot now affect our decision any more than it could in early 1941. Now as then it can only make our task infinitely easier or vastly more difficult.

"The sooner we realize this—and the sooner the Russians realize it—the better."

That was my perhaps overoptimistic interpretation at the time. . . .

The Russian decision was not long delayed.

3. MOLOTOV'S WALKOUT

The British Government acted promptly to bring about a European conference which would consider how Europe should take the initiative in applying for the aid suggested by Mr. Marshall. Messrs. Bevin and Bidault met in Paris and invited Mr. Molotov to join them in order to discuss preliminary plans. But on June 19, before the Russian reply was received, Mr. Bevin delivered a defiant speech in Parliament in which he bluntly declared that Britain would go ahead with or without the Soviet Union—and, if necessary, against it—to bring about some degree of European unity. Referring to the recent Moscow Conference, he said that he would "not be a party to holding up the economic recovery of Europe by the mess of procedure, terms of reference, or all the paraphernalia which may go with it." And then he added belligerently: "If there is to be a conflict of ideologies, I shall regret it, but if it is forced upon us we must face it."

The first Soviet reply was received the following day, in the form of a Tass dispatch saying that Mr. Molotov was studying the Anglo-French invitation, but that the Soviet Government had insufficient information about the amount of United States aid which might be expected, or "about the conditions of the credits or the relation of the United Nations to this question." Nevertheless, on June 26, Mr. Molotov arrived in Paris with a delegation of 89 assistants.

Six days later, Mr. Molotov departed in anger, leaving a stunned world to realize that it was now actually split into two openly hostile camps.

When Mr. Molotov arrived, he encountered an atmosphere of take-it-or-leave-it on the part of Mr. Bevin and of highly nervous anxiety on the part of Mr. Bidault. The latter faced certain trouble with the strong French Communist Party in the event of his failure to reach agreement with Moscow. Bevin and Bidault had already prepared procedural suggestions including the appointment of several committees. They approached the matter from the point of view of producing an over-all European balance sheet by means of which the combined needs of the various countries would be balanced against their combined resources and the ultimate deficit presented to the United States. The reasons for this procedure were: first, that it seemed to be what Mr. Marshall had indicated; second, that there seemed to be no other way to base an application to the United States upon already functioning mutual aid and self-help; and third, that a piecemeal, country-by-country appeal for aid would almost certainly run afoul of political considerations in the American Congress.

Mr. Molotov's position boiled down to this:

First: The Anglo-French proposal constituted an infringement upon national sovereignty and an inadmissible interference in the internal affairs of the European nations. The needs of each nation should, therefore, be separately ascertained.

Second: There should be a distinction between former Allied, neutral, and enemy states. Those countries which had suffered German occupation and which had aided the Allied cause should receive first priority.

Third: The German problem must be treated as an entirely separate matter and by the Council of Foreign Ministers. It should not come before this conference.

Mr. Bidault tried hard to induce Mr. Molotov to consider a compromise proposal and to reassure him that the Anglo-French plan would not permit the invasion of the sovereign rights of the participating nations. Mr. Molotov's reply was merely to repeat his objections and to add a surly warning that the Anglo-French plan would divide Europe, would bring the recipients of American aid under American domination, and would have "nothing in common with the real interests of the peoples of Europe."

Mr. Bevin denounced Mr. Molotov's objections as "based on a complete travesty of the facts and a complete misrepresentation of everything the British Government had submitted." He and Mr. Bidault declared that they now intended immediately to go ahead with the proposed plan without Soviet participation. Mr. Molotov departed.

The next day Britain and France issued an invitation to twenty-two European nations, omitting only Spain and the Soviet Union.

For a short time after Mr. Molotov's departure, it looked as if at least some of the so-called Russian satellites might accept and attend the Conference. The Czechs and Poles had already expressed great interest. Finland, too, seemed anxious to participate. On July 8, Foreign Minister Masaryk of Czechoslovakia announced that his country would be represented at Paris. This was tactlessly hailed in the West as a break with the Soviet Union. Two days later, the Czech Government reversed its position.

On July 12, the Conference convened with sixteen nations participating: Britain, France, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, Holland, Belgium, Luxemburg, Eire, Switzerland, Austria, Portugal, Italy, Greece, and Turkey. The nations which had declined were: the Soviet Union, Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Finland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Albania.

It would seem to have been quite possible for Mr. Molotov to have chosen a different course of action. He did not have to force a division of Europe into two hostile camps, thus creating the very "Western Bloc" which the Soviet Union had seemed rightly anxious to avoid; he could have sought to reach some modification of the proposal, instead of merely denouncing it and going home. Had he done so, he would either have obtained an acceptable compromise or, failing that, remained in a position to obstruct a program which he considered undesirable. As a matter of fact, he could have accepted almost any compromise—or even the original proposal—and have confidently relied upon the American Congress to repudiate it. I say this because I, for one, can scarcely believe that a Congress deliberately inflamed with hostility by Mr. Truman would have voted funds for any plan which included aid to the Soviet Union. This was the very great risk which Mr. Marshall had so courageously taken. Mr. Molotov's departure from Paris probably saved the United States from re-enacting the tragic repudiation of Wilson in 1919.

Even after he had left the Conference himself, it would still have been possible for Mr. Molotov to cause serious embarrassment to Mr. Marshall if he had encouraged Poland and Czechoslovakia to participate in the plan and to apply for a share of American aid. It seems very doubtful that Congress would have passed a plan which involved beneficiaries belonging to the Soviet orbit. Thus, Mr. Molotov had, and missed, a chance of proving to the world that the Marshall Plan —though intended by its author as a definite departure from the anti-Soviet Truman Doctrine—could actually obtain Congressional approval only if it were turned back into the Truman Doctrine. Mr. Molotov flatly assumed and asserted that the Marshall Plan was still in effect an anti-Soviet proposal. In making this assumption, he absolved Mr. Marshall of the dangerously difficult task of getting Congress to prove the contrary. Some of Mr. Marshall's own associates in the Department heaved an almost audible sigh of relief.

Why did Mr. Molotov take Mr. Marshall off the hook? Why did he do the very thing which would make it practically certain that the Marshall Plan could become a reality?

There were probably several reasons. To begin with, it is not hard to understand that Mr. Molotov was irritated by the proprietory, take-it-or-leave-it attitude of Mr. Bevin. This would scarcely have determined so far-reaching a decision, but it may well have influenced the abrupt manner in which it was taken.

More important—the plan as presented would have made every participating country open its books and lay its economic cards on the table. This was probably something that the Soviet Union did not wish to do—partly out of a sense of weakness and false national pride, partly because the Kremlin may not yet have been ready to take its own people fully into its confidence, and partly because the Kremlin considered secrecy about economic affairs a necessary part of military security.

Finally, it is by no means certain that it ever occurred to Mr. Molotov that the course he chose to follow was the one action needed to make the dreaded Marshall Plan a reality. In spite of all their elaborate intelligence-gathering machinery, the Russians are apparently not very good at evaluating the mass of information they receive, nor particularly adept at understanding the psychology of Western peoples. The same thing is very likely true of us in reverse.

Over and above all these possible explanations for what seems a serious tactical blunder on the part of Mr. Molotov, there is, of course, the overriding consideration of the context in which the Marshall proposal was put forward. No responsible American official had ever explicitly repudiated the Truman Doctrine, nor the Baylor speech, nor Mr. Acheson's theory of selectivity. The only specific evidence of repudiation of an anti-Soviet policy had been Mr. Marshall's one sentence: "Our policy is not directed against any country or doctrine. . . ." I happen to have believed at the time, and still believe, that Mr. Marshall meant what he said, and that he did not say more, simply because a Secretary of State does not explicitly repudiate his President. But, as against this one sentence spoken by the Secretary of State, there must have been thousands upon thousands of words transmitted to Moscow reporting the hostile utterances of Senators and Congressmen, of Cabinet officials and/or irresponsible private citizens of prominence. Mr. Molotov's assumption—no matter how untrue or how unfortunate—was not an unnatural assumption for a naturally suspicious man to make.

And so the short chapter in United States foreign policy which one might call "Return to Reason" ended with the Soviet Union walking out and slamming the door.

CHAPTER SIX

The Period of Deployment

MR. MOLOTOV'S WALKOUT ended the slim chance that the Marshall Plan might become a true European Recovery Program and made certain that, if it materialized at all, it would be merely a plan to promote the recovery of Western Europe. Mr. Molotov's walkout likewise made it certain that anti-communism would be the chief motivation for a possible Congressional acceptance of a plan to promote Western European recovery. Finally, the withdrawal of the Soviet Union and of the countries of Eastern Europe meant that any hope of reaching an understanding on Germany and Austria at the next meeting of the Foreign Ministers in November had vanished.

The world was now clearly entering upon a period during which no basic decisions could be reached until each side had deployed its full strength and had an opportunity to appraise the fully deployed strength of the other.

A straight chronological treatment of this period would be confusing. It will better serve our purpose to consider separately first the development of Western deployment and then the unfolding of Eastern strategy and strength. It is no accident that military terms most readily serve to describe this phase of recent history.

1. DEPLOYMENT OF THE WEST

A. THREE TRUTHS IGNORED

Immediately after the departure of the Soviet Foreign Minister, the sixteen Western nations set about working out their proposal to the United States. Their frame of reference was to develop and document a four-year plan for their own economic recovery, based upon the maximum of self-help on the part of each participant, the maximum of mutual aid among the participants, and a final appeal to the United States for help in meeting gradually diminishing deficits.

In starting out upon this task, the sixteen nations immediately became acutely conscious of three facts which stood in contradiction to their terms of reference.

First: It was apparent that, no matter what the political situation, Western Europe simply did not exist as an economic entity with which a realistic plan might deal. All of Europe was one trading community—one economic entity—in which the Eastern countries habitually supplied food and raw materials while the Western nations absorbed the Eastern surplus raw products, providing manufactured articles in return. Any plan for West European recovery would, therefore, have to presuppose at least some exchange of goods and services across the line which now was drawn from Stettin in the north to Trieste in the south. Unless it did presuppose such trade, a West European plan would show a recurring annual deficit so large that it would be quite unrealistic to assume that the United States would care to meet it.

Second: It was equally apparent that any plan numbering Britain, France, Belgium, Portugal, and the Netherlands among its sixteen participants would have to be a plan not merely for Western Europe but for large parts of Africa and Asia as well. As a matter of fact, one of the first moves made by the conferees was to lay down the principle that the countries possessing empires or colonies must be considered as units including such non-European possessions. Without such an assumption, it was clear that the ultimate deficits would reach impossible proportions.

Third: The conferees were forced to recognize that any figures they might arrive at would in the last analysis be meaningless unless prices in the United States were going to be held at a reasonably stable level. The European nations needed not just money, but goods of all sorts, the largest part of which they would have to purchase in the United States. Since the over-all plan had to be expressed in dollars, it would have to rest upon the assumption that the purchasing power of the borrowed dollars would not decline appreciably during the life of the planned program.

These three considerations should have been of immediate and important significance to the men who were shaping American policy on this side of the water. They led inescapably to three conclusions:

1. The Marshall Plan must be accompanied by an American political policy designed not only to make trade across the so-called Iron Curtain possible but to stimulate it to the maximum extent. This would require a considerable campaign of public education, especially in view of the fact that anti-communism had so far supplied most of the fuel to keep Mr. Marshall's pot boiling.

2. The question of United States aid to Asia and other parts of the world could not be simply brushed aside on the theory of "first things first." Parts of Asia and Africa were inextricably involved in any plan for Western Europe. As such, they were part of the first things that came first. Unless this were foreseen and diligently explained to the American people, the economically irrelevant but politically explosive question of China would be sure to arise and confuse the issue.

3. Finally, any American program designed to make the Marshall promise a reality must be accompanied by a program of effective domestic inflation controls. This again required a carefully thought-out program of action and a campaign of education to support such action—especially in view of the approaching election.

Unfortunately, it took months before the United States Government came to draw these conclusions. By that time the fat was in the Congressional fire. In part, this was because the conclusions were politically unpalatable. In part, it was due to other developments which took place while the West European plan was being shaped—developments which demanded immediate attention and action.

B. SLOW MOTION IN WASHINGTON

The first of these events was the British sterling crisis. Not only were Britain's borrowed dollars running out, for reasons already discussed (i.e., the severe winter and the American price rise), but July 15, 1947, was the day upon which Britain had promised to lift currency controls and make the pound sterling freely convertible. No sooner had the British fulfilled this promise than a run started on sterling which drained the British Treasury of almost its last foreign exchange resources. It was not until August 20 that, by agreement with the United States Government, exchange controls were finally reimposed. But in the meantime a severe shock had been administered not only to Britain but to the entire West European economy. Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, our Ambassador in Britain, had been warning of just such a development for months.

Moreover, it was plainly evident to Mr. Douglas—and for that matter to any reasonably intelligent observer—that some of the Western European countries would need stopgap aid in substantial amounts long before the long-range Marshall Plan could become a reality. Here again, Washington was almost incredibly slow to react. The danger signals were flying in July, warning that a widespread drought might finish what the abnormal winter had begun in destroying the 1947 crops. Yet it was not until September 3, long after the worst fears were realized, that Undersecretary of State Lovett publicly recognized the growing crisis and told the American people, "It is later than we think."

One reason for the delay was that Congress was in recess, several of its committees were traveling in Europe to acquire firsthand information, and both the President and the Secretary of State were in Brazil attending the Western Hemisphere Conference. Mr. Marshall arrived back in Washington by plane on September 3, having told the Latin-American countries that the United States recovery plan did not at present include economic assistance for any nations outside of Western Europe. On September 10, the Secretary endorsed Mr. Lovett's statement on the European crisis and announced that the facts and figures concerning interim aid would be ready for the Congressional committees by the end of October. On the same day, President Truman, boarding the battleship Missouri for a leisurely trip home, let it be known that, in his judgment, there was "nothing on the horizon to require a quick return to the United States."

I was in Europe at the time—a Europe which realized that it would literally starve and freeze to death in the coming winter unless American aid were quickly forthcoming. I can only say that it was both difficult and embarrassing for an American to explain that it was lack of understanding rather than apathy which caused this unbelievable slow-motion performance.

On September 29, the President finally announced that France, Italy, and Austria would need interim aid amounting to $580,000,000 to see them through until March 31, 1948, by which time the recovery program would presumably be in action. He said that he "was writing"—not telegraphing—the chairmen of the various Congressional committees asking them to call their committees in October. Meantime, a Citizens Committee for the Voluntary Conservation of Food was appointed and the famous meatless Tuesdays and poultryless Thursdays were put into effect. The President evoked the impression of a man, reluctantly aroused from slumber, shooting in a leisurely manner at a charging elephant with a bean-shooter.

The New York Herald Tribune observed that Mr. Truman had "apparently elected to sit tight and hope for a miracle which would relieve him of the necessity of making a decision that might prove politically unpopular." The New York Times commented more sedately: "The Marshall Plan, temporary aid, food conservation and price controls cannot be more than dreams without popular support and understanding. These cannot be enlisted without courage, conviction and leadership which, it appears, are not to be had from President Truman."

It was not until October 23 that the President finally made up his mind to call an extraordinary session of Congress. (See Appendix, page 66.) He issued the call for November 17. In doing so, he provided one agreeable surprise—he grasped the nettle of domestic inflation controls at the same time that he finally came down off the fence on the necessity for quick Congressional action. Unfortunately, the value of this politically courageous decision was impaired by another one of those ill-considered press conference remarks made a few days earlier. The President, when asked whether he was considering rationing and price controls, had characterized these two primary means for controlling inflation as "methods of a police state."

The special session convened on November 17. In his message on the opening day (Appendix, page 76), President Truman stated a forthright case for granting $597,000,000 of interim aid to France, Italy, and Austria. He coupled this request with a plea for extensive powers to the Executive with which to control the rising inflation in this country. Among other powers, such as that to control exports, speculation on the commodity exchanges, transportation and shipping facilities, he asked for the power to apply, if necessary, the very methods he had condemned as "the methods of a police state"—namely, price controls, allocation, and rationing of scarce commodities.

The proposals were debated for just over a month. The Interim Aid Bill passed both Houses, in spite of a determined effort by a Republican group to earmark a substantial amount of the proposed funds for China. This group was egged on by former Ambassador Bullitt, Governor Dewey of New York, and the powerful Luce publications. At the last moment before the adjournment, on December 19, the same attack was renewed—this time successfully—on the Appropriations Bill, with the result that the total amount of interim aid was cut down to $540,000,000, with $18,000,000 earmarked for China. Thus $75,000,000 was cut off the appropriation for Europe. One of the three chickens had come home to roost.

The second chicken—failure to prepare public opinion for the need for inflation controls—likewise came home to roost in the shape of an emasculated Anti-Inflation Bill, sponsored by the Republicans under the leadership of Senator Taft. It provided the President with none of the essential powers for which he had asked.

The third omission—namely, that of failing to make Congress and the public realize that the whole Marshall program depended upon a political policy designed to stimulate rather than prevent trading with the Soviet orbit—remained to be faced in 1948.

C. THE SIXTEEN NATION REPORT

While these developments were taking place on the more immediate problem of winter aid, the Paris Conference labored over the long-range proposal. Toward the end of August, a first draft was taking shape. This showed a total deficit for the four-year program of something over $28,000,000,000. Undersecretaries Clayton and Lovett and Messrs. Kennan and Bonesteel of the State Department flew to Paris post-haste on the twenty-ninth, in order to make it clear that no such amount could be considered. They criticized the proposal as merely a compilation of "shopping lists" and insisted on a much greater emphasis upon self-help and mutual aid.

The plan was restudied and revised, the total figure being reduced to about $22,000,000,000. Mr. Clayton once more criticized the revised plan as showing insufficient co-operation among the participants, insufficient facts as to the individual nations, and a lack of provision for the convertibility of currencies and the reduction of trade barriers. The heaviest emphasis was upon the last of these criticisms. Having just come from the International Trade Conference at Geneva, where he had successfully engineered the completion of an international trade charter and the adoption of much of the United States program of "liberal trade policies," Mr. Clayton now wished to see these same policies incorporated in the recovery plan. His reasoning was much like that which had forced the fatal convertibility and nondiscrimination clauses into the British Loan Agreement of 1945.

With the British experience fresh in their minds, the European conferees were aghast. They did not wish to make the mistake, which Britain had made, of agreeing under duress to do the impossible. Yet they also did not wish to antagonize the United States or delay the completion of the plan. The result was a somewhat tongue-in-cheek agreement on the part of thirteen nations to "study the possibilities of a customs union."

The episode is important because it illustrates one of the dangerous continuing contradictions in United States policy: namely, the contradiction between wanting to see the whole economy of Western Europe carefully planned out for a number of years, while at the same time strongly objecting to any evidence of government planning or control of the economies of the individual nations. This is not only a confusion of long-range objectives with emergency ad hoc programs. It is an assertion of a predilection for laissez-faire economics together with an admission that laissez-faire economics cannot do the job with which the world is now faced.

The report of the sixteen nations was finally signed on September 20 and sent off. The experts of the sixteen nations were then invited to Washington and thoroughly cross-examined by an inter-departmental committee.

Within the next month, the report was published in full, along with the reports of three major committees appointed in June by the President to assess our own resources and the feasibility of carrying out a European Recovery Program. All four documents deserve careful study in the original. They form the basis of the plan finally proposed to Congress by President Truman in his message of December 19—the last day of the special session.

Briefly, the Sixteen Nation Report (Appendix, page 58) recorded the determination of the signatories to make every effort to raise their own production of vital goods during the next four years. Grain and cereal production was to reach the prewar level by 1951. Sugar and potatoes were to be greatly increased over prewar, with some increases in fats and oil. Coal was to reach a figure a third higher than 1947, electricity 40 per cent higher, steel 80 per cent higher, which would be 20 per cent above 1938. Oil refining was to reach two and a half times above the prewar level. The Report set forth various means for mutual help and the relaxing of trade barriers. It stated frankly that, without large supplies of food, fuel, raw material, and capital equipment from the American continent, "the whole plan will be in jeopardy." The combined deficit of the sixteen nations, plus western Germany, over the four-year period was estimated at $22,440,000,000, a small part of which might be obtained from sources other than the United States.

The sixteen nations formally stressed that the goals set in their proposal could not possibly be met unless there were trade between Eastern and Western Europe. They also stated that the soundness of their calculations depended upon a stable price level in the United States.

The Krug Committee Report (Appendix, page 62) assessed the resources of the United States and found that we were well able to render the required aid.

The Committee of Economic Experts (Appendix, page 67) stressed the danger of inflation and the need for controlling it, while stating that our refusal to aid Europe would mean industrial paralysis in this country.

The Harriman Committee (Appendix, page 69) recommended in favor of the Marshall program, warned against attaching any conditions against socialization, but placed a heavy emphasis upon anti-communism as the chief reason for undertaking the program. It also pointed out that certain items requested by the European nations could not be met in full. The most important of these reservations implicitly raised the question whether the American steel industry was actually doing its utmost to increase production or holding back in order to protect its high price and profit structure.

Besides these basic documents, there are several others which merit careful study. Particularly:

Secretary Marshall's statement to the Congressional committees of November 10 (Appendix, page 73)

The National Association of Manufacturers' release of November 10, which demanded, among other things, a ban against socialization (Appendix, page 76)

President Truman's message of November 17 (Appendix, page 76)

Senator Taft's rebuttal of November 17 (Appendix, page 79)

President Truman's message of December 19, proposing the four-year program (Appendix, page 85)

The President's message of December 19 combined the European report with the recommendations of those who had studied it and co-ordinated it with our domestic picture. It cut down certain specific items and reduced the four-year figure to $17,000,000,000, chiefly by eliminating the European request for $3,000,000,000 to stabilize currencies.

Thus ended the period of deployment of American power in the year 1947. The big battles in Congress still remained to be fought. Until they were won or lost, neither we nor the Russians would know what effective power the United States could muster for the struggle.

2. DEPLOYMENT IN THE EAST

The parallel deployment in the East was doubtless attended by discussions and debates in the Politburo closely resembling our own deliberations. Unfortunately, unlike ours, they were held in secrecy. We can, therefore, only guess at what happened. Prior to March 12, 1947, two major points of view were very likely represented. The one would be the orthodox Marxist-Leninist view that a conflict with the chief exponent and bulwark of "capitalist imperialism" was unavoidable; this would lead to the truculent intransigence typified by Mr. Molotov. The other view, sometimes publicly expressed by Stalin, would be that the socialist U.S.S.R. and the capitalist U.S.A. could live peacefully in the same world; this would lead to a policy of conciliation.

In the constant clash of these viewpoints, one may be sure that there was frequent speculation as to what might be the real intentions of the United States, much as we were speculating about the real intentions of the Soviet Union. Conjectures about the United States would very likely be confused by Russian inability to distinguish between official statements of American policy by responsible statesmen and unofficial pronouncements by irresponsible former statesmen, would-be statesmen, or private groups. Moreover, American intentions would be appraised through the eyes of men accustomed to purposeful deviousness and conspiracy rather than to straightforward expression of diverse opinion.

The effect of the Truman Doctrine upon the Politburo must obviously have been to strengthen the hands of the irreconcilables and to weaken the arguments of the moderates. Subsequent events clearly show that this is what actually happened. Before the Marshall speech of June 5 was ever made, the Politburo had almost certainly decided upon a plan of counteraction. There seems no doubt whatsoever that the subsequent and very different approach by Secretary Marshall was taken by the Kremlin as merely a more skillful implementation of the Truman Doctrine. This may have been partly because no clear disavowal of the Truman Doctrine had accompanied the Marshall program; perhaps even more because the Russians had by this time made up and closed their minds.

Be that as it may, Mr. Molotov went into action. The Moscow Conference on Germany was wrecked. Trade negotiations with Britain were broken off. A Hungarian coup was engineered. The Paris Conference was left talking to itself about Western Europe instead of concerning itself with all of Europe. Increasing pressure was exerted within Austria, Poland, Bulgaria, Rumania, and even Czechoslovakia. Finally, at the Assembly of the United Nations in September, Mr. Vishinsky launched into protracted vitriolic denunciation and abuse of the Western powers and especially of the United States.

The economic aspects of what was soon to develop into the Molotov Plan began to assume shape and substance, in the form of bilateral trade treaties between the Soviet Union and the various countries in the Soviet orbit. The details of these treaties were carefully kept secret, but enough information leaked out to show that some of them at least were very far from satisfactory to the smaller countries.

On October 5 the formation of the "Cominform" was announced (Appendix, page 60). This was to be a permanent co-ordinating committee of the Communist Parties of the U.S.S.R., Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia plus the Communist Parties of France and Italy. The activities of these nine Communist Parties were already only too well co-ordinated. Most of them were dominated by men trained in Moscow. Clearly, more was intended than mere co-ordination. One sentence in the Manifesto provided an interesting clue. "The main danger for the working class at this moment," it said, "lies in the underestimation of its own strength and the overestimation of the force of the imperialist camp." This was an expression of fear. The Marshall Plan—seen by Moscow as a logical development of the Truman Doctrine—had struck a far more jumpy nerve than the original Truman pronouncement. It is important to understand why.

The Truman Doctrine was belligerent, but it was couched in confused ideological and political terms. If it raised any clear rallying-cry, it seemed to make the maintenance of political freedoms, as understood by the West, the cardinal issue. This did not in the least frighten the Kremlin. If the cold war was to be fought over this issue, the Politburo probably felt no serious apprehensions, especially so long as the United States continued to stultify its position by coddling Franco, Salazar, and the Latin-American dictatorships.

The economic approach of the far less belligerent Marshall Plan was quite another matter.

The Russians were well aware that the great issue in most of Europe—both East and West—was not, in 1947, an ideological issue. Men with reasonably full bellies might someday in the future worry about political forms and freedoms. But at this moment, the burning question was one of food, fuel, clothing, shelter, and opportunity to earn a living. As soon as the United States began talking in these terms, the Kremlin sensed a real danger. The declaration issued at Warsaw on October 5 was, in effect, a declaration of war against the Marshall Plan.

General Andrei Zhdanov, one of the nine men of the Politburo, presided at the Warsaw meeting, where he delivered an 18,000-word report to the assembled communist leaders. Speaking of the Marshall Plan, he is reported to have said: "The Soviet Union will make every effort to see that this plan is not realized." Zhdanov then presented Molotov's alternative to the Marshall Plan. It appeared to be something like this: "Through bilateral barter agreements with the Soviet Union, any European country can obtain what it needs without recourse to American dollar loans." "Treaties with the U.S.S.R. constitute agreements of reciprocal advantage for both parties," Mr. Zhdanov is reported to have said. "They never contain anything which could injure the sovereignty of the contracting parties." He contrasted this proposal with "the unjust agreements based on the inequality of rights which the U.S. is concluding and preparing. Thus," he concluded, "the U.S.S.R. clearly shows the way in which Europe can find a way out of its difficult economic situation."

The great weakness in this Molotov Plan—which no amount of propaganda could conceal—was that the U.S.S.R. could not possibly supply the requirements of the various European countries, especially their need for machines, railway equipment, and other capital goods. The United States could and would supply most of these requirements if it carried through the Marshall Plan. That was what the Kremlin was afraid of. And so the Kremlin set out to distract the United States from its course by trying to provoke Washington into an irrelevant propaganda battle, by dragging ideological herrings across the path of the great American debate, and by alternately sabotaging and helping recovery in the West European countries.

President Truman at once indignantly repudiated the charge that the United States had embarked upon a policy of "imperialism and enslavement." He endorsed Undersecretary Lovett's declaration that the nations represented in the Cominform were "trying to prevent, if they can, the economic recovery of Europe." From the point of view of world opinion, this was not a skillful reply.

In order to maintain that the Kremlin was trying to sabotage European recovery, it was necessary to show that the Kremlin's alternative, the Molotov Plan, could not bring about European recovery. No attempt was made to do this. Furthermore, it seemed unwise to tell the six Eastern nations that we considered them wholly identified with what we believed to be the destructive Russian purpose—first, because it was quite obvious that two of them at least (the Czechs and Poles) had no desire to sabotage European recovery; and second, because the success of our own program was dependent upon East-West trade in Europe.

The Molotov Plan was also dependent upon East-West trade, and the Kremlin proceeded very quickly to demonstrate that it was fully aware of the fact. Whereas our inclination was to write off and ostracize the peoples in the Soviet orbit, Moscow took the opposite tack with regard to the Western European nations. Using its only available surplus products, grain and lumber, as bait, it offered trade treaties to both Britain and France. The French negotiations were later broken off, but the Anglo-Soviet treaty was concluded before the end of the year. Perhaps more important, Poland was permitted to export substantial quantities of coal to the Western nations.

In one other respect, the Cominform declarations also showed the Kremlin to be more realistic than Washington. Whereas we were still very uncertain as to whether the middle-of-the-road socialists in Western Europe were our friends or our enemies, no such uncertainty troubled Moscow. The Communist Party leaders denounced Attlee, Blum, Saragat, and Schumacher as traitors to the working class and tools of capitalist imperialism. The attack upon the Western socialist leaders was even more violent than the denunciation of the United States. This should have given pause to those Americans who were clamoring for conditioning American aid upon agreement by the European beneficiaries to halt socialization.

Finally, while we were making somewhat empty unilateral pronouncements of our determination that Italy must remain "a free and democratic nation"—while we were ruefully viewing the wreckage of our ill-advised adventure in Greece—the communists proceeded to inspire the setting up of a revolutionary provisional government in that country. With this move, civil war began in earnest and the danger loomed that Greece might become another Spain. The move in Greece was no doubt part of a long-range Soviet scheme to create a Balkan federation in which Yugoslavia would play the key role.

3. EFFECT ON EUROPE

The effect on Europe of the twofold deployment of the rival powers was immediately noticeable in a number of ways.

The unfolding of the American potential gave heart to all of Western Europe excepting only the faithful followers of Moscow. The mere hope of American aid broke the paralysis of despair. Tired and hungry people went to work with renewed vigor. Production mounted, especially in the British Isles.

In France and Italy, this favorable result was temporarily checked in November by the outbreak of a wave of strikes and demonstrations. These were without doubt inspired by the communist leadership of the trade unions. To say this is not, however, to say that the communist trade union leaders were acting simply on orders from Moscow or to serve Moscow's purposes. High prices, black markets, scarcity of consumer goods and hoarding of food by farmers had brought about conditions in which any trade union leadership would have had to seek relief for the wage earners. The situation was made to order for anyone who could see political profit in causing trouble. Both the communists and the extreme conservatives seized the opportunity.

The assurance of stopgap aid, for the winter months at least, enabled the French and Italian Governments to take a firm stand, to break the strikes, and to begin to tackle the underlying economic problems which had caused them.

On the debit side of the ledger, the anti-communist spirit of the developing American program encouraged the resurgence of the reactionary forces in both countries, led to severe repressive measures, and caused a dangerous weakening of the moderate democratic socialists. In Italy, the de Gasperi Government became a coalition of the Center with the Right. In France, Ramadier and then Schuman managed to maintain a Center Government, precariously balanced between the communists on one side and the reawakened reaction on the other. General de Gaulle re-emerged upon the political scene as the leader of the Right eager to assume power. De Gaulle demanded new elections and a new constitution. He began talking of a "strong state," of abolishing trade unions and political parties, and in other ways sounded strongly reminiscent of Benito Mussolini in the early days of Italian fascism.

The twofold deployment of rival power produced more or less the same effect throughout all of Europe—namely, to force people everywhere more and more into one of the two extreme political positions. Not only was Europe split down the middle, but every country, every city, and every rural community was similarly affected. The ordinary man, who sees most things in varying shades of gray, was increasingly compelled to make a choice in terms of black or white, and increasingly unhappy at the prospect.

4. THE LONDON CONFERENCE

In this atmosphere of mounting tension between East and West, the Council of Foreign Ministers met at London on November 25, in order to make one more half-hearted attempt to reach agreement on Germany and Austria. The conference lasted for three futile weeks and adjourned without even fixing a date for another meeting.

Before leaving for London, Mr. Marshall made an important general pronouncement of policy. This was at Chicago on November 18. Here again is a document which should be read in full. (Appendix, page 81.) The Secretary once more explained the crisis of production in Europe and the American interest in helping to overcome it. He sought to dispel any idea that the American program rested upon imperial design, aggressive purpose, or desire to provoke a third world war. To prove this, he cited the record of history. He reaffirmed that "this Government is willing to co-operate with every nation that pledges a generous effort to the common cause of European recovery." Concerning the Soviet Union, he said:

> Unfortunately, it has become apparent that the third great power which contributed so much to the common victory evidently does not share that purpose. For reasons that are still obscure, it is endeavoring apparently to prolong the present unsatisfactory state of affairs indefinitely. If this purpose prevails, obviously the prosperous European community we knew before the war cannot be re-established within the foreseeable future.
>
> This [said Mr. Marshall] brings me to an important conclusion. It is this divergence of purpose concerning the future of Europe which is the cause of many of the present differences between the United States and Soviet Russia. The divergence is not due to any direct clash between the national interests of these powers. It is my belief that if Europe is restored as a solvent and vigorous community, this issue will have been decided and the disturbing conflict between ourselves and the Soviets, in so far as Europe is concerned, will lessen.

"The place to begin," said the Secretary, "is Europe."

One is struck by the circular nature of this analysis. It would have seemed more logical to say that the place to begin was with an over-all U.S.-U.S.S.R. conference, since "the divergence of purpose" between the two great powers did not exist merely in Europe, but just as much in Asia and other parts of the world. One must bear in mind, however, that Secretary Marshall was about to attend a four-power conference on Germany and Austria, to which he had been committed since April, and that, in these circumstances, he could not very well say that there was no use talking about any single European problem—or the whole European problem—until an over-all understanding had been reached with the Soviet Union.

The London Conference was merely a dreary repetition of the earlier failure at Moscow. Mr. Molotov used it, as he had used previous conferences, as a sounding board for Soviet propaganda. He told the peoples of Europe that the heart of the Marshall Plan was the rebuilding of western Germany as an arsenal; and, in the same breath, he told the Germans that only the Soviet Union wanted to see Germany reunited as a strong, happy, and prosperous nation. The same old arguments over the same old disagreements on boundaries, reparations, and the nature of the new German state led to the same dead-end as before. A slight gleam of hope emerged with regard to an Austrian settlement, but by this time adjournment had become inevitable.

The Secretary flew home and on the very night of his arrival—December 19—broadcast his report to the American people. (Appendix, page 84.) Once more Mr. Marshall clearly and patiently outlined the major points upon which it had been impossible to reach agreement. In conclusion, the Secretary made a number of highly significant statements:

It finally became clear that we could make no progress at this time—that there was no apparent wish to reach a settlement, but only an interest in making more and more speeches intended for another audience. So I suggested we adjourn. No real ground was lost or gained at this meeting, except that the outlines of the problems and the obstacles are much clearer. We cannot look forward to a united Germany at this time. We must do the best we can in the area where our influence can be felt.

After outlining the difficulties to be surmounted in reaching a German settlement, the Secretary said that there was "another and more fundamental reason for the frustration we have encountered. As the result of the war," he said, "a political vacuum has been created and, until this vacuum has been filled by the restoration of a healthy European community, it does not appear possible that paper agreements can assure a lasting peace. Agreements between sovereign states are generally the reflection and not the cause of genuine settlements."

And then came the most important passage:

The Soviet Union has recognized the situation in its frank declaration of hostility and opposition to the European Recovery Program. [Note that Mr. Marshall is now talking about opposition to our program—not opposition to European recovery.]

The success of such a program would necessarily mean the establishment of a balance, in which the sixteen Western nations, who have bound their hopes and efforts together, would be rehabilitated, strong in forms of government which guarantee true freedom, opportunity to the individual, and protection against the terror of government tyranny.

The issue is really clear-cut and I fear there can be no settlement until the coming months demonstrate whether or not the civilization of Western Europe will prove vigorous enough to rise above the destructive effects of the war and restore a healthy society. Officials of the Soviet Union and leaders of the Communist parties openly predict that this restoration will not take place. We, on the other hand, are confident in the rehabilitation of Western European civilization with its freedoms. Until the result of this struggle becomes clearly apparent, there will continue to be very real difficulty to resolve even on paper agreed terms for a treaty of peace.

Mr. Marshall had now stated what he had refrained from stating a month earlier. There was no dog chasing his tail about this analysis. Nor was there any repetition of the dangerous confusion between Soviet opposition to our program for European recovery and Soviet opposition to European recovery as such. Implicitly, also, the Secretary seemed to recognize that there was a vast difference between communist policy in Eastern Europe and communist policy in the West. This distinction had so far apparently eluded our Government. We had adopted the cliché that all communists want chaos because chaos produces communism. We had until now ignored the fact that Soviet leadership had learned that chaos in Europe could quite easily lead to fascism.

Anyone who wandered about behind the so-called Iron Curtain in 1947 could hardly fail to realize: First, that recovery in Eastern Europe had, on the whole, been at least as rapid as in the West—especially in Finland, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. Second, that, far from obstructing recovery in these countries, the Communist Parties had, for the most part, led the way. And, third, that the prestige of the communists in Eastern Europe rested far more upon pragmatic than upon ideological grounds. The communists were the ones who had broken up the feudal estates and carried out land reform in these primarily agricultural countries—a basic measure desired for years but never accomplished by non-communist liberals. The communists had led the way in working out the various two-year, three-year, or five-year plans for economic rehabilitation, with which the majority of non-communists were in substantial agreement. The communists commanded the respect of Eastern Europeans precisely because they had brought order out of the postwar chaos—even though it was a ruthless order enforced by varying degrees of terror.

This was the cardinal fact with which a realistic American program would have to reckon—a fact which had become obscured by the obstructive tactics of the communists in the Western countries.

In other words, we were not entering into a struggle with the U.S.S.R. for and against European recovery. We were entering into a competition with the U.S.S.R. to see which one of us could best promote recovery in its half of a divided Europe.

What sort of competition was it to be? In the answer to that question lay the future of Europe and, very likely, the future of mankind upon this planet.

There are two ways of trying to win a race. One is to run faster than your opponent. The other is to trip him up or knock him over the head. If the two giants were now about to vie with each other in constructive effort, the world had little to fear from their competition. It would then be in the nature of things that the two great powers would sooner or later find themselves cooperating rather than competing. But if the two great powers were about to spend their energies primarily in trying to frustrate each other's efforts, the clearly foreseeable result would be failure—and perhaps war.

One final note on Germany: The failure of the London Conference made it certain that Britain and the United States would now proceed to organize "Bizonia" as an integral part of that Western Europe in which the Marshall Plan was to operate. This raised four important questions to be answered in 1948.

First: Would France join her zone to Bizonia? Or would she hold off because of her objections to an even partially unified Germany?

Second: What were the Anglo-American intentions concerning the Ruhr? Were the Ruhr industries to be turned back to the Germans? And, if so, to what Germans? Were they to be socialized, or were they to be turned over to German "free enterprise"? These questions about the Ruhr were closely related to the question of future French attitude. If the Ruhr were to be "internationalized," the French would probably join in the unification of Western Germany. But political "internationalization" involved a number of dangerous pitfalls of which the British and Americans seemed well aware. My own studies led me, over a year ago, to propose a solution of the Ruhr problem which still seems to me to meet both sides of the dilemma. This was the creation of a Ruhr Coal Authority—somewhat like our TVA—which would have the power to allocate Ruhr coal to the various countries of Europe, including Germany, on the basis of their respective peaceful requirements. Such an Authority might and should eventually develop into a European Coal Authority, with power to allocate all European coal to the various users. Even if limited at the outset to the allocation of Ruhr coal, the Authority would thereby automatically control the level of steel production and other heavy industry in Germany and most of the other Western European countries. Thus the French would be protected against the rehabilitation of the "Ruhr arsenal" and at the same time the pitfalls of political internationalization would be avoided.

Third: A very tricky and immediate question was left for Britain and the United States in effecting the economic unification of their zones without, in fact, creating so much of a political entity in Western Germany as to block the road to eventual unification with the East. Even without committing the ultimate folly of slamming the door by making a separate peace and creating a definite West German sovereignty, the Western Allies faced the danger of playing into Russian hands by making it appear to the Germans that they—rather than the Soviet Union—were responsible for keeping Germany divided.

This question led to the fourth and last: Would the Soviet Union itself slam the door on eventual unification by trying to oust the Western Allies from Berlin, on the grounds that their action in western Germany had violated the Potsdam Agreement and rendered the Allied Control Commission useless and obsolete? And, if the Russians did thus turn the facts upside down and undertake such a move, would they, in the face of Allied refusal to leave, try to carry it out by such sanctions as shutting off power and light from the Allied Sectors of the German capital?

These four questions composed a dangerous pile of dry tinder in the heart of the European Continent.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Where Do We Go From Here?

1. TAKING STOCK

To summarize briefly, Secretary Marshall's first year in office was a year in which the collapse of the wartime coalition was officially acknowledged—a year which split the world into two camps, one led by the Soviet Union and one by the United States. This had a profound effect upon all international relationships, upon the United Nations, and upon affairs within all nations.

The year 1947 was also noteworthy for a pronounced change in British foreign policy, which might be described both as a withdrawal from former commitments associated with traditional British imperialism and as a step forward toward a more enlightened colonial policy and the building of a stronger British Commonwealth. The outstanding features of this change were: the freeing of India, Burma, and Ceylon; the withdrawal from Egypt and the concentration of British Middle Eastern power in Tanganyika; and the yielding up of the British Mandate over Palestine. The turning over of the Palestinian problem to the United Nations led to the partition of Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state —a solution which, for once, brought the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. into agreement. Early in 1947, British foreign policy veered away from the Truman Doctrine toward a middle course between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., and then shifted back, after Mr. Molotov's walkout, to one of increasing solidarity with the Marshall Plan.

The United Nations had a difficult and trying year. The Security Council's work was frustrated by Soviet vetoes, especially with regard to the action recommended by the Balkan Commission in the case of Greece. At the meeting of the General Assembly on September 17, Secretary Marshall offered a program for a more effective United Nations. (Appendix, page 56.) He asked the Assembly to act on three important stalemates —Greece, Korea, and Palestine. He referred to the need for pushing on with atomic control and disarmament, suggested that the Assembly consider a modification of the veto power in the Security Council, and set up an Interim Committee on Peace and Security to sit continuously. This Committee (known as the Little Assembly) was created over the protest of the Soviet Union. A Korean Commission was appointed, likewise over Soviet protest. The only concrete accomplishment was on the Palestinian question—and this, while settled in theory, remained to be worked out in practice.

One other important matter, which can be noted only briefly here, was the completion at Geneva of a draft charter for the International Trade Organization. This was submitted to the Havana Conference in November. This charter—a sort of constitution for world trade—merits careful study (for full text, see Appendix, page 91).

During 1947, United States policy moved through three stages. The first marked the abandonment of a policy of drifting along in the hope of somehow finding a modus vivendi with the Soviet Union, in favor of a policy of quasi-military containment of the Soviet Union. The second was a somewhat tentative attempt to shift from negative anti-communism (or anti-Sovietism) to a positive program of promoting world economic recovery. The third stage, arising chiefly from failure to "unsell" the Truman Doctrine here and abroad, was a reluctant retreat to a policy of promoting recovery in only those countries which would take a stand with us against the Soviet Union.

During the same period, the Soviet Union shifted from its immediate postwar policy of "pushing against mushiness" in order to wring the last drop of advantage out of the wartime agreements, to a policy of blocking what it conceived to be a U.S.-led anti-Soviet crusade. It did not accept the bona fides of Mr. Marshall's attempted shift to a positive policy of co-operative reconstruction. On the contrary, it saw in the projected Marshall Plan an even greater threat than that implied in the earlier Truman Doctrine. The Kremlin thereupon likewise shifted to a third phase, in which the negative impulse to block or distract the American effort was paralleled by the Molotov Plan to promote recovery, especially in those countries which would side with the Soviet Union against the United States. The Kremlin, however, did not confine the Molotov Plan to aiding only the countries in the Soviet orbit.

Let us try now to appraise the relative potential of the two rival recovery plans.

The Marshall Plan was the plan of a nation which wanted to preserve its own peace and prosperity and which was in the process of recognizing that prosperity as well as peace had become indivisible. It was the plan of a nation which enjoyed the highest living standard in the world, was currently the source of something like two-thirds of the world's total production, and was momentarily the sole possessor of atomic weapons. The Marshall Plan was the expression of an enlightened self-interest on the part of the strongest nation on the earth in the economic recovery of the rest of the world.

The Molotov Plan was the plan of a nation acutely conscious of its economic weakness and anxious to strengthen itself without prejudice to its national pride. It was the plan of a war-ravaged nation with a very low living standard, determined to improve it by extracting reparations from its former enemies or making deals with anyone wherever a deal could profitably be made. It was less the expression of self-interest in the recovery of others than the expression of a desire to meet immediate and pressing needs.

The Marshall Plan, besides being the product of enlightened self-interest, was also the product of fear. The fear was of two kinds—fear that the Soviet Union's nationalistic expansionism might become a threat to peace, and fear that the mere existence of communism in large areas of the world might be a threat to "freedom, democracy, and prosperity" everywhere. In simpler terms, it was fear for the maintenance of the American status quo.

The Molotov Plan was likewise partially the product of fear, but fear of almost the reverse nature. This fear was also twofold—fear that the United States might use its preponderant economic power to form an anti-Soviet coalition, and fear that the United States might use its preponderant military power to start an atomic war to prevent revolutionary change. In simpler terms, it was a fear lest Russia's status quo be perpetuated.

The techniques of the two plans varied, as might be expected. The Molotov Plan relied upon bilateral government-to-government bargaining in order to derive the maximum advantage for the U.S.S.R. out of the relatively limited surplus resources which could be squeezed out of the hard-pressed Soviet economy. The Marshall Plan relied upon an over-all multilateral approach in order to accomplish the most with the least sacrifice and also in order to promote those "liberal trade policies" which we considered essential as a protection for free enterprise.

It is apparent that neither the Marshall Plan nor the Molotov Plan can succeed if an insurmountable barrier to trade is erected between the two areas in which the respective plans operate. The Russians realize this and are seeking to push their bilateral trade agreements into the Marshall Plan area. The Western European nations associated in the Marshall Plan realize it. The United States has not yet clearly grasped this fact and is still emotionally unready to extend aid across the Iron Curtain. This is not because the Russians are wiser than we.

The economic advantage in a competitive promotion of recovery is all on our side. To a very large extent we are dealing with surplus production not needed in this country. We have practically no difficulty in obtaining necessities from other parts of the world. Our problem is to maintain our high level of productivity and our high living standard. We are, therefore, not compelled by our own necessities to favor any one nation or group of nations. We have freedom of action. The U.S.S.R., on the other hand, needs machinery, railroad equipment, and all sorts of capital goods in order to get back on its feet. It can create an exportable surplus of a few foodstuffs and raw materials by holding down domestic consumption. It must use this surplus where it can get capital goods. It cannot afford to use it elsewhere. That is why the Molotov Plan did not exclude trade with Western Europe.

With these facts in mind, let us now re-examine the basic hypothesis upon which our Government has been operating.

The apparent view of the United States Government in early 1947 was expressed in the famous article in the July number of Foreign Affairs by "Mr. X." This essay was widely attributed to, and never repudiated by, George Kennan, the chief planner of the Department of State. Its thesis—undoubtedly developed much earlier—was that the primary cause of Russian expansionism was the need of a dictatorial regime to concentrate the attention of the oppressed Russian people upon an external enemy. Only thus—so ran the thesis—could a regime of terrorism, originally created to stamp out internal opposition to the revolution, maintain itself in power. It followed, according to this view, that since such expansionism grows by what it feeds upon, the Soviet Union must be "contained" before its expansionism could reach dimensions which would cause a war. It followed further that, if Soviet expansionism were contained, there would be a strong possibility that the dictatorial regime would mellow or perhaps crumble and be overthrown. This was the belief which clearly underlay the thinking of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and of those State Department officials who drafted the Truman message of March 12, 1947.

With all due respect to these gentlemen and their intimate knowledge of Russian affairs, this thesis seems far too simple. It omits, for one thing, the possibility that Soviet policy may also have been influenced to a large extent by an actual fear—ridiculous as this may seem to us—of attack by the United States. It omits any consideration of the fact that, in a world in which national sovereignty is the supreme authority and in which power has become concentrated in only two centers of super-power, there is a natural tendency toward mutual hostility between those two centers—quite irrespective of the nature or intentions of either. Finally, the Kennan thesis, while recognizing the oppositeness inherent in the nature of the United States and the U.S.S.R., tends to regard this oppositeness as irreconcilable, until such time as a contained U.S.S.R. changes its nature and becomes what we should consider "more democratic." It omits the possibility that we, too, may have to revise some of our ideas.

This analysis led quite naturally to an American policy of holding firmly to what Mr. Dulles called "our invigorated principles" and keeping the Soviet Union in check until it changed its principles. Such a policy must presuppose: first, that we are able to contain Soviet expansion by peaceful means; second, that, if Soviet expansion is checked, the present regime will grow more "democratic" or fall; and, third, that, if the present regime falls, the Russian people will turn out to have convictions and predilections so like our own that a reconciliation will be possible.

The first supposition—that we could contain the Soviet Union by peaceful means—can neither be proved nor disproved until it is too late. The second supposition—that containment would cause the Soviet regime to mellow or fall—seems to rest upon the belief that there is a strong latent resistance to the present regime among the Russian people—of which, so far as I know, there is very little evidence. And the third supposition implies a belief that, if the Russian people were free to choose any form of government, they would choose a form which approximated the Western concept of democracy. This seems to me contrary to contemporary evidence as well as to past history.

Like most revolutions, the Bolshevik Revolution was chiefly concerned with achieving a more equitable distribution of the material benefits of society. It was not—like our Revolution—primarily concerned with establishing self-government and the political freedoms. The Russian people threw out the Czar's management because it had oppressed and exploited them—they wanted to be governed more justly—they had not reached the point of wanting to govern themselves. The Russian ideal of "democracy" is still that of a society in which everyone shares more or less equally in the material benefits. This is an ideal typical of a people accustomed through long generations to a low standard of living, while seeing its rulers living in luxury.

Our ideal of "democracy" is that of a society in which each individual has an equal voice in the management, rather than an equal share in the benefits. This is an ideal typical of a fluid society and of a people accustomed to relatively easy access to a high standard of living.

The two ideals are not antithetical. Neither can alone produce the perfect freedom. Both are included in Aristotle's definition: "Freedom is to govern and be governed." We have so far emphasized the first half of that definition. The Russians have emphasized the second. Or, if you prefer Lincoln to Aristotle, both the Russian ideal and the American ideal are included in the perfect democracy, defined as "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people." We have so far stressed "by the people." The Russians have stressed "for the people."

These national ideals, or emphases, will change only when the conditions change out of which they grew. If our system continues to produce booms and busts, if it continues periodically to expose the majority of the people to hardship and insecurity, if it continues increasingly to freeze the strata in our society so that access to wealth is no longer open except to the privileged few—then we shall again face a rising demand for more economic or social democracy. In the last great depression we saw how the majority of people were willing to sacrifice some of the fetishes of political "freedom" in order to obtain economic security and greater social justice. But with a return of prosperity, we have reverted to our traditional emphasis. It would probably take not one but several more major depressions to make us permanently change our emphasis from political to economic democracy.

In the same way, it will take many years of economic security and a relatively high living standard to make the Russian people change their emphasis from the economic to the political ideal. If there is any present threat to the Soviet regime, it is not likely to be found in a latent revolt against political oppression, but rather in dissatisfaction with a management which fails to raise the living standards of the worker and peasant.

But so long as the Russian people believe that there is any threat to the security of the Russian nation, there is little chance that they will revolt against a management which holds down their living standard in order to build up and protect the national security. So long as American policy lends any reality to the claim of the Soviet regime that the U.S.S.R. is in danger, American policy is in fact protecting the regime against whatever domestic trouble might otherwise be in store for it.

2. A NEW APPROACH

Let us now consider a somewhat different theory than that upon which our Government has been proceeding. Let us consider the theory that the Russians have a long-range aim of creating a communist world, but that—unlike Hitler—they have no time schedule and no fixed objectives which they are determined to gain, if necessary by force of arms. Let us consider the theory that Soviet aggressiveness derives in large measure from fear and feeds upon fear. This does not necessarily make Russia any less dangerous, but it alters our approach to the danger. It would make our policy aim at removing the causes of Russian fear, in so far as it lies within our power to do so without taking foolish risks with our own security.

The two major Soviet fears with which we have to deal are: fear of war with the United States; and fear that we may use our economic power to force our kind of economic system upon so much of the world as to isolate and encircle the Soviet Union. This would postpone into infinity the realization of the still powerful Russian dream of an eventual world revolution. We may consider the mere existence of such a dream dangerous. But we should be wise to recognize that a totally frustrated dream would be far more dangerous at this moment. For a suddenly frustrated deep-seated aspiration can become a grim and irrational determination.

As to Russian fear of war, we know that we do not want to make war upon the Soviet Union. But we must realize that we have in the past year conveyed the impression, not only to the Russians, but to many Europeans and Asiatics that we think we may have to fight the Soviet Union. Many Frenchmen think—and many Czechs, too—that our German policy is primarily designed to create a bulwark against Russia in Central Europe. Many Asiatics think that our policy in Japan, Korea, and China is shaped to the same sort of purpose in Asia. Our Latin-American policy, our huge military expenditures, our sole possession of the atomic bomb, and our continued stock-piling add to this impression. To brush all this aside as the figment of Russian propaganda is to fool no one except perhaps ourselves.

The truth of the matter is that while we are trying sincerely to avoid a clash with the Soviet Union, we are, at the same time, taking out all sorts of insurance against possible failure to do so. Our policy in Germany is not designed to create a bulwark against Russia—which would be foolish in any case—but it is influenced by the consideration that we may have to fight Russia. So is our policy in Japan, China, Korea, Greece, Turkey, and Latin America.

This is a very dangerous business. It is doubly dangerous because the Soviet Union is playing precisely the same game. Never mind who started it. The important thing to realize is that this two-sided policy of taking out insurance against war is the road to war. What constitutes insurance for us is a threat to the Soviet Union. What constitutes insurance to the Soviet Union is a threat to us.

Moreover, most of this insurance business is a very silly business. If we ever do fight the Soviet Union, most of our mutual provocations will have insured neither of us against anything. In an atomic and bacteriological war, fought largely by air across the polar region, what good will it have done us to have armed Señor Perón? What good will it have done the Russians to have insisted upon pushing out their frontier into Central Europe? The Red Army is not going to land in Argentina, and we shall be swept out of Europe overnight. We are both of us taking out insurance against the last war—not against the next one. But, by taking out these useless, expired policies, we each lend reality to the distrust and fear of the other.

The proposal to establish universal military service in this country is another one of these useless but highly dangerous attempts at insurance. It is useless because it would train millions of young men in the techniques of fighting the last war. It is dangerous, not only because it is provocative, but because it would train the young men of this nation to think in terms of war rather than in terms of peace and to accustom themselves to obedience to authoritarian command rather than to the independent spirit of free citizenship. Universal service to the nation in forestry camps, road-building, irrigation and flood-control projects, or—better yet—in special scientific or technological training, including disaster control, is one thing. Universal military training under Army discipline is quite another.

I am not suggesting that we should be so foolish as to disarm ourselves unilaterally. We did that once, with disastrous results. We must remain strong in scientific research, in polar aviation, and wherever strength would count in an atomic war, until we can bring about universal disarmament. But I am suggesting that we make it much clearer than we have to date that we desire to disarm, and that we look to the United Nations to take over the job of policing the world at the earliest possible moment. I am suggesting that we stop thinking in strategic terms which are now meaningless. And, above all, I would like to suggest that we, as citizens, think more about how to prevent the next war and less about what we shall do if war comes. The greatest danger of an atomic war is the widespread acceptance of its inevitability.

We have able military and naval leaders. It is their business always to be prepared for the worst, until the day comes when all the nations lay down their arms. But it is not the business of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to guide our policy in trying to make a lasting peace. Their thinking must not be allowed to shape the thinking of the American people. The American people must learn to think for peace if they want peace.

So much for the military aspect. What can we do to allay Soviet fear of what we might do with our great economic power? This fear rests, I believe, upon considerably more than the fertile imagination of a dictatorial regime trying to maintain itself in power. It rests upon the conviction that the United States is determined to maintain an economic system which must lead either to imperial exploitation (and ultimate war) or to collapse. We are perhaps more concerned with a different and more reasonable version of this fear, which affects most of the peoples of Europe and Asia. This version, which one finds articulately expressed by Western Europeans, runs as follows.

The United States is determined to preserve its own free-enterprise economy. It believes that it can preserve its free-enterprise economy only in a preponderantly free-enterprise world. It will, therefore, use its great economic power to bludgeon the other peoples of the world into a return to laissez-faire capitalism.

Not only our extreme conservatives, like Senator Taft, or Mr. Hoover, or the National Association of Manufacturers, supply the evidence for this fear. One frequently hears the most liberal Republican aspirant for the Presidency, Mr. Harold Stassen, quoted. But the most complete documentation was supplied by President Truman himself in his speech in March 1947 at Baylor University. It was not until December 1947 that an authoritative American voice gave any assurance to the contrary. Then Secretary Marshall, addressing the Pilgrim Society at London, declared that Britain's decision to adopt some degree of socialism would not affect American friendship or American aid. But this was not a general statement. It was not enough to offset what had gone before.*

Apart from official policy, we, as a nation, are at present making the dangerous mistake of meeting communist fanaticism with a doctrinaire fanaticism of our own. One becomes acutely aware of this in talking to almost any thinking person in Europe or Asia. Traveling about outside this country, one encounters everywhere a resentment—directed at us almost as much as against the Soviet Union—a resentment at being forced to choose between the undesirable and the impossible, at having to line up on the side of either communist dictatorship or free-enterprise laissez-faire.

Most Americans do not realize that our alternative is impossible outside of our own hemisphere—that people cannot re-establish private capitalism in countries where private capital has been dispersed or destroyed. Nor do most Americans realize that the majority of Europeans have reached the conviction that a certain amount of government planning and control over a nation's economy is to be desired, even though it may restrict the free initiative of the individual.

The fear that we may try to tie strings to our aid which would force people, against their own judgment and will, back into a system they have discarded, is not a fear one finds only in the Soviet orbit. One finds it everywhere abroad, except among the tenacious remnants of the former economic power groups. Coupled with this fear, one finds a resentment at being told what to do by even the most benevolent outsider.

We have the power to help and guide the world in the direction in which the masses of mankind desire to move. We do not have the power to reverse the direction.

On this ground, at least, we can kill two birds with one stone. We can, to some extent, put Russian fears to rest and at the same time vastly improve our relations with the non-communist world.

There is another reason why we should be wise to abandon our present doctrinaire tendency. Intolerance and coercion are an integral part of the present Soviet system. They act as a foreign body when introduced into the philosophy of life upon which this nation was founded—a foreign body which could poison our whole system and rob it of its power.

The burning issue of our time is economic rather than political. Food, fuel, and shoes are, for the moment, more important than political freedoms. But there is a moral issue, which will someday become more important as the economic crisis subsides. If the great moral issue of our time is belief in the Rights of Man—and especially the right of man freely to choose the form of society in which he wants to live—then we cannot effectively fight for that issue and at the same time peddle our own form of society as the only road to salvation. In doing so, we stultify our case and throw away our greatest power of attraction. For our greatest power of attraction in the ideological competition which seems likely to follow the present economic competition with the Soviet Union is our traditional belief—imperfectly fulfilled though it be—in the great propositions laid down in our Declaration of Independence.

3. GETTING DOWN TO CASES

The change of policy here suggested requires, first of all, an unequivocal statement of our changed position—a statement which the world will understand as a final repudiation of the Truman Doctrine and as meaning that we have now realistically assessed the trend of world affairs and are moving purposefully to meet the economic crisis, confident in our own strength, firm in our convictions, but neither intolerant of disagreement nor frightened by diversity of opinion.

Next, the suggested change of policy requires the recognition that—whether we like it or not—we shall have to transact a large part of our foreign trade with governments rather than with private firms or individuals. It suggests further that we may have to channel through our own Government a considerable portion of our commercial dealings with other countries. There is no doubt that this would have certain implications for our domestic economy. But these carry no further than the implications already inherent in our European Recovery Program. To carry out that program we must in any case permit our Government to plan and control certain sectors of our economy. We may not like moving in this direction. We may not like admitting that there can be no world-wide restoration of "free enterprise" and that, even in our own country, private initiative may be somewhat further restricted. Nevertheless, these are some of the facts of life we have to face. We cannot turn back the clock.

So much for our broad approach to foreign policy. It may work or it may not. But we have little to lose in trying it. Once we change our basic analysis and seek to understand and allay the fears of others, rather than acting out of our own fear, we may find that we can sit down and profitably discuss a number of problems with the men in the Kremlin.

4. POSSIBLE RESULTS OF A NEW APPROACH

First, we might agree rather quickly that both of us wished to promote, rather than obstruct, East-West trade in Europe. This would mean more of a change for us than for the Russians. It might mean, for instance, that we would act favorably upon a Polish application for a loan to buy American coal-mining machinery, provided that we believed granting such a loan would make a substantial amount of additional coal available for Western Europe. There would be good reason for this belief, because Poland is already exporting large quantities of coal to both Eastern and Western European countries. We might send raw cotton or manufacturing equipment to Czechoslovakia on a similar arrangement, or oil-drilling machinery to Rumania.

* A more general statement was made in the State Department's seventeen-volume report to Congress on political conditions in Western Europe, released on January 14, 1948. This report described the democratic socialists of Western Europe as "among the strongest bulwarks against Communism."

Eventually—after we had seen how these trial transactions worked—we might find it possible to win public approval for offering assistance to the Soviet Union itself, provided the Soviet Union would meet us with a more reasonable attitude toward, let us say, reparations from Germany and Austria.

Assuming that we had not already committed the supreme blunder of making a separate peace, a solution of the reparations tangle would be a first long step toward arriving at a sensible settlement in Germany and Austria. If we could complete this process, we should have solved the central problem of the European peace. The withdrawal of American opposition to the socialization of the German monopolies would remove another big stumbling block. It would then remain for the Russians to remove some of the other obstacles, by modifying their present attitude toward frontiers and the nature of the government to be established in Germany.

With the relaxation of U.S.-U.S.S.R. tension, we might reasonably expect a similar gradual breaking up of the log jam in other parts of the world and in the United Nations.

This is not to say that we should expect miracles to happen. The problem of China would, for example, still remain a complicated and difficult affair. But the mere fact that we could address ourselves to its intrinsic nature without the overriding consideration of a possible conflict with the Soviet Union would make its solution infinitely easier. Relieved of our anti-communist obsession, we could follow that policy in China which General Marshall recommended before he became Secretary of State and which we have not since then followed—namely, a policy of withholding aid until the non-communist liberal elements come into power. We could shed our allegiance to the corrupt and reactionary Nanking leadership and, by backing long-overdue reforms, gradually break the monopoly on reform now held by the Communists. This would remove the chief cause of the civil conflict, even though it might not immediately cause all hostilities to cease.

The Korean deadlock is almost entirely the product of U.S.-U.S.S.R. tension. With fear and suspicion reduced on both sides, it should not be too difficult to bring about an orderly evacuation and an independent Korean state.

The relaxation of U.S.-U.S.S.R. tensions would not solve the Japanese problem, but it would alter for the better the relations between General MacArthur's Headquarters and the Far Eastern Commission. It would make Japanese occupation policy more of an Allied policy and less of a United States monopoly than it now is. Furthermore, once we got rid of our fear of democratic socialism, we should find it infinitely easier to deal with the reconstruction of a peaceful Japanese economy. This, in turn, would stimulate recovery throughout the Far East.

In a general way, the same factors might beneficially affect a settlement in the oil-rich Middle East, and the closely related Mediterranean area.

Perhaps the most important result of a different approach to the Soviet Union would be felt in the functioning of the United Nations. At the present time, the operations of the Security Council are frustrated by the battle of votes and vetoes. The General Assembly has become a forum for the ventilation of mutual recrimination. And the work of most of the Commissions and Subcommissions of the United Nations is wasted because the Soviet Union refuses to participate in them altogether.

Worst of all, the United States, which holds by far the greatest military and economic power, is moving more and more toward the exercise of that power outside of rather than through the United Nations. We started to move outside of the United Nations when we intervened in Greece and Turkey. We have acted unilaterally in China. We recently issued a single-handed pronouncement on the maintenance of Italian freedom. We have shown no inclination to channel our developing recovery plan through the United Nations machinery. The reasons for this are obvious, but if this process continues, the United Nations will follow the League of Nations into impotence and oblivion.

All these difficulties and frustrations flow directly from two sources—the imperfect basic concept of the United Nations, and the growing tension between its two most powerful members.

The imperfections in the early concept of the United Nations can be cured only if the United Nations Charter is recognized as being merely a first step toward the creation of a World Government of limited powers. There can never be lasting peace in a world in which the highest authority rests in the sovereign nation-state. There can be peace only when there exists a supra-national authority, created by the united peoples of the world, commanding the direct allegiance of the peoples of the world, and responsive to their will. Too many of those who recognize the need for a supra-national authority tend to lose themselves in specific schemes for this or that particular form of organization. The important thing is not the form but the substance of world government. Once people throughout the world are awakened to the need, the necessary forms and devices will be found. Until they are awakened to the need, the conflicting advocacy of various plans and schemes only tends to create confusion.

Throughout history, a world composed of sovereign nation-states has followed the same pattern. It has tried to align itself in an ever-shifting balance of power in such a way that no nation, or group of nations, could at any time safely assume that a resort to force would be successful. Wars have occurred periodically whenever this balance has broken down—whenever some nation, or group of nations, has thought that it could successfully impose its will by force upon other nations. With the scientific and technological developments of recent years, the number of powers or power-groups composing this precarious balance has constantly diminished. After World War I, Austria-Hungary disappeared and Russia and Germany went into temporary eclipse, leaving as power centers only Great Britain, France, the United States, and Japan. Since this war we have, for the first time, a world reduced, for the moment at least, to only two real focal points of power.

There lies the real heart of our trouble with the Soviet Union. Unless the concept of national sovereignty is superseded by the idea of World Government, the two great centers of power will always tend to come into conflict—no matter what their respective characteristics. Only the establishment of a supranational authority representing all the peoples of all the nations, great and small, can finally remove the danger that, sooner or later, one or the other of the two great powers will think it can safely risk a resort to arbitrary force.

But—and here is the vicious circle in which we are caught—the United Nations cannot develop into World Government unless both the United States and the Soviet Union wish it to do so. So far, neither has declared any such desire. The British and all the Commonwealth Dominions have declared for World Government. So have France, Italy, China, and a number of Latin-American Republics. There is no doubt that many other nations would do likewise if they thought that there were the slightest chance of any such development. But we have not declared that our ultimate aim is to see the United Nations develop into a World Government. We have been so preoccupied with our fear of Russia that we have concerned ourselves much too little with the future of the United Nations.

One can hardly expect the Soviet Union to make the first move. So long as Moscow does not control a majority in the United Nations, so long as Moscow fears us, and so long as we do usually carry a majority with us, the Soviet Union is not likely to take an affirmative attitude toward making the United Nations into a far more powerful organization.

We alone are in a position to break the vicious circle. It is our move. It is up to us to declare that we are willing ultimately to subordinate our great power to the will of the united peoples of the world. It is up to us to remove the causes of Soviet fear and distrust, wherever we can safely do so. It is up to us to refrain from unilateral acts and declarations.

Nor must we—if we do these things—expect to encounter immediate warm appreciation from the Soviet Union, any more than we should expect gratitude from the beneficiaries under our recovery program. We shall be acting for the sake of our own homes, our own children, and our own "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness." We shall be acting out of wise self-interest; and wise self-interest demands that we help men to save their self-respect as well as their lives and livelihood.

5. SOVIET INTRANSIGENCE

The changes suggested in our broad approach to foreign policy are difficult to undertake because they imply a basic re-examination of our present largely emotional attitude. This applies to us as a people even more than to our Government. The difficulty is greatly magnified by the fact that the Russians, for one reason or another, seem almost deliberately determined to be disagreeable.

We have had in Moscow a fairly long succession of officials, journalists, scientists, and engineers, many of whom went there with friendly feeling toward the Soviet Union. Almost to a man—or woman—they have come back puzzled and disappointed at the seemingly impenetrable wall of official unfriendliness they have encountered. Even the individual Soviet citizen, jovial and hospitable though he may be, seems coldly inhibited in his approach to a man-to-man discussion of the misunderstandings between his country and ours.

There is, moreover, no getting around the fact that, in official dealings, the Russians are often just plain ornery. Their representatives, usually limited to their instructions, have a tiresome way of repeating over and over again what they have said before, with little if any regard to whatever evidence or counter-arguments may have been brought forward by others. They give the impression of disregarding not only contrary opinion but also such facts as may be inconvenient. The effect upon even the most patient of men is to provoke a feeling of irritation and hopelessness.

There is no easy answer to this difficulty. It lies deeper than the ordinary rudeness of insecurity—deeper than the chip-on-the-shoulder aggressiveness of the Johnny-come-lately in international society. It cannot be cured quickly by mere patience and friendliness, because both are too often interpreted as weakness.

And yet, there is no alternative to maintaining an attitude of patience and friendliness, because if we, too, get ornery the result will be either a worse deadlock than we have today and an accelerated drift toward each of us becoming a garrison state* or else war—the kind of war in which one man could carry in a suitcase the means of destroying or poisoning the entire population of a great city.

It is truly a time which requires a difficult formula of statesmanship, for it demands courage tempered by wisdom, determination conditioned by respect for the rights of others, and strength made gentle by a sense of responsibility for mankind.

A terrible burden rests upon our public servants. A single word spoken carelessly or in anger by a responsible official may have fateful consequences. The more our public servants feel behind them the pressures of prejudice and fear, the greater will be their temptation to yield to irritation and weariness. The more they feel behind them the calm confidence of an informed people, the greater will be their serenity and effectiveness. If they are to be patient in the face of impatience, tolerant in the face of intolerance, and wise in the face of unwisdom, we, too, must learn patience, tolerance, and restraint.

Time is ticking fast. But—if we set our minds to it—there is still time enough for us to do what is necessary.

6. THE JOB IN HAND

The immediate job in hand consists of two parts, neither of which can succeed without the other.

The first part, which we have been discussing, consists in bringing about a reorientation of our broad approach to U.S.-U.S.S.R. relationships, to the United Nations, and to the over-all context in which the European Recovery Program is to operate.

*Both the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. are already spending something like a third of their national budgets on military and scientific preparedness.

The second part is to get the European Recovery Program and effective inflation controls passed by Congress. To do this, we must overcome several dangers.

First, there is the danger that we shall again be penny-wise and pound-foolish as we were in cutting down the loan to Britain. Here we encounter a combination of hostile elements. There is the Taft-Hoover school of "Let's save Europe if it doesn't cost too much." A variant of this theme reads: "How do we know that Europe can be saved—that it isn't already past saving?" In 1940 and 1941, these same men were taking much the same view of Lend-Lease. "How do we know," they said then, "that Hitler hasn't already won the war?" Then there is the penny-pinching school of Congressman Taber of New York, Chairman of the powerful House Appropriations Committee. Taber and his followers object to all Government expenditures on principle. They are fortified at present by the desire on the part of the majority of Congressmen to reduce taxes. These elements form a powerful combination.

Second, there is the danger that Congress may sabotage our own four-year program by refusing to treat it as a four-year program, appropriating only from year to year without giving any assurance that we will do the whole job. Here the economizers are joined by a number of Senators and Congressmen who visited Europe for a few weeks last summer and came back convinced that Europe needs our help, but not convinced that, even with our help, Europe would save itself, unless more or less forced by us to do so. If this view prevails, we should prevent the European countries from pursuing a planned course of reconstruction, and our whole recovery program would turn into a continuing relief operation.

Third, there is the danger—already discussed—that we may balk at taking those measures of allocation, rationing, and price control without which we shall be unable to prevent a runaway inflation. Here the politicians of both parties are playing ducks and drakes with the people of the United States—and with the destiny of the world. Republicans blame Democrats and Democrats blame Republicans for having let prices and wages get out of control. Each side protests a desire to take remedial action and accuses the other of playing politics. In November 1947, President Truman finally came, with obvious reluctance, to the conclusion which should have been apparent much earlier, that drastic anti-inflation measures were a necessity for the domestic welfare of the American people, quite apart from any need to extend aid to Europe. But his Cabinet is apparently divided on this issue and it will take more than the half-hearted attempts made to date to persuade a recalcitrant Republican Congress.

Every American wage earner, every American housewife, knows the result of past irresponsibility in dealing with this issue. Yet the politicians, in their infinite wisdom, keep telling each other that the American people won't stand for rationing, won't stand for allocation of scarce commodities, won't stand for price controls. Here is a real opportunity for the ordinary citizen to set Congress on the right path, to make Congress realize that it is not actually considering the supposed prejudices of the American people but merely the known prejudices of certain powerful big-business lobbies like the National Association of Manufacturers.

Failure to enact the minimum program finally requested by President Truman would not only wreck the European Recovery Program but our own economy as well. It might easily produce that final collapse of Western capitalism which the Marxists have so long predicted and which they so badly need to prove their case.

Finally, there is the danger that the European Recovery Program will be perverted from its purpose of promoting economic recovery by political excursions, political strings, and political purposes—in other words, that the ERP will revert back into an anti-communist or anti-Soviet crusade. This danger looms on both sides of the aisle in the two Houses of Congress. To avert it, we need a new aproach by the Administration, by its bipartisan team of policy-makers, by the leaders and aspirants of both parties, and—most of all—by the American people.

How can this be brought about in the short time that remains? What can the average citizen do to help?

The average citizen can, first of all, try to understand the problems with which his Government is confronted. To do this he needs to have someone put together the important events of recent history and to sketch in the background against which these events occurred. This attempt to do just that may have fallen short in many ways. But the main thing, it seems to me, is that we should at least make the effort to help one another understand what we are up against.

Given access to the facts about a problem, most Americans are quite capable of coming to their own conclusions. The question of what to do about those conclusions then arises. The first thing most of us like to do is to test them out on somebody else. That is not difficult. But then, supposing that our conclusions survive the test of discussion—perhaps modified to some extent—what then?

It may be trite to say, "Write your Senators and Congressmen." But it still remains the best answer. That is the way our system works—or should work. And, at this particular moment, a curious accident of history gives us an unusual chance to make it work.

When I say accident, I am not referring to the political derailment of Mr. Henry Wallace. I am referring to an unforeseen and very important change which has taken place in the machinery by which United States foreign policy is made.

Under our Constitution, the Upper House of Congress was given power and responsibility in foreign affairs by the provision which required that any treaty proposed by the Executive be ratified by a two-thirds majority of the Senate. Throughout our history, the Lower House has consequently played a minor part in foreign policy. But, under our Constitution, the Lower House was given the power of the purse—it alone may originate bills for the appropriation of taxpayers' money. The accident which has happened almost imperceptibly during recent years is that the making of American foreign policy has become very largely dependent upon the granting of vast appropriations of public funds. At this moment, there can be no effective United States foreign policy without substantial continuing appropriations, and these cannot be obtained unless the House of Representatives is willing to grant them. Thus, the Lower House has fallen into a role never intended for it by the founding fathers, a role to which it is new and unaccustomed.

Whether this be good or bad in itself is debatable. But one consequence of this accident may be of considerable benefit at this particular moment in our history. The average citizen has been given a greater direct leverage upon the conduct of this nation's foreign relations than he has ever had before.

A Congressman has a relatively small constituency in which even a small number of votes may be decisive. He lives in his district and, except in some of our big cities, is relatively accessible. Most Congressmen are personally acquainted with a considerable number of their constituents. In a sense never true before, there is now a direct line from every citizen to someone who is actually going to help make the far-reaching decisions which are going to be made, one way or another, in this year of decision. There is not only a direct line to the center of decision—there is someone on the other end who must listen. For, by another accident of history, we are in an election year.

Take, for example, the case of Congressman Walter Judd of Minnesota, a former missionary in China. Congressman Judd spearheaded the drive in the Lower House to force Secretary Marshall, against his own judgment, to include $18,000,000 for China in the Interim Aid Bill passed last December. The drive succeeded not only in forcing the Secretary of State to aid the Nanking Government, which he had condemned, but reduced winter aid to France, Italy, and Austria below the minimum considered absolutely essential. A similar drive, only on a much larger scale, will be made against the European Recovery Program—probably by the same forces—Governor Dewey, the Luce publications, ex-Ambassador Bullitt, and the Congressional group under Mr. Judd's leadership. The people of the 5th Congressional District in Minnesota have a responsibility for their Representative, and he has a responsibility toward them. Do they want him to oppose the Chinese policy which Secretary Marshall recommended after long and careful study on the spot? Do they want their Congressman to lend himself to the machinations of an East Coast pressure group whose motives are, to say the least, more consistent with the discarded Truman Doctrine than with the Administration's present policy? If they don't, they have the means at their disposal to do something about it.

The same thing is true of the comparatively small number of up-state New Yorkers who will this year either re-elect or fail to re-elect Congressman John Taber. As Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Mr. Taber is one of the key figures in Congress. If the people of Auburn, New York, approve of Mr. Taber's super-economy, well and good. If they do not, they owe it to the nation and to the world to instruct their Representative, and—if he fails to follow their instructions—to defeat him at the polls.

The future of the world lies largely in the hands of this nation. The hands of this nation—which are its public servants—will carry their great burden of responsibility safely across the narrow bridge which leads to peace, only if they are guided and upheld by the strong and firm voice of the American people.

If we believe in "Government by the people"—here is our chance to prove it.

To sum up once more:

There is a world economic crisis and a world political crisis. In dealing with the first, through the Marshall Plan, we are on the road to peace. In dealing with the second, through the Truman Doctrine, we are on the road to war. The basic premises of our political policy require re-examination.

APPENDIX

I

Excerpts from President Truman's Address at Baylor University

ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC POLICY
MAR. 6, 1947

THERE IS ONE thing that the Americans value even more than peace. It is freedom. Freedom of worship—freedom of speech—and freedom of enterprise. It must be true that the first two of these freedoms are related to the third. For, throughout history, freedom of worship and freedom of speech have been most frequently enjoyed in those societies that have accorded a considerable measure of freedom to individual enterprise.

Freedom has flourished where power has been dispersed. It has languished where power has been too highly centralized. So our international trade organization, devotion to freedom of enterprise, in the United States, has deeper roots than a desire to protect the profits of ownership. It is part and parcel of what we call American.

The pattern of international trade that is most conducive to freedom of enterprise is one in which the major decisions are made, not by Governments, but by private buyers and sellers, under conditions of active competition, and with proper safeguards against the establishment of monopolies and cartels.

Under such a system buyers make their purchases and sellers make their sales at whatever time and place and in whatever quantities they choose, relying for guidance on whatever prices the market may afford. Goods move from country to country in response to economic opportunities.

Governments may impose tariffs, but they do not dictate the quantity of trade, the sources of imports, or the destination of exports. Individual transactions are a matter of private choice.

This is the essence of free enterprise.

The pattern of trade that is least conducive to freedom of enterprise is one in which decisions are made by governments. Under such a system the quantity of purchases and sales, the sources of imports and the destination of exports are dictated by public officials.

In some cases trade may be conducted by the state. In others part or all of it may be left in private hands. But, even so, the trader is not free. Governments make all the important choices and he adjusts himself to them as best he can.

This was the pattern of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Unless we act, and act decisively, it will be the pattern of the next century.

Everywhere on earth the nations are under economic pressure. Countries that were devastated by the war are seeking to reconstruct their industries. Their need to import, in the months that lie ahead, will exceed their capacity to export. And so they feel that imports must be rigidly controlled.

Countries that have lagged in their development are seeking to industrialize. In order that new industries may be established, they, too, feel that competing imports must be rigidly controlled.

Nor is this all. The products of some countries are in great demand. But buyers outside their borders do not hold the money of these countries in quantities large enough to enable them to pay for the goods they want. And they find these moneys difficult to earn.

Importing countries, when they make their purchases, therefore seek to discriminate against countries whose currencies they do not possess. Here, again, they feel that imports must be rigidly controlled.

One way to cut down on imports is by curtailing the freedom of traders to use foreign money to pay for imported goods. But recourse to this device is now limited by the terms of the British Loan Agreement and by the rules of the International Monetary Fund. Another way to cut down on imports is by raising tariffs.

But if controls over trade are really to be tight tariffs are not enough. Even more drastic measures can be used. Quotas can be imposed on imports, product by product, country by country, and month by month. Importers can be forbidden to buy abroad without obtaining licenses. Those who buy more than is permitted can be fined or jailed. Everything that comes into a country can be kept within the limits determined by a central plan.

This is regimentation. And this is the direction in which much of the world is headed at the present time.

If this trend is not reversed the Government of the United States will be under pressure, sooner or later, to use these same devices to fight for markets and for raw materials. And if the Government were to yield to this pressure it would shortly find itself in the business of allocating foreign goods among importers and foreign markets among exporters and telling every trader what he could buy or sell, and how much, and when, and where.

This is precisely what we have been trying to get away from, as rapidly as possible, ever since the war. It is not the American way. It is not the way to peace.

Fortunately, an alternative has been offered to the world in the charter of the International Trade Organization that is to be considered at Geneva in the coming month. The charter would limit the present freedom of Governments to impose detailed administrative regulations on their foreign trade.

The International Trade Organization would require its member nations to confine such controls to exceptional cases, in the immediate future, and to abandon them entirely as soon as they can be abandoned.

The trade-agreement negotiations that will accompany the considerations of the charter should enable countries that are now in difficulty to work their way out of it by affording them readier access to the markets of the world. This program is designed to restore and preserve a trading system that is consistent with continuing freedom of enterprise in every country that chooses freedom for its own economy. It is a program that will serve the interests of other nations as well as those of the United States.

If these negotiations are to be successful we ourselves must make the same commitments that we ask of all the other nations of the world. We must be prepared to make concessions if we are to obtain concessions from the others in return. If these negotiations should fail our hope of an early restoration of an international order in which private trade can flourish would be lost. I say again, they must not fail.

The program that we have been discussing will make our foreign trade larger than it otherwise would be. This means that exports will be larger. It also means that imports will be larger.

Many people, it is true, are afraid of imports. They are afraid because they have assumed that we cannot take more products from abroad unless we produce just that much less at home.

This is not the case. The size of our market is not forever fixed. It is smaller when we attempt to isolate ourselves from any other countries in the world. It is larger when we have a thriving foreign trade.

Our imports were down to a billion dollars in 1932; they were up to five billion in 1946. But no one would contend that 1932 was a better year than 1946 for selling goods, or making profits, or finding jobs.

Business is poor when markets are small. Business is good when markets are big. It is the purpose of the coming negotiations to lower existing barriers to trade so that markets, everywhere, may grow.

I said to the Congress, when it last considered the extension of the Trade Agreement Act, and I now reiterate, that domestic interests will be safeguarded in this process by expanding trade. But there still are those who sincerely fear that the trade agreement negotiations will prove disastrous to the interests of particular producing groups.

I am sure that their misgivings are not well founded. The situation briefly is this:

(1) The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been on the books since 1934. It has been administered with painstaking care and strict impartiality. Some thirty agreements with other countries have been made. And trade has grown, to the great benefit of our economy.

(2) This Government does not intend, in the coming negotiations, to eliminate tariffs or to establish free trade. All that is contemplated is the reduction of tariffs, the removal of discriminations, and the achievement, not of free trade, but of freer trade.

(3) In the process of negotiations tariffs will not be cut across the board. Action will be selective; some rates may be cut substantially, others moderately, and others not at all.

(4) In return for these concessions we shall seek and obtain concessions from other countries to benefit our export trade.

(5) Millions of Americans—on farms, in factories, on the railroads, in export and import businesses, in shipping, aviation, banking and insurance, in wholesale establishments and in retail stores—depend upon foreign trade for some portion of their livelihood. If we are to protect the interests of these people, in their investments and their employment, we must see to it that our trade does not decline.

Take one of these groups as an example: We exported in 1946 over $3,000,000,000 worth of agricultural products alone, mostly grain, cotton, tobacco, dairy products and eggs. If we should lose a substantial part of this foreign market the incomes of over 6,000,000 farm families would be materially reduced and their buying power for the products of our factories greatly curtailed.

(6) There is no intention to sacrifice one group to the benefit of another group. Negotiations will be directed toward obtaining larger markets, both foreign and domestic, for the benefit of all.

(7) No tariff rate will be reduced until an exhaustive study has been made, until every person who wishes a hearing has been heard, and careful consideration has been given to his case.

(8) In every future agreement there will be a clause that permits this Government—or any other Government—to modify or withdraw a concession, if it should result, or threaten to result, in serious injury to a domestic industry. This is now required by the Executive Order which I issued on Feb. 25, following extensive conferences between officials in the Department of State and the majority leaders in the Senate.

All these points—the history of the trade-agreement operations, the way in which negotiations are conducted, the protection afforded by the safeguarding clause—should provide assurance, if assurance is needed, that domestic interests will not be injured.

The policy of reducing barriers to trade is a settled policy of this Government. It is embodied in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, fathered and administered for many years by Cordell Hull. It is reflected in the charter of the International Trade Organization. It is one of the cornerstones of our plans for peace. It is a policy from which we cannot—and must not—turn aside.

To those among us—and there are still a few—who would seek to undermine this policy for partisan advantage and go back to the period of high tariffs and economic isolation I can only say this: Times have changed. Our position in the world has changed. The temper of our people has changed. The slogans of 1930 or of 1896 are sadly out of date. Isolationism, after two world wars, is a confession of mental and moral bankruptcy.

Happily, our foreign economic policy does not now rest upon a base of narrow partisanship. Leaders in both parties have expressed their faith in its essential purposes. Here, as elsewhere in our foreign relations, I shall welcome a continuation of bipartisan support.

Our people are united. They have come to a realization of their responsibilities. They are ready to assume their role of leadership. They are determined upon an international order in which peace and freedom shall endure.

Peace and freedom are not easily achieved. They cannot be attained by force. They come from mutual understanding and cooperation, from a willingness to deal fairly with every friendly nation in all matters—political and economic. Let us resolve to continue to do just that, now and in the future.

If other nations of the world will do the same, we can reach the goals of permanent peace and world freedom.

II

President Truman's Message to Congress

The "TRUMAN DOCTRINE"

MAR. 12, 1947

MR. PRESIDENT, Mr. Speaker, members of the Congress of the United States:

The gravity of the situation which confronts the world today necessitates my appearance before a joint session of the Congress.

The foreign policy and the national security of this country are involved.

One aspect of the present situation, which I wish to present to you at this time for your consideration and decision, concerns Greece and Turkey.

The United States has received from the Greek government an urgent appeal for financial and economic assistance. Preliminary reports from the American economic mission now in Greece and reports from the American Ambassador in Greece corroborate the statement of the Greek government that assistance is imperative if Greece is to survive as a free nation.

I do not believe that the American people and the Congress wish to turn a deaf ear to the appeal of the Greek government.

Greece is not a rich country. Lack of sufficient natural resources has always forced the Greek people to work hard to make both ends meet. Since 1940 this industrious and peace-loving country has suffered invasion, four years of cruel enemy occupation and bitter internal strife.

When forces of liberation entered Greece they found that the retreating Germans had destroyed virtually all the railways, roads, port facilities, communications and merchant marine. More than a thousand villages had been burned. Eighty-five per cent of the children were tubercular. Livestock, poultry and draft animals had almost disappeared. Inflation had wiped out practically all savings.

As a result of these tragic conditions, a militant minority, exploiting human want and misery, was able to create political chaos which, until now, has made economic recovery impossible.

Greece is today without funds to finance the importation of those goods which are essential to bare subsistence. Under these circumstances the people of Greece cannot make progress in solving their problems of reconstruction. Greece is in desperate need of financial and economic assistance to enable it to resume purchases of food, clothing, fuel and seeds. These are indispensable for the subsistence of its people and are obtainable only from abroad. Greece must have help to import the goods necessary to restore internal order and security so essential for economic and political recovery.

The Greek government has also asked for the assistance of experienced American administrators, economists and technicians to insure that the financial and other aid given to Greece shall be used effectively in creating a stable and self-sustaining economy and in improving its public administration.

The very existence of the Greek state is today threatened by the terrorist activities of several thousand armed men, led by Communists, who defy the government's authority at a number of points, particularly along the northern boundaries. A commission appointed by the United Nations Security Council is at present investigating disturbed conditions in northern Greece on the one hand and Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia on the other.

Meanwhile, the Greek government is unable to cope with the situation. The Greek army is small and poorly equipped. It needs supplies and equipment if it is to restore the authority of the government throughout Greek territory.

Greece must have assistance if it is to become a self-supporting and self-respecting democracy.

The United States must supply that assistance. We have already extended to Greece certain types of relief and economic aid but these are inadequate.

There is no other country to which democratic Greece can turn.

No other nation is willing and able to provide the necessary support for a democratic Greek government.

The British government, which has been helping Greece, can give no further financial or economic aid after March 31. Great Britain finds itself under the necessity of reducing or liquidating its commitments in several parts of the world, including Greece.

We have considered how the United Nations might assist in this crisis. But the situation is an urgent one requiring immediate action, and the United Nations and its related organizations are not in a position to extend help of the kind that is required.

It is important to note that the Greek government has asked for our aid in utilizing effectively the financial and other assistance we may give to Greece, and in improving its public administration. It is of the utmost importance that we supervise the use of any funds made available to Greece, in such a manner that each dollar spent will count toward making Greece self-supporting, and will help to build an economy in which a healthy democracy can flourish.

No government is perfect. One of the chief virtues of a democracy, however, is that its defects are always visible and under democratic processes can be pointed out and corrected. The government of Greece is not perfect. Nevertheless it represents 80 per cent of the members of the Greek Parliament who were chosen in an election last year. Foreign observers, including 692 Americans, considered this election to be a fair expression of the views of the Greek people.

The Greek government has been operating in an atmosphere of chaos and extremism. It has made mistakes. The extension of aid by this country does not mean that the United States condones everything that the Greek government has done or will do. We have condemned in the past, and we condemn now, extremist measures of the Right or the Left. We have in the past advised tolerance, and we advise tolerance now.

Greece's neighbor, Turkey, also deserves our attention.

The future of Turkey as an independent and economically sound state is clearly no less important to the freedom-loving people of the world than the future of Greece. The circumstances in which Turkey finds itself today are considerably different from those of Greece. Turkey has been spared the disasters that have beset Greece. And during the war the United States and Great Britain furnished Turkey with material aid. Nevertheless, Turkey now needs our support.

Since the war, Turkey has sought financial assistance from Great Britain and the United States for the purpose of effecting that modernization necessary for the maintenance of its national integrity.

That integrity is essential to the preservation of order in the Middle East.

The British government has informed us that, owing to its own difficulties, it can no longer extend financial or economic aid to Turkey.

As in the case of Greece, if Turkey is to have the assistance it needs, the United States must supply it. We are the only country able to provide that help.

I am fully aware of the broad implications involved if the United States extends assistance to Greece and Turkey, and I shall discuss these implications with you at this time.

One of the primary objectives of the foreign policy of the United States is the creation of conditions in which we and other nations will be able to work out a way of life free from coercion. This was a fundamental issue in the war with Germany and Japan. Our victory was won over countries which sought to impose their will, and their way of life, upon other nations.

To insure the peaceful development of nations, free from coercion, the United States has taken a leading part in establishing the United Nations. The United Nations is designed to make possible lasting freedom and independence for all its members. We shall not realize our objectives, however, unless we are willing to help free people to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes. This is no more than a frank recognition that totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples, by direct or indirect aggression, undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States.

The peoples of a number of countries of the world have recently had totalitarian regimes forced upon them against their will. The government of the United States has made frequent protests against coercion and intimidation in violation of the Yalta agreement, in Poland, Romania and Bulgaria. I must also state that in a number of other countries there have been similar developments.

At the present moment in world history nearly every nation must choose between alternative ways of life. The choice is too often not a free one.

One way of life is based upon the will of the majority, and is distinguished by free institutions, representative government, free elections, guaranties of individual liberty, freedom of speech and religion and freedom from political oppression.

The second way of life is based upon the will of a minority forcibly imposed upon the majority. It relies upon terror and oppression, a controlled press and radio, fixed elections and the suppression of personal freedoms.

I believe that it must be the policy of the United States to support peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures.

I believe that we must assist free peoples to work out their own destinies in their own way.

I believe that our help should be primarily through economic and financial aid which is essential to economic stability and orderly political processes.

The world is not static, and the status quo is not sacred. But we cannot allow changes in the status quo in violation of the charter of the United Nations by such methods as coercion, or by such subterfuges as political infiltration. In helping free and independent nations to maintain their freedom the United States will be giving effect to the principles of the charter of the United Nations.

It is necessary only to glance at a map to realize that the survival and integrity of the Greek nation are of grave importance in a much wider situation. If Greece should fall under the control of an armed minority, the effect upon its neighbor, Turkey, would be immediate and serious. Confusion and disorder might well spread throughout the entire Middle East.

Moreover, the disappearance of Greece as an independent state would have a profound effect upon those countries in Europe whose peoples are struggling against great difficulties to maintain their freedoms and their independence while they repair the damages of war.

It would be an unspeakable tragedy if these countries, which have struggled so long against overwhelming odds, should lose that victory for which they sacrificed so much. Collapse of free institutions and loss of independence would be disastrous not only for them but for the world. Discouragement and possibly failure would quickly be the lot of neighboring peoples striving to maintain their freedom and independence.

Should we fail to aid Greece and Turkey in this fateful hour, the effect will be far-reaching to the West as well as to the East.

We must take immediate and resolute action.

I therefore ask the Congress to provide authority for assistance to Greece and Turkey in the amount of $400,000,000 for the period ending June 30, 1948. In requesting these funds, I have taken into consideration the maximum amount of relief assistance which would be furnished to Greece out of the $350,000,000 which I recently requested that the Congress authorize for the prevention of starvation and suffering in countries devastated by the war.

In addition to funds, I ask the Congress to authorize the detail of American civilian and military personnel to Greece and Turkey, at the request of those countries, to assist in the tasks of reconstruction, and for the purpose of supervising the use of such financial and material assistance as may be furnished. I recommend that authority also be provided for the instruction and training of selected Greek and Turkish personnel.

Finally, I ask that the Congress provide authority which will permit the speediest and most effective use, in terms of needed commodities, supplies and equipment, of such funds as may be authorized.

If further funds, or further authority, should be needed for purposes indicated in this message, I shall not hesitate to bring the situation before the Congress. On this subject the executive and the legislative branches of the government must work together.

This is a serious course upon which we embark.

I would not recommend it except that the alternative is much more serious.

The United States contributed $341,000,000,000 toward winning World War II. This is an investment in world freedom and world peace.

The assistance that I am recommending for Greece and Turkey amounts to little more than one-tenth of 1 per cent of this investment. It is only common sense that we should safeguard this investment and make sure that it was not in vain.

The seeds of totalitarian regimes are nurtured by misery and want. They spread and grow in the evil soil of poverty and strife. They reach their full growth when the hope of a people for a better life has died.

We must keep that hope alive.

The free peoples of the world look to us for support in maintaining their freedoms.

If we falter in our leadership, we may endanger the peace of the world—and we shall surely endanger the welfare of our own nation.

Great responsibilities have been placed upon us by the swift movement of events.

I am confident that the Congress will face these responsibilities squarely.

III

Secretary Marshall's Radio Report to the Nation

ON THE MOSCOW CONFERENCE
APR. 28, 1947

TONIGHT I hope to make clearly understandable the fundamental nature of the issues discussed at the Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers.

This conference dealt with the very heart of the peace for which we are struggling. It dealt with the vital center of Europe—Germany and Austria—an area of large and skilled population, of great resources and industrial plants, an area which has twice in recent times brought the world to the brink of disaster.

In the Moscow negotiations all the disagreements which were so evident during the conferences regarding the Italian and Balkan treaties came into sharp focus and remained, in effect, unsolved.

Problems which bear directly on the future of our civilization cannot be disposed of by general talk or vague formulae—by what Lincoln called "pernicious abstractions."

They require concrete solutions for definite and extremely complicated questions—questions which have to do with boundaries, with power to prevent military aggression, with people who have bitter memories, with the production and control of things which are essential to the lives of millions of people.

You have been kept well informed by the press and radio of the daily activities of the council, and much of what I have to say may seem repetitious. But the extremely complicated nature of the three major issues we considered makes it appear desirable for me to report in some detail the problems as I saw them in my meetings at the conference table.

There was a reasonable possibility, we had hoped a probability, of completing in Moscow a peace treaty for Austria and a four-power pact to bind together our four governments to guarantee the demilitarization of Germany. As for the German peace treaty and related but more current German problems, we had hoped to reach agreement on a directive for the guidance of our deputies in their work preparatory to the next conference.

In a statement such as this it is not practicable to discuss the numerous issues which continued in disagreement at the conference. It will suffice, I think, to call attention to the fundamental problems whose solution would probably lead to the quick adjustment of many other differences.

It is important to the understanding of the conference that the complex character of the problems should be understood, together with their immediate effect on the people of Europe in the coming months. To cite a single example, more coal is most urgently needed throughout Europe for factories, for utilities, for railroads, and for the people in their homes. More coal for Allied countries cannot be mined and delivered until the damaged mines, mine machinery, railroad communications and like facilities are rehabilitated. This rehabilitation, however, depends on more steel, and more steel depends in turn on more coal for steel making. Therefore, and this is the point to be kept in mind, while the necessary rehabilitation is in progress, less coal would be available in the immediate future for the neighboring Allied states.

But less coal means less employment for labor, and a consequent delay in the production of goods for export to bring money for the purchase of food and necessities. Therefore, the delay necessary to permit rehabilitation of the mines so vitally affects France that the settlement of this matter has become for her a critical issue. All neighboring states and Great Britain and the Soviet Union are directly affected in various ways since coal is required for German production of goods for export sufficient to enable her to buy the necessary imports of foods, et cetera, for much of which the United States is now providing the funds.

Moreover, in the background of this coal issue which is directly related to steel production, is the important consideration of the build-up of heavy industry in Germany, which could later again become a threat to the peace of the world. I cite this single example to illustrate the complications which are involved in these negotiations.

The Allied control council in Berlin presented a detailed report of the many problems concerned with the political, military, economic and financial situation under the present military government of Germany. In connection with these matters, the ministers considered the form and scope of the provisional political organization for Germany, and the procedure to be followed in the preparation of the German peace treaty.

The German negotiations involved not only the security of Europe and the world, but the prosperity of all of Europe. While our mission was to consider the terms of a treaty to operate over a long term of years, we were faced with immediate issues which vitally concerned the impoverished and suffering people of Europe who are crying for help, for coal, for food and for most of the necessities of life, and the majority of whom are bitterly disposed toward the Germany that brought about this disastrous situation. The issues also vitally concern the people of Britain and the United States who cannot continue to pour out hundreds of millions of dollars for Germany because current measures were not being taken to terminate expeditiously the necessity for such appropriations.

The critical and fundamental German problems to which I shall confine myself are: (a) the limits to the powers of the central government; (b) the character of the economic system and its relation to all of Europe; (c) the character and extent of reparations; (d) the boundaries for the German state; and (e) the manner in which all Allied states at war with Germany are represented in the drafting and confirmation of the treaty.

All the members of the council of foreign ministers are in apparent agreement as to the establishment of a German state on a self-supporting, democratic basis, with limitations imposed to prevent the re-establishment of military power.

This issue of the degree of centralization of the further German state is of greatest importance. Excessive concentration of power is peculiarly dangerous in a country like Germany which has no strong traditions regarding the rights of the individual and the rights of the community to control the exercise of governmental power. The Soviet Union appears to favor a strong central government. The United States and United Kingdom are opposed to such a government, because they think it could be too readily converted to the domination of a regime similar to the Nazis. They favor a central government of carefully limited powers, all other powers being reserved to the states, or laender as they are called in Germany. The French are willing to agree only to very limited responsibilities for the central government. They fear a repetition of the seizure of power over the whole of Germany carried out by the Hitler regime in 1933.

Under ordinary circumstances there are always strong and differing points of view regarding the character of a governmental reorganization. In this case there are great and justifiable fears regarding the resurrection of German military power and concern over expressed or concealed desires for quite other reasons.

Regarding the character of the German economic system and its relation to all of Europe, the disagreements are even more serious and difficult of adjustment. German economy at the present time is crippled by the fact that there is no unity of action, and the rehabilitation of Germany to the point where she is self-supporting demands immediate decision.

There is a declared agreement in the desire for economic unity in Germany, but when it comes to the actual terms to regulate such unity there are wide and critical differences. One of the most serious difficulties encountered in the effort to secure economic unity has been the fact that the Soviet-occupied zone has operated practically without regard to the other zones and has made few if any reports of what has been occurring in that zone. There has been little or no disposition to proceed on a basis of reciprocity and there has been a refusal to disclose the availability of foodstuffs, and the degree or character of reparations taken out of this zone.

This unwillingness of the Soviet authorities to co-operate in establishing a balanced economy for Germany as agreed upon at Potsdam has been the most serious check on the development of a self-supporting Germany, and a Germany capable of providing coal and other necessities for the neighboring states who have always been dependent on Germany for these items. After long and futile efforts to secure a working accord in this matter, the British and American zones were combined for the improvement of the economic situation, meaning the free movement of excess supplies or produce available in one zone to another where there is a shortage. Our continuing invitation to the French and Soviets to join in the arrangement still exists. This merger is bitterly attacked by the Soviet authorities as a breach of the Potsdam agreement and as a first step toward the dismemberment of Germany, ignoring the plain fact that their refusal to carry out that agreement was the sole cause of the merger. It is difficult to regard their attacks as anything but propaganda designed to divert attention from the Soviet failure to implement the economic unity agreed upon at Potsdam. Certainly some progress toward economic unity in Germany is better than none.

The character of the control over the Ruhr industrial center, the greatest concentration of coal and heavy industries in Europe, continues a matter of debate. It cannot be decided merely for the purpose of reaching an agreement. Vitally important considerations and future consequences are involved.

The question of reparations is of critical importance as it affects almost every other question under discussion. This issue naturally makes a tremendous appeal to the people of the allied states who suffered the terrors of German military occupation and the destruction of their cities and villages.

The results of the Versailles treaty of 1919 regarding payment of reparations on a basis of dollars, and the difficulties encountered by the Reparations Commission appointed after Yalta in agreeing upon the dollar evaluation of reparations in kind convinced President Truman and his advisers considering the question at Potsdam that some other basis for determining reparations should be adopted if endless friction and bitterness were to be avoided in future years. They succeeded in getting agreement to the principle of reparations to be rendered out of capital assets—that is, the transfer of German plants, machinery, et cetera, to the allied powers concerned.

It developed at the Moscow conference that the Soviet officials flatly disagreed with President Truman's and Mr. Byrnes' understanding of the written terms of this agreement. The British have much the same view of this matter as the United States.

We believe that no reparations from current production were contemplated by the Potsdam agreement. The Soviets strongly oppose this view. They hold that the previous discussions and agreements at Yalta authorize the taking of billions of dollars in reparations out of current production. This would mean that a substantial portion of the daily production of German factories would be levied on for reparations payments, which in turn would mean that the recovery of Germany sufficiently to be self-supporting would be long delayed. It would also mean that the plan and the hope of our government, that Germany's economic recovery by the end of three years would permit the termination of American appropriations for the support of the German inhabitants of our zone, could not be realized.

The issue is one of great complications, for which agreement must be found in order to administer Germany as an economic whole as the four powers claim that they wish to do.

There is, however, general agreement among the Allies that the matter of the factories and equipment to be removed from Germany as reparations should be re-examined. They recognize the fact that a too drastic reduction in Germany's industrial set-up will not only make it difficult for Germany to become self-supporting, but will retard the economic recovery of Europe. The United States has indicated that it would be willing to study the possibility of a limited amount of reparations from current production to compensate for plants, previously scheduled to be removed as reparations to various allied countries, which it now appears should be left in Germany; it being understood that deliveries from current production are not to increase the financial burden of the occupying powers or to retard the repayment to them of the advances they have made to keep the German economy from collapsing. The Soviet government has made no response to this suggestion.

The issue regarding boundaries to be established for Germany presents a serious disagreement and another example of complete disagreement as to the meaning of the pronouncement on this subject by the heads of the three powers. In the rapid advance of the Soviet armies in the final phase of the war, millions of Germans in eastern Germany fled to the Oder River. The Soviet armies, prior to Potsdam, had placed Poles in charge of this area largely evacuated by the German population. That was the situation that confronted President Truman at Potsdam. Under the existing circumstances, the President accepted the situation for the time being with the agreed three-power statement, "the heads of government reaffirm their opinion that the final delimitation of the western frontier of Poland should await the peace settlement."

The Soviet foreign minister now states that a final agreement on the frontier between Germany and Poland was reached at Potsdam and the expression I have just quoted merely referred to the formal confirmation of the already agreed upon frontier at the peace settlement, thus leaving only technical delimitation to be considered.

The United States Government recognized the commitment made at Yalta to give fair compensation to Poland in the west for the territory east of the Curzon line incorporated into the Soviet Union. But the perpetuation of the present temporary line between Germany and Poland would deprive Germany of territory which before the war provided more than a fifth of the foodstuffs on which the German population depended. It is clear that in any event Germany will be obliged to support, within much restricted boundaries, not only her pre-war population but a considerable number of Germans from Eastern Europe. To a certain extent this situation is unavoidable, but we must not agree to its aggravation. We do not want Poland to be left with less resources than she had before the war. She is entitled to more, but it will not help Poland to give her frontiers which will probably create difficulties for her in the future. Wherever the frontiers are drawn, they should not constitute barriers to trade and commerce upon which the well-being of Europe is dependent. We must look toward a future where a democratic Poland and a democratic Germany will be good neighbors.

There is disagreement regarding the manner in which the Allied powers at war with Germany are to participate in the drafting and confirmation of the German peace treaty. There are fifty-one states involved. Of these, in addition to the four principal Allied powers, eighteen were directly engaged in the fighting, some, of course, to a much greater extent than others. It is the position of the United States that all Allied states at war with Germany should be given an opportunity to participate to some degree in the drafting and in the making of the peace treaty, but we recognize that there would be very practical difficulties if not impossibilities in attempting to draft a treaty with fifty-one nations participating equally at all stages. Therefore, the United States government has endeavored to secure agreement on a method which involves two different procedures, depending on whether or not the state concerned actually participated in the fighting. But all would have an opportunity to present their views and rebut other views, and all would sit in the peace conference to adopt a treaty.

It is difficult to get the agreement of the countries that have suffered the horrors of German occupation and were involved in heavy losses in hard fighting to accept participation in the determination of the treaty terms by countries who suffered no losses in men or material and were remote from the fighting. The United States, however, regards it as imperative that all the states who were at war with Germany should have some voice in the settlement imposed on Germany.

The proposal for the four-power pact was advanced by the United States government a year ago. It was our hope that the prompt acceptance of this simple pact, insuring in advance of the detailed German peace settlement that the United States would actively co-operate to prevent the rearmament of Germany, would eliminate fears as to the future and would facilitate the making of a peace suitable to Europe's present and future needs. It was our hope that such a commitment by the United States would relieve the fear of the other European powers that the United States would repeat its actions following the first World War, insisting on various terms for the peace settlement and then withdrawing from a position of any responsibility for their enforcement. It was thought that the compact of the four powers to guarantee the continued demilitarization of Germany would reassure the world that we were in complete accord in our intention to secure the peace of Europe.

However, the Soviet government met our proposition with a series of amendments which would have completely changed the character of the pact, making it in effect a complicated peace treaty, and including in the amendments most of the points regarding the German problem concerning which there was, as I have pointed out, serious disagreement. I was forced to the conclusion by this procedure that the Soviet government either did not desire such a pact or was following a course calculated to delay any immediate prospect of its adoption. Whether or not an agreement can finally be reached remains to be seen, but the United States, I think, should adhere to its present position and insist that the pact be kept simple and confined to its one basic purpose—to keep Germany incapable of waging war.

The negotiations regarding the Austrian treaty resulted in agreement on all but a few points, but these were basic and of fundamental importance. The Soviet Union favors and the other governments oppose the payment of reparations and the cession of Carinthia to Yugoslavia.

But the Soviet government attached much more importance to its demand that the German assets in Austria which are to be hers by the terms of the Potsdam agreement should include those assets which the other three powers consider to have been taken from Austria and the citizens of the United Nations by force or duress by Hitler and his Nazi government following the taking over of Austria by military force in March, 1938. The Soviet government refused to consider the word duress, which in the opinion of the other three powers would be the critical basis for determining what property, that is, business, factories, land, forests, et cetera, was truly German property and not the result of seizures by terroristic procedure, intimidation, fake business acquisition, and so forth. The Soviet Union also refused to consider any process of mediation to settle the disputes that are bound to arise in such circumstances, nor would they clearly agree to have such property as they receive as German assets subject to Austrian law in the same manner as other foreign investments are subject to Austrian law.

The acceptance of the Soviet position would mean that such a large portion of Austrian economy would be removed from her legal control that Austrian chances of surviving as an independent self-supporting state would be dubious. She would in effect be but a puppet state.

All efforts to find a compromise solution were unavailing. The United States, in my opinion, could not commit itself to a treaty which involved such manifest injustices and, what is equally important, would create an Austria so weak and helpless as to be the source of great danger in the future. In the final session of the conference it was agreed to appoint a commission to meet in Vienna May 12 to reconsider our disagreements and to have a committee of experts examine into the question of the German assets in Austria. Certainly prompt action on the Austrian treaty is necessary to fulfill our commitment to recognize Austria as a free and independent state and to relieve her from the burdens of occupation.

Complicated as these issues are there runs through them a pattern as to the character and control of central Europe to be established. The Foreign Ministers agreed that their task was to lay the foundations of a central government for Germany, to bring about the economic unity of Germany essential for its own existence as well as for European recovery, to establish workable boundaries and to set up a guaranteed control through a four-power treaty. Austria was to be promptly relieved of occupation burdens and treated as a liberated and independent country.

Agreement was made impossible at Moscow because, in our view, the Soviet Union insisted upon proposals which would have established in Germany a centralized government, adapted to the seizure of absolute control of a country which would be doomed economically through inadequate area and excessive population, and would be mortgaged to turn over a large part of its production as reparations, principally to the Soviet Union. In another form the same mortgage upon Austria was claimed by the Soviet delegation.

Such a plan, in the opinion of the United States delegation, not only involved indefinite American subsidy, but could result only in a deteriorating economic life in Germany and Europe and the inevitable emergence of dictatorship and strife.

Freedom of information for which our government stands inevitably involves appeals to public opinion. But at Moscow propaganda appeals to passion and prejudice appeared to take the place of appeals to reason and understanding. Charges were made by the Soviet delegation and interpretation given the Potsdam and other agreements, which varied completely from the facts as understood or as factually known by the American delegation.

There was naturally much uncertainty regarding the real intention or motives of the various proposals submitted or of the objections taken to the proposals. This is inevitable in any international negotiation.

However, despite the disagreements referred to and the difficulties encountered, possibly greater progress toward final settlement was made than is realized.

The critical differences were for the first time brought into the light and now stand clearly defined so that future negotiations can start with a knowledge of exactly what the issues are that must be settled. The deputies now understand the precise views of each government on the various issues discussed. With that they can possibly resolve some differences and surely can further clarify the problems by a studied presentation of the state of agreement and disagreement. That is the best that can be hoped for in the next few months. It marks some progress, however painfully slow. These issues are matters of vast importance to the lives of the people of Europe and to the future course of world history. We must not compromise on great principles in order to achieve agreement for agreement's sake. Also, we must sincerely try to understand the point of view of those with whom we differ.

In this connection, I think it proper to refer to a portion of a statement made to me by Generalissimo Stalin. He said with reference to the conference, that these were only the first skirmishes and brushes of reconnaissance forces on this question. Differences had occurred in the past on other questions, and as a rule, after people had exhausted themselves in dispute they then recognized the necessity of compromise. It was possible that no great success would be achieved at this session, but he thought that compromises were possible on all the main questions, including demilitarization, political structure of Germany, reparations and economic unity. It was necessary to have patience and not become pessimistic.

I sincerely hope that the Generalissimo is correct in the view he expressed and that it implies a greater spirit of co-operation by the Soviet delegation in future conferences. But we cannot ignore the factor of time involved here. The recovery of Europe has been far slower than had been expected. Disintegrating forces are becoming evident. The patient is sinking while the doctors deliberate. So I believe that action cannot await compromise through exhaustion. New issues arise daily. Whatever action is possible to meet these pressing problems must be taken without delay.

Finally, I should comment on one aspect of the matter which is of transcendent importance to all our people. While I did not have the benefit, as did Mr. Byrnes, of the presence of the two leading members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I did have the invaluable assistance of Mr. Dulles, a distinguished representative of the Republican party as well as a recognized specialist in foreign relations and in the processes of international negotiations and treaty-making. As a matter of fact, the bi-partisan character of the American attitude in the present conduct of foreign affairs was clearly indicated by the strong and successful leadership displayed in the Senate during the period of this conference by Senators Vandenberg and Connally in the debate over a development of our foreign policy of momentous importance to the American people. The fact that there was such evident unity of purpose in Washington was of incalculable assistance to me in Moscow.

The state of the world today and the position of the United States make mandatory, in my opinion, a unity of action on the part of the American people. It is for that reason that I have gone into such lengthy detail in reporting my views on the conference.

IV

Undersecretary Acheson's Speech at Cleveland, Miss.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF RECONSTRUCTION
MAY 8, 1947

YOU WHO live and work in this rich agricultural region, whose daily lives are concerned with the growth and marketing of cotton and corn and other agricultural products, must derive a certain satisfaction from the fact that the greatest affairs of state never get very far from the soil.

When Secretary of State Marshall returned from the recent meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Moscow he did not talk to us about ideologies or armies. He talked about food and fuel and their relation to industrial production, and the relation of industrial production to the organization of Europe, and the relation of the organization of Europe to the peace of the world.

The devastation of war has brought us back to elementals, to the point where we see clearly how short is the distance from food and fuel either to peace or to anarchy.

Here are some of the basic facts of life with which we are primarily concerned today in the conduct of foreign relations:

The first is that most of the countries of Europe and Asia are today in a state of physical destruction or economic dislocation, or both. Planned, scientific destruction of the enemy's resources carried out by both sides during the war has left factories destroyed, fields impoverished and without fertilizer or machinery to get them back to shape, transportation systems wrecked, populations scattered and on the borderline of starvation, and long-established business and trading connections disrupted.

Another grim fact of international life is that two of the greatest workshops of Europe and Asia—Germany and Japan—upon whose production Europe and Asia were to an important degree dependent before the war, have hardly been able even to begin the process of reconstruction because of the lack of a peace settlement. As we have seen, recent efforts at Moscow to make progress towards a settlement for Germany and Austria have ended with little accomplishment. Meanwhile, political instability in some degree retards revival in nearly every country of Europe and Asia.

A third factor is that unforeseen disasters—what the lawyers call "acts of God"—have occurred to the crops of Europe. For two successive years unusually severe droughts have cut down food production. And during the past winter storms and floods and excessive cold unprecedented in recent years have swept northern Europe and England with enormous damage to agricultural and fuel production. These disasters have slowed down the already slow pace of reconstruction, have impeded recovery of exports, and have obliged many countries to draw down irreplaceable reserves of gold and foreign exchange, which had been earmarked for the importation of reconstruction materials, for the purchase of food and fuel for subsistence.

The accumulation of these grim developments has produced a disparity between production in the United States and production in the rest of the world that is staggering in its proportions. The United States has been spared physical destruction during the war. Moreover, we have been favored with unusually bountiful agricultural crops in recent years. Production in this country is today running at the annual rate of 210 billion dollars.

Responding to this highly abnormal relationship between production in the United States and production in the rest of the world, the United States Government has already authorized and is carrying out an extensive program of relief and reconstruction. We have contributed nearly 3 billion dollars to foreign relief. We have taken the lead in the organization of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund, and have subscribed to these two institutions to the extent of almost 6 billion dollars. We have increased the capacity of the Export-Import Bank to make loans abroad by almost 3 billion dollars. We have made a direct loan of 3¾ billion dollars to Great Britain. We are proposing this year to contribute a half billion dollars for relief and reconstruction in the Philippines, and a billion dollars to relief in occupied areas. The President's recommendations for aid to Greece and Turkey to the extent of 400 million dollars and for post-UNRRA relief to the extent of 350 million dollars are still under consideration by Congress. And there are a few other smaller items.

These measures of relief and reconstruction have been only in part suggested by humanitarianism. Your Congress has authorized and your Government is carrying out a policy of relief and reconstruction today chiefly as a matter of national self-interest. For it is generally agreed that until the various countries of the world get on their feet and become self-supporting there can be no political or economic stability in the world and no lasting peace or prosperity for any of us. Without outside aid, the process of recovery in many countries would take so long as to give rise to hopelessness and despair. In these conditions freedom and democracy and the independence of nations could not long survive, for hopeless and hungry people often resort to desperate measures. The war will not be over until the people of the world can again feed and clothe themselves and face the future with some degree of confidence.

The contribution of the United States towards world livelihood and reconstruction is best measured today not in terms of money but in terms of the commodities which we ship abroad. It is commodities—food, clothing, coal, steel, machinery—that the world needs, and it is commodities that we must concentrate our attention upon.

Our exports of goods and services to the rest of the world during the current year, 1947, are estimated to total 16 billion dollars, an all-time peace-time high. Before the war our exports of goods and services fluctuated around 4 billion dollars annually.

It is difficult to imagine 16 billion dollars' worth of commodities. This represents one month's work for each man and woman in the United States, one month's output from every farm, factory, and mine.

Let me give you another indication of the extent of our exports. The volume of commodities now moving out of east coast and Gulf ports of the United States is twice as great as the peak volume which moved out of those ports during the war when we were transporting and supplying not only our own huge armies abroad but a tremendous volume of lend-lease supplies.

Our exports this year are perhaps the maximum, in quantity, that is likely to be exported abroad in the next few years. At the same time these exports are probably the minimum that we should make available to the world.

It is extremely difficult under present circumstances to increase the volume of our exports further. For in this country, too, there is a great demand for commodities, and foreign customers must compete with American customers. The character and composition of our exports will probably change, with lesser quantities of food, fuel, and raw materials being exported and increased amounts of steel, machinery, and other manufactured products going abroad. But the total volume of exports is not likely to increase substantially until the world gets soundly on its feet and a genuine world prosperity may carry a healthy multilateral trade to higher levels.

In return for the commodities and services which we expect to furnish the world this year, we estimate that we will receive commodities and services from abroad to the value of about 8 billion dollars. This is just about half as much as we are exporting. This volume of imports is equal to about two weeks' work of all the factories, farms, mines, and laborers of the United States, and consists largely of things which are not produced in this country in sufficient quantity. We wish that the imports were larger, but the war-devastated world is just not able to supply more.

The difference between the value of the goods and services which foreign countries must buy from the United States this year and the value of the goods and services they are able to supply to us this year will therefore amount to the huge sum of about 8 billion dollars.

How are foreigners going to get the U.S. dollars necessary to cover this huge difference? And how are they going to get the U.S. dollars to cover a likely difference of nearly the same amount next year? These are some of the most important questions in international relations today.

Of this year's difference between imports and exports, more than 5 billion dollars is being financed by loans and grants-in-aid from the United States Government through such instruments as direct relief, the Export-Import Bank, the International Bank, the International Fund, and the loan to Great Britain. Funds for this purpose have already been authorized by Congress. The remainder of this year's deficit will be covered by private investments, remittances of American citizens abroad, and by drawing down the extremely limited foreign reserves of gold and foreign exchange.

But what of next year, and the year after that? Continued political instability and "acts of God" are retarding recovery to a greater degree than had been anticipated. The extreme need of foreign countries for American products is likely, therefore, to continue undiminished in 1948, while the capacity of foreign countries to pay in commodities will probably be only slightly increased. Under existing authorizations, considerable sums will be available to offset next year's deficit. But these funds will taper off rapidly during the latter part of 1948. The need, however, will decline very little if at all.

This is not a bright picture. But we must face up to the facts on the rate of world recovery. It has been widely overlooked that after the first World War it was only in 1925 that the world arrived at the 1914 level of economic activity. And World War II was many times more destructive than World War I. In the late war nations planned on a vast scale and executed with new and tremendously improved weapons the destruction of the enemy's economic resources, with enormous success. Recovery will therefore be correspondingly slow.

One more thing to be considered is that as great as is our supply of commodities and services to the world during the current year, it is still far short of what the people of the world need if they are to eat enough to maintain their physical strength and at the same time carry on essential measures of reconstruction and become self-supporting. This will be true until the other workshops and granaries of the world are back in full production.

What do these facts of international life mean for the United States and for United States foreign policy?

They mean first that we in the United States must take as large a volume of imports as possible from abroad in order that the financial gap between what the world needs and what it can pay for can be narrowed. There is no charity involved in this. It is simply common sense and good business. We are today obliged from considerations of self-interest and humanitarianism to finance a huge deficit in the world's budget. The only sound way to end this deficit financing is by accepting increased quantities of goods from abroad. There can never be any stability or security in the world for any of us until foreign countries are able to pay in commodities and services for what they need to import and to finance their equipment needs from more normal sources of investment.

Today in Geneva our negotiators are meeting with representatives of 17 other countries in an effort to negotiate a mutual reduction in trade barriers and an agreement upon fair rules to govern international trade. This is one of the ways in which we are attemping to face up to the realities of international life. The Geneva conference must succeed. The International Trade Organization must be established.

The Geneva conference must succeed not only because of the emergency supply and financial situation that exists today, but also because our position as the world's greatest producer and creditor nation demands that for a long period to come we accept an ever larger volume of imports. When the process of reconversion at home is completed, we are going to find ourselves far more dependent upon exports than before the war to maintain levels of business activity to which our economy has become accustomed.

The facts of international life also mean that the United States is going to have to undertake further emergency financing of foreign purchases if foreign countries are to continue to buy in 1948 and 1949 the commodities which they need to sustain life and at the same time rebuild their economies. Requests for further United States aid may reach us through the International Bank, or through the Export-Import Bank, or they may be of a type which existing national and international institutions are not equipped to handle and therefore may be made directly through diplomatic channels. But we know now that further financing, beyond existing authorizations, is going to be needed. No other country is able to bridge the gap in commodities or dollars.

This leads directly to a third imperative for our foreign policy. Since world demand exceeds our ability to supply, we are going to have to concentrate our emergency assistance in areas where it will be most effective in building world political and economic stability, in promoting human freedom and democratic institutions, in fostering liberal trading policies, and in strengthening the authority of the United Nations.

This is merely common sense and sound practice. It is in keeping with the policy announced by President Truman in his special message to Congress on March 12 on aid to Greece and Turkey. Free peoples who are seeking to preserve their independence and democratic institutions and human freedoms against totalitarian pressures, either internal or external, will receive top priority for American reconstruction aid. This is no more than frank recognition, as President Truman said, "that totalitarian regimes imposed on free peoples, by direct or indirect aggression, undermine the foundations of international peace and hence the security of the United States."

The fourth thing we must do in the present situation is to push ahead with the reconstruction of those two great workshops of Europe and Asia—Germany and Japan—upon which the ultimate recovery of the two continents so largely depends. This is what Secretary Marshall meant when he reported to the nation on April 28 that action on behalf of European recovery cannot await "compromise through exhaustion," and that we must take whatever action is possible immediately, even without full Four Power agreement, to effect a larger measure of European, including German, recovery. European recovery cannot be complete until the various parts of Europe's economy are working together in a harmonious whole. And the achievement of a coordinated European economy remains a fundamental objective of our foreign policy.

Finally, in order to carry out an economical and effective policy of relief and reconstruction along the foregoing lines, your Government is going to need the extension by Congress of certain executive powers over the domestic sale, transportation, and exportation of a limited list of commodities. Such controls have been in effect during the war and are still in effect under the President's war powers, but are due to expire June 30th of this year. It is vitally important that these controls be renewed. It is commodities that are needed in critical areas abroad, not just money. It is wheat and coal and steel that are urgently required to stave off economic collapse, not just dollar credits.

Your Government must therefore be able to insure equitable distribution of supplies as between the domestic economy and the export demand. This requires the extension of allocation powers with respect to a limited list of commodities certified by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce as critical to the foreign economic policy of the United States. Powers to assign priorities directly to producing firms will be necessary for a still more restricted list of items. At the same time, a continuation of export controls is required in order to direct exports where we want them to go and to cut down unnecessary and undesirable foreign buying in the domestic market.

Power to assign priorities on transportation is also needed. This power is needed in order to insure the efficient use of transportation facilities, particularly freight cars. Without such authority it will be difficult to move bulky export commodities such as coal and grain in the required quantities.

Finally, certain legislation which would enable the Maritime Commission to insure maximum availability and efficient use of shipping is required in order to insure the success of our export programs with respect to bulky items such as coal and grain.

Legislative proposals of this nature have been presented to Congress, or will be presented in the near future. It is of the greatest importance to the foreign economic policy of this country, and thus to the security and well-being of the nation, that these powers be granted.

There is a story going the rounds about a man who, after listening to an extended lecture on the grave financial and economic difficulties of northern Europe and Great Britain, remarked, "And, just think, all the trouble was caused by a blizzard."

I think we will all agree that something more than a blizzard has caused Europe's current difficulties. But last winter's blizzard did show up the extremely narrow margins of human and national subsistence which prevail in the world today, margins so narrow that a blizzard can threaten populations with starvation and nations with bankruptcy and loss of independence.

Not only do human beings and nations exist in narrow economic margins, but also human dignity, human freedom, and democratic institutions.

It is one of the principal aims of our foreign policy today to use our economic and financial resources to widen these margins. It is necessary if we are to preserve our own freedoms and our own democratic institutions. It is necessary for our national security. And it is our duty and our privilege as human beings.

V

Mr. Hoover's Letter to Mr. Taber

ON THE PEACE TREATIES AND RECOVERY

MAY 26, 1947

New York, New York

Honorable John Taber
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations
House of Representatives
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Taber:

I have your request for a memorandum of my views upon the recommendation of the War Department of $725,000,000 for food and collateral relief requirements for Germany, Japan and Korea for the next fiscal year.

You have also requested that I should furnish you a memorandum upon the causes of these continuing demands upon us, measures which might ameliorate these demands upon our taxpayers and generally upon our foreign relief and reconstuction policies. I shall, as you requested, attend the committee hearing on Tuesday to give any further information they desire.

For clarity, I have throughout this text numbered my specific recommendations.

(1) As matters stand, this appropriation of $725,000,000 should be made. In addition to this proposed American appropriation, the British are also to contribute their share of bi-zonal relief in Germany. These enormous sums are inescapable for the next year unless millions of people under our flags are to die of starvation. They are about the same as during the present fiscal year, and this year's experience demonstrates how near starvation is in these countries.

Surely, we must take steps to bring these burdens upon our taxpayers to an end.

We are now providing relief for the third year after the war.

The delay by Russia in making peace with Germany and Japan, together with the Allied policies of reparations and industrial demilitarization, have paralyzed the industrial productivity of these countries. They are unable to make substantial exports and are not contributing, as they otherwise could, to their own support.

General Marshall, in Moscow, ably urged the immediate necessity for Russia and France to comply with the Potsdam agreement, which provided for economic unification of the four zones; for the revision of the plant transfers for reparations; and the revision of so-called "levels of industry." Meanwhile, Russia and France are taking industrial exports from their zones which, under the Potsdam agreement, would contribute to paying the food bill in the American and British zones. Thus we are paying reparations. We are shipping fertilizers for relief which could be supplied from the French zone. We are supplying France with Ruhr coal which could be used for the manufacturing of exports in Germany with which to pay for food.

(2) In view of the Russian refusal of General Marshall's able presentation at Moscow, and the continued violation of the Potsdam agreement to unify German economy in both Russia and France, we are surely no longer bound by that agreement as to reparations and industrial policies.

In the bi-zonal area of Germany, after two years since V-E Day, the agricultural production is about 75 per cent of pre-war and the industrial production is only at 33 per cent of 1936, and exports are only 3 per cent. In Japan there has been about 80 per cent recovery in agricultural production, but industrial production is only 30 per cent of pre-war, with exports about 4 per cent.

To understand the situation in the German area, we might visualize what would happen if the present policies were imposed on the United States. Suppose America were divided into four zones with little interchange of economic life or food surpluses, with an obligation to tear down and ship abroad 25 per cent of our peace-production plants, and with a restricted "level of industry" which would destroy 60 per cent of our possible export trade. Then add to this the failure even to designate the plants that are to be removed, so that all initiative to operate the remaining plants is destroyed by uncertainty as to whom the victims will be. Suppose also we were not allowed to produce oil and were limited in fertilizer production. Without relief from some humanitarian country, millions of our people would die.

Unless these are revolutionary changes in our policies as to Germany and Japan, the burdens upon our taxpayers are not likely to lessen and are more likely to increase. There are three alternatives before us in our occupied territories: to wash our hands of the whole business and then let the conquered countries drag the whole world to final chaos; or, for humanitarian reasons, merely to carry these people on a food subsistence level, hoping for improvement in the attitudes of other nations; or to act at once to free ourselves from their hindrances as far as possible.

(3) The time has come when we should issue a last call to Russia and France to comply with the Potsdam agreement. If they do not at once respond, we and the British should immediately take the steps to set up the economy of the bi-zonal areas so as to restore their industrial production and exports.

(4) An effort should be made to consolidate the French zone (except the Saar) into the bi-zonal area. In this we have a right to expect French cooperation in view of the great sacrifices the American people are now making on behalf of France.

(5) In any event, we should immediately carry out the present project of a temporary centralized German government over the American and British zones subject to our military direction. We might even contemplate a separate peace with this Government if the next conference of Foreign Ministers does not succeed in more constructive policies.

(6) If we are to secure adequate exports with which they can pay for food, it is urgent that we at once revise the reparations and industrial demilitarization policies imposed upon these zones by various Allied agreements. These latter policies are identical in Japan, where they must likewise be revised.

(7) We should, in our German zones and in Japan, suspend the whole concept of "levels of industry," placing restrictions upon only a few specified industries, such as shipping and aviation.

(8) We should at once abolish for good the destruction or removal of all industrial plants which can make peacetime goods or services. The heavy burden now borne by our taxpayers is ample proof of the folly of these policies. It is an illusion that there are any consequential reparations to be had by removal of peacetime industrial plants. The buildings, foundations, water, electrical and other connections in such plants have no value for removal. All that is removable of any use are machines, all second-hand and many obsolete. The cost of tearing them out, shipping them to some area where there is neither skilled labor nor skilled management, and of building new foundations, buildings and connections, leaves even these values comparatively trivial. We should allow the removal of equipment from such munitions factories which cannot be converted into peacetime production. We should assess by independent engineers the actual value to any proposed recipient of peacetime plants, deducting the cost of dismantling, and then call upon Germany or Japan to pay such a sum over the years and to retain the plants. With such action, the uncertainties which now paralyze German and Japanese initiative would quickly revive many industries and gradually provide exports to pay for their food. The drain upon our taxpayers would gradually disappear. Unless this is done, Germany and Japan will not be self-supporting in our time.

Such policies have no practical relation to the demilitarization of either Germany or Japan. I assume we are not going to make the major mistake of Versailles of leaving these countries the nuclei of militarism by granting them any armies or navies. It seems generally agreed that we will absolutely disarm these peoples so that they shall not again be able to engage in aggressions; that this disarmament will embrace destruction of all military arms, fortifications and arms factories; that they will have no army, no navy, and no air force; that they will retain only a constabulary in which no previous officer may be employed; that no militarist officials can hold public office; that this disarmament must be continued for a generation or two, until they have lost the "know-how" of war, and the descent of militarism through birth. We have already offered to join in guarantees which will make these prohibitions effective.

(9) With such a policy of demilitarization, the chains on production and export of peace-purpose goods should be removed and a simple check maintained to assure that industry does no evil.

The situation in Japan is not complicated by zonal occupation of other armies, and we are more free to act. Also the United States is paying the entire food bill. The world has had the service of a great administrator in General MacArthur, under whose guidance the Japanese have adopted a constitution approved by us; they have freely elected a Government and are determined upon democratic processes.

(10) We should at once summon the peace conference with Japan and make a peace with her by as many nations as wish to adhere.

Such policies as I have outlined are of a vast importance to the nations outside of Germany and Japan. The whole world is suffering from delay in restoration of productivity. The whole world is an interlocked economy, and paralysis in two great centers of production is a world disaster. There is greater opportunity to speed recovery in the world by such action as I outline than by any amount of gifts and loans from the United States.

There has been announced an American policy of defending the frontiers of western civilization. The most vital of these frontiers are Germany and Japan. If they are lost, all Europe and the Far East are lost.

The reasons for continuous obstruction by Russia to every effort which would restore production have at least some expression in the Russian press as a method by which the United States can be bled white by relief measures. We should wait no longer. Russia will not make war about it.

(11) The problems of relief I have been discussing are involved in a much wider action. That is the coordination of all aid which we are extending for relief and reconstruction abroad. The resources of the United States are not unlimited, and we are carrying over 90 per cent of these burdens. In the two years since the war the United States has spent upwards of fourteen billions in free relief, Government loans or loans from agencies dependent upon the United States for their survival. Already we are practically committed to five billions during the next fiscal year. These activities are divided among five or six such agencies directed from Washington that are extending aid to a score of nations. Their policies are not coordinated so as to secure cooperation among nations which would save large sums to the American taxpayers and would produce more rapid restoration of recovery abroad. The purpose of these activities is to save life and restore productivity. The restoration of production in the world is of mutual interest to all nations. I have in this memorandum cited instances of a lack of cooperation among nations. To state it bluntly, we cannot get such cooperation unless there is coordination of our own organization at home so as to make American aid to other nations conditional upon their cooperation to the common end. I am talking about the American taxpayer, about mutual economic action, and not about dollar diplomacy.

Yours faithfully,
HERBERT HOOVER.

VI

Secretary Marshall's Address at Harvard

THE "MARSHALL PLAN"
JUNE 5, 1947

I NEED not tell you, gentlemen, that the world situation is very serious. That must be apparent to all intelligent people. I think one difficulty is that the problem is one of such enormous complexity that the very mass of facts presented to the public by press and radio make it exceedingly difficult for the man in the street to reach a clear appraisement of the situation. Furthermore, the people of this country are distant from the troubled areas of the earth and it is hard for them to comprehend the plight and consequent reactions of the long-suffering peoples, and the effect of those reactions on their governments in connection with our efforts to promote peace in the world.

In considering the requirements for the rehabilitation of Europe, the physical loss of life, the visible destruction of cities, factories, mines and railroads was correctly estimated, but it has become obvious during recent months that this visible destruction was probably less serious than the dislocation of the entire fabric of European economy. For the past ten years conditions have been highly abnormal.

The feverish preparation for war and the more feverish maintenance of the war effort engulfed all aspects of national economies. Machinery has fallen into disrepair or is entirely obsolete. Under the arbitrary and destructive Nazi rule, virtually every possible enterprise was geared into the German war machine. Longstanding commercial ties, private institutions, banks, insurance companies and shipping companies disappeared, through loss of capital, absorption through nationalization or by simple destruction.

In many countries, confidence in the local currency has been severely shaken. The breakdown of the business structure of Europe during the war was complete. Recovery has been seriously retarded by the fact that two years after the close of hostilities a peace settlement with Germany and Austria has not been agreed upon. But even given a more prompt solution of these difficult problems, the rehabilitation of the economic structure of Europe quite evidently will require a much longer time and greater effort than had been foreseen.

There is a phase of this matter which is both interesting and serious. The farmer has always produced the foodstuffs to exchange with the city dweller for the other necessities of life. This division of labor is the basis of modern civilization. At the present time it is threatened with breakdown. The town and city industries are not producing adequate goods to exchange with the food-producing farmer. Raw materials and fuel are in short supply. Machinery is lacking or worn out.

The farmer or the peasant cannot find the goods for sale which he desires to purchase. So the sale of his farm produce for money which he cannot use seems to him an unprofitable transaction. He, therefore, has withdrawn many fields from crop cultivation and is using them for grazing. He feeds more grain to stock and finds for himself and his family an ample supply of food, however short he may be on clothing and the other ordinary gadgets of civilization. Meanwhile, people in the cities are short of food and fuel. So the governments are forced to use their foreign money and credits to procure these necessities abroad. This process exhausts funds which are urgently needed for reconstruction. Thus a very serious situation is rapidly developing which bodes no good for the world. The modern system of the division of labor upon which the exchange of products is based is in danger of breaking down.

The truth of the matter is that Europe's requirements for the next three or four years of foreign food and other essential products—principally from America—are so much greater than her present ability to pay that she must have substantial additional help, or face economic, social and political deterioration of a very grave character.

The remedy lies in breaking the vicious circle and restoring the confidence of the European people in the economic future of their own countries and of Europe as a whole. The manufacturer and the farmer throughout wide areas must be able and willing to exchange their products for currencies, the continuing value of which is not open to question.

Aside from the demoralizing effect on the world at large and the possibilities of disturbances arising as a result of the desperation of the people concerned, the consequences to the economy of the United States should be apparent to all. It is logical that the United States should do whatever it is able to do to assist in the return of normal economic health in the world, without which there can be no political stability and no assured peace.

Our policy is directed not against any country or doctrine but against hunger, poverty, desperation and chaos. Its purpose should be the revival of a working economy in the world so as to permit the emergence of political and social conditions in which free institutions can exist. Such assistance, I am convinced, must not be on a piecemeal basis as various crises develop. Any assistance that this Government may render in the future should provide a cure rather than a mere palliative.

Any government that is willing to assist in the task of recovery will find full cooperation, I am sure, on the part of the United States Government. Any government which maneuvers to block the recovery of other countries cannot expect help from us. Furthermore, governments, political parties or groups which seek to perpetuate human misery in order to profit therefrom politically or otherwise will encounter the opposition of the United States.

It is already evident that, before the United States Government can proceed much further in its efforts to alleviate the situation and help start the European world on its way to recovery, there must be some agreement among the countries of Europe as to the requirements of the situation and the part those countries themselves will take in order to give proper effect to whatever action might be undertaken by this Government. It would be neither fitting nor efficacious for this Government to undertake to draw up unilaterally a program designed to place Europe on its feet economically. This is the business of the Europeans. The initiative, I think, must come from Europe. The role of this country should consist of friendly aid in the drafting of a European program and of later support of such a program so far as it may be practical for us to do so. The program should be a joint one, agreed to by a number, if not all European nations.

An essential part of any successful action on the part of the United States is an understanding on the part of the people of America of the character of the problem and the remedies to be applied. Political passion and prejudice should have no part. With foresight, and a willingness on the part of our people to face up to the vast responsibility which history has clearly placed upon our country, the difficulties I have outlined can and will be overcome.

VII

Secretary Marshall's Address to the United Nations Assembly

SEPT. 17, 1947

MR. PRESIDENT—Fellow Delegates: I have been asked by the President of the United States to extend to you the cordial greetings of the Government and people of the United States, as well as his own warm personal welcome. We are happy to have you with us in this country. We trust that your stay will be productive of the far-reaching results which the peoples of all countries expect from this gathering.

Our point of departure for the deliberations of this Assembly might well be the annual report of the Secretary-General on the work of the Organization. It is a noteworthy document. It records realistically the progress and development of the United Nations, and its failures. It reflects the diligent efforts of the Secretary-General and his staff to expedite the rapidly growing volume of United Nations business.

The situation we face today may be summarized by the statement that more than two years after the end of the war the fruits of peace and victory are still beyond our grasp. Men look anxiously toward the future, wondering whether a new and more terrible conflict will engulf them. We have not yet succeeded in establishing a basis for peace with Germany and Japan, nor have we restored Austria as an independent state. Reconstruction lags everywhere; the basic requirements of life are scarce; there is desperate need throughout great areas. The complex economic machinery which was thrown out of joint by the war has not yet been put back into running order. In place of peace, liberty, and economic security, we find menace, repression, and dire want.

A supreme effort is required from us all if we are to succeed in breaking through the vicious circles of deepening political and economic crisis. That is why the United States has placed on the agenda of this Assembly the question of threats to the political independence and territorial integrity of Greece.

The history of the Greek case in the United Nations is well known in this Assembly. You are aware that the Security Council last December adopted a resolution establishing an investigating commission to inquire into the situation along the northern frontier of Greece and report the facts to the Security Council. You know that that commission and its subsidiary group, by large majorities, have attributed the disturbances principally to the illegal assistance and support furnished by Yugoslavia, Albania, and Bulgaria, to guerrilla forces fighting against the Greek Government. The extent or effectiveness of such assistance to the Greek guerrillas is not the point at issue here. It is a universally accepted principle of international law that for one nation to arm or otherwise assist rebellious forces against another government is a hostile and aggressive act. Not only has this principle been upheld in a number of famous cases in international law, but it has also found expression in international agreements. The majority of the members of the Security Council have recorded their support of this principle by their action in this case. One permanent member of the Security Council, however, has three times vetoed the efforts of the Council to deal with the situation.

This Assembly cannot stand by as a mere spectator while a Member of the United Nations is endangered by attacks from abroad. If the United Nations should fail to protect the integrity of one small state, the security of all small states would be placed in jeopardy. The inability of the Security Council to take effective action in this case passes a grave responsibility to the General Assembly. I am confident that the General Assembly will not fail to meet this responsibility. It must do so if the Organization is to carry out its fundamental purposes.

The United States Delegation will therefore submit to the Assembly a resolution which will contain a finding of responsibility; call upon Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia to cease and desist from rendering further assistance or support to the guerrillas in Greece; establish a commission to assist in the implementation of these recommendations and to investigate the facts with regard to compliance therewith; and make other appropriate recommendations to the states concerned.

The General Assembly is also faced with the problem of Palestine. The Government of the United States intends to do everything within its power at this session of the General Assembly to assist in finding a solution for this difficult problem which has stirred up such violent passions and which is now resulting in the shedding of blood and in great mental and moral anguish. The solution will require of each of us courage and resolution. It will also require restraint.

The Special Committee on Palestine is to be highly commended for its contribution to the solution of this problem. Although the members of this Committee were not able to agree unanimously upon a number of important issues, including that of partition, they have been able to find the basis for agreement on 11 recommendations to this Assembly. Their achievement in reaching unanimity on so many points represents definite progress.

We realize that, whatever the solution recommended by the General Assembly, it cannot be ideally satisfactory to either of the two great peoples primarily concerned. While the final decision of this Assembly must properly await the detailed consideration of the report, the Government of the United States gives great weight not only to the recommendations which have met with the unanimous approval of the Special Committee but also to those which have been approved by the majority of that Committee.

I turn now to the question of the independence of Korea. At Cairo in December 1943, the United States, the United Kingdom, and China joined in declaring that in due course Korea should become free and independent. This multilateral pledge was reaffirmed in the Potsdam Declaration of July 1945 and subscribed to by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics when it entered the war against Japan. In Moscow in December of 1945, the Foreign Ministers of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, and the United States concluded an agreement designed to bring about the independence of Korea. This agreement was later adhered to by the Government of China. It provided for the establishment of a Joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. Commission to meet in Korea and, through consultations with Korean democratic parties and social organizations, to decide on methods for establishing a provisional Korean government. The Joint Commission was then to consult with that provisional government on methods of giving aid and assistance to Korea, any agreement reached being submitted for approval to the four powers adhering to the Moscow Agreement.

For about two years the United States Government has been trying to reach agreement with the Soviet Government, through the Joint Commission and otherwise, on methods of implementing the Moscow Agreement and thus bringing about the independence of Korea. The United States representatives have insisted that any settlement of the Korean problem must in no way infringe the fundamental democratic right of freedom of opinion. That is still the position of my Government. Today the independence of Korea is no further advanced than it was two years ago. Korea remains divided at the 38th parallel with Soviet forces in the industrial north and United States forces in the agricultural south. There is little or no exchange of goods or services between the two zones. Korea's economy is thus crippled.

The Korean people, not former enemies but a people liberated from 40 years of Japanese oppression, are still not free. This situation must not be allowed to continue indefinitely. In an effort to make progress the United States Government recently made certain proposals designed to achieve the purposes of the Moscow Agreement and requested the powers adhering to that Agreement to join in discussion of these proposals. China and the United Kingdom agreed to this procedure. The Soviet Government did not. Furthermore, the United States and Soviet Delegations to the Joint Commission have not even been able to agree on a joint report on the status of their deliberations. It appears evident that further attempts to solve the Korean problem by means of bilateral negotiations will only serve to delay the establishment of an independent, united Korea.

It is therefore the intention of the United States Government to present the problem of Korean independence to this session of the General Assembly. Although we shall be prepared to submit suggestions as to how the early attainment of Korean independence might be effected, we believe that this is a matter which now requires the impartial judgment of the other members. We do not wish to have the inability of two powers to reach agreement delay any further the urgent and rightful claims of the Korean people to independence.

For the achievement of international security, and the well-being of the peoples of the world, it is necessary that the United Nations press forward on many fronts. Among these the control of atomic and other weapons of mass destruction has perhaps the highest priority if we are to remove the specter of a war of annihilation.

The preponderant majority of the Atomic Energy Commission has made real progress in spelling out in detail the functions and powers of an international control agency which would provide a framework for effective atomic energy control. Two nations, however, have been unwilling to join the majority in the conclusions reached. This is a disturbing and ominous fact. In dealing with the facts presented by the advent of atomic energy, the majority has devised a system of control, which, while it is bold and daring, is, in our view, essential for security against atomic warfare. The minority has evidently been unwilling to face these same facts realistically. The mandate of the General Assembly remains unfulfilled. Failure to agree on a system of control which can provide security against atomic warfare will inevitably retard the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy for the benefits of the peoples of the world and will accelerate an atomic-armaments race.

The initial offer made by the United States on June 14, 1946, by which this country would give up its present advantage in exchange for an effective system of control, has found most gratifying acceptance by the majority of the nations represented on the Commission. They have worked earnestly together to hammer out specific proposals whereby such a system could be put into effect. All have made important contributions to the end product. The majority is convinced that its proposals provide the only adequate basis for effective control.

Since the United States realizes fully the consequences of failure to attain effective international control, we shall continue our efforts in the Atomic Energy Commission to carry forward our work along the lines of the majority views. We must state frankly, however, that, in the absence of unanimous agreement on the essential functions and powers which the majority has concluded must be given to the international agency, there will necessarily be limitations on the extent to which the remaining aspects of the problem can be worked out in detail. If the minority persists in refusing to join with the majority, the Atomic Energy Commission may soon be faced with the conclusion that it is unable to complete the task assigned it under its terms of reference laid down in the General Assembly resolution of January 24, 1946.

The United States also recognizes the importance of regulating conventional armaments. We regret that much more progress has not been made in this field. From this rostrum it is very easy to pay lip service to the sincere aspirations of all peoples for the limitation and reduction of armed forces. This is a serious matter which should not be the subject of demagogic appeals and irresponsible propaganda. I say frankly to the General Assembly that it is the conviction of my Government that a workable system for the regulation of armaments cannot be put into operation until conditions of international confidence prevail. We have consistently and repeatedly made it clear that the regulation of armaments presupposes enough international understanding to make possible the settlement of peace terms with Germany and Japan, the implementation of agreements putting military forces and facilities at the disposal of the Security Council, and an international arrangement for the control of atomic energy.

Nevertheless, we believe it is important not to delay the formulation of a system of arms regulation for implementation when conditions permit. The Security Council has accepted a logical plan of work for the Commission for Conventional Armaments. We believe that the Commission should proceed vigorously to develop a system for the regulation of armaments in the businesslike manner outlined in its plan of work.

The effective operation of the United Nations Security Council is one of the crucial conditions for the maintenance of international security. The exercise of the veto power in the Security Council has the closest bearing on the success and the vitality of the United Nations.

In the past the United States has been reluctant to encourage proposals for changes in the system of voting in the Security Council. Having accepted the Charter provisions on this subject and having joined with other permanent members at San Francisco in a statement of general attitude toward the question of permanent-member unanimity, we wished to permit full opportunity for practical testing. We were always fully aware that the successful operation of the rule of unanimity would require the exercise of restraint by the permanent members, and we so expressed ourselves at San Francisco.

It is our hope that, despite our experience to date, such restraint will be practiced in the future by the permanent members. The abuse of the right of unanimity has prevented the Security Council from fulfilling its true functions. That has been especially true in cases arising under chapter VI and in the admission of new members.

The Government of the United States has come to the conclusion that the only practicable method for improving this situation is a liberalization of the voting procedure in the Council.

The United States would be willing to accept, by whatever means may be appropriate, the elimination of the unanimity requirement with respect to matters arising under chapter VI of the Charter, and such matters as applications for membership.

We recognize that this is a matter of significance and complexity for the United Nations. We consider that the problem of how to achieve the objective of liberalization of the Security Council voting procedure deserves careful study. Consequently, we shall propose that this matter be referred to a special committee for study and report to the next session of the Assembly. Measures should be pressed concurrently in the Security Council to bring about improvements within the existing provisions of the Charter, through amendments to the rules of procedure or other feasible means.

The scope and complexity of the problems on the agenda of this Assembly have given rise to the question whether the General Assembly can adequately discharge its responsibilities in its regular, annual sessions. There is a limit to the number of items which can receive thorough consideration during the few weeks in which this body meets. There would seem to be a definite need for constant attention to the work of the Assembly in order to deal with continuing problems. Occasional special sessions are not enough. The General Assembly has a definite and continuing responsibility, under articles 11 and 14 of the Charter, in the broad field of political security and the preservation of friendly relations among nations. In our fast-moving world an annual review of developments in this field is not sufficient.

The facilities of the General Assembly must be developed to meet this need. I am therefore proposing, today, that this Assembly proceed at this session to create a standing committee of the General Assembly, which might be known as the Interim Committee on Peace and Security, to serve until the beginning of its third regular session next September. The Committee would not, of course, impinge on matters which are the primary responsibility of the Security Council or of special commissions, but subject to that it might consider situations and disputes impairing friendly relations brought to its attention by member states or by the Security Council pursuant to articles 11 and 14 of the Charter and report to the Assembly or to the Security Council thereon; recommend to the members the calling of special sessions of the General Assembly when necessary; and might report at the next regular session on the desirability of establishing such a committee on a permanent basis.

In our opinion, every member of the United Nations should be seated on this body.

The creation of the Interim Committee will make the facilities of the General Assembly continually available during this next year to all its members. It will strengthen the machinery for peaceful settlement and place the responsibility for such settlement broadly upon all the members of the United Nations. Without infringing on the jurisdiction of the Security Council, it will provide an unsurpassed opportunity for continuing study, after the adjournment of this Assembly, of the problems with which the United Nations must contend if it is to succeed.

The attitude of the United States toward the whole range of problems before the United Nations is founded on a very genuine desire to perfect the Organization so as to safeguard the security of states and the well-being of their peoples.

These aims can be accomplished only if the untapped resources of the United Nations are brought to bear with full effect through the General Assembly and in other organs. The Assembly cannot dodge its responsibilities; it must organize itself effectively, not as an agency of intermittent action but on a continuous basis. It is for us, the members of the Assembly, to construct a record of achievement in dealing with crucial problems which will buttress the authority of the Organization and enable it to fulfil its promise to all peoples.

The large powers bear special responsibilities because of their strength and resources. While these responsibilities bring with them special advantages, the Great Powers must recognize that restraint is an essential companion of power and privilege. The United Nations will never endure if there is insistence on privilege to the point of frustration of the collective will. In this spirit we have indicated our own willingness to accept a modification of our special voting rights in the Security Council. In the same spirit we appeal to the other permanent members of the Security Council, in this and in all matters, to use their privileged position to promote the attainment of the purposes of the Organization.

The Government of the United States believes that the surest foundation for permanent peace lies in the extension of the benefits and the restraints of the rule of law to all peoples and to all governments. This is the heart of the Charter and of the structure of the United Nations. It is the best hope of mankind.

VIII

Report of the Sixteen Nations at Paris

SEPT. 23, 1947

THE OFFICIAL summary of the report of the Committee of European Economic Cooperation is as follows:—

1. The report is designed primarily as a close and careful analysis of the maladjustments which have resulted from the war and as an examination of what the participating countries can do for themselves and for each other to work towards a lasting solution.

2. The scale of the destruction and dislocation of the second world war was greater than that of the first. Agricultural and industrial production was severely reduced, traditional sources of food and raw material supply were cut off, so that when the war was over the devastated countries had to start again almost from the beginning. Thanks to the great efforts of the European countries themselves and to the generous assistance of the United States, other countries, and Unrra, recovery proceeded fast. But it was not maintained in the winter of 1946-47, and the European economy suffered a serious setback. Coal continued in short supply, and the lack of it curtailed industrial production. Food and other commodities remained scarce, and the prices of food and primary products rose. The foreign exchange resources of the participating countries had, therefore, to be drawn upon heavily. An exceptionally severe winter was followed by a long drought and intensified these difficulties, so that by the summer of 1947 the earlier hope of a quick recovery had receded.

3. As the work of the Committee of Cooperation was proceeding, the foreign exchange crisis continued to gather momentum. A number of countries had to impose further import restrictions, except for the purchase of cereals, coal, and other essential supplies. Action on similar lines is likely to become necessary in the near future in most of the participating countries. The early recovery is now halted and the crisis is deepening. The circumstances in which the report has been drawn up give it the character of an initial report. To deal with any amendments which appear desirable it may be necessary to publish supplementary reports which take account of the development of the international economic situation.

RECOVERY PROGRAMME

4. The purpose of the report is to formulate an economic recovery programme for the participating countries which is aimed at putting Europe on its feet by the end of 1951. This recovery programme is based upon four lines of action:

(i) A strong production effort by each of the participating countries;

(ii) The creation of internal financial stability;

(iii) The maximum cooperation between the participating countries;

(iv) A solution of the problem of the participating countries' trading deficit with the American continent, particularly by exports.

5. The participating countries are normally dependent on a large volume of imports—raw materials, feeding-stuffs, and in certain cases food—from the rest of the world. Traditionally these were paid for partly by export of goods and services and partly by income from oversea investments. Because of the dislocation caused by the war import needs are temporarily larger than normal, investment earnings have been reduced, and exports have not yet been able to attain the level to redress the balance. The problem before the participating countries and the basic aim of the recovery programme is thus to revive and expand their production, so as to eliminate abnormal demand on the outside world and produce for export the increased volume of goods required to pay for the imports the participating countries will continue to need.

SELF-HELP

6. The report assumes a high degree of self-help by the countries concerned and mutual help between them. In order to ascertain what could be achieved technical committees were set up to make a special examination of agriculture, fuel and power, steel, timber, and transport, together with the related industries, such as agricultural and mining machinery, and the general problem of man-power. The recovery programme is designed to achieve the following total results by 1951:

(i) Restoration of pre-war bread grain and other cereal production, with large increases above pre-war in sugar and potatoes, some increases in oils and fats, and as fast an expansion in livestock products as supplies of feeding-stuffs will allow.

(ii) Increase of coal output to 584,000,000 tons—i.e., 145,000,000 tons above the 1947 level (an increase of one-third) and 30,000,000 tons above the 1938 level.

(iii) Expansion of electricity output by nearly 70,000,000,000 kwh., or 40 per cent above 1947 and a growth of generating capacity by 25,000,000 kw., or two-thirds above pre-war.

(iv) Development of oil refining capacity in terms of crude oil throughout by 17,000,000 tons to two and a half times the pre-war level.

(v) Increase of crude steel production by 80 per cent above 1947 to a level of 55,000,000 tons, or 10,000,000 tons (20 per cent) above 1938.

(vi) Expansion of inland transport facilities to carry a 25 per cent greater load in 1951 than in 1938.

(vii) Restoration of pre-war merchant fleets of the participating countries by 1951.

(viii) Supply from European production of most of the capital equipment needed for these expansions.

PRODUCTION TARGETS

The various countries have undertaken to use all their efforts to develop their national production in order to achieve these targets. Of particular importance are the French and Italian grain production programmes, which aim at recovering pre-war levels by 1951, and the United Kingdom coal production programme, which is designed to exceed the pre-war level by 1951. These production programmes, taken as a whole, represent an expansion of output similar in general scale to that achieved by the United States in the mobilization years 1940-44. This production effort provides the foundation for a sound and workable European economy.

7. The creation of internal financial stability in certain countries is a necessary condition for the accomplishment of their production programmes and undertakings have been given by the countries concerned to apply all necessary measures to lead to the rapid achievement of this stability. The quick success of stabilization will to a very large extent depend on adequate foreign assistance being available during the period when stabilization is being achieved. No precise calculation can be made of the amount required without examining the position of each of the countries concerned at the time when stabilization is undertaken. But from such estimates as can be made the amount likely to be required would be of the order of $3,000,000,000.

8. The maximum use will be made by the participating countries of their own raw material resources, man-power, and productive capacity. This process will be stimulated by measures to be taken to secure progressive relaxation of import restrictions to improve payment arrangements between the various countries and to transfer surplus labor. An announcement has already been made about the setting up of a customs union study group, which will make a first report within three months of its being convened. The French Government has stated that it is ready to commence negotiations with all European Governments who wish to enter a customs union with France and whose national economies are capable of being combined with the French economy in such a way as to make a viable unit. The Italian Government has associated itself with this declaration.

COMMON PLANNING

9. Apart from mutual help designed to increase supplies of scarce commodities and to increase the flow of trade between the participating countries, agreement has been achieved on collective action on special problems as follows:

(i) A series of projects is being developed for common planning of the exploitation of new sources of electric power. The plan selected by the committee provides for the erection of a series of power plants to exploit the hydroelectric resources of the Alps, certain German lignite deposits, and Italian reserves of geothermic energy. This work involves the cooperative development of resources cutting across frontiers, and the decisions are being taken without regard to national frontiers. The common planning required is now proceeding.

(ii) Encouragement of the standardization of mining and electrical supplies and freight cars.

(iii) Examination of the possibility of securing the more efficient use of freight cars by pooling arrangements and by international study of the flows of traffic.

(iv) Arrangements for the interchange of information by the steel producing countries about their programmes of modernization and extension, so that each country may take account of plans made by the others.

10. Arrangements have been made for continuing the work of mutual help and consultation begun in Paris both through the United Nations machinery and in other ways. A joint organization charged with the task of reviewing progress made in the execution of the programmes is also contemplated.

REQUIREMENTS FROM U.S.

11. The report shows that even after taking full account of the supplies which they can produce for themselves and which they can hope to obtain from the rest of the world, the participating countries will require large quantities of food, fuel, raw materials, and capital equipment from the American continent. Without this flow of goods the whole recovery programme will be in jeopardy. The requirements stated take account of the supplies likely to be available. They do not represent extravagant importing. Food consumption at the end of the period will be less than the pre-war level and the estimates are framed on the basis that in many countries restrictions on consumption of food, clothing, and gasoline (for non-essential purposes) will continue to be necessary.

12. The scale of the problem is shown by the combined deficit of the participating countries and Western Germany with the American continent, which is given in the following tables. The size of the deficit is to a large extent attributable to lack of supplies formerly available from Eastern Europe, South-East Asia, and other non-European sources. It may be possible to meet part of the deficit through the International Bank for Development and Reconstruction, private investment and credit operations, and, for a few countries, by the use of their limited available assets.

(Thousand million dollars)

—	1948	1949	1950	1951	Total
U.S.A. ..	5.64	4.27	3.28	2.62	15.81
Rest of American continent ..	1.94	1.82	1.30	0.91	5.97
	7.58	6.09	4.58	3.53	21.78
Deficit of dependent territories	0.46	0.26	0.07	—0.13	0.66
Total ..	8.04	6.35	4.65	3.40	22.44

THE INTERNATIONAL BANK

Estimated imports from the American continent include equipment as well as commodities such as food and coal. If imports of equipment, other than agricultural machinery and coal-mining machinery, to which special considerations apply, were financed by loans from the International Bank or by other credit operations, the deficit remaining to be dealt with could be reduced as follows:

(Thousand million dollars)

—	1948	1949	1950	1951	Total
Deficit as shown in above table	8.04	6.35	4.65	3.40	22.44
Less equipment assumed to be financed by International Bank, &c. ..	0.92	0.89	0.70	0.60	3.11
Total ..	7.12	5.46	3.95	2.80	19.33

13. The need for an intense effort to expand exports from the participating countries to the rest of the world is recognized throughout the report as essential to help reduce the deficit over the four-year period. Given favorable world conditions, it is estimated that the participating countries and Western Germany at the end of the period will have a substantial surplus in their trading account with non-participating countries other than those of the American continent. For the year 1951 this is tentatively estimated as $1,800,000,000 and for the four-year period at $2,810,000,000. Only if there is a sufficient flow of dollars to the rest of the world to enable the participating countries to earn dollars, or their equivalent, for this surplus, will it be possible to offset this surplus against the dollar deficit with the American continent.

14. The report emphasizes that while the first element of the recovery programme must be to increase European production, it will be impossible to right the problem unless market conditions in the American continent allow both Europe and other parts of the world to sell goods there in increasing quantities. The maladjustment between the productive power and resources of the American continent and the participating countries is due to many causes and cannot be righted by European action alone. The purpose of the report is to submit proposals for the necessary restorative action on the European side by production, stabilization, and cooperation between the participating countries, but this cannot complete the task. The report concludes with the following phrases:

CALAMITOUS RESULTS

"The problem which the Committee of Cooperation has been working to solve in Paris is the aftermath of the war. The committee now submits its proposal for the necessary restorative action on the European side by production, stabilization and cooperation between the participating countries, as well as by measures to stimulate the free flow of goods and services. These proposals are reinforced by definite and specific undertakings by each of the countries concerned. But these undertakings can be successfully carried out only with the assurance of a continued flow of goods from the American continent; if that flow should cease the results would be calamitous. Europe's dollar resources are running low. One country after another has already been forced by lack of dollars to cut down vital imports of food and raw materials from the American continent. If nothing is done a catastrophe will develop as stocks become exhausted. If too little is done, and if it is done too late, it will be impossible to provide the momentum needed to get the programme under way. Life in Europe will become increasingly unstable and uncertain; industries will grind to a gradual halt for lack of materials and fuel, and the food supply of Europe will diminish and begin to disappear.

"In these circumstances the participating nations have welcomed the opportunity to prepare and present to the United States a statement of their plans and requirements. Through meetings between representatives of the United States and of the participating nations, the details of that statement can be filled in and the means of recovery more precisely defined.

THE MEANS OF RECOVERY

"In the last analysis the external means of recovery can in largest measure come only from the United States, which has by its assistance in the last two years already rescued Europe from collapse and chaos. Unfortunately the size of the problem has proved greater than was expected; the disruption caused by the war was more far-reaching and the obstacles to recovery more formidable than was realized even six months ago. This report contains, it is believed, a realistic appreciation of the solution. In it the participating countries have set out the facts as they see them and on the basis of those facts have formulated a recovery programme. Their programme is based upon the fullest use of their existing productive capacity. In drawing it up they have sought to reduce their needs from the American continent to the minimum consistent with its achievement. The American people, through their Government and their Congress, will consider this programme and determine whether the means can be found for supplying those needs. On their decision will depend whether Europe can achieve economic stability and thereby be enabled to make her full contribution to the welfare of the world."

IX
The Cominform Documents

OCT. 5, 1947

COMMUNIQUE

At the end of September in Poland took place an informational conference with the participation of the following Communist parties: Communist party, Yugoslavia – Comrades Edvard Kardelj [Yugoslav Vice-Premier] and Milovan Djilas [Yugoslavian Minister Without Portfolio]; Bulgarian Workers party (Communist)—Comrades Vulko Chervenkov and V. Poptomov; Communist party Rumania—Comrades [George] Gheorghiu-Dej [Ana] Pauker; Hungarian Communist party—Comrades M. Farkash and Jozsef Revai; Polish Workers party – Comrades [Vice Premier Wladyslaw] Gomulka and H. Minc; All-Union Communist party (Bolshevik of the Soviet Union)—Comrades [Andrei] A. Zhdanov and [Georgi M.] Malenkov; Communist party of France—[Jacques] Duclos and [Etienne] Fajon; Communist party of Czechoslovakia – R. Slansky and S. Bashtovansky; and the Communist party of Italy—Comrades [Luigi] Longo and [Eugenio] Reale.

Members of the conference heard information reports about the activity of the Central Committees of the parties represented from Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, Poland, the Soviet Union, France, Czechoslovakia, and Italy.

Having exchanged viewpoints on these reports, the members of the conference decided to discuss the question of the international situation and the question of exchange of experience and coordination of activity of Communist parties represented at the conference.

A report on the international situation was made by Zhdanov. Members of the conference exchanged viewpoints on the report, fully coordinated their views on the present international situation and the tasks issuing from it and unanimously accepted a declaration on the question of the international situation.

A report on the exchange of experience and coordination of activity of Communist parties was made by Comrade Gomulka.

On this question, the conference, having in view the negative phenomena produced by the absence of contact between parties represented at the conference and taking into consideration the necessity for mutual exchange and experience, has decided to create an Information Bureau.

The Information Bureau will consist of the representatives of the Central Committees of the above mentioned parties.

The tasks of the Information Bureau consist in the organization of an exchange of experience between parties and, in case of necessity, in coordination of their activity on the basis of mutual agreement.

It has been decided that the Information Bureau will publish a printed organ. The city of Belgrade (Yugoslavia) has been decided as the location for the Information Bureau and the editorial board of its organ.

RESOLUTION

The conference states that the absence of connections between Communist parties who have taken part in this conference is in the present situation a serious shortcoming. Experience has shown that such division between Communist parties is incorrect and harmful. The requirement for an exchange of experience and voluntary coordination of actions of the separate parties has become particularly necessary now in conditions of the complicated post-war international situation and when the disunity of Communist parties may lead to damage for the working class.

Because of this, members of the conference agreed on the following:

First, to set up an Information Bureau of representatives of the Communist party of Yugoslavia, the Bulgarian Workers party (of Communists) of Rumania, the Hungarian Communist party, the Polish Workers party, the All-Union Communist party (bolshevik), the Communist party of France, the Communist party of Czechoslovakia, Communist party of Italy.

Second, the task given to the Information Bureau is to organize and exchange experience and, in case of necessity, coordinate the activity of Communist parties on foundations of mutual agreement.

Third, the Information Bureau will have in it representatives of the Central Committees—two from each Central Committee. Delegations of the Central Committees must be appointed and replaced by the Central Committees.

Fourth, the Information Bureau is to have printed an organ—fortnightly and, later on, weekly. The organ is to be published in French and Russian and, if possible, in other languages.

Fifth, the Information Bureau is to be in Belgrade.

MANIFESTO

Representatives of the Communist party of Yugoslavia, the Bulgarian Workers party (Communist), the Rumanian Communist party, the Hungarian Communist party, the Polish Workers party, the International Communist party (Bolshevik), the French Communist party, the Czechoslovak Communist party, the Italian Communist party, after exchanging opinions on the subject of the international situation, resolved the following declaration:

In the international situation brought about by the second World War and in the period that followed fundamental changes took place.

The characteristic aspect of these changes is a new balance of political forces interplaying in the world arena, a shift in the relationship between states which were the victors in the second World War, their revaluation.

As long as the war lasted the Allied states fighting against Germany and Japan marched in step and were one. Nevertheless, in the Allies' camp already during the war there existed differences regarding the aims of the war as well as the objectives of postwar and world organization. The Soviet Union and the democratic countries believed that the main objective of the war was the rebuilding and strengthening of democracy in Europe, the liquidation of fascism and the prevention of a possible aggression on the behalf of Germany, that its further aim was an achievement of an all around and lasting cooperation between the nations of Europe.

The United States of America and with them England placed as their war aim a different goal—the elimination of competition on the world market (Germany and Japan) and the consolidation of their dominant position. This difference in the definition of war aims and post-war objectives has begun to deepen in the post-war period.

Two opposite political lines have crystallized: on the one extreme the U.S.S.R. and the democratic countries aim at whittling down imperialism and the strengthening of democracy. On the other side the United States of America and England aim at the strengthening of imperialism and choking democracy. Because the U.S.S.R. and the democratic countries stand in the way of fulfilling imperialistic plans aiming at world domination and crushing democratic movements, a campaign against the Soviet Union and the countries of the new democracy was undertaken, a campaign fed also by a threat of a new war on the part of the most sanguine imperialist politicians of the United States and England.

In this way there arose two camps—the camp of imperialism and anti-democratic forces, whose chief aim is an establishment of a world-wide American imperialists' hegemony and the crushing of democracy; and an anti-imperialistic democratic camp whose chief aim is the elimination of imperialism, the strengthening of democracy and the liquidation of the remnants of fascism.

The battle of the two opposite camps—capitalistic and anti-imperialistic—is waged amid conditions of a further sharpening of the universal crisis of capitalism, a weakening of the forces of capitalism and a strengthening of the forces of socialism and democracy.

Because of the above, the imperialistic camp and its directing force, the United States of America show a growing aggressive activity. The activity evolved at the same time in all spheres—in the sphere of military and strategic activities, economic expansion and ideological warfare. The Truman-Marshall plan is only a farce, a European branch of the general world plan of political expansion being realized by the United States of America in all parts of the world. The plan of the economic and political subjugation of Europe through American imperialism is complemented by plans for the economic and political subjugation of China, Indonesia and South America. The aggressors of yesterday—the capitalist tycoons of Germany and Japan—are being prepared by the United States of America for a new role—as tools of the imperialistic policy in Europe and Asia of the United States of America.

The arsenal of tactical weapons used by the imperialistic camp is further very complex. It combines direct threats of force, blackmail and intimidation, all sorts of political tricks and economic pressure, bribery, the using for its own ends of conflicting interests and disagreements with the aim of strengthening its position, and all that is camouflaged by a mask of liberalism and pacifism in order to deceive and befuddle people not too dexterous in politics.

A separate place in this arsenal is reserved for the treasonable policy of the Rightist Socialists of the kind of [Leon] Blum in France, [Prime Minister] Attlee and [Foreign Secretary] Bevin in Britain, [Socialist Leader Dr. Kurt] Schumacher in Germany, [President Dr. Karl] Renner and [Vice Premier Adolf] Schaerf in Austria, [Giuseppe] Saragat in Italy, and so on, who aim at hiding the true face of imperialism behind the mask of democracy and Socialist phraseology while in reality they serve as faithful toadies of the imperialists, bringing within the ranks of labor dissension and disruption and poisoning its conscience. It is not an accident that the imperialistic British foreign policy has found in the person of Bevin its most consistent and arduous spokesman.

In these conditions the anti-imperialistic democratic camp has to close its ranks and draw up and agree on a common platform to work out its tactics against the chief forces of the imperialist camp, against American imperialism, against its English and French allies, against the Right-Wing Socialists above all in England and France.

To frustrate those imperialistic plans of aggression we need the efforts of all democratic and anti-imperialistic forces in Europe.

The Right-Wing Socialists are the traitors in this common cause. With the exception of those countries of new democracy where the Communists and Socialists, together with other progressive parties have formed a common bloc in the face of imperialism, the Socialists in most other countries, and especially the French Socialists and the British Laborites—[French Premier Paul] Ramadieur, M. Blum, Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin—facilitate by their servile placidity the fulfillment of American capitalistic aims, encouraging it to blackmail, and pushing their own countries on the road to vassal-like dependence on the United States of America.

In this situation the Communist parties are faced with a particularly important problem. They must grasp in their hands the banner of national independence and sovereignty in their own countries. If the Communist parties stand fast on their outposts, if they refuse to be intimidated and blackmailed, if they courageously guard over the democracy, national sovereignty, independence and self determination of their countries, if they know how to fight against attempts at the economic and political subjugation of their countries and place themselves at the head of all the forces ready to defend the cause of national honor and independence, then and then only no plans to subjugate the countries of Europe and Asia can succeed.

The above is one of the fundamental aims of the Communist parties.

One should realize that between the imperialist desire to unleash a new war and the possibility of organizing a war, there exists a tremendous distance.

The nations of the world do not want war. The forces who align themselves with peace are so numerous and powerful that if they defend hard and without flinching the cause of peace, if they show perseverance and grit then the plans of the aggressors are doomed to bankruptcy.

We should not forget that the imperialist agents, through their clatter regarding the danger of war, try to intimidate vacillators and weaklings and thus gain through blackmail concessions for the aggressor.

The main danger for the working class at this moment lies in the underestimation of its own strength and overestimation of the force of the imperialist camp.

In the same way as the appeasement policy of Munich led to Hitler's aggression, today concessions to the United States of America and the imperialist camp may cause its instigators to grow even more shameless and aggressive.

In consequence the Communist parties should place themselves in the vanguard of the Opposition against the imperialistic plans of expansion and aggression in all its manifestations whether in the sphere of state administration, politics, economics or ideology and they should at the same time unite and coordinate their efforts on the basis of a common anti-imperialist and democratic platform as well as gather around themselves all democratic and patriotic forces in their respective nations.

X

Summary of the Krug Committee's Report

ON U. S. CAPACITY TO GIVE AID
OCT. 18, 1947

THE CURRENT high levels of production and consumption in the United States are creating, in a number of specific and important areas of our economy, certain difficult supply impacts that must be faced. They are also aggravating generally the urgent need for extending our programs for the conservation, development and expansion of the nation's resources. Even though foreign aid exports in general are a small proportion of our domestic production or requirements and their drain upon our resources relatively minor, they point up the need for finding solutions to several important supply problems and emphasize the importance of broadening our conservation practices and building up our stockpiles of strategic minerals.

CURRENT HIGH LEVELS OF ECONOMIC ACTIVITIES

The economy of this country is today operating at highest peacetime levels, and, in many activities, is exceeding its wartime peaks. The production and transportation equipment of the nation is being utilized as fully as ever before in peacetime, and, in general, its raw material resources are being put to use at rates that exceed past peacetime records. This unprecedented economic activity has resulted in the attainment of a gross national product, or total value of final goods and services produced or in process, of $204 billion in 1946 and a rate of $225 billion annually for the first six months of 1947.

The broad concept of our national resources underlying this study has necessarily been broken down for the purposes of appraisal into particular components that relate to the commodities which are most likely to be required for foreign aid, together with their related physical resources, and to those national resources which are fundamental contributing factors in our productive process though not themselves exported—man-power, electric power and transportation facilities.

As might be anticipated from the current high level of the gross national product, most of the industries and occupations of our economy are functioning at unusually high rates, and the strain upon our facilities and drain on our resources are generally manifest. The studies of the problems of supply for the various commodities and the reviews of the contributing factors uniformly reveal that the prevailing characteristic of the current economy is one of tautness.

To be sure, there are instances of surpluses in capacity, and the availability of a number of commodities could be assured or increased through more appropriate distribution. And, in many cases, production could be maintained and even increased with minor adjustments of capacity or the breaking of specific bottlenecks. But the most serious shortages require complex adjustments in the supply of equipment and materials that are themselves difficult to provide.

Not only is our production at levels that, in many instances, are nearing the capacity of our facilities, but most of our exhaustible resources are being utilized at peak levels. In those cases where the reserves of these resources are vast there is of course, no cause for concern in current levels of extraction, but there are a number of resources which are being depleted at rates that cannot properly be disregarded.

This high utilization of its industrial and agricultural productive capacity is taxing the nation's plants and facilities. With a minimum of material and market controls, this situation of itself creates problems that require adjustment. The production of many of our products is depending upon the proven flexibility of our economic system and the ingenuity of our technologists in bridging gaps or breaking bottlenecks by providing substitutes and taking other measures to overcome shortages.

The heavy impacts upon our key industries and the drain upon our natural resources resulting from these production levels are pointing upon some of the major problems of our national well-being and security:

These high levels of employment and activity cannot be maintained without comprehensive programs for expanding, developing and replenishing our basic resources, adding materially to our productive capacity in key industries, and where domestic supplies are inadequate, through importing raw materials.

EXPORTS AND IMPACTS

The supply difficulties and danger spots are not, however, generally attributable to exports. Total exports are only a fraction of our gross national product. The studies of specific commodities also reveal that, in most instances, exports are not a large claimant for the current high levels of production and indeed, are not relatively as large as before the war.

They also show that most of the supply problems are short-run problems that will tend to diminish throughout the five years under study both because increases in some of our domestic capacities are being undertaken and because the foreign aid needs for many critical commodities can be expected to taper off sharply as production abroad gets under way.

The fact is that, with our production and employment, capital investment and personal consumption, at the highest levels ever reached in times of peace, we are suffering from the unaccustomed inconveniences of a sudden and unprepared for high-employment economy. This condition is owing far more to the pressures of internal demands than to exports. The study of electric power, as one of the contributing factors to the productivity of our economy, tends to confirm the observation that current levels of domestic production and consumption, rather than exports, are taxing our facilities. The power used in the manufacture or supply of the things that we export is an insignificant factor in the current and prospective stringencies in the power supply.

The underlying studies also show that the problems created by the impact of a possible foreign aid program upon the economy of the United States are of two sorts.

Most immediately, there are the supply impacts: the problems of obtaining adequate supplies of the commodities which are not currently being produced in sufficient quantities to satisfy all demands. To meet these problems, it will be necessary either to increase production through expanding capacity or utilizing existing capacity more intensively, or to divert consumption from less essential domestic and foreign uses to more essential ones.

There are also resource impacts: the problems of preventing the combined domestic and foreign drain on our natural resources from depleting them at uneconomic or unsafe rates. These can be met either by restricting production, and so running into conflict with the requirements of sound economic policy, both domestic and foreign, or by adopting conservation practices which will permit maximum rates of production to be attained with safety.

SUPPLY IMPACTS

Supply impacts are chiefly those which affect the volume of production and consumption and the level of prices and employment for particular commodities. Under present conditions of high levels of economic activity, any increase in demand, whether domestic or foreign, is likely to be felt in commodity markets to an exaggerated degree. The commodity studies show, however, that the number of specific supply problems likely to result from a program of foreign aid is relatively small, and that still fewer are likely to be quantitatively important.

Though many items are in scarce supply in the United States, chiefly as the result of the war and the extraordinarily high level of domestic demand, the only serious problems of supply to be anticipated in connection with a foreign aid program will be those which are related to shortages that are world-wide in character and that result chiefly from the wartime destruction or devastation of productive facilities.

These major world shortages consist of foods, especially cereals, and more particularly wheat, the staple of diet in the western world; fertilizers, especially nitrogen fertilizers, which can produce the greatest immediate increase in crop yields; coal, which is needed to activate industrial plants of all kinds, including notably those producing nitrogen fertilizers and steel; steel, which is basic to all reconstruction programs; and mechanical equipment, with special emphasis on farm machinery, freight cars and mining machinery.

The small number of key commodities simplifies the problem, but their basic and interrelated character complicates it. For example, maximum effort to relieve current food deficiencies abroad interferes to some extent with the aim of restoring foreign economies to a self-supporting basis. At current high prices United States farmers are eager to increase output, and their strong competition for available supplies of nitrogen fertilizers and farm machinery increases the difficulty of satisfying export demands for these goods.

Similarly, foreign demands for coal and steel compete with those for mechanical equipment. The need to effect a reconciliation among these and other competing demands, many of which are relatively inessential, poses the central problems of supply, so far as the foreign aid program is concerned.

These key items do not exhaust the list of requirements for foreign aid. Year after year, the list of exports from the United States contains larger or smaller quantities of nearly every movable goods which we produce, and it is probable that foreign countries will need to import exceptionally large amounts of many of our goods during the period of reconstruction. But this enumeration is designed to focus attention upon the commodities which, because they present the greatest problems, merit the greatest attention. Moreover, it is believed that, if effort and ingenuity are concentrated upon making considerably larger supplies of those key commodities available, other shortages will progressively diminish in severity as the aided countries return to a self-supporting basis.

Wheat: In terms of volume and cost, for it is the cheapest effective source of the calories needed to meet basic food deficiencies in foreign lands, wheat is by far the most important item of American food production in relation to foreign needs.

Export of foods other than grains are important, but many of them are ordinarily too expensive in terms of cost per calorie to be substituted for wheat in large quantities in meeting demands. It is generally agreed that European countries must concentrate on eliminating their basic calorie deficiencies in order that workers will have the incentive and strength to produce increased quantities of coal and other industrial requisites so essential in any program of economic rehabilitation.

Our current production of wheat is vastly in excess of our domestic food requirements. The wheat crop of 1947 was 1,400 million bushels, compared with 1,156 million for 1946, and the ten-year average (1936-45) of 890 million bushels. Of almost 19 million long tons of food exported by the United States in the twelve months ended June 30, 1947, cereals made up 80 per cent by weight, and exports of wheat alone (including flour) amounted to 10½ million long tons, or nearly 400 million bushels. These exports did not significantly reduce domestic use of grain products for human food, although additional grain could have been converted into meat and milk.

For 1948 and the following years the problem is to assure maximum wheat production for as long as it is needed to meet world shortages. According to the Department of Agriculture, the production goals that have been set are designed to encourage maximum wheat production and exports next year. Similarly high goals should be set in the years thereafter if the world wheat shortage continues.

But whether such goals can be met will depend upon weather. Wheat yields are extremely variable from year to year. Our large wheat crops during the past six years have been due in part to unusually favorable weather. Weather has also been partly responsible for the current high level of wheat acreage, since favorable moisture conditions have permitted plantings on land normally submarginal for wheat. With average weather, yields certainly and acreage probably would decline from present levels. With dry weather in the Great Plains material reductions in wheat acreage would be expected.

The immediate problem is securing the wheat for shipments during the current crop year. This supply problem again is largely a result of the weather, both here and abroad. To be sure, the 1947 wheat crop in the United States exceeds the highest previous record by more than 200 million bushels and would ordinarily have permitted a substantial increase in exports over last year, with a corresponding improvement in the food situation of importing countries.

However, adverse weather has resulted in a short corn crop in this country and in a drastic reduction in bread grain production in Europe. There is, consequently, an extremely serious wheat supply problem for the current crop year. The short corn crop means that exports of corn and other coarse grain during the rest of this fiscal year will be small and that relatively large amounts of domestic wheat will be fed to livestock, thereby reducing quantities available for export.

The reduced bread grain production in Europe means that European food imports would have to be increased by the equivalent of 200 million bushels of grain, even to maintain the low consumption levels of 1946-1947.

Exportable supplies of grain and other foods in countries other than the United States are expected to be somewhat larger than last year, but not sufficient to offset the decline in European production. The supply problem is also affected by the level to which our carry-over stocks may safely be drawn down at the end of the fiscal year. If 1948 wheat crop prospects, as of next spring, are very good, carry-over stocks might again be brought down to the level of July, 1947. If 1948 wheat prospects are relatively poor, it would be desirable to carry larger stocks into 1948-49.

From the standpoint of world food needs in 1947-48, it would be desirable for the United States to export much more wheat than the 1946-47 total of roughly 400,000,000 bushels. However, our ability to increase wheat exports above this level will depend to a considerable extent upon our ability to hold wheat feeding of livestock below the levels that now seem probable.

While price and rationing problems are not covered within the scope of this report, the supply problem in this instance is materially affected by price factors. The rate of wheat feeding will be influenced by the relative prices of wheat and feed grains, particularly corn, and also by the relative prices of wheat and livestock products. Government action to reduce wheat feeding by means of direct limitation orders could not be taken without additional legislation.

Possible types of action to assure maximum supplies of wheat for export would include food conservation programs, measures designed to reduce consumption (and hence prices) of other grains and livestock products, efforts among farmers, feed dealers and feeders to limit the use of wheat for feed, programs to limit use of wheat and coarse grains by industrial users, such as the brewers and distillers, and measures to encourage freer movement of wheat from farms.

In addition to these possibilities for increasing the availability of wheat for export to meet European needs, consideration should be given to supplementing wheat exports by exporting other foods, particularly those in long supply, to make up any discrepancy in wheat exports. To the extent that the substitution of other foods for wheat is practicable, it would tend to lessen the price impact resulting from maximum wheat exports.

In summary, wheat is a key item in any foreign aid program. We can continue to supply large quantities of wheat for foreign aid without substantial reduction of food supplies in this country or undue drain on our soil resources, assuming average weather and our continued ability to plant in the Great Plains. The immediate problem, however, is meeting European requirements in the current crop year when adverse weather has reduced American corn supplies and European grain production; the competition of the heavier European demands with our substitution of wheat for corn results in complex price impacts.

The success of measures to assure equitable distribution of food supplies in this country and to minimize price effects will therefore determine the extent of our current exports and the levels of future exports if adverse weather condition are encountered.

Nitrogen Fertilizers: The current low level of food production in many countries is owing, in part, to the inadequacy of current fertilizer supplies and to accumulated deficiencies of fertilizer applications during the war. Of the three essential plant nutrients—nitrogen, phosphorus and potassium—the first is used to obtain immediate increases in food production. Fertilizer phosphate and potash are necessary to the long-run preservation of the fertility of the soil but are not as effective for securing immediate crop increases. Therefore nitrogen is the most important fertilizer production and supply problem. Europe and North Africa possess ample reserves of the two other fertilizer minerals, and it is probable that production of these two fertilizers can gradually be brought into balance with European needs, if mining machinery, coal and other supplies can be made available.

While United States production of nitrogen (including the output of ordnance plants) has increased threefold since before the war, domestic consumption of nitrogen fertilizers has more than doubled. Most of the increase in consumption has occurred in agriculture, but the demands of industry for nitrogen are not relatively greater than before the war.

Although European production of nitrogen is almost back at pre-war levels, total production abroad is still considerably below capacity, owing chiefly to an insufficiency of coal and electric power, and world needs for nitrogen are greater than before the war.

CURRENT SHIPMENTS SMALL

With the exception of the nitrogen being produced in Army ordnance plants and exported to occupied areas, relatively small quantities of nitrogen are currently being shipped from this country and even these quantities are secured only through the use of priority powers.

Unless special measures are taken, American nitrogen capacity will expand only enough to keep pace with domestic requirements.

Considering transportation and cost, it appears desirable to export nitrogen for increased food production abroad rather than to continue to ship the much greater tonnages of equivalent food from the United States. The most effective means of increasing our nitrogen exports include the stimulation of fuller utilization of plant capacity, the curtailment of industrial use of nitrogen and the diversion of fertilizers from domestic to foreign markets. Greater production from Government plants could probably be secured, but at higher cost until the plants are consolidated for efficient operation.

It is understood, however, that considerable nitrogen capacity is currently unutilized in Western Europe, primarily for lack of coal. The gains to be made from full utilization of this capacity, by making coal supplies available, may be much greater than those which can reasonably be expected from the actions necessary to increase exports of nitrogen from the United States.

In summary, the foreign aid program should be designed to increase production of nitrogen by employing unused capacity in Europe and elsewhere to help to meet the current world food shortage and to minimize imports of food to aided countries. To this end coal and industrial equipment shipments for nitrogen fertilizer production should be given high priority.

Coal. Although reconstruction requirements make European coal needs greater than prewar levels, coal production in Europe is currently about 25 per cent below prewar rates. Western Europe could probably use about 100 million tons of coal per year in excess of current production, and sufficient coal supplies are essential to close the vicious circle of dragging agricultural and industrial output.

Since the foreign aid program is to achieve reconstruction, the current imports of coal from the United States should decline rapidly as reconstruction is effected. There is no area of the economy, moreover, where the need for developing sound and durable relationships between European regions is greater than in the case of coal.

Eastern European coal, particularly Polish coal, is essential to the integrated development of a reasonably balanced European economy. Assuming an effective "self-help and mutual-aid" program, the current coal supply crisis can be expected to be relatively short-lived, the years 1947 and 1948 representing the peak in demand for coal from the United States.

At current production rates the total hard and soft coal produced in the United States in 1947 will approximate 660 million tons, or about 4 per cent below the peak of 684 million tons reached during the war. Production is currently being limited by the lack of adequate supply of coal cars on the railroads. Coal is not stored at the mines, and when transportation facilities are inadequate for shipment of all available coal, production is curtailed.

COAL OUTPUT MUST RISE

Total consumption of coal in the United States and Canada for 1947 is estimated at 627 million tons. If production were not limited by the lack of coal cars, it is believed that coal could be produced in amounts sufficient to meet this level of United States and Canadian requirements and in addition an amount equal to the coal-loading capacity of United States port facilities. Coal loading for export reached a record monthly peak of about 5 million tons in August, 1947. Under average conditions a somewhat lower loading rate may be expected. Capacity shipments from our ports would be sufficient to meet the most essential foreign demands.

Price problems are a factor in the coal situation, as in wheat. There are many grades of coal, and handling costs for overseas shipment are a large part of the final cost, and are the same per ton regardless of quality. Foreign purchasers, therefore, often find it advantageous to pay premium prices to acquire the better coals, thus making procurement by American buyers more difficult and expensive. Procurement procedure for a foreign aid program should be such as to assure effective utilization of high-grade coals and minimum impact on domestic prices.

Since the domestic requirements and the export demands will remain heavy at least during the next year, production must be higher than it was during 1947 to meet the total demand.

As coal cars are the current bottleneck to production, every effort must be made to increase the availability of new coal cars and to improve the utilization of existing equipment.

In summary, the problem of producing enough coal to meet our own requirements and those for export is not a coal resource problem but primarily a transportation problem. We must make most effective use of available transportation equipment and arrange for the procurement of coal for foreign aid under procedures that will minimize the impact on the domestic market.

Steel. Steel presents, in many ways, the most troublesome problem of all. Neither time nor facilities have been available for a fully adequate appraisal of the worldwide steel problem and the importance of steel in the world economy dictates that such an appraisal should be made. It is clear, however, that, at present, there is a crippling shortage of steel in all foreign countries striving to recover from the effects of war. This shortage is the result primarily of the removal, destruction or incapacitation of foreign iron and steelmaking plants, and of the exceptionally high level of requirements to replace losses or to meet backlogs accumulated during the war. Existing iron and steelmaking plants in foreign countries are incapacitated chiefly because of shortages of war materials, especially coking coal.

Foreign aid requirements for steel products compete importantly with our domestic demands and with the demands of South America and other developing areas.

The accumulation of backlogs for both producers' and consumers' goods and the effects of population growth have raised domestic steel consumption to the highest peacetime levels.

In most of the studies of specific commodities, the shortage of steel or steel products is indicated to be one of the bottlenecks to maintaining or increasing production.

Not only is this the case with such heavy users as the industrial and farm machinery and vehicle industries, where sheet metal, transmission chains and castings are steel components in short supply, but also in petroleum, where steel tubing, casing and pipe lines are needed; in fertilizers and other chemicals, where pressure tank cars and containers are problems; in coal where production levels are dependent upon the availability of open-top cars now in short supply; in transportation where facilities for shipping wheat and other commodities are similarly below current requirements.

The present situation contrasts with that in 1940, a year when heavy foreign demand did not face competition from a fully employed economy in the United States. Rated capacity in the industry was increased from 81,000,000 tons of steel ingots in 1940 to 95,000,000 tons in 1945 and is down to 91,000,000 tons in 1947 owing to dismantling of older facilities. It is estimated that approximately 85,000,000 tons of steel ingots will be produced from this capacity in 1947. Exports of steel mill products as such will amount to approximately 6,600,000 tons, compared with 8,000,000 tons in 1940.

Production of finished steel mill products was 46,000,000 tons in 1940 and will be about 63,000,000 tons in 1947; exports were about 17 per cent of production in 1940 and will be 10.5 per cent this year. Furthermore, while other categories have increased, exports of sheet and strip, the items in tightest supply, have not increased above the pre-war (1937) rate, relative to output.

To increase the current level of exports of iron and steel mill products without reducing domestic consumption will necessitate the breaking of certain domestic bottlenecks, particularly the shortage of steel sheet. Additional sheet and strip capacity is being installed by the steel industry and is becoming available in increasing quantities. Programs already planned extend to the end of 1948.

A considerable portion of the most urgent foreign demand, however, is for various kinds of ingots and rough shapes for which adequate finishing capacity is available in the United States. The basic limiting factor to exports, therefore, is not finishing capacity but ingot production, which in 1947 will total some six million tons less than rated capacity. Everything possible should be done to bring this unused capacity into production promptly.

For the most part, this gap between output and capacity reflects the shortage of raw materials, namely, steel scrap and pig iron. While a continued high rate of industrial production should provide sufficient industrial scrap to produce 85 million tons of ingots, the additional quantities of scrap required for increased output will be difficult to obtain.

Pig iron productive capacity of 64.7 million tons is being used at only about 90 per cent of capacity, leaving 6.2 million tons of unused capacity. A number of furnaces built by the Government are not being used at all, because of such problems as local shortages of coke, lack of blowers and poor furnace condition. Certain privately owned furnaces are likewise hampered by local coke shortages, while others are operating below capacity because of the poor quality of coke available and similar factors, including high costs of production in some cases.

Energetic efforts by industry with appropriate government encouragement and assistance will ease these raw material shortages. The most promising possibilities, in addition to prompt return of industrial scrap, exist in the accelerated scrapping of remaining war surplus materials and the organization of systematic collection of obsolescent scrap. Another possibility is in the extension of the high pressure and oxygen techniques to increase output of pig iron from existing capacity. Solution of the scrap and pig iron problems would permit an increase in our ingot output to a level closer to rated capacity than at present.

From an examination of past relationships between steel production and the national economy—a conservative basis for analysis in the abnormal postwar period—it would appear that, if the current high level of economic activity continues, the present capacity of the iron and steel industry in the United States, even if fully utilized, will be inadequate to meet the demands placed upon it.

NEW TECHNIQUES MAY HELP

Increasing the capacity of the steel industry by the construction of additional new facilities, however, would not be effective unless raw materials are available in adequate quantities to make such new facilities fully productive. Moreover, such construction would require the use of steel that is critically needed currently both here and abroad. Careful consideration must, therefore, be given to every possible alternative for making maximum amounts of steel available and to assure its use for the most critical needs. The investment of steel in the increases of needed new steel capacity should be properly timed and geared to the availability of raw materials and to the supplying of other critical requirements for available steel.

It may be possible that pig iron and ingot capacity can be increased by new technological means as a substitute for the construction of new blast and steel furnaces. The technical practicability of the use of oxygen-enriched air in the open hearth process has already been demonstrated and indicates considerable increases in production per furnace.

It appears that the reduction in costs would justify the additional capital investment in oxygen-making equipment and the solving of the several production problems entailed in its use. As regards finishing capacity, the need for increases will depend upon the types of products in demand. Continued European requirements for steel will depend to a considerable extent upon the speed with which foreign steel facilities can be brought into production.

Every effort should be directed to accelerate this development. Export controls may be effective in channeling steel exports to assistance areas. In addition, however, government-industry cooperation will be needed to channel domestic steel supplies to assure their most effective use in our economy.

In summary, maintenance of substantial European demands for American steel will aggravate a serious domestic supply situation. Industry and government cooperation is needed to make raw materials, including scrap, available and otherwise to assure full utilization of existing capacity. Continued consideration must be given to increasing domestic capacity for future needs in such a manner as to minimize the effect of taking steel from current critical uses. In the light of the world steel shortage, supplies made available for export should be channeled to the most important uses and, through government-industry cooperation, supplies should be assured for essential needs here at home. Foreign-aid requirements should be carefully screened and procurement for export should be organized to reduce the impact on domestic supplies and prices to a minimum.

Industrial Equipment. In order to provide for the rehabilitation of the European economy, certain items of industrial equipment will be needed. Many items of such equipment are readily available for export and will have little or no effect upon our domestic economy. There are particular types of equipment, however, that are especially needed abroad and are also in heavy demand at home, and for which productive capacity is limited.

Production of industrial machinery and vehicles in the United States reached a total of over 18 billion dollars in 1944, held to substantially the same rate during the first half of 1945 and dropped precipitously thereafter. Production in June, 1946, however, was at the annual rate of 13 billion dollars. Exports of industrial machinery, not including vehicles, accounted for nearly 7 per cent of production in 1937, and a slight increase to about 8 per cent is expected in 1947. Europe's share of our industrial machinery exports has declined from an average of about 30 per cent in 1936 to 1938 to about 26 per cent in the first six months of this year. The major increase in exports of these products has been the 10 per cent greater shipments to Latin America.

One of the most important items of possible foreign aid requirements for industrial equipment is freight cars, especially open tops, for the transport of coal. It is understood that, despite the relatively low output, coal is being stored at the mines in Europe for lack of inland transport facilities. In this country the coal car shortage is a major limiting factor in production. Mining machinery, including rubber conveyor belts, is another serious shortage that limits output per worker both in the coal mines of Europe and in the phosphate and potash mines of North Africa and Europe.

These and similar items of equipment are needed to assist in breaking some of the more serious bottlenecks in European recovery.

To the extent that they make coal and fertilizer available, they will permit the tapering off of outside aid in the form of these essentials and the food and steel products that are creating the greatest supply problems in this country and the world generally.

To a considerable extent, the problem of making these items of equipment available both for export and for domestic demands is a result of the tight steel situation. The impact of these and other exports containing steel upon our domestic steel capacity, however, does not need separate consideration here, as the amount of steel in such products has been included in the estimates of requirements for domestic industry.

In addition to securing steel, however, the supply of industrial equipment for foreign aid will require industry-Government cooperation to maintain fullest utilization of productive capacity and to assure that the most pressing demands are given first priority. Attention given to the breaking of individual bottlenecks in the production of machinery and equipment permits the evaluation of the impact of a specific action on other programs and is more often than not effective in solving a whole series of production problems.

In view of the high levels of domestic demand and the importance of foreign requirements for industrial machinery for rehabilitation, foreign aid exports should be carefully evaluated and channeled so that every item of scarce equipment is put to work promptly and effectively in reconstruction.

In summary, supply problems on machinery and equipment items, unlike the other supply problems, are capable of less precise evaluation in the absence of definite requirements.

Moreover, their solution is likely to be brought about by more careful attention to individual problems to assure the supply of specific items necessary for a coordinated reconstruction program. The impact of these exports will be lessened in many instances by a solution of the steel bottlenecks.

Undoubtedly, the list of European requirements will specify the amounts and kinds of these and other items required and will reveal other urgent needs which may present short-run supply difficulties. Such requirements may have important impacts upon particular industries or plants but cannot present any generalized problems of supply for the country as a whole.

For the most part, the supply impacts of the foreign aid program can be reduced by providing for its sound administration. They call for the effective organization of the purchasing procedures for foreign aid exports to create the minimum impact on the domestic economy and to assure the proper channeling of commodities in short supply to those uses where they will be most effective in the rehabilitation of the European economy, assuming maximum "self-help and mutual aid." Cooperative arrangement with the countries receiving assistance will be necessary to assure that foreign aid purchases do not compete with each other and otherwise unduly aggravate domestic market conditions. Government-industry cooperation will be needed both for breaking domestic production and supply bottlenecks and for proper channeling of exports.

XI

Report to the Nation by President Truman

NEED FOR CALLING SPECIAL SESSION

OCT. 24, 1947

My Fellow Countrymen:

I have called the Congress to meet on Nov. 17 to consider the problems of high prices at home and emergency aid abroad.

These are questions of vital importance to all of us. I want to talk to you frankly tonight about both of these problems.

Since V-J Day we have moved steadfastly toward two goals. We have sought peace and prosperity—prosperity for all our people, peace for all the world.

As we measure our progress toward these goals and chart the course ahead we find that recent events have raised new and dangerous obstacles in our path.

Our domestic prosperity is endangered by the threat of inflation. The peace of the world is endangered by hunger and cold in other lands.

These obstacles must be overcome by prompt and courageous action. Legislation by the Congress is essential. The need is too pressing—the results of delay too grave —for Congressional action to wait until the next regular session in January.

Let me speak first about our domestic prosperity.

In many ways we are now more prosperous than we have ever been. More workers have jobs—and at better wages—than at any time in the past.

Farmers are receiving a greater share of our national income than they have in many years. Manufacturers and retailers are enjoying record business and record earnings. We are producing more goods for civilian use than ever before in history.

But these signs of prosperity do not tell the whole story. Although production is high, prices are shooting up.

Although nearly every one is employed, many people cannot afford essential items. Although national income has reached a new high, the buying power of many people is shrinking.

A few figures—and they are startling figures—show how the cost of living is going up.

Since the middle of 1946 this is what has happened:

Clothing prices have gone up 18 per cent; household furnishings have gone up 18 per cent; food has gone up 40 per cent. The average for all items is up 23 per cent. And the cost of living is still climbing. In the last three months it has climbed at a rate of 16 per cent a year.

Wholesale prices are also increasing. Since the middle of 1946, textiles have gone up 30 per cent; metals, up 35 per cent, and building materials, up 41 per cent. These increases in wholesale prices affect every industry and trade, and they will eventually be reflected in retail prices.

For some of our people the increased cost of living has been offset by increased incomes. But for most of our people, increases in income are falling behind increases in the cost of living.

Millions of families of low or moderate income are already victims of inflation. These families are using up savings, they are mortgaging their future by going into debt. They are doing without things they should have.

I know the worries of the breadwinner whose earnings cannot keep up with the high cost of living. I know of the difficulties of the housewife who tries to stretch the family income to pay for groceries and clothes and rent. I know how hard it is to skimp and save, and do without.

When so many people are not sharing fairly in prosperity the road is being paved for a recession or a depression.

None of us can afford to overlook this danger. Farmers will remember how they suffered after 1920 because price inflation was followed by a collapse. Business men and bankers will recall how they suffered after 1929 because wild speculation was followed by the depression. Even those who are prosperous today are prospective victims of inflation tomorrow.

Inflation must be stopped before it is too late.

It is within our power to stop it. Our economy is basically sound. It has been immensely strengthened in recent years. The average buying power of our people today is 40 per cent higher than it was in 1929. But we are losing some of this gain as rising prices pull away from incomes. We can prevent further loss, and can even go on to new gains, if we use our economic strength wisely.

The major cause of high prices in this country is the great demand among our own people for available goods. An attempt has been made to place the blame upon our foreign aid program, but this is not borne out by the facts. During the war we learned that we could improve our standard of living with less than 60 per cent of our output available for civilian use. At present, even with current exports to all countries, a far greater per cent of our production is available for civilian use. With sound policies, we can protect our own standard of living and carry on a substantial foreign aid program at the same time.

We now have—and will continue to have —enough food and clothing and other goods in the United States to meet our needs. But excessively high prices mean that these goods are not being distributed wisely and fairly. High prices ration the essentials of life by squeezing out the less fortunate of our citizens. We can meet this problem only by bringing prices into line with the incomes of our people.

In our free-enterprise system we place major reliance upon voluntary action by business men, farmers, workers and consumers. That is why I have repeatedly urged voluntary price reductions.

But the responsibility of government extends beyond aiding voluntary action. The government must respond to the needs of the people.

The American people now have a compelling need for protection from the dangers of price inflation and the rising cost of living. They recognize this need and are asking for the protection to which they are entitled. The government must assume a larger share of the responsibility for putting an end to excessive prices and the hardships and dangers which accompany them. For this purpose, prompt enactment by the Congress of comprehensive legislation is necessary.

This, then, is one reason why I am calling the Congress into session on Nov. 17. When it meets I shall recommend a program for dealing with inflation, high prices and the high cost of living. Adequate measures, enacted in time, are necessary to correct the present situation.

Let me turn now to the other reason for calling the Congress into session. This is the problem of hunger and cold and human suffering abroad. It is the problem of men and women and children who look to us for help at this crucial time.

We are following a definite and clear foreign policy. That policy has been, is now, and shall be to assist free men and free nations to recover from the devastation of war, to stand on their own feet, to help one another and to contribute their full share to a stable and lasting peace. We follow that policy for the purpose of securing the peace and well-being of the world. It is nonsense to say that we seek dominance over any other nation. We believe in freedom, and we are doing all we can to support free men and free governments throughout the world.

In furtherance of this foreign policy, we now have under consideration the part which the United States should play in aiding a long-range recovery program for western Europe. This plan presents great hope for economic security and peace in that vital part of the world. It will take some time to complete the consideration of this plan and to make all the important decisions required for putting it into effect.

However, a period of crisis is now at hand. The perils of hunger and cold in Europe make this winter a decisive time in history. All the progress of reconstruction and all the promise of future plans are endangered. If European nations are to continue their recovery, they must get through this winter without being crippled by economic paralysis and resulting chaos.

In advance of our decision on the long-range European recovery plan, we must help some nations through this immediate crisis. The most imminent danger exists in France and in Italy. If the economies of these countries collapse and the people succumb to totalitarian pressures, there will be no opportunity for them or for us to look forward to their recovery so essential to world peace.

Their first need is food. Exceedingly bad weather this year has caused the worst crops in western Europe in a generation. Crop failures in France—the worst in 100 years—and in Italy make it necessary for those countries to import half the grain they need to live on during the coming months.

The other major shortage is fuel. Fuel supplies were depleted by last year's severe winter. War damage to railroads and the reduced efficiency of miners laboring on an inadequate diet have prevented the rebuilding of fuel stocks.

The financial reserves of France and Italy have been nearly exhausted by the cost of their imports since the end of the war. Rising prices in the United States and in other countries where they must buy have further reduced the purchasing power of their remaining funds. They now face the coming winter without sufficient resources to pay for essential food and fuel.

The figures tell the story.

France can meet her minimum needs, with present funds, until the end of December, but she will enter the new year without funds to pay for essential imports. The French will need $357,000,000 to carry them until March 31, 1948.

Italy will not be able even to get through the rest of this year. Italy must have $142,000,000 to carry her until Dec. 31 and an additional sum of $143,000,000 to get through the first quarter of 1948.

Serious difficulties have also been encountered in the occupied areas—Germany, Japan and Korea. Additional funds will have to be appropriated this year in order for us to maintain our position in these areas.

It can readily be seen that Congressional action to meet these needs cannot be delayed until January.

My action in convening the Congress on Nov. 17 in no way reduces the necessity for pressing forward with our voluntary food-saving program. Dollars appropriated by the Congress cannot feed hungry people if there is no food for the dollars to buy. There will not be enough food unless we, the people of the United States, save vast quantities of grain. I am deeply gratified at the splendid response of the American people to our national food-saving program. It is an earnest effort to meet the needs of humanity.

Even with the proposed aid from this country, the people of Europe this winter will be on short rations. They will be cold, and they will be without many necessities. But our emergency aid will be definite assurance of the continuing support of this nation for the free peoples of Europe.

The two problems I have been discussing with you tonight—high prices at home and hunger and cold abroad—present a challenge to the American people.

We could choose the course of inaction. We could wait until depression caught up with us, until our living standards sank, and our people tramped the streets looking for jobs. Other democratic nations would lose hope and become easy victims of totalitarian aggression. That would be the course of defeatism and cowardice.

Our other course is to take timely and forthright action. If we do this we can halt the spiral of inflation at home, relieve hunger and cold abroad and help our friendly neighbors become self-governing once again.

I know that it is the heartfelt wish of the American people that action be taken which will overcome the obstacles to peace and prosperity confronting this nation.

It is within our power to lead the world to peace and plenty.

With resolution and united effort we shall achieve our goal.

XII

Summary of Economic Advisers' Report

ON EFFECT OF FOREIGN AID ON U.S.

NOV. 1, 1947

SCOPE AND PURPOSE

THE principal questions considered in the report are the extent of the burdens that would be imposed on the economy of the United States by providing further foreign aid during the next few years and the capacity of the economy to support those burdens. Since a companion report prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior deals with national resources and physical capacities, the Council of Economic Advisers centers its attention upon the effect of exports, financed in part with Government funds, upon domestic production, consumption, and prices.

Burdens are measured first in terms of goods made available abroad and withdrawn from domestic consumers, and second in terms of price effects; then these price impacts are looked at in their relation to the general functioning of the domestic economy; and then the effect on Government finance and the tax structure is examined.

THE IMPACT OF PAST AID

The effect of the export surplus to date is highly relevant to an inquiry into the general impact of a new foreign aid program because, at the levels of new foreign aid under discussion, the export surplus in the future will be lower than it has been in the recent past, while our total domestic output of goods and services will probably be higher in future years.

The size of the export surplus furnishes a general measure of impact, since it represents the excess of goods and services sent abroad over the goods and services that we import. In 1946 total exports were 15.3 billion dollars and the export surplus was 8.1 billion dollars. In the second quarter of 1947 total exports reached a peak annual rate of 21 billion dollars, imports were about 8 billion dollars, and the export surplus rose to an annual rate of 13 billion dollars, but in the third quarter exports declined to an annual rate of 18.3 billion dollars, and the export surplus to 10.3 billion dollars.

Since the end of the war Government financial aid to European countries has financed about four-fifths of their excess of purchases from us in 1946 and nearly all of it in the second quarter of 1947. The large part of the export surplus financed through our foreign aid program has reflected economic conditions in Europe and the depletion of their buying resources. Since the end of the war the Government has financed about one-third of our exports to the world as a whole, and about two-thirds of our total export surplus. The impact of aid has therefore, been substantially less than that of the total export surplus.

EFFECT OF PAST AID ON DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

The size of the export surplus to date has naturally decreased the amount of goods available for domestic consumption. But it has not, in view of the tremendous increase in American productive capacity during and since the war, prevented the American consumer from enjoying a general standard of living far above any pre-war level. Actual domestic consumption of most significant items is now far higher than before the war. For example, per capita consumption of meat has risen from 125 pounds a year in the pre-war period to an estimated 155 pounds for 1947. Such shortages of goods as we experience reflect unparalleled levels of domestic demand based on high national income.

EFFECTS ON PRICE LEVEL TO DATE

The high foreign demand has added to the inflationary pressure on prices, but the much larger domestic demand has been the principal cause of the upward pressure. Prices remained stable during the second quarter of 1947, when the export surplus reached its peak. In the third quarter of this year, although the export demand has been diminishing, it has played an important part in the increases in grain prices, due to high foreign demand for wheat in the face of adverse crop developments. Grain price increases have spread to livestock and other food products. But even for food, the sharp rise stemmed largely from the exceptionally high domestic demand. Looking at the economy generally, price inflation has been caused mainly by domestic factors, but shortages of specific commodities present different problems, as will be shown later.

THE GENERAL IMPACT OF A NEW FOREIGN AID PROGRAM

In the absence of a new foreign aid program, it is likely that our export surplus would sink to an annual rate of 4 to 5 billion dollars by next year, contrasted with the 13-billion-dollar annual rate in the second quarter of 1947 and an estimated current annual rate of about 10 billion dollars. Assuming that our imports remain at approximately the current level of about 8 billion dollars a year, our total exports during next year would sink to an annual rate of 13 billion dollars or less, compared to an annual rate of 21 billion dollars in the second quarter of 1947 and an estimated current annual rate of about 18 billion dollars. The major reductions would occur in our exports to Europe.

While this rapid reduction in exports would probably not inflict serious short-run damage on our own economy, substantial problems of readjustment would be generated. Moreover, the industrial paralysis which could be expected to result in some other countries would have repercussions of major proportions upon our own economy and upon world stability.

The report assumes for illustrative purposes a foreign aid figure based upon the Paris Conference Report which would reach a maximum annual rate of 8 billion dollars during the first year, including about 1 billion dollars already authorized, and which would produce a maximum export surplus of about 12 billion dollars a year. This would mean total exports at a peak of not more than 20 billion dollars a year, assuming 8 billion dollars of imports. Since these levels are lower than those reached during the second quarter of 1947 and would decline appreciably from year to year, it follows that the export surplus resulting from any future foreign aid program will at no time equal, and for most of the time will be substantially less, than levels which have been reached during the current year.

In view of the long-run prospect for increasing American output if maximum employment and production are maintained, these facts lead to the conclusion that the general impact of a new foreign aid program of the assumed size upon the American economy could be sustained because a larger impact has already been sustained. The report stresses, however, that problems raised by specific commodities in relatively short supply could distort or overturn this generally optimistic picture if not dealt with effectively.

THE PROBLEM OF SPECIFIC COMMODITIES

Food, steel, industrial and agricultural machinery, coal, and fertilizer are items of key significance because foreign demand for these goods is especially urgent whereas they are in relatively short supply in this country.

THE IMPACT OF THE GRAIN SHORTAGE

The food situation is the most serious. The problem stems from a very short corn crop at home, coinciding with a bad crop year for food grains in Europe. Although the domestic wheat crop was at a record level, adverse corn crop developments and high meat prices have provided incentives for feeding large amounts of wheat to livestock.

Exports of wheat will need to be maintained at recent levels. At the same time, the domestic demand both for grains and for meat, poultry, and other food continues to be very high despite record prices. Food price increases have already become serious, and further food price increases would decrease the value of each dollar of foreign aid extended, work additional hardships upon American families of low or moderate income, and threaten an inflationary price-wage spiral which could adversely affect the whole economy.

If wheat exports continue at the levels set by foreign need, and if the domestic demand for food remains at or near its post-war level, conservation and other measures to regulate use and hold prices in check will be needed in this country. With such measures to maintain healthful nutritional standards, the supply here would be adequate to serve nutritional and other needs satisfactorily although not luxuriously.

STEEL AND STEEL PRODUCTS

Our total production of rolled steel products during the first half of 1947 was at an annual rate of more than 62 million short tons, contrasted with less than 35 million tons in 1939. Although exports rose from about 2½ million tons in 1939 to an annual rate of 6½ million tons in the first half of 1947, the amount of steel available for domestic consumption is much higher than before the war. But owing to the enormous increase in our steel-using industry, the relative steel shortage is of serious proportions and there is not much prospect of large increase in production in the short run.

The chief danger here is that this supply situation may be translated into further increases in the price of steel and steel products which would give an additional inflationary impetus to the whole economy. High domestic and foreign demand for industrial and agricultural machinery is closely connected with the steel problem.

The general conclusion regarding steel as well as food is this: Whether the domestic situation worsens considerably or progresses satisfactorily depends upon the use of vigorous, affirmative measures to assure distribution to the most urgent uses and to prevent a spiraling of prices.

COAL AND FERTILIZER

In the case of coal and fertilizer, for which there is a large foreign need to quicken the process of economic restoration, the domestic economy can well afford to continue or even increase shipments of these commodities. Domestic shortages are not serious (for coal, the problem is mainly one of transportation), while shipments abroad will lessen the demand for other imports by hastening the revival of production in Europe.

FISCAL IMPACT OF FOREIGN AID

Foreign aid to date has been financed with revenues derived from taxation and not through increasing the national debt. This policy should continue so long as our own economy continues to operate at high levels and under inflationary pressure. Even had there been a smaller foreign aid program in the past, and even without a new foreign aid program, it would be undesirable to reduce the level of taxes while such pressures exist. On the other hand, from the budgetary standpoint, a new foreign aid program should not call for increased taxes. Further, since the general impact of a new foreign aid program would be less than the recent impact of foreign aid, such a new program would not increase inflationary pressures above recent levels, and therefore would not call for still higher taxes as an anti-inflationary measure. The amount of exports financed with Government aid has ranged between 2 and 3 per cent of our gross national product, and will be less in the future, and our general financial capacity to support such a program cannot be questioned.

SOME LONG-RANGE IMPLICATIONS OF FOREIGN AID

To the extent that aid is provided through loans, these can be repaid only through restoration of the export trade of other countries. This will expose American industry to added competition, a test which must be faced. Some outright gifts to meet emergency demands, however, will more rapidly qualify these countries for loans from the International Bank and private sources and more rapidly restore a well-balanced world trade.

In the longer run, the economic restoration of Europe will benefit our own economy by enabling us to obtain more goods by advantageous trade. On the other hand, a cessation of foreign aid would force an economic reorientation of Europe which would be detrimental to our economy.

SOFTENING THE IMPACT OF FOREIGN AID

A new foreign aid program will have a severe or a moderate impact on our economy depending upon the domestic measures we adopt. These measures involve both the administration of foreign aid and related questions of domestic economic policy.

The seriously inflationary consequences that would result from mismanagement of the situation in such commodities as food and steel require selective distribution to the most necessary domestic and foreign uses. The two types of uses are interrelated, because the demand in both cases takes place at the same strategic spots in the American market. The consequences can be dealt with effectively only through careful coordination of all measures undertaken.

The relative shortages of specific commodities require export controls, allocations for domestic use, discouragement of misuse or excessive use, efficient transportation and distribution, and the curbing of speculation and hoarding of goods.

The general inflationary threat resulting from the combined impact of foreign and domestic demand requires the continuance of tax revenues at present levels, maximum economy in Government expenditures, stimulation of saving, and the enlargement and aggressive use of measures to control dangerous expansion of credit.

The proposal for new foreign aid requires that we face with greater wisdom and courage than ever before the dangers to our whole economy that are now revealing themselves in the form of relative shortages and inflationary pressures at strategic spots in the economy. The foreign aid program compels us to face certain domestic problems squarely, but remedial and preventive measures available to us are adequate if we have the courage to use them.

PRESIDENT'S STATEMENT

Two weeks ago I made public the report on National Resources and Foreign Aid prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. At that time I noted that a second report in the series on foreign aid would soon be made by the Council of Economic Advisers. This report has now been completed and submitted to me under the title "The Impact of the Foreign Aid Program Upon the Domestic Economy."

Secretary Krug reported that on the whole our national resources, if intelligently utilized, are physically sufficient to support a considerable foreign-aid program, while preserving the national security and the American standard of living. The report of the Council of Economic Advisers moves on from this point to present an economic analysis of the effect that a foreign-aid program of substantial size would have on agricultural and industrial production in the United States, on domestic consumption and prices on Government finance and the tax structure.

The Council of Economic Advisers reaches the conclusion that the American economy can sustain the general impact of a new foreign-aid program and that there is no question of our general financial capacity to support such a program. At the same time the Council stresses the fact that we must deal promptly and effectively with problems raised by key commodities—wheat, steel, certain items of industrial and agricultural machinery, coal and fertilizer.

The materials contained in both Secretary Krug's report and the Council's report have been made available in advance to the committee of nineteen private citizens working under the chairmanship of the Secretary of Commerce. That committee, after studying these analyses of domestic effects and the Paris Conference's presentation of European needs, will submit its conclusions and recommendations as to the limits within which we may wisely and safely extend assistance to foreign countries. Aided by these reports and other pertinent material, I shall make recommendations to the Congress concerning a program of foreign assistance.

XIII

Summary of Harriman Committee's Report

ON FOREIGN AID
NOV. 8, 1947

I. PRINCIPLES

THE President's Committee on Foreign Aid was asked to determine the limits within which the United States could safely and wisely extend aid to Western Europe. It has approached this assignment in a spirit of realism.

We believe that the future of Western Europe lies very much in its own hands. No amount of outside aid, however generous, can by itself restore to health the economies of the sixteen nations which met at Paris in July. Except in Western Germany, where the United States has direct governmental responsibility, the success of any aid program depends ultimately on hard work and straight thinking by the people and the Governments of the European nations themselves.

The sixteen nations, and Western Germany, comprise over 275,000,000 men and women. They possess great agricultural and industrial resources. Even at its present depressed state, the production of this area is vastly greater than any aid which this country can provide. Such aid must be viewed not as a means of supporting Europe, but as a spark which can fire the engine.

The committee is also aware that the volume of aid required from the United States is of such proportions that it will place a substantial burden on the people of the United States. For all its resources, the United States is no limitless cornucopia. The population of this country represents something less than 7 per cent of the population of the world. This country has heavy responsibilities at home as well as in Europe, in Asia and in our own hemisphere. The aid which we give represents, to be sure, only a small fraction of our total production. But at the present time there is no slack in the American economy and every shipment abroad of scarce goods—especially food which Europe must have—adds to the inflationary pressure at home.

The committee regards as nonsense the idea which prevails to a considerable degree in this country and abroad, that we need to export our goods and services as free gifts, to insure our own prosperity. On the contrary, we are convinced that the immediate economic danger to the United States is inflation, which means, among other things a shortage of goods in relation to demand. We believe that our goal should be to bring about a condition where exports from this country are more nearly balanced by a return flow from abroad of services and materials essential to our own economy. We also believe that the European nations desire to achieve such equilibrium in the interests of their self-respect and prosperity. To make this equilibrium possible should be a major objective of any program of aid.

The interest of the United States in Europe, however, cannot be measured simply in economic terms. It is also strategic and political. We all know that we are faced in the world today with two conflicting ideologies. One is a system in which individual rights and liberties are maintained. The opposing system is one where iron discipline by the state ruthlessly stamps out individual liberties and obliterates all opposition.

Our position in the world has been based for at least a century on the existence in Europe of a number of strong states committed by tradition and inclination to the democratic concept. The formulation of the Paris report is the most recent demonstration that these nations desire to maintain this concept. But desire is not enough. The democratic system must provide the bare necessities of life now and quickly rekindle the hope that by hard work a higher standard of living is attainable. If these countries by democratic means do not attain an improvement in their affairs they may be driven to turn in the opposite direction. Therein lies the strength of the Communist tactic: it wins by default when misery and chaos are great enough. Therefore the countries of Western Europe must be restored to a position where they may retain full faith in the validity of their traditional approaches to world affairs and again exert their full influence and authority in international life.

II. POLICIES

The success of any program for aid which may be adopted will depend on the policies which this country and the European nations pursue. It should be made a condition of continued assistance under such a plan that the participating countries take all practicable steps to achieve the production and monetary goals which they have set for themselves in the Paris report. Failure to make genuine efforts to accomplish these results would call for cessation of further assistance.

However, aid from this country should not be conditioned on the methods used to reach these goals, so long as they are consistent with basic democratic principles. Continued adherence to such principles is an essential condition to continued aid but this condition should not require adherence to any form of economic organization or the abandonment of plans adopted in and carried out in a free and democratic way. While this Committee firmly believes that the American system of free enterprise is the best method of obtaining high productivity, it does not believe that any foreign-aid program should be used as a means of requiring other countries to adopt it. The imposition of any such conditions would constitute an unwarranted interference with the internal affairs of friendly nations.

The goals which the European governments have set for themselves and with which our Government may legitimately concern itself are conditioned by the nature of the European economic problem. The reasons for the inability of Western Europe to balance its accounts with the rest of the world at the present time are generally understood and are ably analyzed in the CEEC (Committee for European Economic Co-operation), Western Europe is cut off from the food and supplies which flowed from Eastern Europe before the war. Foreign investments and shipping revenues have been lost. The costs of essential food and raw material imports have risen and are still rising.

To overcome these disadvantages European production must expand well above pre-war levels; yet in important industries, especially coal mining, and important areas, especially Germany, it is lagging badly. It is the judgment of all competent observers that these troubles flow from an acute shortage of working capital and from the serious disintegration of organized economic life rather than from wartime physical destruction. Working capital in the form of fuel, raw materials, and food, is needed to sustain Europe until its production is built up. Some capital equipment is needed to further the rehabilitation of industry. An effective restoration of the purchasing power of money is essential to the resumption of ordered economic life.

The Paris report cannot be praised too highly for its emphasis on this point. It clearly states that European production can expand only as currencies and exchange rates are stabilized, as budgets are balanced, and as trade barriers are reduced. Post-war experience has abundantly proved that if money demand is vastly in excess of the supply of goods, the effects of "repressed inflation" are almost as bad as the disease itself. Germany is merely the most horrible example of an attempt to restore economic life without giving people a money they can trust. In this situation, the rapid spread of black markets undermines the respect for law. Normal monetary incentives cease to operate. The worker has no just reward for his labor and the farmer refuses to sell his produce. Resources are dissipated. Trade degenerates to barter. Controls tend to become self-perpetuating.

Achievement of monetary stability would allow a gradual restoration of normal incentives and a gradual return to a system where individuals and enterprises, both public and private, can operate in markets. It would also allow the stabilization of exchange rates, which is all but impossible so long as inflation proceeds apace. It is obvious that this situation makes balance of payments problems that much more difficult. The Committee believes that in the near future some adjustment of exchange rates must be made. The prelude to that is internal monetary reform.

The Paris report rightly emphasizes the need for scaling down restrictions on trade between countries. But the reduction of tariffs is of little moment if exchange controls and other controls have to be maintained indefinitely. Whatever one's attitude toward planning and free enterprise may be, there is all but universal agreement that true economic recovery depends on releasing the energies of individuals and cutting down on time-consuming regulation of production and distribution.

III. NEEDS AND CAPACITIES

In emphasizing these points, the Committee is simply making explicit the principles that are imbedded in the Paris report. It does not wish to imply that confidence in currencies can be restored without increased production abroad combined with substantial injections of American aid. It believes that the need for holding inflation in check in this country and in Europe bears directly on the magnitude of the aid we can and should extend.

The Committee found little evidence that the goals set at Paris to restore standards of living were excessive in terms of basic necessities. Even if all the estimates submitted at Paris were to go through as planned, Europeans would not be eating as well in 1951 as they ate in 1938. If food were available, it would pay to meet these estimates in full in the interest of political stability. This is especially true in the case of Western Germany, where more food is essential to secure more coal production and the revival of an economy now obviously on dead center.

The Committee, however, is not convinced that the participating nations at Paris were wholly realistic in their plans for capital expansion. On the first point, it is obvious that if Europe is to be revived and made self-supporting—if our aid program is not to degenerate into just another relief program—the European nations will have to rehabilitate their capital plant. But it cannot be too strongly stated that the process of investment and capital formation imposes a severe strain on the country undertaking it. It means the introduction of money income into the economy, with no comparable output of consumer goods to sop up this purchasing power. This process is highly inflationary. To the degree that capital goods are sent to Europe from the United States, it is true, the strain is transferred from European economies to our own. Nevertheless, the secondary effects of large capital programs should not be overlooked.

At the present time, gross investment in the United States is running at about 17 per cent of total national product at the height of a boom. Some of the European nations have attempted to exceed this rate. It seems unlikely that European nations can prudently afford to sustain capital formation on as large a scale as they have planned. What this means, in effect, is that housing programs and capital development may have to be slowed down until European recovery is much more advanced than at present.

In addition the program written at Paris may have to be modified by a shift in the amounts going to the separate countries. As this shift is made, we believe that the amount of aid allotted to Germany may have to be higher than was set at Paris. This committee wishes to state emphatically that the overwhelming interest of the United States is to prevent the resurgence of an aggressive Germany. The fears of neighboring nations are thoroughly understandable. On the other hand, it is generally admitted that the revival of Ruhr coal output, along with the increase in British coal output, is the crux of the problem of getting Western Europe back on its feet. Apparent savings to the American taxpayer, accomplished by spending too little money on Germany, have thus far been more than offset by the consequent deterioration of the general European economic situation.

The final determining factor in the size of a prudent program is the availability of commodities in this country. The Committee has canvassed such availability in detail. At the Paris Conference, it was concluded that the Western Hemisphere simply did not have the food resources to supply all of the estimated needs. As against estimated need for 35 million tons of grain, the Paris Conference conceded that 25 million tons was the maximum which could be obtained from the outside world with about 9 million tons coming from the United States. In 1947, the United States will probably export some 15 million tons of grain with about 9 million tons going to Europe. In view, however, of the poor American corn crop and the lack of fall rains, only a most favorable crop year in 1948 would make any such performance possible.

With a number of other commodities, the situation is only a little less stringent. Steel and the steel-making materials, especially scrap, are in particularly short supply in the United States. Because it is a basic industrial material, the effects of this shortage are pervasive. Coal exports at a high rate are possible, though they are imposing a strain on the United States transportation system and there may be a few shortages in the coming winter. The margin between supply and demand of petroleum products is very narrow in this country. The European countries do not expect to import this commodity from the United States in volume, but the shortage, like that of steel products, is world-wide. There is little likelihood that these requirements set forth at Paris can be met.

The situation is much the same in regard to most of the items of machinery and equipment the European nations need. In the middle of an agricultural boom, the demand of American farmers for farm machinery is well beyond the capacity of the industry. As to mining machinery, coal output is at a high rate and American mine operators are buying as much machinery as they can obtain. Heavy electrical equipment of all kinds is perhaps the tightest industrial item of all. The story is much the same for certain of the basic raw materials.

These remarks do not imply that the United States can do little toward the rehabilitation of Europe. European governments and private firms have placed large orders in the United States for industrial equipment. A voluntary food conservation program has been initiated to make food available for export. In spite of shortages here, manufacturers of automobiles and farm machinery are voluntarily maintaining exports. If funds were available to finance European purchases and if European requirements were known in detail, exports could at least be maintained and in many cases stepped up. In over-all terms, a foreign aid program would not even require the maintenance of present rates of exports. The conclusion that does emerge from the examination of particular markets for particular commodities is that supply will be a limiting factor in many cases and that many European requirements cannot be met in full.

IV. THE MAGNITUDE OF AMERICAN AID

On the basis of revised estimates of European imports and exports, the Committee calculates that the cost of the European aid program to the Government of the United States would be about $5.75 billions for the first year, and between $12 and $17 billions for the whole program here suggested.

These figures are not comparable to those contained in the Paris report. The latter are estimates of the deficit the participating European countries would incur in their trade with the Western Hemisphere. They measure the margin by which the European countries expect their payments in dollars for goods and services imported from the Western Hemisphere to exceed their receipt in dollars.

The Paris estimates of imports have had to be revised downward, mainly on the grounds of unavailability of goods. To the extent of this revision the estimated cost of the program was also reduced. At the same time it was necessary, on grounds of realism, to revise downward the European estimates of exports and to modify the figures in a number of other ways which increase the cost. The result was an estimate by the Committee that the balance of payments deficit would be $1 billion to $1.5 billions lower in the first year and possibly as much as $5 billions lower for the whole plan than that contained in the Paris program.

The Committee's estimate of the cost to the United States Government is a smaller figure than the foreign trade deficit. First, a deduction must be made for the part of the program that can be financed through the International Bank. Second, there may be private financing. Third, a large part of the European deficit with the American Continent is with countries other than the United States. In its own interest, the United States will probably have to supply funds to cover a part of this deficit but we should not have to finance it in full. When allowance is made for these deductions, the resulting figures are those given above for the cost to the United States Treasury.

It is helpful to compare the figure for the cost to the United States Government with what the United States has been doing for Europe in the past. Before the run on sterling in July the annual rate of withdrawals on the British loan was about $2.6 billions. In addition, in the first half of 1947, the rate of withdrawal on other European aid programs—relief, UNRRA and special grants—was about $2 billions. In 1947 the United States assumed only half of the cost of German occupation, but in 1948 it seems likely that it will have to assume the whole burden, amounting to about $1 billion.

When all these factors are taken into account the program of aid proposed for 1948 proves to be a moderate increase on what the United States has in the recent past been spending in Europe and what will probably have to be expended in Germany in any case. In addition the program calls for increased lending operations by the International Bank.

Looking to the years beyond calendar 1948, the Committee emphasizes that any estimates are altogether speculative. The American people have an understandable interest in trying to ascertain the drain on their resources in the future. But it is totally impossible, and indeed unwise, to attempt to calculate this with accuracy. The Paris conference suggested that the total European foreign exchange deficit for the four-year period 1948-51 would be about $22 billions. The Committee's estimates range from $17 to $23 billions. When deductions are made for various types of financing, the range of possible appropriations would be $12 to $17 billions. But the Committee cannot emphasize too strongly that any aid extended to Europe must be on a year-to-year basis. It must be subject to constant vigilant review of the Congress.

V. FINANCE AND ADMINISTRATION

Even to carry out a prudent program in 1948 entails the execution of certain fundamental policies on the part of the United States Government and the most careful administration. The Committee believes that any aid to Europe offered by the United States should be financed out of taxes, not out of borrowing. The maintenance of a surplus in the United States Treasury is a necessity in this inflationary period.

A foreign aid program will require means to make available goods that are in short supply. Voluntary measures should be relied upon wherever possible. If and when they are not, the Government will probably require authority to set priorities in order to insure the availability for export of limited amounts of the items most critically needed. It might also have to issue limited orders to control consumption of critical materials such as those still in effect for tin. Especially in the field of food it might be necessary to use the device of requiring that limited quantities be set aside for export.

It must be emphasized that these suggestions apply only to the foreign-aid program and not to the broad problem of inflation. The committee is convinced that inflation is a serious deterrent to the stability of the American economy, but any consideration of a program to control inflation would have been beyond its competence and its terms of reference.

The Committee is convinced that the administration of the program is of primary importance because it will be necessary, for reasons given above, to adjust the program as it goes forward. To insure unity of administration, it is recommended that a new independent agency be set up in the Federal Government. The head of this agency should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. A board of directors should be appointed, representing the departments of Government concerned with the program, including the Secretary of State and such other persons as the Congress may see fit to add.

The head of the new organization should be chairman of this board, which should have power only to establish and adjust general policies within the framework of Congressional action.

The operating decisions should be made by the head of the new organization, but it will be necessary for him to work out effective means for cooperation with the State Department concerning these major decisions which have an important bearing on the foreign policy of the United States.

The closest possible relations should be maintained between the new organization and the Congress. This is a question to be solved by the Congress, but we suggest it might be done by a special joint committee created for this purpose, as in the case of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The new organization must have a chief representative in Europe, reporting directly to the head of that organization, and responsible to him, to deal with the continuing committee set up by the participating countries, and also to coordinate the activities of the various local representatives of the organization in those countries. In addition, representatives will be needed in the different countries. They will have to report to and be under the direct control of the head of the new organization. But they should keep the Ambassadors in the respective countries informed of their communications. In all cases where there is necessity for taking up important matters with Governments, it should be done by the Ambassador to the end that there will be only one diplomatic representative of the United States in these countries. Due to the need for flexibility in the program, the Committee recommends that the corporate form of organization be given careful consideration.

VI. SUMMARY

The basic conclusions of the President's Committee on Foreign Aid may be summarized as follows:

1. The hope of Western Europe depends primarily on the industry and straight thinking of its own people.

2. The United States has a vital interest —humanitarian, economic, strategic and political—in helping the participating countries to achieve economic recovery.

3. The aid which the United States gives will impose definite sacrifice on this country.

4. The magnitude of Western Europe's deficit with the American Continent in 1948 will be of the order of $7 billions, but when all possibilities of financing are taken into consideration, the approximate

AVAILABLE SUPPLY, U. S. CONSUMPTION, AND AMOUNT FOR EXPORT OF SELECTED COMMODITIES, 1948

Commodity	Unit	1948 Potential Production	1948 Imports	Available Supply	Estimated U. S. Consumption	Available for Export Actual	% of Prod.	†Current Rate of Exports (1947) Actual	% of Prod.
Textiles
Raw cotton	Mil. bales	11.5‡	.2	11.7	9.5§	2.2	18.8	3.5	29.7
Linters	1,000 bales	1,230	100	1,330	1,250	80	6.5	60	4.9
Cotton cloth	Mil. sq. yds	11,118	30	11,148	10,148	1,000	9.0	900	8.1
Rayon fiber	Mil. lbs	1,075	50	1,125	1,080	45	4.2	45	4.2
*Rayon fabric	Mil. yds	2,035	3	2,033	1,798	240	11.8	240	11.8
Cotton tire cord	1,000 lbs	290,000	0	290,000	184,000	106,000	36.6	13,000	4.5
*Rayon tire cord	1,000 lbs	210,000	0	210,000	191,000	19,000	9.0	19,000	9.0
*Hard cordage, rope & twine	Mil. lbs	505	56	561	555	6	1.2	3.6	.7
*Raw jute and butts	Long tons	0	95,000	95,000	95,000	0	0	0	0
*Burlap and jute bags	Mil. lbs	500	40	540	520	20	4.0	20	4.0
Lumber	Mil. bd. ft
Pulp and Paper		35,500	1,200	36,700	35,700	1,000	2.8	1,000	2.8
*Total paper and board	1,000 short tons	21,800	4,080	25,860	25,195	665	3.0	355	1.6
*Total paper products	1,000 short tons	12,000	10	12,010	11,760	250	2.1	120	1.0
*Total wood pulp	1,000 short tons	12,500	2,200	14,700	14,510	190	1.5	135	1.1
Leather
*Sole, welting & offal, bovine	1,000 lbs	380,000	5,150	385,150	377,900	7,250	1.9	5,250	1.3
*Upper and lining	1,000 sq. ft	1,315,000	16,000	1,331,000	1,285,400	45,600	3.5	47,850	3.6
*Glove and garment	1,000 sq. ft	430,000	1,750	431,750	421,750	10,000	2.3	12,125	2.8
Leather manufactures
Boots and shoes	1,000 prs	475,000	3,000	478,000	471,000	7,000	1.5	7,200	1.5
Rubber
Pass. car tires	1,000 units	70,059	0	70,059	61,425	8,634	12.3	1,698	2.4
Truck-bus tires	1,000 units	15,803	0	15,803	10,675	5,128	32.4	1,693	10.7
*Conveyor belting	1,000 lbs	50,000	0	50,000	50,000	0	0	6,600	12.9

*Indicates commodities where domestic demand will exceed supply regardless of exports.
†Based on first 6 months. ‡1946-47 crop. §Assuming this level of mill consumption.

POTENTIAL GROSS SUPPLY OF DOLLARS UNDER EXISTING LOAN AND GIFT PROGRAMS

(In Millions of Dollars)

	Available or Potentially Available	Funds Drawn Through July, 1947	Unutilized
United States Government Lending:
Export-Import Bank loans	$3,500	$1,820	c$1,680
Lend-lease "pipeline" credits	1,500	1,350	d150
Surplus property credits	1,150	950	200
Ship sales credits	330	160	170
Loan to United Kingdom	3,750	a3,350	400
Monetary Stabilization credits	295	b8	287
RFC loan to the Philippines	70	70	0
Total	$10,595	$7,708	$2,887
United States Government Relief and Special Aid:
UNRRA	$2,700	$2,700	.....
Post-UNRRA	332	.....	g332
Relief in occupied areas	1,600	e1,000	h600
Greek-Turkish aid	400	.....	i400
Philippine aid program	635	f125	510
International Refugee Organization	71	.....	71
Total	$5,738	$3,825	$1,913
International Bank	j$3,266	$250	l$3,016
International Fund	k3,406	86	13,320

a Through Aug. 31, 1947. b Through March 31, 1947. c About $400 of this was already committed to non-European countries by the end of July, 1947. d All but $8 or $9 million of this is required to meet unpaid bills for goods already procured. e Estimated. f $100 million made available in surplus materials. g Appropriations for fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, as accepted by Congress and including an allowance for China. h More than half of this is earmarked for Asia. i Over 60 per cent of this is earmarked for military purposes. j This is considered to be the probable ceiling on World Bank dollar loans. The bank has about one-half of a billion dollars available to make loans at the present time. In addition, the bank can sell its own debentures in the American capital market to raise further funds. However, the market will probably not absorb debentures which would carry the total volume of debentures plus initial contributions over the limit of the United States capital and other dollar subscriptions. Although the total authorized lending power of the bank is $8.2 billions in various currencies, dollar loans are the only ones which can be used to purchase materials and equipment in substantial quantities for reconstruction purposes at the present time. k United States quota of $2,750 million plus gold paid in by other countries through June 30, 1947. l These funds are usable only as specified in the Articles of Agreement under which the International Bank and Monetary Fund were established. The entire amount cannot be made available in the immediate future, nor can it be made available solely to Europe.

need for appropriations past and future to cover the calendar year of 1948 may be on the order of 5.75 billion dollars.

5. The extension of such aid, now or in the future, calls for anti-inflationary fiscal policies on the part of this country, and a new agency to administer the aid extended.

As a final word, both on the magnitude of the program recommended, and on the policies outlined, it is well to bear in mind that success depends on giving way neither to over-optimism or to undue pessimism. It is one thing to propose a program, it is another to see it through. The immediate months and indeed years ahead are not apt to be easy either for this country or for the European nations. It is not wise to underestimate the steepness of the climb.

By the same token, however, it is essential to maintain perspective. The years following World War I were years of intense dislocation and dissolution both at home and abroad. Yet, by 1924, Europe, which seemed totally disorganized in 1919, was well on its way to recovery. Even more in point would seem to be the wartime experience of this nation and other democracies. In 1940, it seemed inevitable that a large part of what we call Western civilization was irreparably lost. In late 1941, following Pearl Harbor, the fortunes of this nation were at an all-time ebb. Yet four years later, complete victory had been gained, American arms stood triumphant in the East and in the West, and it was obvious that the United States had entered into a new period of power, prestige, and responsibility, The following years have contained many disappointments. Wartime alliances have melted away. Yet it is safe to say that at no time in history has there been more need for Western Europe and the United States to stand firmly together. And who will say that, if we apply to the making of the peace the same spirit which triumphed in the war, we may not see an equally dramatic vindication of the ideals and principles of free men everywhere?

STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT

Text of a statement by President Truman, released by the White House together with the report of his Committee on Foreign Aid:

Last June I appointed a committee of nineteen distinguished private citizens to determine the facts concerning the kinds and amounts of our resources available for economic assistance to foreign countries, and to advise me on the limits within which, in the opinion of the committee, the United States might safely and wisely plan to extend such aid.

I asked the Secretary of Commerce to serve as chairman of the committee. The members of the committee were drawn from the ranks of American business, finance, labor, agriculture, educational and research institutions.

During the intervening months, the members of this committee of private citizens have been diligently studying the many aspects of this complicated problem, particularly as it relates to western Europe. They have carefully examined the analysis, by a committee of Government officials under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, of the adequacy of our national resources to support a foreign aid program; the analysis by the Council of Economic Advisers of the impact of a substantial aid program upon our national economy; the report of the representatives of the sixteen nations who met in Paris, and other data available from various sources.

This committee has now submitted to me its report, European recovery and American aid. The report contains a careful discussion of the problem of European recovery and our interest therein; the requirements of the countries involved; the supplies available; the size of an effective aid program and the feasibility of its being met; the problems of finance and administration; and the effects of a foreign aid program on our own economy.

In addition, the committee's report contains detailed discussions of problems presented by specific commodities, food, raw materials, and manufactured goods that are needed.

The members of the committee have fulfilled their task without partisanship, and with no other purpose than to further the best interest of their country, and to aid in securing the peace and well-being of the world. I am deeply grateful to each member of the committee for putting aside so many other pressing duties in order to bring this difficult assignment to completion in so short a period.

The committee's report should prove of great help in the prompt formulation of a program of sound assistance to western Europe. I commend this report to the careful attention of members of the Congress, officials of the executive branch, and all citizens concerned for our country's welfare.

XIV

Secretary Marshall's Statement to Congressional Committees

ON EUROPEAN AID
NOV. 10, 1947

THE Congress in the coming session will be called upon to make decisions which, although less spectacular and dramatic, will be no less important for the future of our country and the world than those of the war years. Your responsibilities as members of the committees directly concerned with our foreign relations are accordingly very great.

It appears unnecessary to elaborate for you on the somber picture of the world situation. You all, I am sure, are fully aware of its gravity and the immense responsibility which the course of events has placed upon our country.

The President will lay before the Congress the program of his administration for aid to Europe. My duty as Secretary of State is to present the reasons for this program; the reasons why I profoundly believe that the vital interest of the United States is directly involved.

In concentrating upon the problem of aid to Europe I do not ignore the fact that there are other areas of the world beset by economic problems of tremendous gravity. But the very magnitude of the world problem as a whole requires a careful direction of our assistance to the critical areas where it can be most immediately effective.

The need for our assistance in the European area is real and it is urgent. The report of the sixteen nations represented on the Committee of European Economic Cooperation sets this forth, I think, in a convincing manner.

As a result of the war, the European community which for centuries had been one of the most productive and indeed creative portions of the inhabited world was left prostrate. This area, despite its diversity of national cultures and its series of internecine conflicts and wars, nonetheless enjoys a common heritage and a common civilization.

The war ended with the armies of the major allies meeting in the heart of this community. The policies of three of them have been directed to the restoration of that European community. It is now clear that only one power, the Soviet Union, does not for its own reasons share this aim.

We have become involved in two wars which have had their origins in the European Continent. The free peoples of Europe have fought two wars to prevent the forcible domination of their community by a single great power. Such domination would have inevitably menaced the stability and security of the world. To deny today our interest in their abilty to defend their own heritage would be to disclaim the efforts and sacrifices of two generations of Americans. We wish to see this community restored as one of the pillars of world security; in a position to renew its contribution to the advancement of mankind and to the development of a world order based on law and respect for the individual.

The record of the endeavors of the United States Government to bring about a restoration of the whole of that European community is clear for all who wish to see. We must face the fact, however, that despite our efforts, not all of the European nations have been left free to take their place in the community of which they form a natural part.

Thus the geographic scope of our recovery program is limited to those nations which are free to act in accordance with their national traditions and their own estimates of their national interests. If there is any doubt as to this situation, a glance at the present map of the European Continent will provide the answer.

The present line of division in Europe is roughly the line upon which the Anglo-American armies coming from the west met those of the Soviet Union coming from the East. To the west of that line the nations of the continental European community have been grappling with the vast and difficult problem resulting from the war in conformity with their own national traditions without pressure or menace from the United States or Great Britain.

Developments in the European countries to the east of that line bear the unmistakable imprint of an alien hand. All the nations of Europe, sixteen in number, which were in a position to exercise free choice, gave a prompt and energetic response to the simple suggestion made at Harvard on June 5, last, and thereby an impressive demonstration of the continuing vitality of European civilization.

It would be well, therefore, to deal briefly with what the area encompassed by those sixteen nations plus western Germany has meant to us and has meant to the world. This community before the war accounted for nearly one-half of the world's trade. They owned nearly two-thirds of the world's shipping. Their industrial production in terms of the basic commodities of coal, steel and chemicals was before the war slightly greater than that of the United States. Their economy was highly integrated, each part depending upon the efficient working of the other.

I think that the figures cited will indicate the importance, even from a purely economic point of view, of the sixteen nations who have joined together to develop a program for their mutual recovery. Their response to our suggestion of June 5 was a remarkable cooperative effort in a post-war world in which that element has hitherto been distressingly lacking.

Congress will wish to go into the objectives and the details of the European recovery program at some length, but I feel that a brief summary of the tentative conclusions we have reached may serve the useful purpose of making clear the distinction between the long-range recovery program and the stop-gap program, which we refer to as interim aid.

The Committee of European Economic Cooperation, meeting in Paris, produced a recovery program extending over four years. After the most careful checking, with the assistance of experts drawn from many governmental agencies, we have concluded that the Paris report correctly identifies the courses of action necessary to produce recovery and indicates an approximate order of magnitude of the cost for the full four-year program.

On the basis of present indications, the estimated cost to our treasury of this program may be of the order of magnitude of $16,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000. We feel, however, that the uncertainties of weather and crops, supply availabilities, prices, etc., inject a degree of assumption which makes the total cost impossible to forecast with accuracy at this time. I therefore will not recommend to the President that the Congress appropriate for the full four-year period.

I feel, however, that we can estimate with reasonable accuracy and assurance the sum required for the first stage of the recovery program, which will cover a fifteen-month period from April 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949.

Our tentative estimate of the cost, subject to final checks in the light of the Harriman report is something under $1,500,000,000 for the last three months of the fiscal year 1948 and somewhat less than $6,000,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949. The findings contained in the Krug report, the Nourse report, and the Harriman report, together with the studies made by our interdepartmental committees, make it clear that a program in this order of magnitude can be safely undertaken by this country. I shall therefore recommend to the President that the United States support the European recovery program and that an amount be appropriated for the fifteen-month period ending June 30, 1949.

It is of cardinal importance that an able and effective United States administration manage the funds which may be made available by the Congress. How best to achieve this and the other essential elements of an organizational and administrative structure for the program of aid to European recovery is a matter which the Congress will wish to examine with great care. There are several important principles which I believe should determine the nature of this organization:

A. The operation of this program will in many ways define and express the foreign policy of the United States in the eyes of the European countries and the world. Therefore, the operation must fully accord with the foreign policy of the President as expressed through the Secretary of State.

B. The organization, if it is to afford successful and dynamic management to the complex recovery program, must be granted the widest practicable flexibility both in its operations and in the use of the funds placed at its disposal. The program of United States support will achieve its objective only if it is kept responsive to changing situations and varying supply conditions.

C. Full use should be made of the existing governmental agencies in carrying out those parts of the program which fall within the scope of their present activities. The Departments of Commerce, Treasury, Agriculture, Interior, the national military establishment and other agencies are well equipped to perform many of the necessary functions. The National Advisory Council and other competent interdepartmental agencies will have important parts to play.

D. Strong central administrative direction is essential in a complex and varied program of this kind. There must be a high degree of integration in our operation, both in the United States and overseas. Unity of command, rather than diffusion of authority and responsibility is required.

The President will submit to the Congress his recommendations concerning the administration of the European recovery program.

There will be important functions for the United States to perform in Europe. Much of this work will be negotiation with governments of a nature constituting essentially an extension of the conduct of the entire relationship of the United States with the participating countries. Such matters are now handled through our embassies and legations and clearly should continue to be.

There will be certain additional functions arising directly out of the operating program, such as screening of specific import requirements, arrangements for furnishing technical assistance and other similar specialized activities which will require the appointment of qualified men who can devote their full attention to such matters. These men in their dealings with participating governments should work through our ambassadors because it is essential to maintain a single channel of responsibility for United States negotiations with other governments.

For general co-ordination of the operations in Europe and for central representation in the continuing European organization which the participating countries have decided to establish, consideration should be given to the designation of a special United States representative for the European recovery program, with ambassadorial rank, appointed by the President with the advice of the Department of State and the National Advisory Council.

In practice it is felt that, where need is clearly demonstrated and where repayment cannot reasonably be expected, imports of supplies which are quickly consumed, such as food, fertilizer, and fuel, of indispensable items of capital equipment for immediate replacement and repair, and of essential raw materials should be financed by means of grants.

Loans should be made to cover imports of capital equipment and raw materials which will directly produce the means of repayment and where such repayment can reasonably be expected. At the same time every encouragement should be given to early initiation of private financing so as to eliminate as far as possible the necessity for direct assistance from the United States government. Use should also be made of the resources of the International Bank whenever in the opinion of the bank the necessary and appropriate conditions for loans can be met.

It is obvious that the basic responsibility for European recovery rests on the European countries themselves. However, this Government must have assurance that the aid it provides is effectively utilized for the achievement of European recovery as rapidly as possible.

It is contemplated that, to this end, bilateral agreements will be negotiated between the United States and each of the countries participating in the recovery program, setting forth the reciprocal undertaking relating to American assistance. These agreements will vary in form and content as between countries, depending upon the nature of the aid to be furnished and the conditions deemed important in each case.

The commitments should include undertakings to adopt monetary, fiscal and other measures to maintain stability in price and cost structures; to develop production to reach targets set by the participating countries and in particular, to increase the production of coal and basic foods; and to cooperate in reducing barriers to trade and promoting increased interchange of goods and services. Many other points and more detailed provisions to be covered in the agreements will be presented and discussed during the hearings.

Assistance to Europe will, to a considerable extent, take the form of commodities. The proposal to be submitted to the Congress contemplates the use of funds provided under the program for purchases outside the United States of commodities not readily available in sufficient quantities in this country. This policy will tend to protect our home economy against inflationary price movements which might result from concentrated buying in our markets. It seems clearly in our interest that the greatest possible amount of these supplies be obtained for Europe from other countries. Such countries should be encouraged to contribute directly as much as they can to the recovery program through grants-in-aid or by extending credits for exports to Europe.

I have so far confined my remarks to the European recovery program itself. But the economic effects of this program will extend far beyond the boundaries of the sixteen countries involved. It is in one important sense a world recovery program. The delay in European recovery has created serious problems for many countries which normally supply the European market with raw materials and other commodities.

Where Europe's trade with the rest of the world would normally have been balanced by an equivalent exchange of goods and services, the low level of European production and the limited availability of exports has drastically reduced such payment possibilities.

Furthermore, the habitual triangular trade patterns have almost disappeared, whereby Europe met its deficit for goods obtained from the Western Hemisphere by means of balances obtained from other parts of the world. Similar patterns of triangular trade used to provide certain other countries in the Western Hemisphere with balances from Europe which were used to purchase goods in the American market.

With the breakdown of these trade patterns, supplying countries, to a substantial degree, have had to accept nonconvertible currency or extend credit in order to sell in the European market. Neither of these procedures has given them dollars with which to purchase in the American market. The net result has been that trade continued around the world in large part on the basis of American grants or credits which made dollars available to other countries to meet their import requirements. The diminishing supply of dollars is restricting trade everywhere.

The European recovery program will be quickly reflected in other countries, if the important element of flexibility in purchasing is provided. To the extent that supplies for Europe are procured from nonparticipating countries for dollars, the trade position of these countries with the United States will be improved. In this way we feel that the problems of the other Western Hemisphere countries can be met through a combination of the European recovery program purchases and normal Export-Import Bank transactions.

More important in a fundamental sense, with increases in production in Europe such as those contemplated in the Paris report, exports from Europe will increase, and the necessity for the various supplying countries to accumulate nonconvertible currencies or to extend credit will diminish. Just as the progress of each individual country among the sixteen will affect the progress of the others, so the recovery of Europe will inevitably be a significant link in a chain reaction creating or maintaining economic activity in other countries.

The situation in China continues to cause us deep concern. The civil war has spread and increased in intensity. The Chinese Communists by force of arms seek control of wide areas of China.

The United States and all other world powers recognize the National Government as the sole legal government of China. Only the Government and people of China can solve their fundamental problems and regain for China its rightful role as a major stabilizing influence in the Far East. Nevertheless we can be of help and, in the light of our long and uninterrupted record of friendship and international cooperation with China, we should extend to the Government and its people certain economic aid and assistance. A definite proposal is under preparation for early submission.

I do not have to tell you that this foreign economic program of the United States seeks no special advantage and pursues no sinister purpose. It is a program of construction, production and recovery. It menaces no one. It is designed specifically to bring to an end in the shortest possible time the dependence of these countries upon aid from the United States. We wish to see them self-supporting.

This is certainly not the program of a country seeking to exercise domination or to influence unduly any foreign country. The nations and political groups which have now declared their opposition to the program apparently wish to block for their own reasons the revival of Western Europe.

I have gone at some length into the major features of the long-range plan for European reconstruction and the part that the United States can prudently and wisely contribute because I fully realize that the speedy and adequate consideration of the interim aid program which will be the first item of business presented to you cannot be dealt with by the Congress without understanding its relationship to the program of long-range reconstruction of Europe.

I would, however, urge upon you the necessity of a speedy decision in regard to the interim aid program. What is immediately needed is aid to maintain the status quo in food and in the material necessary to keep the wheels turning and people at work.

It will do little good to discuss the merits of a recovery program for Europe if in the meantime political and economic conditions have deteriorated to a point where such a program could not possibly succeed. The problem of overseas payment has become particularly acute in the case of Austria, France and Italy. It is clear that the people of these countries in the absence of immediate assistance will, during the next few months, begin to suffer from a lack of food and other necessities of life and the whole economic and social life of the people will be seriously affected. Within a short time these countries will have exhausted all of the dollar resources which they can muster to maintain the flow of essential supplies.

Austria, whose economy is carrying the weight of a military occupation of four powers, has been able to survive in recent months largely through the assistance rendered to her under the United States foreign relief program. These funds will be exhausted shortly after the beginning of the year.

The dollar resources of France will permit her to procure essential food and fuel from abroad only until the end of December. Because of her rapidly dwindling reserves, she took steps at the end of August to reduce sharply the placement of contracts for most other imports.

Italy's financial situation is even more serious than that of Austria or France. Last June the Italian Government took steps to eliminate the purchase of most of the raw materials and supplies which she required for the operation of her economy. The United States foreign relief program has been able to provide food and coal until the present time. Funds are not in sight, however, beyond the first of December to maintain the flow of these necessary commodities.

In order to meet this emergency, I recommend that you give immediate and urgent consideration to a bill authorizing the appropriation of sufficient funds to provide the supplies necessary to permit the people of these three countries to continue to eat, to work and to survive the winter. This is not a recovery program. It is designed to help provide the essentials of existence to the people of these three countries.

To accomplish this purpose it is recommended that the Congress authorize an appropriation of $597,000,000. Of this amount Austria needs $42,000,000. France needs $328,000,000 and Italy needs $227,000,000. These funds should be sufficient to meet the situation until March 31, 1948, before which time we hope that some decision may have been taken by the Congress regarding a broad recovery program.

In the absence of a recovery program the problem of maintaining existing levels in Europe rapidly becomes more complex after March 31. Additional countries will by that time practically have exhausted their dollar resources, and the cumulative effect of the uncertainties as to the future and the continued low levels of production and consumption will have serious consequences throughout Europe.

The program of interim aid would be concentrated largely on such items as food, fuel, fertilizer, fibers, seeds and medical supplies. With such resources as they can make available, the countries should be able themselves to procure other imports needed to prevent economic deterioration. The program should be sufficiently flexible to take account of such changes in requirements and availabilities as may occur.

Interim aid should be given to these countries under agreement to make efficient use of the commodities which we would supply. The bilateral agreements would also require that the local currency equivalent of the value of the commodities which we supply would be used only for such purposes as we and the recipient country might agree. They should also include a provision that the receiving government make known to its people the purpose and source of our supplies, and that it would make available full information concerning their distribution and use.

The operation of a program of the type which is proposed can be handled expeditiously by existing agencies of the Government. The procedures and machinery which are being used in the current relief program have been set up in accordance with the relief bill enacted last summer.

The urgency of the situation is so great that I recommend that no new agency be set up to handle this interim program. The time required to organize such an agency, to hire personnel and establish new procedures would defeat its very purpose. Whatever agency might be created to administer the long-term European recovery program could, of course, take over the operation of interim aid as soon as it comes into existence.

There is one further element with respect to interim needs. It is my understanding that the Department of the Army will be presenting certain additional requirements for funds for occupied areas above the present appropriations available for this purpose during the current fiscal year. I am told that these will be on the general order of $500,000,000 of which slightly more than $300,000,000 will be for additional requirements in Western Germany.

I have endeavored to present in broad outline the long-range European recovery program and, in somewhat more detail, the interim aid program. The proposals will be presented in full to your respective committees.

In considering them I know you are aware of the momentous importance to the world of your decisions. While we are dealing at the moment with the drab though vital facts of economic life, they carry with them fateful consequences.

The automatic success of the program cannot be guaranteed. The imponderables are many. The risks are real. They are, however, risks which have been carefully calculated, and I believe the chances of success are good. There is convincing evidence that the peoples of Western Europe want to preserve their free society and the heritage we share with them. To make that choice conclusive they need our assistance. It is in the American tradition to help. In helping them we will be helping ourselves—because in the large sense our national interests coincide with those of a free and prosperous Europe.

We must not fail to meet this inspiring challenge. We must not permit the free community of Europe to be extinguished. Should this occur it would be a tragedy for the world. It would impose incalculable burdens upon this country and force serious readjustments in our traditional way of life. One of our important freedoms —freedom of choice in both domestic and foreign affairs would be drastically curtailed.

Whether we like it or not, we find ourselves, our nation, in a world position of vast responsibility. We can act for our own good by acting for the world's good.

XV

Conditions of Aid Suggested by National Association of Manufacturers

NOV. 10, 1947

1. That the participating nations evidence their intent to stabilize their currencies, balance their budgets and place their fiscal policies on a sound basis.

2. That the countries take and enforce adequate measures to insure maximum domestic production.

3. That the countries work toward a restoration of free international payments.

4. That the countries make reasonable use of their own realizable gold and foreign exchange assets.

5. That the countries refrain from reexporting products received under the United States aid program, and from exporting identical products produced domestically.

6. That existing state enterprises in the participating countries should have a widespread measure of autonomy and not be subject to detailed political control.

BAN ON NATIONALIZATION

7. That during the period of economic aid the participating countries should not undertake any further nationalization projects, or initiate projects which have the effect of destroying or impairing private competitive enterprise, and thus retard their economic progress.

8. That in so far as practicable, United States aid should be extended to private competitive enterprises in the foreign countries instead of to governments or their agencies.

9. That commodities and products advanced under the aid program should be produced in the recipient country or within the United States, except in instances where procurement elsewhere would be economically advantageous to the United States.

10. That countries participating in the program must accord non-discriminatory treatment to United States business men and investigators, and also accord to representatives of the United States press freedom to visit their countries and report their observations.

11. That the extension of economic relief should be scheduled on a basis of ability to fulfill performance stipulation.

XVI

President Truman's Message to Congress

PROPOSING FOREIGN AID AND INFLATION CONTROLS

NOV. 17, 1947

MR. PRESIDENT, Mr. Speaker, members of the Eightieth Congress:

The Congress has been convened to consider two problems of major concern to the citizens of the United States and to the peoples of the world. The future of the free nations of Europe hangs in the balance. The future of our own economy is in jeopardy.

The action which you take will be written large in the history of this nation and of the world.

The Secretary of State and other representatives of the executive branch have appeared before committees of Congress during the past week to present the facts regarding the necessity for immediate assistance by the United States to certain European countries. Austria, France and Italy have nearly exhausted their financial resources. They must be helped if their peoples are to survive the coming winter, and if their political and economic systems are not to disintegrate.

Exceedingly bad weather has brought on crop failures and fuel shortages and has caused intense suffering. The food and fuel stocks of these countries are now near the vanishing point. Their peoples are in a dangerously weakened condition, due to years of short rations. Additional medical supplies and facilities are urgently necessary.

Austria needs $42,000,000, Italy needs $227,000,000 and France needs $328,000,000 to buy food, fuel and other essential goods during the next four and one half months. Detailed information has been presented to your committees concerning these needs and the purposes for which funds to be appropriated by the Congress would be spent.

Additional funds will also be required to maintain our position in occupied countries.

Emergency assistance by itself will not solve European problems. Emergency aid is no substitute for a long-range recovery program, but it is a vital prerequisite to such a program. If the Western European nations should collapse this winter, as a result of our failure to bridge the gap between their resources and their needs, there would be no chance for them—or for us—to look forward to their economic recovery. The providing of interim aid will give us time to plan our part in an economic recovery program and it will give the peoples of Europe the strength to hold out until such a program begins.

I will shortly submit to the Congress recommendations concerning the long-range European recovery program. This program is the result of the combined efforts of thoughtful men of two continents whose concern has been the most effective manner in which sixteen European nations, western Germany and the United States can work together for European recovery, world prosperity and lasting peace.

It is a tribute to the strength of our democracy that we are able to make so great a contribution to the freedom and welfare of other nations and other peoples. This nation is strong both in material resources and in the spirit of its people. Our economic strength, born of our system of free institutions, has contributed to raising the standard of living the world over. Our moral strength, resulting from our faith in human rights, is the inspiration of free men everywhere.

I refer to the strength of this nation with humility, for it is an awe-inspiring truth that the manner in which we exert our strength now, and in the future, will have a decisive effect on the course of civilization.

There is a truth whose significance grows with the experience of each passing day. The American people are becoming more and more deeply aware of their world position. They are learning that great responsibility goes with great power.

Our people know that our influence in the world gives us an opportunity—unmatched in history—to conduct ourselves in such a manner that men and women of all the world can move out of the shadows of fear and war and into the light of freedom and peace.

We must make the most of that opportunity. For we have learned, by the costly lesson of two world wars, that what happens beyond our shores determines how we live our own lives. We have learned that, if we want to live in freedom and security, we must work with all the world for freedom and security.

Human misery and chaos lead to strife and conquest.

Hunger and poverty tempt the strong to prey upon the weak.

Twice within this generation we have had to take up arms against nations whose leaders, misled by the hope of easy conquest, sought to dominate the world.

We are convinced that the best way to prevent future wars is to work for the independence and well-being of all nations. This conviction guides our present efforts, and will guide our future decisions. We have participated fully and gladly in the growth of the United Nations and we seek now to strengthen and improve it. We are assisting free nations who have sought our aid in maintaining their independence. We have contributed large sums to help rebuild countries devastated by war. We have taken the lead in breaking down barriers to world trade.

In our efforts, however, to achieve the conditions of peace for all the world, we have encountered unforeseen and unwelcome obstacles.

We have found that not all nations seem to share our aims or approve our methods. We regret the differences which have arisen and the criticisms so loudly expressed. Yet we cannot afford and we do not intend, to let current differences with some nations deter our efforts to cooperate in friendly fashion and to assist other nations who, like us, cherish freedom and seek to promote the peace and stability of the world.

The actions of this Government must be of a stature to match the dignity and influence of the United States in world affairs. The prompt provision by the Congress for interim aid will be convincing proof to all nations of our sincere determination to support the freedom-loving countries of western Europe in their endeavors to remain free and to become fully self-supporting once again.

If that action is followed by the enactment of the long-range European recovery program, this Congress will have written a noble page in world annals.

I have spoken of the economic and moral strength of the United States and of the way in which we must use that strength if we are to build a world community of free, strong and independent nations.

The strength of the United States is not due to chance. It is due to the wise decisions and bold actions taken by free and courageous men throughout the history of our democracy.

The time is at hand for new decisions and new actions of equal wisdom.

On several occasions during the past year I have reported to the Congress and to the nation on our general economic situation. These reports have told of new high levels of production and employment. Farmers are producing 37 per cent more than in 1929. Industry is producing 65 per cent more. In terms of actual purchasing power, the average income of individuals, after taxes, has risen 39 per cent. The rapid growth of our post-war economic activity has exceeded expectations and has revealed anew the potentialities of our economy.

In each of my reports, however, I have had to warn of dangers which lay ahead.

Today, inflation stands as an ominous threat to the prosperity we have achieved. We can no longer treat inflation—with spiraling prices and living costs—as some vague condition we may encounter in the future. We already have an alarming degree of inflation. And even more alarming, it is getting worse.

Since the middle of 1946, fuel has gone up 13 per cent; clothing prices have gone up 19 per cent; retail food prices have gone up 40 per cent. The average for all cost of living items has risen 23 per cent.

The housewife who goes to buy food today must spend $10 to buy what $7 bought a year and a half ago.

The cost of living is still climbing. In the past four months it has risen at a rate of 16 per cent a year.

Wholesale prices are rising, too. They affect every industry and trade, and they are soon translated into retail prices.

Since the middle of 1946, wholesale textile prices have gone up 32 per cent; metals have gone up 36 per cent; building materials have gone up 42 per cent. Wholesale prices on the average have gone up 40 per cent.

The harsh effects of price inflation are clear. They are felt by wage earners, farmers and business men. Wage earners are finding that bigger pay checks this year buy less than smaller pay checks bought last year. Despite generalities about high farm prices the income of many farm families cannot keep up with the rising costs of the things they buy. Small business men are being squeezed by rising costs. Even those who are well off are asking, "How long can it last? When is the break coming?"

In addition, price inflation threatens our entire program of foreign aid. We cannot abandon foreign aid, nor can we abandon our own people to the ravages of unchecked inflation.

We cannot allow the strength of this nation to be wasted and our people's confidence in our free institutions to be shaken by an economic catastrophe. We shall be inviting that catastrophe unless we take steps now to halt runaway prices.

Our immediate approach to the problems of high prices and inflation should consist of three types of measures: one, to relieve monetary pressures; two, to channel scarce goods into the most essential uses; three, to deal directly with specific high prices.

The way to reduce monetary pressure is by restraining the excessive use of credit. At a time when the economy is already producing at capacity, a further expansion of credit simply gives people more dollars to use in bidding up the prices of goods.

Consumer credit is increasing at a disturbing rate. The amount outstanding has risen from $6,500,000,000 in 1945 to more than $11,000,000,000 today. Even more rapid expansion is under way now, because the controls on consumer credit exercised by the Federal Reserve System expired Nov. 1. These credit controls should be restored. Also, some restraint should be placed on inflationary bank credit.

Legislation is required, moreover, to prevent excessive speculation on the commodity exchanges.

Another effective weapon against inflation is increased savings by the public. Every dollar that is saved instead of spent is a dollar fighting against inflation. In order to encourage additional savings, the Government should intensify its vigorous efforts to sell savings bonds.

The second part of the program to curb inflation is to secure the most efficient use of scarce goods and otherwise channel their flow so as to relieve inflationary pressures. Grain, for example, is too badly needed to permit wasteful feeding to livestock. Steel, as another example, is too scarce to be used for non-essential purposes.

Legislation is required to authorize the allocation of scarce commodities which basically affect the cost of living, or basically affect industrial production. In these limited areas inventory control powers are also needed.

Authority to allocate transportation services should be extended.

In addition, existing export controls should be continued and strengthened. Goods that we cannot wisely export must be kept here, and the shipments we make must go where they are needed most. Profiteering in exports must be prevented.

The measures which I have already discussed will, when taken together, aid substantially in relieving inflationary pressures. For large segments of the economy, they should be adequate to meet the requirements of the present situation. However, there are limited areas of acute danger in which these measures cannot be regarded as guaranteeing adequate protection.

For example, present forecasts indicate that we are likely to have less grain and meat next year than we have this year. The pressure on the prices of these foods would then become increasingly great. If these pressures are permitted to bring further sharp increases in food prices, they may well set off a chain reaction that would spread throughout the economy. It is surely better to take timely action to check adverse forces at particular trouble spots than to wait until general inflation has become so serious as to require drastic controls over the whole economic life.

Therefore, we need a third group of measures to combat inflation. Legislation should be enacted, authorizing the Government to impose price ceilings on vital commodities in short supply that basically affect the cost of living. Basic elements in the cost of living are food, clothing, fuel and rent. In addition, the legislation should be broad enough to authorize price ceilings on those vital commodities in short supply that basically affect industrial production. This will enable us to stamp out profiteering and speculation in these important areas.

This does not mean that price ceilings should be imposed on all items within the classes I have mentioned. For example, price ceilings would not be necessary for staple food and clothing items not in short supply or for any delicacies or luxuries. The same principle of selective treatment would apply to industrial items. This selective treatment of a relatively few danger spots is very different from over-all wartime price controls.

Even should the shortages of a few commodities at the consumer level remain serious for a time, I believe that the fair distribution of such commodities can be largely accomplished without consumer rationing. But no one can foretell exactly how serious some shortages may become next year. With serious shortages, a free market works cruel hardships on countless families and puts an unbearable pressure on prices. I therefore recommend that authority be granted, as a preparedness measure, to ration basic cost of living items on a highly selective basis.

Adequate protection from high prices and under distribution can be assured only by establishing authority for price ceilings and rationing in the fields of critical importance. It takes several months to set up an organization and make the administrative arrangements necessary to put price control and rationing into effect. Thus, the only prudent course is to establish the authority at this time so the necessary preparations can be started. If we fail to prepare, and disaster results from our unpreparedness, we shall have gambled with our national safety—and lost.

If the Government imposes price ceilings covering a specific area of production, it should in all fairness have the authority, in that same area, to prevent wage increases which will make it impossible to maintain the price ceilings. This authority should be granted, although I believe that there would be few occasions for its use.

I am confident that, if the cost of living can be brought and held in reasonable relationship to the incomes of the people, wage adjustments through collective bargaining will be consistent with productivity and will avoid an inflationary round of wage increases.

Next to food, the most important element in the cost of living is rent. Under the modified rent control law, rents are rising at the rate of about 1 per cent a month. A 12 per cent annual increase in rents imposes an intolerable strain upon the family budget. The Rent Control Law should be extended and the weaknesses in the present law should be corrected.

I am well aware that some of my proposals are drastic measures. No one regrets more than I the necessity for considering their use. But if we face the facts squarely, it is apparent that no other methods can safely be counted upon to protect our people from the dangers of excessively high prices and ruinous inflation.

The American people want adequate protection from these dangers and they are entitled to it. It should not be denied them. Nor should they be misled with half measures.

Even with the authority to impose price ceilings, the Government will intensify its efforts to obtain voluntary action. Wherever voluntary action will do the job there will be no necessity to impose the Government's authority. But the very existence of these powers should have a salutary effect. They will demonstrate to each of our citizens the importance of carefully weighing each step that might lead to higher prices. They will support expanded and more specific efforts to obtain voluntary action by business men, labor leaders, farmers, and consumers to hold prices down.

All the actions I have described are essential to a fair and effective anti-inflation program. I look upon them as short-run insurance against the impairment of our prosperity and the threat to our future development.

We should all ponder the following questions:

What would it avail the farmer, in the long run, if farm prices should go substantially higher only to be followed by a disaster such as occurred after the first World War?

What would it avail the worker, in the long run, to obtain inflationary wage increases, if they were followed by a repetition of the bitter experience when 15,000,000 workers were out of jobs?

What would it avail the businessman to have record-breaking profits soar even higher, if they were followed by a depression which would imperil our whole system of enterprise?

The program which I have outlined is one designed to meet the existing emergencies of inflation and exorbitant price levels. It is an emergency program which should be adopted to protect our standard of living for the immediate present and to make possible economic security in the future.

But a program designed to meet a crisis cannot by itself be a program designed to build for the future. We must also make plans to prevent future difficulty of the same nature.

Our long-range programs must stress ever-increasing production.

To accomplish this for agriculture, we need a comprehensive farm program. We shall need programs to increase the use of farm products by industry and consumers in this country when other countries become more nearly self-sufficient. Long-range national measures will be needed to protect the farm population against ruinous deflation in farm production and prices.

To expand industrial output, we need a long-range program to overcome basic shortages in capacity and equipment. To provide markets for increased output of farm and factory, we shall need long-range programs to raise the standard of living, particularly for families of low income.

But the first step toward this progress in the future is to deal with the critical present. We must win the battle against inflation, so that our long-range efforts may start from high levels of prosperity and not from the depths of a depression.

In summary, the immediate anti-inflation program that I recommend calls for the following legislative action:

1. To restore consumer credit controls and to restrain the creation of inflationary bank credit.

2. To authorize the regulation of speculative trading on the commodity exchanges.

3. To extend and strengthen export controls.

4. To extend authority to allocate transportation facilities and equipment.

5. To authorize measures which will induce the marketing of livestock and poultry of weights and grades that represent the most efficient utilization of grain.

6. To enable the Department of Agriculture to expand its program of encouraging conservation practices in this country, and to authorize measures designed to increase the production of foods in foreign countries.

7. To authorize allocation and inventory control of scarce commodities which basically affect the cost of living or industrial production.

8. To extend and strengthen rent control.

9. To authorize consumer rationing on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living.

10. To authorize price ceilings on products in short supply which basically affect the cost of living or industrial production, and to authorize such wage ceilings as are essential to maintain the necessary price ceilings.

If we neglect our economic ills at home, if we fail to halt the march of inflation, we may bring on a depression from which our economic system, as we know it, might not recover. And if we turn our backs on nations still struggling to recover from the agony of war, not yet able to stand on their own feet, we may lose for all time the chance to obtain a world of free peoples that can live in enduring peace.

The freedom that we cherish in our own economy and the freedom that we enjoy in the world today are both at stake.

I have recommended interim aid for certain western European countries and a program to curb inflation in the United States. I regard the measures which I have presented to you as vital and essential to the welfare of this nation.

When the American people have faced decisions of such magnitude in the past, they have taken the right course.

I am confident that the Congress, guided by the will of the people, will take the right course on this occasion.

XVII

Senator Taft's Attack on Truman Proposals

NOV. 17, 1947

TODAY the President of the United States demanded that Congress, and the people, turn the clock backward. He advocates a return to the days of war, of the OPA, of the War Labor Board and the War Production Board.

He demands power in his individual discretion to fix prices or not to fix prices, to fix wages or not to fix wages, to prevent purchases by the housewife unless she gets ration stamps from some new Federal board, to dictate to every farmer where he shall sell the products of his farm and at what prices and to regulate the details of every business, control its inventories, regulate its acquisition of raw materials and direct the disposition of its finished products.

He wants price control against the producer, wage control against the working man, rationing against the housewife and the restaurant, every kind of control over the business man.

It means the setting up of a Federal bureau with literally hundreds of thousands of employes, and agents prying into the daily lives of millions of people. We know this is what it would mean because we saw it happen here. Such a proposal is not progress, nor is it liberalism. It is reaction and a step to a completely totalitarian nation.

Evidently under this Administration we can never return to a state of peace. We still have war taxes. We have a war budget. Now we are to have war controls.

Most of our Presidents have regarded war and its incidence as the worst calamity that people could suffer, except the loss of its liberty. But the present Administration for domestic policy reasons is so eager to retain the incidence of war that one can only doubt that whether there is a real will to peace.

The President represents that these powers will be sparingly used only with relation to vital commodities in short supply which basically affect the cost of living, or basically affect industrial production.

Everything, he says, is to be done on a highly selected basis. If there is one thing which the OPA certainly learned, it is that you can't do price control partially.

Why, the President ended controls himself on the ground that you could not control some prices unless you controlled all. All important commodities are interrelated. If you ration and fix the price of meat, everybody rushes out to buy chickens and eggs.

Controls immediately must be established over them. And who is to determine what are vital commodities and whether they affect the cost of living? Of course all commodities affect the cost of living. That definition alone includes 90 per cent of all commodities. No—the President is only trying to sugarcoat the pill. This is the OPA. This is the police state condemned by the President himself only a month ago. This is the end of economic freedom.

Certainly prices are too high. Unreasonable increases in wages may be requested. Certainly more food is being consumed in this country than necessary. But if we can't meet problems of that kind within our system of free competition and incentive then we must regiment prices, wages and rationing forever.

Apart from theory there are three practical objections to adopting a police state. First, it chokes production instead of increasing it, and what we want is more production to give people what they need at reasonable prices.

We saw under the OPA controls how many important products disappeared from the market. The housewife couldn't buy any butter, any meat, any soap, any canned goods. No man could find a white shirt or a new suit. There was no leather because of the black-market slaughtering of beef, and no shoes. There wasn't any lumber or building materials. And none of them came back until we got rid of OPA.

The English have complete price control and rationing, and they haven't got enough to live on. They have no incentive to get production. Men don't work longer hours, because there isn't anything to buy with the money that they could earn. Surely with that example before us, we don't want to socialize and regiment America.

In the second place nobody knows enough to do the job of control as well as it is done by natural economic law. There are probably a billion transactions a day in this country and no one knows how to fix prices and conditions to govern those sales.

I saw the little man who struggled with the problem in the OPA bureaus. They created books and books of regulations, and had to amend them daily. If their rules fitted the east, they didn't fit the west or the south.

And there was no relief from their bungling and their injustice. Certainly this Administration has shown no evidence of ability to do the job. Look at the mess made of the voluntary food saving program to carry out a simple and highly desirable purpose. Meatless Tuesdays and chickenless and eggless Thursdays never did make any sense, because everyone ate chickens and eggs on Tuesday and meat on Thursdays, leaving them exactly where they were.

Last Thursday morning on the dining car the steward told us that, while he could not serve eggs, he would substitute wheat cakes on every order. So to save wheat for Europe the travelers ate wheatcakes in America. What difference would it have made if the Government had had legal power to enforce its decree? The compulsory plan would have been the same fool plan, and just as ineffective.

The reason this country has a surplus of food to ship in such tremendous amount is that we have pursued a system based on liberty. If we go back to Government restrictions, there won't be any surplus to ship abroad, and we will be subject to the same paralysis of initiative which exists in Europe and in England today.

According to the President's own statement, the average income of individuals after taxes has risen 39 per cent since 1929 in terms of actual purchasing power. The average man is therefore 39 per cent better off than he was at the high point of prosperity eighteen years ago.

The average workman is better off today than he was in 1939 just before the war in spite of the high prices, because his wages have gone up 110 while the cost of living has only gone up about 65 per cent.

Nearly half the families in the country have two workers in the family, and those families are better off than they were before the war. Unfortunately there are still a large number of families whose wages or fixed income has lagged behind the increase in prices.

We have to do everything therefore that we can to get prices down or increase their income, but we don't need to surrender liberty to keep this country on an even keel.

What emergency except a political emergency justifies making the President an economic dictator with power to run the lives of every business man, farmer, working man and housewife?

This high price condition is no accident. It has obviously resulted from the policies of the Administration which has controlled this Government for the last fifteen years and throughout the war. Prices are high because demand is greater than the supply.

Although the supply is tremendously increased over pre-war, the money available for spending has increased still more. The war was financed on inflation with a deficit of $50,000,000,000 a year for three or four years. The money created then and saved by the people is coming into the market today to buy goods.

Under lend-lease we distributed dollars around the world, and now those dollars are coming back from South America and elsewhere to buy goods that are insufficient for our own needs. Through the Bretton Woods Fund and Bank and the British loan we have distributed more dollars to be spent here.

At the same time we have kept Government expenses and taxes many times higher than they were before the war. The Administration has resisted any attempt to cut expenses, or to cut taxes. Every cent the Government spends puts more money into the buyer's side of the market.

The huge tax burden from this expense, amounting to about $40,000,000,000 a year—plus $12,000,000,000 of state and local taxes—30 per cent of the national income altogether—is a burden on millions of taxpayers. A lot of the taxes, however, are passed on into the cost of manufactured products. When you buy a pair of shoes you help pay the taxes of the farmer who raises the cattle, the livestock dealer, the packer, the leather processor, the shoe manufacturer and the shoe retailer. Probably 25 per cent of what you pay for your shoes is made up of taxes, and the same is true of many other articles.

Probably the most important cause of high prices is the tremendous volume of export buying. True, we have an exceptional income here at home in the United States, but the income of our people is practically balanced by our production.

When we impose on top of this balance $20,000,000,000 of foreign money, of foreign buying, we can hardly be surprised that a great increase in demand outruns our supply and forces prices up. This year we are exporting at the rate of $20,000,000,000 a year and importing at the rate of $9,000,000,000. That means that $11,000,000,000 of market demand are coming from abroad with no goods to balance them. About half of it is balanced by taxes, but the other half is pure inflation.

The President recommends that we extend and strengthen export controls. Why, he has had power to control exports right along, only he hasn't exercised it in any effective way. He has permitted the world to come in with the dollars we gave them, and bid up the price of our goods.

Of course we have to export to Europe to prevent starvation and chaos. Everybody agrees on that. There isn't any substantial difference about the necessity of doing something at once to carry Italy and France through the winter, through a short-range emergency program.

From the point of view of checking communism, this program is essential, but it is more or less useless unless we also change our policy in Germany and our policy in China. Secretary Marshall's efforts to re-establish the economy of Western Europe with American dollars is completely hopeless as long as he continues in Germany to destroy the industrial plants which alone can make Germany self-supporting. It means that Western Europe can become self-supporting.

Secretary Marshall is apparently uninterested in saving China from the Communists at a very reasonable cost, while he advocates the spending of billions for Western Europe. It is most unfortunate that there is not a word of encouragement in this message for those who are fighting against communism in China without ammunition and with their backs to the wall.

People seem to feel that we cannot check exports without causing hardship and starvation, but as a matter of fact of some $20,000,000,000 of exports, of goods and services, in 1947, only about 40 per cent go to Europe—$12,000,000,000 goes to every other section of the world, North America, South America, Asia and Africa.

Surely we should ration the rest of the world on steel, grain and oil before we even consider rationing our own people.

Today the Russian Government has an active commission here buying American goods and paying gold for them, which is better than credit, but just as inflationary. Much of what Russia is buying is heavy machinery, good for the manufacture of munitions.

Why does the President grant export licenses for goods of this kind and permit the Russians to come in and spend their money for them when steel and various types of machinery are insufficient for our own needs?

I have pointed out that the tremendous exports are one of the main causes of high prices here today. They can be cut down. In fact, if they continue at the present volume they present a threat to the whole economy, because they cannot possibly be maintained indefinitely when the world returns to normal.

In 1929 we built up a false export trade based on private credit. When it became apparent that the loans were not to be repaid, all lending stopped and the sudden unemployment which resulted here contributed heavily to the depression of 1932. Now we are repeating the experiment with Government funds instead of private funds.

We have been aiding Europe at the rate of about $5,000,000,000 a year of Government grants, loans and other aid. I think we can maintain that rate if we cut down on other exports and other Government expense without further serious effect on prices, and certainly without any need for setting up police state controls.

But I can't see any reason for increasing the rate of the very generous contributions we have been making. No nation has ever been so generous or made such tremendous effort to export as we have during the past two years.

We cannot endanger our whole economy and our whole liberty by trying to increase that five billion rate to the $8,000,000,000 a year requested by the foreign nations at Paris.

European Socialists do not seem to realize that if we are to continue a program for any length of time it must be based on a continuation of the liberty which has brought it about. But while temporarily we might increase our output by government restrictions, in the end we would soon be subject to the same paralysis of initiative which exists in England and in Europe today. In other words, Europe has to take the limitations which are inherent in a free system if they want the benefits produced by it.

We have shipped more food and other assistance out of this country than any other nation has ever done before in the history of the world. We cannot stretch that liberality too far, or there will be nothing to ship. We cannot ship so much that under a free system it will lead to a period of boom and bust.

In short, the way to hold prices down is for the Government to spend less money and reduce taxes, to limit exports and to hold the Marshall plan within a reasonable figure, and to control the growth of private credit. The Marshall plan is not primarily to relieve hardship and starvation. Our whole contribution for food, fuel and fertilizer under this plan will probably not be more than $2,500,000,000 a year.

The rest of the assistance requested is desirable, but much of it is not essential, certainly not worth the establishment of another OPA and a police state in this country.

Apparently the President thinks that we cannot adopt his version of the Marshall plan without police state controls and another OPA. I said last week in New York that the President was asking for two completely inconsistent policies at the same time. I said that if we wanted the $8,000,000,000 European form of the Marshall plan and all the exports we have, we cannot have lower prices. If we want lower prices, we have to give up that kind of Marshall plan.

If the Marshall plan is essential for the preservation of Europe and the world, then perhaps we can even stand higher prices more than we can stand a complete relapse to a Fascist regimentation of every individual in the United States.

But I believe very strongly that we can adopt a modified Marshall plan probably with more benefit to the countries concerned than if we are too lavish with our dollars, and I believe that we can hold prices at reasonable amounts with such a modified plan, if we cut other expenses and taxes, control credits and limit exports.

Surely, the American people do not desire a return to the days of OPA. They know that the controls won't work. They remember the shortages and the black markets. In time of war a morale develops which makes it possible to maintain some control, but in time of peace controls in this country are certain to fail. They will not hold real prices down, if we permit other conditions to go on forcing prices up.

We can't advocate higher wages with any promise that there will be no higher prices, as the President did just after the end of the war.

The American people don't like to be regimented, and they don't like to be ordered around by Federal officials. Our experience with Prohibition and with OPA both prove that vast black-market operations develop which the Federal Government itself is unable to control. Morals are broken down because it pays money to be a criminal.

Surely, the President's memory must be short. It was the President's own decontrol board which took off the controls on dairy products and grains in 1946. It was the President himself who took off controls on meat just before the 1946 election. It was the President himself who took off almost all other controls.

Can he sincerely believe that the Government could now enforce the controls he is asking for more successfully than they were controlling prices at that time? Does he think they can enforce the controls without a vast army of enforcement agents? Or even with such an army?

The President's adoption of his police-state program represents the final surrender to the left wing. The President himself indicated clearly within a month his disapproval of price control. What has happened since? The growing importance of the Marshall plan?

But three committees of eminent men examined that plan and found that we could safely undertake it, or the essential part of it, without serious danger to this country. While some mild forms of allocation were suggested none of the committees thought a complete price control, wage control, rationing system was necessary. Only Leon Henderson and his crowd, and the Political Action Committee of the CIO, advocated this program now adopted by the President.

There has been no change of conditions since the President's opinion a month ago except the conditions of political strategy.

From a Republican political standpoint it might be better for the Congress to give the President the power which he demands. It could only result in failure and a revolt of public opinion against any man who is trying to enforce the law.

I have had Republicans say to me that we should swallow our views and pass these measures for our political advantage, so that chaos and confusion will redound to our advantage in November, 1948. But it seems to me that the issue is far deeper than any political issue.

We stand at the crossroads today between a free America and a planned economy. This is the last stand of the planners who think they know how to run the people's affairs better than the people can know themselves.

If this effort succeeds in time of peace, there will never be a time when an emergency cannot be summoned up to justify the continuation of powers of this kind. It was only a month ago that the President himself said that consumer rationing and price controls were police-state methods. That is the issue today, not only in America, but throughout the world.

This country is the great bulwark of a free life, and from that freedom has developed the greatest and most productive country in the world and the country where the people are better off than any other country in the world. Shall we abandon that philosophy and that program for the police-state methods which have brought the rest of the world as seekers for charity to our door?

XVIII

Secretary Marshall's Address at Chicago

ON LONDON CONFERENCE ON GERMANY
NOV. 18, 1947

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE, I believe, have a sound understanding of the basic principles and objectives of our foreign policy. These have been expressed on many occasions by responsible officials of this Government, beginning with the President. They are understandable, I believe, to you all because they have their origin in the American conscience and in the deeply rooted traditions of our people. No American, I am sure, questions the desirability of this country promoting wherever it can the right of people to govern themselves and the rule of impartial law as against the exercise of arbitrary power. These principles require no elaboration. But, true as they are, such generalities do not always serve to clarify for our people the current problems with which we are now faced. They do not in themselves answer the question, "What is it all about?" They do not in themselves provide an answer as to why at almost every turn we find ourselves in disagreement with another power with whom we were so recently allied in the common cause. I shall tonight confine myself to the problems relating to one area of the world which at the moment are occupying the attention of the Administration and the Congress and with which in another aspect I will be dealing at the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers which opens in London November 25. That is the related problem of the revival of the European community and the peace settlements with Germany and Austria. I shall try to avoid oversimplification on the one hand and bewildering detail on the other.

In my statement before the committees of Congress on November 10, I laid great stress on the entity known as Europe and its importance to the world and to the United States in particular. So important to the understanding of our present problem is the meaning of the European community that at the expense of repetition I will restate it. Europe, or what through centuries has been known as Europe, is a community of nations which despite racial and religious differences, commercial rivalries, and sporadic internecine wars has developed governmental procedures and an advanced civilization. We are a part of that civilization. Our national traditions—the foundation on which our entire civilization rests—find their counterpart, if not their origin, in some part of this European community.

Europe is a natural grouping of states designed by geography and history to function as a community if it is to function well. Because of the character of its people, the nations comprising the European community function harmoniously and effectively only if they are permitted to operate of their own free will. The logic of history would appear to dictate the necessity of this community drawing closer together not only for its own survival but for the stability, prosperity, and peace of the entire world.

Due to the Nazi attempt to subjugate the entire European community, Europe was plunged into a great war. The central question that arose at the end of this war was, in effect, what was to be the future of this European community. Was it to be restored to a position of stability so it could work out its own problem, or was it to be kept in a state of permanent dependency and eventual absorption into a system alien to its traditions and civilization?

It is generally recognized that the major responsibility for finally crushing nazism devolved upon three powers, none of which can be strictly classed as a continental European state. The efforts of two of these powers have been consistently directed, since the military victory, toward the restoration of the European community to its former status. They have been so directed partly out of compassion but primarily, I think, because they recognized the historical fact that a revived, revitalized Europe is necessary to a peaceful and prosperous world order.

FORMER EUROPEAN POSITION

For centuries Europe occupied a preeminent position and exercised a dominant influence in international affairs. Before the recent war it was one of the two highly industrialized areas on earth and enjoyed a correspondingly high standard of living. Today Europe is devastated and dispirited, but once it regains strength and confidence it will draw on its store of resources, energies, skills, and spiritual qualities and again make major contributions to world progress. This is the goal of those who are genuinely devoted to the cause of European recovery.

Unfortunately, it has become apparent that the third great power which contributed so much to the common victory evidently does not share that purpose. For reasons that are still obscure, it is endeavoring apparently to prolong the present unsatisfactory state of affairs indefinitely. If this purpose prevails, obviously the prosperous European community we knew before the war cannot be reestablished within the foreseeable future.

This brings me to an important conclusion. It is this divergence of purpose concerning the future of Europe which is the cause of many of the present differences between the United States and Soviet Russia. The divergence is not due to any direct clash between the national interests of these powers.

It is my belief that if Europe is restored as a solvent and vigorous community, this issue will have been decided, and the disturbing conflict between ourselves and the Soviets, in so far as Europe is concerned, will lessen.

It seems evident that, as regards European recovery, the enlightened self-interest of the United States coincides with the best interest of Europe itself and of all those who desire to see conflicts of whatever nature resolved so that the world can devote its full attention and energy to the progressive improvement of the well-being of mankind. The place to begin that process is Europe.

I have referred to the fact that Europe formerly stood as a strong and constructive element of the world's economy and political order. Its trade, both among the European countries themselves and with other regions, was a major factor in the international exchange of commodities and services and was a direct stimulus to productivity throughout the world. The stabilizing influence which Europe as a concert of independent nations exercised on the remainder of the world was a basic factor in assuring the security of our own nations—a fact which we acknowledged by twice committing our total resources to the preservation of the integrity of the continental community, free of single-power domination.

The near collapse of Europe has left weakness where once there was strength and has created in effect a political and economic vacuum. It is certainly not our purpose to exploit the situation by filling the vacuum with American power. The map of Europe today bears witness to our true intentions. West of the line where the Allied armies met, nations in their own way are grappling with their postwar problems, each in accordance with its distinctive institutions and traditions, free of external pressure. The proposals of the United States to assist in the recovery of the nations that responded to the suggestion of June 5 has no purpose other than to restore Europe as a self-supporting community of states and to terminate as speedily as possible dependence upon us for aid. It is unfortunate that only 16 European states felt free to participate in the Paris conference on economic cooperation. This Government is willing to cooperate with every nation that pledges a generous effort to the common cause of European recovery.

We are now intimately working to this end with governments of varied political complexions—some constitutional monarchies and some republics, both with Socialist ministers, some controlled by conservative elements and some constituted of coalitions. This is a fact that everyone can see, and it should dispel completely the propagandistic assertions that we seek to impose the American pattern on others.

Much has been said about the various freedoms, about democracy, about the right of people and of nations to determine for themselves without restraint the forms of government they desire. Much has also been said regarding the desire of the United States Government to influence other nations to follow what we believe we follow with constantly increasing success—that is a philosophy of government dedicated to the freedom and welfare of the individual. That is our earnest desire. It is certainly not imperialistic, and it does not indicate a passion for war.

We realize that we cannot expect the same conceptions to be held by all countries. Different races, different traditions, different histories and rates of development lead to different results, but on fundamentals I think we find a general agreement among peoples the world around.

OUR INTEREST IN EUROPEAN RESTORATION

If the United States entertained any idea of extending American influence or domination over Europe, our policy would not be directed toward ending European dependency upon this country but toward perpetuating that relationship. The clarity of the record and of our intentions, however, has not prevented Soviet officials and Communist groups elsewhere from waging with increasing venom a calculated campaign of vilification and distortion of American motives in foreign affairs. These opponents of recovery charge the United States with imperialist design, aggressive purposes, and finally with a desire to provoke a third world war.

I wish to state emphatically that there is no truth whatsoever in these charges, and I add that those who make them are fully aware of this fact.

What is the record? We have annexed no territory. We have not used the greatest military power and military resources ever assembled to acquire for the United States a special privileged position, either political or economic. Furthermore, since the close of hostilities the United States and Great Britain have voluntarily reduced the area of their sovereignty in the world. Colonial areas and dependent people have been assisted to achieve full independence. New countries have emerged from under the U. S. and British flags to take their place as members of the United Nations.

While the western democracies have been reducing the area of their sovereignty, one country has taken the opposite road. The Soviet Union has in effect considerably expanded her frontiers. Since 1939 she has de facto annexed territory comprising an area of more than 280,000 square miles, with a population of some 22 million people.

The American proposal for assistance to Europe is directed toward production, construction, and recovery. It is a genuinely cooperative undertaking, which is being worked out in an atmosphere of mutual trust and with careful regard for the sovereignty of nations. Indeed, this joint endeavor by the United States and 16 European states is a clear and convincing demonstration of cooperation freely given to achieve the common good. As such it perfectly reflects one of the basic precepts of democracy.

This Government recognizes that elements of uncertainty are involved in so vast and complex an undertaking. But we believe that the promise of success more than justifies the risks. We are completely convinced that the risks of not attempting to restore Europe are far greater than those involved in taking positive action as now proposed. We recognize that our people will be called upon to share their goods still in short supply and will have to forego filling a portion of their own requirements until the greater needs of Europe have been met. This is a direct contradiction of the allegation that we are seeking to dump surplus goods in Europe in order to avoid the depressing effects of over-supply. This particular charge of "dumping" must have a strange sound to those Europeans now desperately seeking the very essentials of life. And it must sound equally odd to Americans who are standing with money in hand impatient to buy goods which we are sending to Europe to meet a more urgent need. But such is the breath of propaganda.

COMMENTS REGARDING PROPAGANDA

I should like in this connection to make a few comments regarding propaganda in general and particularly with regard to the debates and procedure of the United Nations Assembly. It seems desirable to analyze the situation somewhat and clear up some of the issues prior to the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in London.

During the meeting of the United Nations Assembly there was a great deal said, with considerable vituperation, regarding the attitude of the Government and people of the United States toward the Soviet Union, along with the direct accusation that a war spirit was being fomented by our press and by distinguished citizens who were named. A portion of this, the major portion I assume, was intended for pure propaganda purposes. But I also assume that there may have been some genuine feeling that the purposes of this Government and the attitude of most of the American press were definitely hostile to the Soviet Union. As a responsible official of the United States Government I would like to see more restraint than is sometimes exhibited in discussions of international issues.

But as regards the critical attitude recently manifested in this country toward the Soviet Union, I should like to distinguish between this effect and its cause. To determine that cause it is necessary to go back at least as far as the summer of 1945, immediately following the German surrender. At that time I think it was a fact that the people of the United States had as high a regard, or I might better put it, appreciation, for the Soviet people and their sacrifices, and for the Soviet Army and its leaders, as they held for any other people in the world. But today, only two years later, we are charged with a definite hostility toward the Soviet Union and its people, which constitutes a complete change in our attitude since the summer of 1945.

I recognize this effect. I would not characterize it as hostile. But the important question is, "What produced this tremendous change in our national feeling and attitude?" The truth as I see it is that from the termination of hostilities down to the present time the Soviet Government has consistently followed a course which was bound to arouse the resentment of our people.

Just what the purpose of this remarkable procedure has been, particularly during 1946, I have been at a loss to determine. So many of the actions of that Government were provocative without any other evident purpose. I have endeavored to find at least a partial explanation in the historical characteristics of the Russian Government and its officials through a long period of years and not solely related to the present regime. While some light can thus be cast on the problem, it does not, even in a small way, explain why a government should proceed with apparent deliberation to destroy the invaluable asset of high regard and good-will which is possessed in the attitude of the American people and why it should deliberately provoke such animosities as are evident at this time.

The people of this country are God-fearing people. They have been very patient in their attitude towards misrepresentation of their actions and motives when their only purpose has been to help the other fellow. Today our people have been virtually driven into a state of active resentment, and, having been goaded to this point, they are accused of having lighted and stoked this great fire of public resentment. This last is propaganda, yes, of the most brazen and contemptuous character. But since it affects the very stability of the world, it is time to call a halt to such inflammatory practices.

I am not pessimistic regarding the progress made by the United Nations during the recent Assembly meeting. The fact that the world has a forum for free debate is in itself a hopeful portent for the future. The fact that debates have sometimes included more of vituperation or diatribe than of logic or adherence to the facts was unfortunate but in the long run, I think, merely incidental and an always present possibility in any democratic debate. The organization did pass through a serious struggle, but I think it emerged without loss of potential strength. The question now is, where do we go from here, which leads me to the coming Conference of Foreign Ministers in London.

PROBLEM OF GERMAN RESTORATION

The problem of restoring the European community inevitably raises in acute form the problem of Germany. The restoration of Europe involves the restoration of Germany. Without a revival of German production there can be no revival of Europe's economy. But we must be very careful to see that a revived Germany could not again threaten the European community.

I am not speaking of the revival of Germany in a military sense. There can be no question of the absolute necessity of keeping Germany disarmed and demilitarized. Today Germany is completely disarmed. Measures have been proposed by the United States and supported by the United Kingdom and France to insure the continued demilitarization of Germany for 40 years. Thus far the Soviet Union has, in effect, rejected that proposal by wholesale amendments of its purpose, but the offer still stands.

The revival of German militarism, however, is not the only important factor involved in the relationship of Germany to a restored Europe. There is an imperative necessity for safeguards to insure that the economic power of Germany shall not be used by a future German Government as a weapon for the furtherance of exclusively German policies. This poses admittedly a complicated and difficult problem. An attempt artificially to limit German peacetime economy could easily prevent the essential revival of German production to an extent that would render impossible the economic revival of Europe.

The answer to the problem would appear to relate primarily to the future role and functioning of the great industrial complex in the Ruhr. The United States believes that safeguards must be set up to insure that the resources and industrial potential of the Ruhr, particularly in respect to coal and steel, should not be left under the exclusive control of any future German Government but should be used for the benefit of the European community as a whole.

The charge has frequently been made that the United States in its policy has sought to give priority or intends to give priority to restoration of Germany ahead of those of the other countries of Europe. The truth is that far from having been accorded a preference over any Allied country, German recovery has lagged so far behind that of the other countries of Europe as to retard the whole effort for European recovery. At the present time industrial production in western Germany is less than one-half that of prewar. The food supplies are seriously below the minimum requirement for health and efficiency, and German foreign trade is only a small fraction of its former dimension. In fairness to the American taxpayer, who has been contributing hundreds of millions of dollars annually to support the people in the American zone, Germany must be made self-supporting as quickly as possible. With safeguards against any revival of German militarism and with measures to assure the utilization of the basic products of the Ruhr for the good of the European community as a whole, I believe that Europe and the world will be adequately protected against the danger of future German domination. In these circumstances it should be possible to proceed to the establishment of a provisional central authority in a federated German state and to the final framing of a peace settlement. We shall earnestly endeavor at the Conference in London to make progress along these lines.

CHARACTER OF INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS

Now I have tried to give you a picture of certain of our major international problems. These are not the only problems with which we are dealing. There are other areas of the world in which we face situations of immense complexity and gravity. But what I have told you this evening may give you a better idea of the character of our international problems as a whole and of our approach to them.

We are aware of the seriousness and extent of the campaign which is being directed against us as one of the bulwarks of Western civilization. We are not blind to any of the forms which this attack assumes. And we do not propose to stand by and watch the disintegration of the international community to which we belong.

But at the same time we are aware of our strength and of the fact that there is great need in many countries for our help and our friendship; we can afford to discount the alarms and excursions intended to distract us, and to proceed with calm determination along the path which our traditions have defined.

I will approach this Conference in London with an open mind and will seek only for a sound basis for agreement. I will seek to avoid statements for mere popular or propaganda effect, no matter what the provocation. It is my purpose to concentrate solely on finding an acceptable basis of agreement to terminate the present tragic stalemate and to speed the advent of a new era of peace and hope for Europe and the world.

XIX

Secretary Marshall's Report to the Nation

ON THE FAILURE OF THE LONDON CONFERENCE

DEC. 19, 1947

THE result of the recent meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London was disappointing. I realized that the many lengthy statements and the frequent and fundamental disagreements were very confusing to the general public.

Also, the continuous accusations against the good faith, the integrity and the purposes of the governments of the Western powers, particularly the United States, necessarily added greatly to the confusion. This was, as a matter of fact, one of the purposes of these attacks.

I anticipated great difficulty in reaching a comprehensive agreement, but I did have a hope that we might take three or four fundamental decisions which would permit immediate action by the four powers to alleviate the situation in Germany this winter and greatly improve the prospects for all of Europe. That we failed to reach any such agreements is the greatest disappointment.

The United States delegation went to London with an open mind, as I had stated we would in Chicago but we went with a strong determination to bring to an end the division of Germany which has existed since the German capitulation. We were also determined that any agreement reached at London should be a genuine workable agreement, and not one which would immediately involve obstruction and frustration in the Allied Control Council when it came to be put into effect in Germany.

I shall review only briefly the interminable discussions during the weeks of debate at London. To us it was but a dreary repetition of what had been said and re-said at the Moscow Conference. I shall endeavor, however, to point out the main issues on which the conference deadlocked and give you my estimate of the underlying reasons.

The basic issue, as we saw it before the opening of the London Conference, was whether or not the Allies could agree among themselves to reunite Germany.

The issue in regard to the Austrian treaty was even simpler and had already emerged clearly at the Moscow Conference.

Because the two main issues which I have outlined would be the controlling factors in our discussions, three of the delegations had agreed that the Austrian treaty should be considered first, and the economic principles to govern the treatment of Germany as an economic whole should come second. We felt that this order was logical and necessary if we were to debate with any prospect of success the remaining items on our agenda. The Soviet delegation held a different view and insisted that questions on the preparation of a German peace treaty should be given precedence over the questions regarding immediate economic unity for Germany.

In order to get the conference started, it was finally agreed to accept the Soviet request that the preparation of a German peace treaty should be item two on the agenda. As a result, with the exception of one day of discussion of Austria and the Austrian treaty, it was not until after ten days of meetings that the conference really reached the heart of the German question. These first ten meetings were devoted to futile and somewhat unreal discussion of the mechanisms for the preparation of an eventual German peace treaty before the question of whether or not there was to be a united Germany had even been considered. There was one question, however, of real substance during this phase of the discussion which had a direct application not only to a German peace treaty but also to the immediate situation in Germany. This was the question of the present and future frontiers of the German state. No serious consideration of a peace treaty could be undertaken without first considering what was to be the area of the future German state. Three delegations had already expressed their agreement that the area of the Saar should be separated from Germany and integrated into French economy. Mr. Molotov refused to commit his government on this point.

On this vital matter of frontiers, three delegations agreed to the establishment of a frontier commission or commissions to make an expert study of any proposed changes from the prewar frontiers. Mr. Molotov refused to agree. It was impossible for me to reconcile his urgent insistence upon the necessity of expediting the preparation for a German peace treaty with his categoric refusal to agree to the appointment of boundary commissions which three delegations considered to be an absolutely essential first step in any serious preparation for a future German peace settlement.

Many other questions concerning the actual preparation of any peace treaty were discussed without agreement.

It was during this stage of the debate that Mr. Molotov insisted that the four powers should agree upon the immediate establishment of a German central government. Although the United States had been, I believe the first of the four occupying countries to suggest at Moscow the desirability for the earliest possible establishment of a German provisional central government, it was obvious that until the division of Germany had been healed and conditions created for German political and economic unity, any central government would be a sham and not a reality. This view was shared by the other Western delegations but to Mr. Molotov it was completely unacceptable. This was the first clear evidence of his purpose to utilize the meeting as an opportunity for propaganda declarations which would be pleasant to German ears.

After several days of consideration by the deputies the Austrian treaty was again brought to the conference table on Dec. 4. The sole issue discussed was the determination of what were the true German assets in eastern Austria to which the Soviet Union was fully entitled by the Potsdam agreement. This had been the stumbling block in reaching final agreement on the treaty draft, and it was an issue which would determine whether or not Austria would be under such complete economic domination by the Soviet Union that it would be virtually a vassal state.

The French had endeavored to break the impasse by submitting a compromise proposal, but this was categorically refused by the Soviet delegate. In the last hour of the final session of the conference Mr. Molotov indicated an apparent willingness to accept a percentage reduction in the Soviet claims, without specifying the actual amount involved in his proposal. The matter was immediately referred to the deputies and I was informed just prior to my departure from England that the Soviet government would submit later a detailed proposition.

It was not until the tenth meeting that the conference finally came to the heart of the problem—to a consideration of the harsh realities of the existing situation in Germany.

Several more days were to elapse, however, before the council really came to grips with these realities. Discussions of procedure—of what document to discuss—again intervened to delay our work. However, on Monday, Dec. 8, the procedural issues were resolved and the council began the consideration of the fundamental issues which eventually led to the adjournment of the session without agreement.

I shall endeavor to indicate briefly what those issues were without reciting the involved and prolonged discussions over individual items.

The general issue was simple. It was whether or not Germany was to continue divided or whether the Allies could agree to recreate a unified Germany. Unless this could be achieved, all other questions relating to Germany would remain academic.

What then were the particular obstacles to the achievement of German economic and political unity?

The United States delegation considered that there were certain fundamental decisions which the four occupying powers should take if German unity was to be achieved. These were:

1. The elimination of the artificial zonal barriers to permit free movement of persons, ideas and goods throughout the whole territory of Germany.

2. The relinquishment by the occupying powers of ownership of properties in Germany seized under the guise of reparations without four-power agreement.

3. A currency reform involving the introduction of new and sound currency for all Germany.

4. A definite determination of the economic burdens which Germany would be called upon to bear in the future, that is, the costs of occupation, repayment of sums advanced by the occupying powers and reparations.

5. An over-all export-import plan for all of Germany.

When these basic measures had been put into effect by the occupying powers, then the establishment under proper safeguards of a provisional government for all Germany should be undertaken.

Reparations soon emerged as a key issue. For the benefit of those not fully familiar with past negotiations on this subject I wish to explain that a definite agreement had been concluded two years ago at Potsdam that reparations payments would be made by the transfer of surplus capital assets, that is, factories, machinery, and assets abroad, and not by payments from time to time out of the daily output of German production. One reason for this decision was to avoid an issue that would continue through the years between Germany and the Allies and between the Allies themselves concerning her ability to pay and the actual value of payments which had been made in goods. Also, it was clearly evident that for many years Germany would be involved in a desperate struggle to build up sufficient foreign trade to pay for the food and other items on which she will be dependent from outside sources. The best example of this phase of the situation that I can give is the present necessity for Great Britain and the United States to pay out some 700 millions a year to provide the food and other items to prevent starvation and rather complete disintegration of that portion of Germany occupied by our forces.

In other words reparations from current production—that is, exports of day-to-day German production with no return—could be made only if the countries at present supplying Germany—notably the United States—foot the bill. We put in and the Russians take out. This economic truth, however, is only one aspect of Soviet reparation claims. In the eastern zone of Germany the Soviet Union has been taking reparations from current production and has also, under the guise of reparations, seized vast holdings and formed them into a gigantic trust embracing a substantial part of the industry of that zone. This has resulted in a type of monopolistic strangle hold over the economic and political life of eastern Germany which makes the region little more than a dependent province of the Soviet Union. A very strong reason, in my opinion, for our failure to agree at London was the Soviet determination not to relax in any way its hold on eastern Germany. Acceptance of their claims for reparations from current production from the western zones would extend that strangle hold over the future economic life of all Germany.

The Soviet position was nowhere more clearly indicated than by Mr Molotov's categoric refusal to furnish the Council of Foreign Ministers with information concerning the reparations already taken from the eastern zone or indeed any information at all concerning the situation there, until full agreements had been reached. In effect we were to tell them what has occurred in the western zones, which we had already done, and they tell us nothing. That refusal to provide information absolutely essential for decisions as to the organization of German unity would by itself have made any agreement impossible. A remarkable illustration of the Soviet position in this matter was their carping criticism of the economic procedure in our zones which are freely published for the world to read, while virtually in the same breath blandly refusing to provide any data at all concerning their zone.

It finally became clear that we could make no progress at this time—that there was no apparent will to reach a settlement but only an interest in making more and more speeches intended for another audience. So I suggested that we adjourn. No real ground was lost or gained at the meeting, except that the outlines of the problems and the obstacles are much clearer. We cannot look forward to a unified Germany at this time. We must do the best we can in the area where our influence can be felt.

All must recognize that the difficulties to be overcome are immense. The problems concerned with the treaty settlements for Italy and the satellite countries were simple by comparison since none of those countries were divided into zones of occupation and all of them had an existing form of government. Germany by contrast is sub-divided into four pieces—four zones. No trace of national government remains.

There is another and I think even more fundamental reason for the frustration we have encountered in our endeavor to reach a realistic agreement for a peace settlement. In the war struggle Europe was in a large measure shattered. As a result a political vacuum was created and until this vacuum has been filled by the restoration of a healthy European community, it does not appear possible that paper agreements can assure a lasting peace. Agreements between sovereign states are generally the reflection and not the cause of genuine settlements.

It is for this very reason, I think, that we encountered such complete opposition to almost every proposal the Western powers agreed upon. The Soviet Union has recognized the situation in its frank declaration of hostility and opposition to the European recovery program. The success of such a program would necessarily mean the establishment of a balance in which the sixteen Western nations, who have bound their hopes and efforts together, would be rehabilitated, strong in forms of government which guarantee true freedom, opportunity to the individual, and protection against the terror of governmental tyranny.

The issue is really clear-cut and I fear there can be no settlement until the coming months demonstrate whether or not the civilization of western Europe will prove vigorous enough to rise above the destructive effects of the war and restore a healthy society. Officials of the Soviet Union and leaders of the Communist parties openly predict that this restoration will not take place. We on the other hand are confident in the rehabilitation of western European civilization with its freedoms.

Now, until the result of this struggle becomes clearly apparent, there will continue to be a very real difficulty to resolve even on paper agreed terms for a treaty of peace. The situation must be stabilized. Western nations at the very least must be firmly established on a basis of government and freedoms that will preserve all that has been gained in the past centuries by these nations and all that their co-operation promises for the future.

XX

President Truman's Message to Congress

RECOMMENDING EUROPEAN RECOVERY PLAN

DEC. 19, 1947

To the Congress of the United States:

A principal concern of the people of the United States is the creation of conditions of enduring peace throughout the world. In company with other peace-loving nations, the United States is striving to insure that there will never be a World War III. In the words of the charter of the United States, we are "determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war."

We seek lasting peace in a world where freedom and justice are secure and where there is equal opportunity for the economic well-being of all peoples.

To this end, the United States played a leading role in the founding of the United Nations. We have supported that organization at all times to the best of our ability, and we have advanced a number of proposals for increasing its effectiveness in maintaining peace and security and in establishing the economic, social and moral foundations of peace.

We are working in the United Nations towards the elimination and control of armaments and, in a step without precedent or parallel, have offered to place our most powerful weapon under international control, provided that other nations agree to effective and enforceable safeguards against its use for destructive purposes.

The United States, in the conviction that a prerequisite to peace in the future is the just settlement of past differences, has labored to obtain fair and workable treaties of peace for former enemy states so that they may resume their places in the family of nations.

The United States has taken the lead in world-wide efforts to promote industrial and agricultural reconstruction and a revival of world commerce, for we know that enduring peace must be based upon increased production and an expanding flow of goods and materials among nations for the benefit of all.

Since the surrender of the Axis powers we have provided more than $15 billion in the forms of grants and loans for aid to victims of the war, to prevent starvation, disease and suffering; to aid in the restoration of transportation and communications and to assist in rebuilding war-devastated economies. This assistance has averted stark tragedy and has aided progress towards recovery in many areas of the world.

In these and many other ways the people of the United States have abundantly demonstrated their desire for world peace and the freedom and well-being of all nations.

We must now make a grave and significant decision relating to our further efforts to create the conditions of peace. We must decide whether or not we will complete the job of helping the free nations of Europe to recover from the devastation of the war. Our decision will determine in large part the future of the people of that continent. It will also determine in large part whether the free nations of the world can look forward with hope to a peaceful and prosperous future as independent states or whether they must live in poverty and in fear of selfish totalitarian aggression.

INTEREST OF THE UNITED STATES IN EUROPEAN RECOVERY

It is of vital importance to the United States that European recovery be continued to ultimate success. The American tradition of extending a helping hand to people in distress, our concern for the building of a healthy world economy which can make possible ever-increasing standards of living for our people and our overwhelming concern for the maintenance of a civilization of free men and free institutions, all combine to give us this great interest in European recovery.

The people of the United States have shown, by generous contributions since the end of hostilities, their great sympathy and concern for the many millions in Europe who underwent the trials of war and enemy occupation. Our sympathy is undiminished, but we know that we cannot give relief indefinitely, and so we seek practical measures which will eliminate Europe's need for further relief.

Considered in terms of our own economy, European recovery is essential. The last two decades have taught us the bitter lesson that no economy, not even one so strong as our own, can remain healthy and prosperous in a world of poverty and want.

In the past the flow of raw materials and manufactured products between western Europe, Latin America, Canada and the United States has integrated these areas in a great trading system. In the same manner Far Eastern exports to the United States have helped pay for the goods shipped from Europe to the Far East. Europe is thus an essential part of a world trading network. The failure to revive fully this vast trading system, which has begun to function again since the end of the war, would result in economic deterioration throughout the world. The United States, in common with other nations, would suffer.

Our deepest concern with European recovery, however, is that it is essential to the maintenance of the civilization in which the American way of life is rooted. It is the only assurance of the continued independence and integrity of a group of nations who constitute a bulwark for the principles of freedom, justice and the dignity of the individual.

The economic plight in which Europe now finds itself has intensified a political struggle between those who wish to remain free men living under the rule of law and those who would use economic distress as a pretext for the establishment of a totalitarian state.

The next few years can determine whether the free countries of Europe will be able to preserve their heritage of freedom. If Europe fails to recover, the peoples of these countries might be driven to the philosophy of despair—the philosophy which contends that their basic wants can be met only by the surrender of their basic rights to totalitarian control.

Such a turn of events would constitute a shattering blow to peace and stability in the world. It might well compel us to modify our own economic system and to forego, for the sake of our own security, the enjoyment of many of our freedoms and privileges.

It is for these reasons that the United States has so vital an interest in strengthening the belief of the people of Europe that freedom from fear and want will be achieved under free and democratic governments.

ORIGINS OF THE EUROPEAN RECOVERY PROGRAM

The end of the fighting in Europe left that continent physically devastated and its economy temporarily paralyzed. The immediate problem was to prevent widespread starvation and disease and to make a start toward economic recovery. In the first year and a half after V-E day, the people of western Europe, by their own diligent efforts and with the aid of the United States and other nations, made remarkable progress toward these objectives.

At the beginning of 1947, however, they were still short of the goal of economic recovery. Their difficulties were greatly increased during the present year, chiefly by a bitter winter followed by floods and droughts, which cut western Europe's grain crop to the lowest figure in generations and hampered production of many other products.

Nevertheless, it was clear by last spring that Europe had achieved sufficient political and economic stability to make possible an over-all plan for recovery.

European recovery is essentially a problem for the nations of Europe. It was therefore apparent that it could not be solved, even with outside aid, unless the European nations themselves would find a joint solution and accept joint responsibility for its execution. Such a co-operative plan would serve to release the full productive resources of Europe and provide a proper basis for measuring the need and effectiveness of further aid from outside Europe, and in particular from the United States.

These considerations led to the suggestion by the Secretary of State on June 5, 1947, that further help from the United States should be given only after the countries of Europe had agreed upon their basic requirements and the steps which they would take in order to give proper effect to additional aid from us.

In response to this suggestion, representatives of sixteen European nations assembled in Paris in July, at the invitation of the British and French governments, to draw up a co-operative program of European recovery. They formed a committee of European economic co-operation. The countries represented were: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United Kingdom. Although western Germany was not formally represented on the committee, its requirements, as well as its ability to contribute to European economic recovery were considered by the committee.

THE RECOVERY PROGRAM PROPOSED BY THE EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

The report of the European committee was transmitted to the government of the United States late in September. The report describes the present economic situation of Europe and the extent to which the participating countries can solve their problem by individual and joint efforts. After taking into account these recovery efforts, the report estimates the extent to which the sixteen countries will be unable to pay for the imports they must have.

The report points out that the peoples of western Europe depend for their support upon international trade. It has been possible for some 270,000,000 occupying this relatively small area, to enjoy a good standard of living only by manufacturing imported raw materials and exporting the finished products to the rest of the world. They must also import foodstuffs in large volume, for there is not enough farmland in western Europe to support its population, even with intensive cultivation and with favorable weather. They cannot produce adequate amounts of cotton, oil and other raw materials. Unless these deficiencies are met by imports, the productive centers of Europe can function only at low efficiency, if at all.

In the past these necessary imports were paid for by exports from Europe, by the performance of services such as shipping and banking, and by income from capital investments abroad. All these elements of international trade were so badly disrupted by the war that the people of western Europe have been unable to produce in their own countries, or to purchase elsewhere, the goods essential to their livelihood. Shortages of raw materials, productive capacity and exportable commodities have set up vicious circles of increasing scarcities and lowered standards of living.

The economic recovery of western European countries depends on breaking through these vicious circles by increasing production to a point where exports and services can pay for the imports they must have to live. The basic problem in making Europe self-supporting is to increase European production.

The sixteen nations presented in their report a recovery program designed to enable them, and western Germany, to become economically self-supporting within a period of four years and thereafter to maintain a reasonable minimum standard of living for their people without special help from others. The program rests upon four basic points:

(1) A strong production effort by each of the participating countries.

(2) Creation of internal financial stability by each country.

(3) Maximum and continuing co-operation among the participating countries.

(4) A solution of the problem of the participating countries trading deficit with the American continents, particularly by increasing European exports.

The nations represented on the European committee agreed at Paris to do everything in their power to achieve these four aims. They agreed to take definite measures leading to financial, economic and monetary stability, the reduction of trade barriers, the removal of obstacles to the free movement of persons within Europe and a joint effort to use their common resources to the best advantage.

These agreements are a source of great encouragement. When the representatives of sixteen sovereign nations, with diverse peoples, histories and institutions, jointly determine to achieve closer economic ties among themselves and to break away from the self-defeating actions of narrow nationalism, the obstacles in the way of recovery appear less formidable.

The report takes into account the productive capacities of the participating nations and their ability to obtain supplies from other parts of the world. It also takes into account the possibilities of obtaining funds through the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, through private investment and, in some instances, by the sale of existing foreign assets. The participating countries recognized that some commodities, particularly food, will remain scarce for years to come, and the diet they have set as their goal for 1951 is less adequate in most cases than their pre-war diet. The report assumes that many countries will continue restrictions on the distribution of shortage items such as food, clothing and fuel.

When all these factors had been considered the European committee concluded that there will still be a requirement for large quantities of food, fuel, raw materials and capital equipment for which the financial resources of the participating countries will be inadequate.

With successful execution of the European recovery program, this requirement will diminish in each of the four years ahead, and the committee anticipated that by 1952 Europe could again meet its needs without special aid.

APPRAISAL OF THE EUROPEAN PROBLEM

The problem of economic recovery in Western Europe is basically of the character described in the report of the sixteen nations. A successful European recovery program will depend upon two essentials. The first is that each nation separately and all the nations together should take vigorous action to help themselves. The second essential is that sufficient outside aid should be made available to provide the margin of victory for the recovery program.

The necessary imports which the sixteen countries cannot finance without assistance constitute only a small proportion, in terms of value, of their total national production —some 5 per cent over the four years of the program. Those imports, however, are of crucial importance in generating recovery. They represent the difference between ever-deepening stagnation and progressive improvement.

Most of the necessary outside aid, if it is to come at all, must come from the United States. It is a simple fact that we are the only nation with sufficient economic strength to bridge the temporary gap between minimum European needs and war-diminished European resources.

We expect that other countries which have it within their power will also give what assistance they can to Europe. Canada, for example, has been lending assistance to Europe fully as great in proportion to its capacity as that which we have given. We also expect that international institutions, particularly the International Bank, will provide such assistance as they can within their charters. But the fact remains—only the United States can provide the bulk of the aid needed by Europe over the next four years.

It is necessarily a complex and difficult task to determine the extent and nature of this aid.

In some respects, the situation has changed significantly since the report of the sixteen countries was completed. Some of these changes have been unfavorable, including price increases in the United States and other countries where Europe makes purchases, a serious drought in Europe, and aggressive activities by Communists and Communist-inspired groups aimed directly at the prevention of European recovery.

There have also been favorable changes. In the last few months coal production in the Ruhr district of western Germany has increased from 230,000 tons a day to 290,000 tons a day. Similarly, coal production in the United Kingdom has risen markedly in recent weeks. Iron and steel production has correspondingly increased.

Such increases in production which lie at the heart of industrial recovery are of far-reaching importance.

Further changes in the situation, now unpredictable, are to be expected as European recovery progresses.

All our plans and actions must be founded on the fact that the situation we are dealing with is flexible and not fixed, and we must be prepared to make adjustments whenever necessary.

Weather conditions will largely determine whether agricultural goals can be met.

Political events in Europe and in the rest of the world cannot be accurately foreseen. We must not be blind to the fact that the Communists have announced determined opposition to any effort to help Europe get back on its feet. There will unquestionably be further incitements to strike, not for the purpose of redressing the legitimate grievances of particular groups, but for the purpose of bringing chaos in the hope that it will pave the way for totalitarian control.

On the other hand, if confidence and optimisim are reestablished soon, the spark they provide can kindle united efforts to a degree which would substantially accelerate the progress of European recovery.

Despite these many imponderables, the dimensions of the necessary assistance by the United States can now be determined within reasonable limits. We can evaluate the probable success of a bold concept of assistance to the European economy. We can determine the principles upon which American aid should be based. We can estimate the probable magnitude of the assistance required and judge whether we can, safely and wisely, provide that assistance.

Extensive consideration has been given to these problems. Congressional committees and individual members of the Congress have studied them at home and abroad during the recent Congressional recess. The report of the European nations has been carefully analayzed by officials of our government. Committees of the executive branch and a group of distinguished private citizens have given their best thought to the relationship between Europe's needs and our resources.

PROGRAM FOR UNITED STATES AID

In the light of all these factors, an integrated program for United States aid to European recovery has been prepared for submission to the Congress.

In developing this program, certain basic considerations have been kept in mind:

First, the program is designed to make genuine recovery possible within a definite period of time, and not merely to continue relief indefinitely.

Second, the program is designed to insure that the funds and goods which we furnish will be used most effectively for European recovery.

Third, the program is designed to minimize the financial cost to the United States, but at the same time to avoid imposing on the European countries crushing financial burdens which they could not carry in the long run.

Fourth, the program is designed with due regard for conserving the physical resources of the United States and minimizing the impact on our economy of furnishing aid to Europe.

Fifth, the program is designed to be consistent with other international relationships and responsibilities of the United States.

Sixth, the administration of the program is designed to carry out wisely and efficiently this great enterprise of our foreign policy.

I shall discuss each of these basic considerations in turn.

RECOVERY—NOT RELIEF

The program is designed to assist the participating European countries in obtaining imports essential to genuine economic recovery which they cannot finance from their own resources. It is based on the expectation that with this assistance European recovery can be substantially completed in about four years.

The aid which will be required from the United States for the first fifteen months, from April 1, 1948 to June 30, 1949, is now estimated at $6.8 billion.

These funds represent careful estimates of the cost of the goods and services which will be required during this period to start Europe on the road to genuine economic recovery. The European requirements as they were stated in the Paris report have been closely reviewed and scaled downward, where they appeared to include nonessentials or where limited supplies will prevent their full satisfaction.

The requirements of the remaining three years of the program are more difficult to estimate now, but they are expected to decrease year by year as progress is made toward recovery. Obviously, price changes, weather and crop conditions and other unpredictable factors will influence the overall cost of our aid. Nevertheless, the inherent nature of this enterprise and the long-range planning necessary to put it into effect on both sides of the Atlantic require that this government indicate its plans for the duration and the general magnitude of the program, without committing itself to specific amounts in future years. The best estimates we can now make indicate that appropriations of about $10.2 billion will be required for the last three years.

I recommend that legislation providing for United States aid in support of the European recovery program authorize the appropriation of $17 billion from April 1, 1948, to June 30, 1952. Appropriation for the period from April 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949, should be made in time for the program to be put into effect by April 1, 1948. Appropriations for the latter years should be considered subsequently by the Congress on an annual basis.

The funds we make available will enable the countries of Europe to purchase goods which will achieve two purposes—to lift the standard of living in Europe closer to a decent level, and at the same time to enlarge European capacity for production. Our funds will enable them to import grain for current consumption, and fertilizer and agricultural machinery to increase their food production. They will import fuel for current use, and mining machinery to increase their coal output. In addition, they will obtain raw materials, such as cotton, for current production, and some manufacturing and transportation equipment to increase their productive capacity.

The industrial goods we supply will be primarily to relieve critical shortages at a few strategic points which are now curtailing the great productive powers of Europe's industrial system.

The fundamental objective of further United States aid to European countries is to help them achieve economic self-support and to contribute their full share to a peaceful and prosperous world. Our aid must be adequate to this end. If we provide only half-heartedly and half-way help, our efforts will be dissipated and the chances for political economic stability in Europe are likely to be lost.

INSURING PROPER USE OF UNITED STATES AID

A second basic consideration with regard to this program is the means by which we can insure that our aid will be used to achieve its real purposes—that our goods and our dollars will contribute most effectively to European recovery. Appropriate agreements among the participating countries and with the United States are essential to this end.

At the Paris conference the European nations pledged themselves to take specific individual and co-operative actions to accomplish genuine recovery. While modification or amplification of these pledges may prove desirable, mutual understandings of this nature are essential. They will give unity of purpose and effective coordination to the endeavors of the peoples of the sixteen nations.

In addition, each of the countries receiving aid will be expected to enter into an agreement with the United States affirming the pledges which it has given to the other participating countries, and making additional commitments.

Under these agreements, each country would pledge itself to take the following actions, except where they are inapplicable to the country concerned:

(1) To promote increased industrial and agricultural production in order to enable the participating country to become independent of abnormal outside economic assistance.

(2) To take financial and monetary measures necessary to stabilize its currency, establish or maintain a proper rate of exchange, and generally to restore or maintain confidence in its monetary system.

(3) To co-operate with other participating countries to reduce barriers to trade among themselves and with other countries and to stimulate an increasing interchange of goods and services.

(4) To make efficient use, within the framework of a joint program for European recovery, of the resources of the participating country, and to take the necessary steps to assure efficient use in the interest of European economic recovery of all goods and services made available through United States aid.

(5) To stimulate the production of specified raw materials, as may be mutually agreed upon, and to facilitate the procurement of such raw materials by the United States for stockpiling purposes from the excess above the reasonable domestic usage and commercial port requirements of the source country.

(6) To deposit in a special account the local currency equivalent of aid furnished in the form of grants, to be used only in a manner mutually agreed between the two governments.

(7) To publish domestically and to furnish to the United States appropriate information concerning the use made of our aid and the progress made under the agreements with other participating countries and with the United States.

The United States will, of course, retain the right to determine whether aid to any country is to be continued if our previous assistance has not been used effectively.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

A third basic consideration in formulating the program of United States aid relates to the financial arrangements under which our aid is to be provided.

One of the problems in achieving the greatest benefit from United States aid is the extent to which funds should be made available in the form of grants as contrasted with loans. It is clear that we should require repayment to the extent that it is feasible and consistent with the objectives of the program, in order that no unnecessary burden be imposed upon the people of the United States.

It is equally clear that we should not require repayment where it would impose paralyzing financial obligations on the people of Europe and thus defeat the basic purpose of making Europe self-supporting.

Recovery for Europe will not be achieved until its people are able to pay for their necessary imports with foreign exchange obtained through the export of goods and services. If they were to have additional burdens to bear in the form of interest and amortization payments in future years, they would have to plan for an even higher level of exports to meet these obligations. This would necessarily increase the requirements of the recovery program, and delay the achievement of economic stability.

It is also important that an increasing portion of the financial needs of Europe be met by dollar loans from the International Bank and by the revival of private financing. This prospect would be seriously jeopardized if the United States, as part of the recovery program, were to impose all that the traffic will bear in the form of debt obligations.

I recommend that our aid should be extended partly in the form of grants and partly in the form of loans, depending primarily upon the capacity of each country to make repayments, and the effect of additional international debt upon the accomplishment of genuine recovery. No grants should be made to countries able to pay cash for all imports or to repay loans.

At a later date it may prove desirable to make available to some of the European countries special loans to assist them in attaining monetary stability. I am not now requesting authorization for such loans, since it is not possible at this time to determine when or to what extent such loans should be made.

As economic conditions in Europe improve and political conditions become more stable, private financing can be expected to play an increasingly important role. The recommended program of United States aid includes provisions to encourage private financing and investments.

IMPACT ON THE UNITED STATES ECONOMY

A fourth basic consideration is the effect of further aid for Europe upon the physical resources of the United States and upon our economy.

The essential import requirements of the 270 million people of western Europe cover a wide range of products. Many of these requirements can be met by the United States and other countries without substantial difficulty. However, a number of the commodities which are most essential to European recovery are the same commodities for which there is an unsatisfied demand in the United States.

Sharing these commodities with the people of Europe will require some self-denial by the people of the United States. I believe that our people recognize the vital importance of our aid program and are prepared to share their goods to insure its success.

While the burden of our people should not be ignored or minimized, neither should it be exaggerated. The program of aid to Europe which I am recommending is well within our capacity to undertake.

Its total cost, though large, will be only about 5 per cent of the cost of our effort in the recent war. It will cost less than 3 per cent of our national income during the life of the program.

As an investment toward the peace and security of the world and toward the realization of hope and confidence in a better way of life for the future, this cost is small, indeed.

A committee under the chairmanship of the Secretary of the Interior was appointed last summer to study the effect of a foreign-aid program upon the natural resources of our country. Its study has shown that our resources can safely meet the demands of a program such as I am now recommending. Such demands could not, however, be supplied indefinitely. Our program of aid to Europe recognizes this fact.

Our exports to Europe will decrease during the succeeding years of the program as trade is revived along realistic patterns which will make available from other sources an increasing share of Europe's requirements.

Actually, our position with respect to some raw materials of which we have inadequate domestic resources will be improved, since, under our program of aid to Europe, an increased amount of these materials will be made available to us.

During recent months the Council of Economic Advisers made an intensive study of the impact of foreign aid on our domestic economy.

The council concluded that a program of the size now contemplated is well within our productive capacity and need not produce a dangerous strain on our economy.

At the same time, a group of distinguished private citizens under the chairmanship of the Secretary of Commerce considered the extent and nature of foreign aid which the United States can and should provide. The conclusion of this group was that a program of the scope I am recommending is a proper, wise and necessary use of United States resources.

The reports submitted to me by the Council of Economic Advisers and the committees under the chairmanship of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce all emphasized that specific measures should be taken to prevent our foreign aid program from imposing unnecessary burdens on our economy.

If the United States were to supply from its own production all the essential commodities needed to meet European requirements, unnecessary scarcities and unnecessary inflationary pressures would be created within our economy. It is far wiser to assist in financing the procurement of certain of these commodities from other countries, particularly the other food-producing countries in the Western Hemisphere. The funds we make available to aid European recovery therefore should not be restricted to purchases within the United States.

Under the proposed program of aid to Europe, the total exports to the whole world from this country during the next year are expected to be no greater than our total exports during the past twelve months.

This level of exports will nevertheless have an important impact on our markets. The measures I have already proposed to the Congress to fight general domestic inflation will be useful, as well, in cushioning the impact of the European aid program.

The effect of aid to Europe upon our economy, as well as its financial cost, will be significantly affected by the arrangements we make for meeting shipping requirements.

The interest of the United States will be served best by permitting the sale or temporary transfer of some of our warbuilt merchant ships to the European countries. Because of world steel shortages, the sale or temporary transfer of ships should be linked with a reduction or deferment of the projected shipbuilding schedules of the participating countries. These arrangements should be consistent with their long-range merchant marine requirements. They should also be consistent with our long-range objectives of maintaining an adequate merchant marine and shipbuilding industry for the United States.

Making these vessels available to the European countries will materially reduce the cost of United States aid both by lowering shipping costs and by reducing the use of scarce materials for new ship construction overseas.

RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS

A fifth basic consideration is the relationship of our aid to the European recovery program to other international questions.

I have already mentioned that the requirements and resources of western Germany were included in the considerations of the sixteen countries at Paris. Our program of United States aid also includes western Germany.

The productive capacity of the highly industrialized areas of western Germany can contribute substantially to the general co-operative effort required for European recovery. It is essential that this productive capacity be effectively utilized, and it is especially important that the coal production of the Ruhr continue to increase rapidly.

Every precaution must, of course, be taken against a resurgence of military power in Germany. The United States has made clear on many occasions its determination that Germany shall never again threaten to dominate Europe or endanger the peace of the world. The inclusion of western Germany in the European recovery program will not weaken this determination.

As an occupying power in western Germany, the United States has a responsibility to provide minimum essentials necessary to prevent disease and unrest. Separate appropriations will be requested for this purpose for the period through June 30, 1949.

Above this minimum level, amounts needed to assist in the rehabilitation of western Germany are included in the overall estimates for aid to European recovery.

Another significant area of the world which has been considered in developing the recovery program is eastern Europe. A number of the governments of eastern Europe which were invited to participate in the work of the Paris conference on economic co-operation chose not to do so. Their failure to join in the concerted effort for recovery makes this effort more difficult and will undoubtedly prolong their own economic difficulties.

This should not, however, prevent the restoration of trade between eastern and western Europe to the mutual advantage of both areas. Both the report of the sixteen nations and the program now submitted to the Congress are based on the belief that over the next few years the normal pattern of trade between eastern and western Europe will be gradually restored. As the restoration of trade is achieved, the abnormal demands on the Western Hemisphere, particularly for food and fuel, should diminish.

The relationship between this program and the United Nations deserves special emphasis because of the central importance in our foreign policy of support of the United Nations. Our support of European recovery is in full accord with our support of the United Nations.

The success of the United Nations depends upon the independent strength of its members and their determination and ability to adhere to the ideals and principles embodied in the Charter. The purposes of the European recovery program are in complete harmony with the purposes of the Charter—to insure a peaceful world through the joint efforts of free nations. Attempts by any nation to prevent or sabotage European recovery for selfish ends are clearly contrary to these purposes.

It is not feasible to carry out the recovery program exclusively through the United Nations. Five of the participating countries are not yet members of the United Nations. Furthermore, some European members are not participating in the program.

We expect, however, that the greatest practicable use will be made of the facilities of the United Nations and its related agencies in the execution of the program. This view is shared by all the participating countries.

Our intention to undertake a program of aid for European recovery does not signify any lessening of our interest in other areas of the world. Instead, it is the means by which we can make the quickest and most effective contribution to the general improvement of economic conditions throughout the world. The workshops of Europe, with their great reservoir of skilled workers, must produce the goods to support peoples of many other nations.

I wish to make especially clear that our concentration on the task in western Europe at this time will not lessen our long-established interest in economic co-operation with our neighbors in the Western Hemisphere. We are first of all a member of an American community of nations, in which co-operative action, similar to that which the European nations are now undertaking, is required to increase production, to promote financial stability, and to remove barriers to trade.

Fortunately, we in the Americas are further advanced along this road, but we must not overlook any opportunity to make additional progress. The European recovery program will require procurement of supplies in many nations of this hemisphere. This will act as a stimulant to production and business activity and promote the reestablishment of world trade upon which the prosperity of all of us depends.

While our present efforts must be devoted primarily to western Europe, as the most important area in the world at this time for the future of peace, we also have a special concern for the war-torn areas of Asia. In Japan and Korea, the United States has supplied extensive aid to support life and commence reconstruction. Since the war's end, we have provided China with varied and important assistance which has aided that nation substantially.

The United States should continue to do all it appropriately can to assist in the restoration of economic stability as a basis for recovery in the Far East. Extensive study has been given during the last few months to the means by which we might best aid in meeting the special needs for relief and rehabilitation in China. I expect to make recommendations on that subject to the Congress during its next session.

ADMINISTRATIVE ARRANGEMENTS

I have set forth several basic considerations which should govern our aid to the recovery of Europe. One further consideration which vitally affects all the others is the necessity for effective administrative arrangements adapted to the particular requirements of the program. If the work to be done is not well organized and managed, the benefits of our aid could be largely dissipated.

The administration of our aid will involve the performance of several major functions. The needs of the participating countries must be reviewed in close co-operation with them. Continued relationships must be maintained with the United Nations and with an organization of the participating nations.

The requirements for each commodity or service under the program must be carefully evaluated in relation to United States supplies and domestic needs and to the resources of other nations which can help. Decisions must be reached as to the best means of supplying aid and the conditions of aid for each country. Assistance must be given to facilitate the procurement, transportation and efficient use of goods. A constant review must be maintained over the use of our aid and the execution of agreements. The results of the program must be evaluated and reported to all concerned—the President, the Congress and the people.

While these activities are complex, they are not comparable in magnitude or in character to our war-time supply activities. Under this program, most of the operations can be carried out through private channels and existing government agencies.

Nevertheless, the scope and importance of the program warrant the creation of a new organization to provide central direction and leadership. I therefore recommend the establishment of a new and separate agency, the Economic Co-operation Administration, for this purpose. It should be headed by an administrator, appointed by the President and directly responsible to him. The administrator should be subject to confirmation by the Senate.

The Economic Co-operation Administration will sponsor the European aid requirements as they are reviewed and adjusted, with other governmental agencies, to form a practical program in the light of available supplies and capacities. The Economic Co-operation Administration will be responsible for initiating the approved program project by project and nation by nation and for regulations as to supervision, co-operative assistance and other policy matters which will guide the program at every point. In keeping with the importance and nature of its task, the new agency should have flexibility in the determination of operating methods, the use of funds and the hiring of key personnel.

The relationship of the Economic Co-operation Administration to the existing governmental establishment is of crucial importance. In the determination of programs for the several countries, the assessment of individual projects and many other matters involving our activities abroad, the Economic Co-operation Administration must work closely with the Department of State. Similarly, on many actions affecting our domestic economy, the Administration must work with, rather than supplant, existing agencies.

For example, the Department of Agriculture should be relied upon for any required government action in the procurement and allocation of certain other commodities in short supply, and for continued administration of export controls. The facilities of these agencies will in some cases need to be strengthened, but no major changes in governmental organization to perform important domestic functions will be required.

Under these circumstances, I expect that the Economic Co-operation Administration will need only a small staff. No vast new agency or corporation is needed to perform functions for which government facilities now exist.

It is essential to realize that this program is much more than a commercial operation. It represents a major segment of our foreign policy. Day in and day out its operations will affect and be affected by foreign policy judgments. We shall be dealing with a number of countries in which there are complex and widely varying economic and political situations. This program will affect our relationships with them in matters far beyond the outline of the program itself. Its administration must therefore be fully responsive to our foreign policy. The administrator must be subject to the direction of the Secretary of State on decisions and actions affecting our foreign policy.

The United States activities in Europe under the program will constitute essentially an extension of our present relationships with the participating countries. In order to maintain unity of United States representation abroad, our ambassador in each country must retain responsibility for all matters requiring contracts with the government to which he is accredited, including operations under this program. Some additional personnel technically qualified to perform specialized functions arising out of the program, should be placed in the embassies to represent and carry out the responsibilties of the Economic Co-operation Administration abroad.

In addition, I recommend that provision be made for a special United States representative for the European recovery program. He would represent the United States at any continuing organization of the participating countries, and he would exercise general co-ordination of our operations in Europe under the program. He should be appointed by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate, and have ambassadorial rank. Because of the joint interest of the Secretary of State and the administrator in his activities, the special representative must serve both as the President may direct. The activities of this representative in promoting mutual self-help among the European nations will be of the utmost importance in achieving the success of the European recovery program.

BASIS FOR TRUMAN AID REQUEST

This step-by-step table shows how President Truman arrived at $17,000,000,000 as the estimated United States outlay under the Marshall plan for European recovery. Where two figures are shown, the lower figure represents the cost if prices drop, the higher figure represents the sum if prices hold at about present levels:

1. Deficit of the sixteen European nations and Germany with the entire Western Hemisphere	$19,400,000,000 to $22,100,000,000
2. Add Deficit of combined United States and British occupation zones of Germany in trade with other European countries	+$600,000,000
3. Total cost	$20,000,000,000 to $22,700,000,000
4. Subtract: Financing provided by International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, private loans, unspent credits, aid from other Western Hemisphere countries, etc.	−$4,100,000,000
5. Total needed from United States Treasury	$15,900,000,000 to $18,600,000,000
6. Subtract: Separate appropriation being asked by the Army to combat "disease and unrest" in Germany through June, 1949	−$800,000,000
7. Total needs for Marshall plan	$15,100,000,000 to $17,800,000,000
8. Authorization asked of Congress	$17,000,000,000

The administrative arrangements I have described are in keeping with the character of the job to be done and will provide the most efficient and economical means for its performance.

CONCLUSION

In proposing that the Congress enact a program of aid to Europe, I am proposing that this nation contribute to world peace and to its own security by assisting in the recovery of sixteen countries which, like the United States, are devoted to the preservation of free institutions and enduring peace among nations.

It is my belief that United States support of the European recovery program will enable the free nations of Europe to devote their great energies to the reconstruction of their economies. On this depend the restoration of a decent standard of living for their peoples, the development of a sound world economy, and continued support for the ideals of individual liberty and justice.

In providing aid to Europe we must share more than goods and funds. We must give our moral support to those nations in their struggle to rekindle the fires of hope and strengthen the will of their peoples to overcome their adversities. We must develop a feeling of teamwork in our common cause of combating the suspicions, prejudices and fabrications which undermine co-operative effort, both at home and abroad.

This joint undertaking of the United States and a group of European nations, in devotion to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, is proof that free men can effectively join together to defend their free institutions against totalitarian pressures, and to promote better standards of life for all their peoples.

I have been heartened by the widespread support which the citizens of the United States have given to the concept underlying the proposed aid to European recovery. Workers, farmers, business men and other major groups have all given evidence of their confidence in its noble purpose and have shown their willingness to give it full support.

I know that the members of Congress have already given much thoughtful consideration to the grave issues now before us. I know what the Congress will, as it should, consider with great care the legislation necessary to put the program into effect. This consideration should proceed as rapidly as possible in order that the program may become effective by April 1, 1948. It is for this reason that I am presenting my recommendations to the Congress now, rather than awaiting its reconvening in January.

I recommend this program of United States support for European recovery to the Congress in full confidence of its wisdom and necessity as a major step in our nation's quest for a just and lasting peace.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

The White House, Dec. 19, 1947.

XXI

A Constitution for World Trade

Summary of the Geneva draft of a charter for an International Trade Organization

THE countries of the United Nations will meet in a conference on World Trade and Employment at Habana, Cuba, on November 21, 1947, to perfect and recommend to their governments a charter for an International Trade Organization. On this occasion the Economic and Social Council will submit to the Conference for its consideration the draft of a charter completed at Geneva in August by a Preparatory Committee of 17 countries. The results of the Geneva meeting, which include the signing of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, are of historic significance. They represent the greatest step ever taken toward the establishment, by mutual agreement between governments, of the rules which nations will follow in their conduct of world trade and commerce. The essentials of the Geneva draft charter are here summarized to acquaint the American people with this project which was originally proposed by the United States in December 1945.

1. TARIFFS AND PREFERENCES

Members of the ITO must carry out negotiations directed toward the substantial reduction of tariffs. But if, through unforeseen developments, a particular reduction should increase imports so sharply as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers, a member may suspend its operation in whole or in part.

Reductions in tariffs will operate to reduce or eliminate margins of preference. Aside from the preferences that may survive negotiation, each member must grant every other member equal treatment for its trade. No new preferences can be created. No existing preferences can be increased. An exception is made, however, for new preferential arrangements which are incidental to the establishment of a customs union.

2. INVISIBLE TARIFFS

Members must not nullify tariff cuts by employing restrictive methods of customs administration, by imposing discriminatory internal taxes or regulations, or by resorting to other hidden forms of protection. In the case of motion pictures the only restriction allowed is a requirement that a certain fraction of screen time must be devoted to the exhibition of domestic films. Such quotas are made negotiable and may thus be reduced through international agreement. Remaining screen time may not be allocated among foreign films but must be kept open to free competition.

3. QUOTA SYSTEMS

As a general rule quantitative limitations on exports and imports are forbidden. But this rule is qualified by a number of necessary exceptions. Quotas may be used until 1951 in distributing products in short supply, in maintaining price controls, and in liquidating government surpluses and war industries. They may be used temporarily to relieve critical shortages of foodstuffs and other essential goods. They may be used permanently to enforce standards for the classification and grading of commodities. Import quotas on agricultural and fisheries products may also be employed to supplement domestic production and marketing controls and surplus disposal programs if such quotas do not reduce the share of imports in the domestic market.

More important is a final exception which permits a member to employ import quotas to the extent necessary to forestall the imminent threat of, or to stop, a serious decline in its monetary reserves or, in the case of a member with very low monetary reserves, to achieve a reasonable rate of increase in its reserves. Under this provision a member can select imports on the ground of essentiality. But it cannot completely exclude any class of goods. It must avoid unnecessary damage to the interests of other members. It must seek to restore equilibrium in its balance of payments on a sound and lasting basis and to assure an economic employment of productive resources. It must consult with the ITO concerning the effect of its restrictions on other countries, the causes of its monetary difficulties, and the ways in which they may be overcome. It must relax its quotas as its monetary position improves and eliminate them entirely when its difficulties disappear.

Any member may complain that another has failed to satisfy these conditions. If the ITO finds that the complaint is justified, it must recommend that the restrictions in question be withdrawn or modified. If the offending member does not comply with its recommendation, the ITO may then authorize other members to impose higher tariffs, quotas, or other restrictions on its trade. In all of its decisions in such cases the ITO must accept as conclusive the determinations of the International Monetary Fund as to the financial questions that are involved.

Where quotas are permitted they must be administered without discrimination. But there are also necessary exceptions to this rule. In the main these exceptions are designed to make the provisions of the charter consistent with the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. The most important of them permits a member to discriminate in using quotas if it can thereby increase its total imports and safeguard its monetary reserves. But, in doing so, the member must satisfy strict criteria and, after March 1952, it must also obtain the prior approval of the ITO. The ITO may, at any time, order a member to discontinue discriminations that are inconsistent with these provisions and, whenever it finds that there is no longer a wide-spread disequilibrium in international trade, may completely suspend the operation of this exception to the general rule.

4. EXCHANGE CONTROLS

Since quantitative restrictions and exchange controls may be employed alternatively to affect the flow of trade, it is important that the rules that govern these two devices be laid down and administered with such consistency that it will be impossible, by resorting to one of them, to escape from the rules that govern the other. Accordingly, the charter provides that members shall not, by exchange action, frustrate the intent of the charter nor, by trade action, the intent of the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund. Members of the ITO who do not belong to the fund are required to join it or, failing this, to enter into a special exchange agreement with the ITO. Any such agreement would be established and administered in collaboration with the Fund.

5. STATE TRADING

The rules that regulate state trading enterprises parallel those that govern public control of private trade. A member maintaining a state monopoly must declare the margin that it will add when it sells an imported product in its domestic market. It must negotiate with respect to the height of this margin in the same way in which members negotiate with respect to tariffs. It must satisfy the full domestic demand at the resulting price, imposing no other limit on the quantity it buys. It must act in a manner that is consistent with the general principle of most-favored-nation treatment, buying and selling on the basis of commercial considerations and affording the enterprises of other members adequate opportunity, in accordance with customary business practice, to compete for participation in its purchases and sales.

6. SUBSIDIES

If a member pays any subsidy that increases exports or reduces imports, it must inform the ITO and must be prepared to discuss the possibility of limiting the subsidy at the request of any member who may be harmed. Direct subsidization of exports is forbidden, after two years, unless it is incidental to a stabilization plan that maintains domestic prices at a level that is sometimes above and sometimes below the level of prices in world markets, or unless it is permitted under an intergovernmental commodity agreement, or unless it is authorized by the ITO.

7. RESTRICTIVE BUSINESS PRACTICES

Every member agrees to take all possible measures, by legislation or otherwise, to ensure, within its jurisdiction, that commercial enterprises, whether private or public, do not engage in practices which restrain competition, limit access to markets, or foster monopolistic control in international trade, whenever such practices interfere with the expansion of production or trade or the achievement of any other objective of the charter. Upon complaint by a member the ITO will make an investigation, hold hearings, and, if it finds that the practices in question have such an effect, will request the members concerned to take every possible remedial action and may recommend remedial measures to be carried out in accordance with their respective laws and procedures.

8. COMMODITY AGREEMENTS

Members agree substantially to limit their present freedom to enter into intergovernmental commodity agreements. Such agreements will be confined, in general, to primary commodities. They must be open to participation on equal terms by any member of the ITO. And they must be accompanied at every stage by full publicity. Agreements which regulate production, exports, imports, or prices are confined, moreover, to commodities produced under strictly specified conditions and to periods of burdensome surplus and wide-spread distress. They must be limited in duration and subject to periodic review. They must afford consuming countries and producing countries an equal voice. They must assure the availability of adequate supplies. They must provide increasing opportunities for satisfying world requirements from economic sources. And each country participating in such an agreement must adopt a program of economic adjustment designed to make a continuation of the agreement unnecessary. These rules do not prohibit commodity agreements; they do not promote them. They are designed to safeguard the interests of consumers, to force adjustment to changing conditions, and to facilitate the early restoration of free markets.

9. EMPLOYMENT

Each member agrees to take action designed to achieve and maintain full and productive employment and large and steadily growing demand within its own territory through measures appropriate to its political, economic, and social institutions. The nature of the action to be taken by any member is for it alone to choose. No member is asked to guarantee that its efforts will succeed; the commitment is simply that such efforts will be made. This commitment was taken by the Congress of the United States when it passed the Employment Act of 1946. And full employment, as the term is used in the charter, is defined in the words of that law.

Certain countries have been reluctant to enter into a freer trading system because they fear that such a system would make it more difficult for them to maintain their domestic employment programs. This might happen, for instance, if there were a persistent maladjustment in which one or more countries bought too little abroad and invested too little abroad in relation to their exports while others produced and sold too little abroad to balance their accounts. In such a situation the charter provides that all of the members concerned shall take action designed to correct the maladjustment. But the particular measures that are to be adopted by any member are for it alone to decide.

Adherence to liberal commercial policies would also be rendered difficult if a major trading country were to fall into a depression which would involve a serious or abrupt decline in its demand for imported goods. In this case, as in others, a member may ask to be relieved of certain obligations that it has assumed under the charter on the ground that the benefits accruing to it have been nullified or impaired. And the ITO, in considering this complaint, is directed to have regard to the need of members to take action to safeguard their economies against deflationary pressure.

10. ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Each member agrees to develop the resources of its own territory, to raise standards of productivity, and to cooperate with others, through international agencies, in promoting general economic development. Members exporting facilities required for development agree to impose no unreasonable impediments to their exportation, and members importing them agree to take no unreasonable action injurious to the interests of those who provide them. Upon request the ITO may advise any member concerning its plans and programs for development and aid the member in obtaining technical advice and assistance.

Each of the less developed countries will make its own decisions as to the industries it wishes to promote. Where public assistance is required, it will be free to subsidize new industries. And where it has not included a commodity in a trade agreement, it will be free to impose new tariffs or raise existing ones. But in those cases in which a member desires to use some method of protection that it has promised not to use, that is, where it wishes to impose an import quota or to change the tariff status of a commodity to which the provisions of a trade agreement may apply, it must first obtain the permission of the ITO. In such cases ITO will consult with those members whose trade would be affected and, with their agreement, may grant the developing country a limited release from the obligations that it had previously assumed. The charter thus establishes a new principle in international affairs: that import quotas are not to be employed, without international sanction, for the development of infant industries.

11. INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT

The ITO has, among its purposes, encouragement of the international flow of capital for productive investment, and it is authorized to promote the elaboration and adoption of a general agreement or statement of principles as to the conduct, practices, and treatment of foreign investment. Members agree, subject to certain safeguards, to provide the widest opportunities for investment and the greatest security for existing and future investments. A member may exclude new investments from any or all sources. It may continue discriminatory measures already in effect. But in adopting future measures, it must treat one member as well as it treats another and foreign investors as well as it treats its own. It must not so change its rules as to discriminate against any investment once the investment has been made. If a member requires a transfer of ownership from foreign nationals to its own nationals, it must provide for the payment of just consideration. If it takes into public ownership the property of a foreign national, it must make just compensation. More definite provisions on the adequacy, promptness, and transferability of payment should be included in the future investment code. The present draft is to be regarded not as the final expression of international agreement on the treatment of private investment but as a foundation on which such agreement can be built.

12. STRUCTURE OF THE ITO

The ITO will have, as the basis of its organization, a conference of member states. Continuing administration of its affairs will be in the hands of an executive board of 15 to 18 members, a director general, and a staff. Certain functions will be delegated to a tariff committee, composed of member states who have already carried out negotiations for the reduction of barriers to trade, and to a small number of specialized commissions composed of technical experts. In financing the operation of the agency, no member can be required to contribute more than a third of the total cost.

The method of voting in the conference remains to be determined. The present draft of the charter presents four alternatives: unit voting, light-weighted voting, heavy-weighted voting, and a compromise proposal under which decisions on certain issues would require majorities in both a unit vote and a weighted vote. The composition of the executive board is likewise unsettled. But any one of the alternatives presented in the present draft would assure a permanent seat to the United States.

13. FUNCTIONS OF THE ITO

It will be the function of the ITO, through consultation among its members, to carry out the substantive provisions of the charter. In addition to this the agency will serve as an international center for information on matters affecting trade and as a source of advice and assistance to member governments. It will undertake to improve trade statistics. It will collect, analyze and publish data on exports, imports, balances of payments, prices, subsidies, customs regulations, and national commercial policies; on treaties and other agreements affecting trade; on conventions, laws, and procedures relating to restrictive business practices; on commodity problems and the operation of commodity agreements. It will develop and recommend standards for the grading of commodities, for commercial terms, for documentation, for tariff valuation, and for the simplification of procedures that act as obstacles to trade. It may draft modern international conventions and standard provisions for commercial treaties and recommend the conclusion of new agreements or the modification or termination of old agreements on commercial policy, restrictive business practices, commodities, economic development, and international investment.

14. DISPUTES AND ENFORCEMENT

The executive board of the ITO will interpret the provisions of the charter, handing down rulings in the case of a dispute or, with the consent of the parties concerned, referring it to arbitration upon such terms as may be agreed. Members may appeal the rulings of the board to the conference and, on legal questions, may require the conference to request an advisory opinion from the International Court of Justice.

If the ITO determines, upon complaint, that a member has not lived up to its obligations under the charter, it may release the complaining member or members from corresponding obligations so that the balance of interest between the parties to the dispute may be restored. The offending member may thus be faced with higher tariffs, quotas, or other restrictions on its trade. This prospective loss of benefits should serve as a powerful deterrent to noncompliance. But the ITO will have the power to place such limits on retaliation that it cannot degenerate into economic war.

15. RELATIONS WITH NONMEMBERS

The rules that are to govern the relations between members and nonmembers of the ITO are still to be determined. The present draft contains three alternatives. The first of these permits a member having heavy trade with nonmembers to suspend the application of any provision of the charter, requires it thereupon to afford other members an opportunity for consultation, and permits it, in the absence of agreement, to withdraw from the Organization. The other two alternatives forbid members to extend to nonmembers the benefits provided under the charter, unless specifically permitted to do so by the ITO. It is the purpose of the latter provisions to make membership attractive and nonmembership unattractive by confining the benefits of the charter to countries that are willing to accept its obligations.

The broad promise of this charter for our times is clear. We need no longer accept the choice of economic anarchy, on the one hand, or the creation, on the other hand, of a super state to enforce the directives of "economic planning" on a world scale. The 17 countries which met at Geneva conduct three quarters of the world's trade; they have outlined and reached general agreement on a concrete and realistic alternative; and they have done this by the democratic method of free discussion and mutual consideration of common problems. At the Habana conference, their conclusions will be put before a wider international forum to perfect an instrument which all peace-loving nations can in due course adopt as their constitution for world trade.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

JAMES P. WARBURG entered public life in 1933 as a member of President Roosevelt's "Original Brain Trust" and as Financial Adviser of the United States Delegation to the world Economic Conference at London. After graduating from Harvard, he served in World War I as a lieutenant (j.g.) in the U. S. Naval Flying Corps and then engaged in banking—in Washington and Boston banks—and, finally, became Vice Chairman of the Bank of the Manhattan Company. President Roosevelt drew on this financial experience when he made Mr. Warburg one of his unofficial advisers.

During World War II Mr. Warburg was a deputy director of O. W. I., in charge of psychological warfare policy in the European Theater. Since then he has traveled, as newspaper correspondent and free lance writer, through western and central Europe, on both sides of the "iron curtain," and in all zones of occupied Germany. In 1947 he was United States delegate at the Far East Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mr. Warburg's home is in New York. Put Yourself in Marshall's Place is his fifteenth book. Except for three books of verse, his previous work has dealt with economic and foreign affairs.

Put Yourself in Marshall's Place

by JAMES P. WARBURG

THIS BOOK presents the problems General Marshall inherited when he became Secretary of State, what he has done about them in his first year in office, and what he is trying to do now. It enables the reader to share his burden, to help him find the difficult road to peace. Thus it becomes a primer for American citizens on the world crisis, and provides a constructive suggestion for a new approach. It gives the average puzzled citizen a telescoped factual background to the over-all international situation, especially with respect to US-USSR relations. It re-examines the current fears and prejudices which today influence policy directly or indirectly. Anyone who reads this book cannot fail to feel a sense of personal responsibility for the decisions which will be made one way or another in the next few months; and a realization that the average citizen is not powerless to do something about these decisions.

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, PUBLISHERS

PRICE: ONE DOLLAR

SIMON AND SCHUSTER, INC.
Publishers
ROCKEFELLER CENTER • 1230 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK 20

R E V I E W C O P Y

PUT YOURSELF IN MARSHALL'S PLACE

by

James P. Warburg

For Immediate Release

June 22, 1960

Dear Mr. Welch:

I enclose a copy of Mr. Murrow's reaction to Dr. Adler's request.

Mr. Murrow further states that it "pleasures him greatly" to be asked to join with Mr. Welch in any undertaking, but Mr. Murrow cannot endorse books without being obliged to endorse cigarettes, or drinking liquor, or some other product deleterious to human welfare.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Murrow cherish the hope that they may see Mr. and Mrs. Welch again after Mr. Murrow returns from the political conventions.

As ever yours,

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Massachusetts

FF:gw encl

August 25, 1959

Dear Mr. Welch:

Your very nice note arrived just before Mr. Murrow left for Sweden. He asked me to tell you that he and Mrs. Murrow will be in London about October 1st. They will be staying at the Connaught and hope very much that there will be an opportunity to see you and Mrs. Welch.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Massachusetts

gw

JOSEPH N. WELCH
BOX 215
HARWICHPORT, MASSACHUSETTS

Dear Mr Murrow

Gosh,, how we would have loved seeing you.

We too are about to go abroad for 3 weeks or so. Mr Preminger has invited us to attend premieres of "Anatomy" in Paris, London, West Berlin & perhaps Milan.

London opening is (I think Oct 1,):

Just a faint hope on my part. We might see you

Much luck Joe Welch

Joseph Welch

August 11, 1959

Dear Mr. Welch:

The thought that I shall probably leave this country without seeing you again distresses me. We are sailing on August 25 and I would propose myself for a brief visit to you and Mrs. Welch if that were physically possible, but it isn't. The pressure of last-minute arrangements is, as usual, too great to permit my doing what I would like to do. If the opportunity affords, and I am sure it will, I will send you an occasional epistle during the year. Meanwhile, please accept my affectionate regards.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

Dear Mr Murrow

There is no nicer pair of words than "my friend" especially when used by you in speaking of me.

On Tuesday I shall see Miss Renwick and thank her too. She is indeed a sweet and lovely person. and with great talent as well.

You are much in my thoughts as you begin the rest of your 2 here long wished you might have. I can even remember saying you should do it and discounting your answer that you really might

You have a truly great place in the world. And you have very great responsibilities. a pause and a gathering of strength is surely indicated

My only fear is that you will make too many compromises and end by doing too much work

I hope not

Sincerely
Joe Welch

Welch

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300
CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
JOSEPH N. WELCH
VIRGIL C. BRINK
DANIEL L. BROWN
GRAFTON L. WILSON

ANTHONY BRAYTON
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN

JOHN CHRISTOFORO
JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER

LUCIUS E. THAYER
DAVID BURSTEIN
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD
C. KEEFE HURLEY
JOHN T. POWELL
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS

JOHN A. DOLAN
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS, JR.
EARLE C. COOLEY

SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN
RICHARD G. DORR
GEORGE H. FOLEY
FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.

JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN KIMBALL, JR.

BLAIR L. PERRY
JEFFREY O'CONNELL

JOHN M. MAGUIRE, COUNSEL

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

June 25, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS-TV
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Yesterday I sent to you a copy of a Federal Court Opinion concerning Mr. St. Clair of this office. This was an error on my part. Mr. Welch asked me on the telephone to send the Opinion to Mr. Murrow. He was referring to another gentleman by the same name in Boston. But to my mind you are "Mr. Murrow" and the other person did not enter my mind at any moment, - even while typing the note to you enclosing the Opinion.

Therefore, if it is not too troublesome, will you please return the Opinion to me? And I regret any confusion I may have caused you.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Gertrude E. Casale

(Mrs.) Gertrude E. Casale
Secretary to J. N. Welch

JRL A-P 11, — — 4 *

Welch.

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300
CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
JOSEPH N. WELCH
VIRGIL C. BRINK
DANIEL L. BROWN
GRAFTON L. WILSON

ANTHONY BRAYTON
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN

JOHN CHRISTOFORO
JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER

LUCIUS E. THAYER
DAVID BURSTEIN
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD
C. KEEFE HURLEY
JOHN T. POWELL
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS

JOHN A. DOLAN
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS, JR.
EARLE C. COOLEY

SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN
RICHARD G. DORR
GEORGE H. FOLEY
FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.

JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN KIMBALL, JR.

BLAIR L. PERRY
JEFFREY O'CONNELL

JOHN M. MAGUIRE, COUNSEL

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

June 24, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Mr. Welch wanted me to send this to you. *

Sincerely,

Gertrude E. Casale

(Mrs.) Gertrude E. Casale
Secretary to Joseph N. Welch

119 Fed. Sup. 242.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS

CIVIL ACTION NO. 51-1250

CAPE COD FOOD PRODUCTS, INC.

v.

NATIONAL CRANBERRY ASSOCIATION, et als

OPINION

March 1, 1954

WYZANSKI, J.

The Jury having rendered a verdict for Plaintiff in the sum of $175,000 single damages, on a complaint alleging violation of Section 2 of The Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C. Sec. 2, Plaintiff's counsel moves for the assessment of a reasonable attorney's fee pursuant to 15 U.S.C. Sec. 15.

The evidence before me bearing upon an attorney's fee is as follows. This is a private anti-trust suit which was not preceded by a public or even another private suit in the same industry. Plaintiff's Chief Counsel, James D. Saint Clair, Esq., in his thoroughness of preparation, economy of effort, choice of emphasis, quality of examination and cross-examination, presentation of argument, analysis of the law, courtesy to parties, witnesses, opposing counsel, and the Court, and that indefinable distinction which breathes excellence, can stand comparison with any lawyer who has appeared before me in the last dozen years. The success that he achieved, while founded on the merit of Plaintiff's case, was by no means inevitable. In hands less gifted and with a lawyer less persuasive to a Jury, Plaintiff's cause might well have gone a-gley. Here as in earlier cases, Plaintiff's counsel has shown that despite his relative youth and his short career at the Bar, he is quite capable of holding his own against the most experienced advocates of our profession. With becoming deference to his seniors, but with unflinching courage in examining witnesses, in meeting opposing arguments, and in resisting what he regarded as unsound rulings from the Bench, Plaintiff's counsel set a model not likely to be surpassed.

In a statement filed with the Court, Plaintiff's counsel says that he and other senior partners of his firm devoted three hundred sixty-six hours to the preparation of this case, and their associates devoted two hundred thirty-one hours to this case.

In assaying the foregoing evidence, I have in mind principles laid down in cases directly in point, and in others that are cognate.

In Anti-Trust cases the fees have often run substantially over one-third of the single damages recovered. STRAUS v. VICTOR TALKING MACHINE CO., 2nd Cir., 297 FED. 791, ($23,894.71 single damages allowed after appeal. Attorney's fees reduced from $35,000. to $30,000;) RANKIN COMPANY v. ASSOCIATED BILL POSTERS OF U.S. etc., 2nd Cir., 42 F. 2d 152 (single damages slightly over $101,000., counsel fees $50,000;) EMICH MOTORS CORP. V. GENERAL MOTORS CORP., 7th Cir., 181 F. 2d, ($412,000. single damages, $250,000. counsel fees;) AMERICAN CAN CO. v. BRUCE'S JOICES, 5th Cir., 190 F. 2d, 73($60,000. single damages, $40,000. counsel fees;) MILWAUKEE TOWNE CORP. v. LOEW'S INC., 7th Cir. 190 F. 2d 73, ($313,858.10 single damages, counsel fees reduced from $225,000. to $75,000;) TWENTIETH CENTURY-FOX FILM CORP. v. BROOKSIDE THEATRE CORP., 8th Cir., 194 F. 2d 846,($375,000. single damages, $100,000. counsel fees.) See Homer Clark, THE TREBLE DAMAGE BONANZA: NEW DOCTRINES OF DAMAGES IN PRIVATE ANTITRUST SUITS, 52 Michigan Law Review, 363, 411-413. In listing the matter which appears in paranthesis this Court has not intended to intimate that the sound method of computing a reasonable fee requires the Court to consider only single damages, rather than treble damages. Ordinarily, of course, in so far as the amount of a party's recovery is one of the factors to be taken into account in establishing a fair fee. Reference is made to the total amount in issue between the parties, or to the total amount recovered by one of them.

Other relevant cases have arisen under the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act. HUTCHINSON v. WILLIAM C. BARRY, INC., D. Mass., 50 F. Supp. 292 (single damages $160.95, counsel fees $100.);

AUCDIN v. MYSTIC WASTE CO., D. Mass. 55 F. Supp. 672, ($1290.17 single damages, counsel fees $300); GILBERT v. THIERRY, D. Mass., 58 F. Supp. 235, (on actual overcharges totalling $45. Counsel fees of $75 allowed); KALWAR v. McKINNON, 1st Cir., 152 F. 2d 263 (on actual overcharges totalling $45 counsel fees of $74 in the District Court and an additional $25 in the Court of Appeals).

Under 35 U.S.C. Sec. 70, authorizing the assessment of counsel fees in patent litigation, awards of $30,000 in the District Court, and an additional $2500 in the Court of Appeals were allowed where, disregarding penalties, normal damages of $113,507.50 were recovered. RUSSELL BOX CO. v. GRANT PAPER BOX CO., 1st Cir., 203 F. 2d 177, affirming GRANT PAPER BOX CO. v. RUSSELL BOX CO., D. Mass., 106 F. Supp. 616.

In an action for the infringment of copyright where Plaintiffs' damages were assessed at $5000, though Defendant realized profits of only $890.16, counsel fees awarded pursuant to 17 U.S.. Sec. 116 were $2000 in the District Court, and an additional $500 in the Court of Appeals. F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. v. CONTEMPORARY ARTS, 1st Cir., 193 F. 2d 162.

Reference was made at the Bar to the fact that under statutes permitting Indians to sue the United States, Congress customarily sets a maximum for attorney's allowances at 10% of the recovery. Such situations, however, reflect peculiar tenderness toward The United States as Defendant, and wards of The United States as Plaintiffs. Moreover these situations indicate that when Congress wished to limit awards mathematically, it knew how to do so. And finally if a 10% figure were to be used it should be applied to the total damages recovered. That is $525,000.

The limitation of $25. an hour which is said to be applied to senior counsel in cases before administrative tribunals like The Securities Exchange Commission and The Interstate Commerce Commission must be read in the light of the regulatory system and the type of public interest there involved.

Likewise, amounts allowed to Trustees, Receivers, Counsel, and Committees in corporate reorganization matters reflect the position of the applicants for fees as court appointees, serving the public interest and often allegedly acting as representatives of persons who will usually be called on to make substantial financial sacrifices as a consequence of the reorganization. See HUTCHINSON v WILLIAM C. BARRY INC., D. Mass., 50 F. Supp. 292, 298; BOYNTON v TARBELL, 272 MASS. 142, 172 N.E. 340.

The analogies cited in the last six paragraphs, while they have some pertinence, almost all require less variety and rarity of skill than the instant case demanded and received. It is doubtful whether any type of legal work requires a higher degree of professional competence and native ability than the presentation to a Jury of complicated economic questions. This is especially true where the parties are not public agencies, but private persons having no unusual investigatory or other aids. Absence of such investigatory assistance is a special handicap where, as here, Plaintiff's counsel did not have the benefit of previous litigation by The United States, resulting in a judgment, which constitutes for injured individuals, prima facie evidence, in accordance with 15 U.S.C. Sec. 16.

In HUTCHINSON, I explained at length what seemed to me the relevant policy considerations which must governawards of counsel fees in this type of case.

My conclusion was that a losing Defendant must pay what it would be reasonable for counsel to charge a victorious Plaintiff. The rate is the free market price, the figure which a willing, successful client would pay a willing, successful lawyer. Sometimes the figure may seem high. But so far as price is determined by unique excellence and by social usefulness, the advocate is especially worthy of large recompense. His brevity may reflect extraordinary gifts and thus in itself be indicative of merit. See WHISTLER v. RUSKIN, cited in PENNELL, THE ART OF WHISTLER, (Modern Library, N. Y. 1928) p. 64. And his simplicity of presentation may be a proof not of the problem's lack of difficulty, but rather of his unmatched native quality. See GIOTTO, (G. VASARI, EMIN-ENT PAINTERS, SCULPTORS, and ARCHITECTS, BLASHFIELD-HOPKINS, Ed., N. Y. 1926 Vol. 1, p. 61).

Unless excellence in the trial lawyer is properly recompensed, the best men will not spend their time in court and thus there will dry up the most essential sources of an independent bar.

Only two countervailing arguments have been advanced (implicitly rather than explicitly, to be sure) by opposing counsel in the case at bar. The first is that the time spent by Plaintiff's counsel in preparation amounted to a total of only 597 hours, and second that Plaintiff's Chief Counsel has been at the bar only slightly less than seven years. But the very economy of counsel's methods and his youth are perhaps the most significant hall marks of an outstanding talent.

I allow, in addition to disbursements of $856.85, a reasonable attorney's fee of $35,000 without prejudice to these being increased by further services in appellate courts.

Welch, Joe N.

May 4, 1959

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Massachusetts

Dear Mr. Welch:

I am most eager to hear all about your experience in the strange world of movies. I will be here until round about the first of July, should you be passing through.

My respects to Mrs. Welch, please.

Sincerely yours,

ERM:skh

JOSEPH N. WELCH
BOX 215
HARWICHPORT, MASSACHUSETTS

Dear Ed Murrow

I just listened to your Thursday evening broadcast. Your reference to Arthur Godfrey seemed to me just right. Agree, in Boston called to say the same thing.

Making a movie is hard work. More accurately helping in a small way to make a movie is hard. But I have heard Agres say "I think it was the most rewarding experience of my life"

Its good to have her feel that way

Regards to Mrs. Murrow and to Casey.

Sincerely
Joe Welch

Welch, J. N.

The Mather Inn

"The Inn of Gracious Hospitality"

PHONE HUdson 6-4466

ISHPEMING, MICHIGAN

April 6, 1959

Dear Ed:

I valued your note of March 20th.

Agnes and I have found this an exciting adventure, as we hoped we would. It is hard work too.

So far we have no regrets. On the contrary, our present judgment is that we are glad we did it.

Sincerely,

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

FACILITIES FOR BANQUETS AND CONVENTIONS, HUNTING, FISHING, SKIING, VACATIONING

Welch, J. N.

March 20, 1959

Dear Mr. Welch:

A brief epistle to say how sorry I am that I missed you when last you were in New York, and to wish you much luck in the new venture.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. J. N. Welch
Hale and Dorr
60 State Street
Boston 9, Massachusetts

ERM:jmi

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
JOSEPH N. WELCH
VIRGIL C. BRINK
DANIEL L. BROWN
GRAFTON L. WILSON

ANTHONY BRAYTON
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN

JOHN CHRISTOFORO
JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER

LUCIUS E. THAYER
DAVID BURSTEIN
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD
C. KEEFE HURLEY
JOHN T. POWELL
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS

JOHN A. DOLAN
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS
EARLE C. COOLEY

SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN
RICHARD G. DORR
GEORGE H. FOLEY
FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.

JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN KIMBALL, JR.

BLAIR L. PERRY
ROBERT L. MEADE
JEFFREY O'CONNELL

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300
CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

JOHN M. MAGUIRE, COUNSEL

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

January 26, 1959.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thanks for yours of January 20th with enclosure.

It was a great delight to Mrs. Welch and me to be a guest in your home. Not the least of our pleasure was in seeing Casey again. We think he has a great way with him. Mrs. Welch has seen your letter, smiled when reading it, and returns your greetings both to you and Mrs. Murrow.

One thing I liked was the red dress. I am a sucker for a red dress.

Sincerely,

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York City 22.

Gosh! Some of my letters get transcribed, sent to Cape and finally signed and mailed in tortoise time. J

Welch, Jos.

January 20, 1959

Dear Mr. Welch:

(1) Mrs. Murrow and I were delighted that you and Mrs. Welch honoured our humble abode by your presence the other evening. I regret that my fatigue was so apparent. That does not often happen.

(2) Having viewed your "memorandum to Mr. Borge" I hasten to send you this small but tangible stipend.

(3) I think the Welch, Birkett, Blum conversation will be what Harry Truman is wont to call "a dinger". I am not sure what the word means, but it is, I am sure, a superlative. Thank you again, and please convey my warmest greetings to Mrs. Welch.

Sincerely yours,

KRM:skh

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

Welch, Joe

December 17, 1958

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

Dear Mr. Welch:

The seventh it is. I trust Mrs. Welch will be with you. Would you prefer to dine with us at home, or shall we go out and mingle with the lower class of people? Is there anyone you would like to see that evening? If so, please command me.

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

JOSEPH N. WELCH
BOX 215
HARWICHPORT, MASSACHUSETTS

Dec 11, 1958

Dear Mr Morrow

answering your flattering question:—

Probably on the evening of Jan 7. I have agreed to do something at a Judge Medina affair on Jan 8 and will probably* come down a day earlier.

Sincerely
Joe Welch

* Snowy roads, perils of air travel ancient joints (my own - not N.Y. joints) general lassitude and cussedness all have a bearing on "probably"
Jr

Welch, Joseph

November 25, 1958

Dear Mr. Welch:

Hereafter, I shall make no effort to compete with you in either intellect or alliteration.

As Mr. Churchill would say: "Pray advise me when your presence may be expected in the city". I hanker to have you spend an evening with us, if you can spare the time.

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

EDWARD R. MURROW
485 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N.Y.

November 18, 1958

Dear Mr. Welch:

Thank you for your note. When may we expect to see you in this city of steam, scurry and scamper again?

As ever yours,

Ed

ERM:skh

In January
JNW

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

Welch, Joseph N.

November 18, 1958

Dear Mr. Welch:

Thank you for your note. When may we expect to see you in this city of steam, scurry and scamper again?

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
Box 215
Harwichport, Mass.

JOSEPH N. WELCH
BOX 215
HARWICHPORT, MASSACHUSETTS

Sent tomorrow

My Secretary has had two hospitalizations & two operations this summer. My correspondence has therefore suffered.

I think your letter of Aug 20 is long since obsolete but it seems not to have been acknowledged for which I now apologize.

I have not seen all your recent programs but have seen some & as you know I'm a sucker for anything you do. This may surprise you but one favorite is the news each night.

This requires no acknowledgment

Sincerely Joe Welch

Conf. W.
Welch, J.N.

July 21, 1958

Mr. J.N. Welch
Hale and Dorr
Counsellors at Law
60 State Street
Boston 9, Mass.

Dear Mr. Welch:

We are back from the West Coast and I am now trying to decide whether to go to the Middle East. Will write again as soon as possible. Meantime, I hope you are having an enjoyable summer.

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

hold

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW
60 STATE STREET
BOSTON 9

TELEPHONE HUbbard 2-3300

June 16, 1958

VEC
note

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Where do you get such language as "Perhaps you will permit me to write you again"?

Actually, I will watch the mail with eagerness in July, hoping that you will write me again.

Sincerely,

J. N. Welch

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

June 12, 1958

Dear Mr. Welch:

Grinnell was hectic but most stimulating. I was much impressed although fear that I failed to impress the students greatly. The language of the citation was gracious and exaggerated.

Your gracious invitation to visit you at Harwichport is most tempting and I trust you will permit me to delay giving you a definite answer. I must go to the West Coast early in July to see my mother briefly and after that I may or may not have to go to Europe. Perhaps you will permit me to write you again about the middle of July.

I am most eager to hear about the TV project.

Sincerely,

Mr. J.N. Welch
Hale and Dorr
Counsellors at Law
60 State Street
Boston 9, Massachusetts

fc

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300
CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
VIRGIL C. BRINK
JOSEPH N. WELCH
DANIEL L. BROWN

ANTHONY BRAYTON
GEORGE H. FOLEY

JOHN KIMBALL, JR.
JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN CHRISTOFORO

GRAFTON L. WILSON
LUCIUS E. THAYER
DAVID BURSTEIN
JOHN T. POWELL
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD

RICHARD G. DORR
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN
JOHN A. DOLAN

JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER
REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS

C. KEEFE HURLEY
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS
SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN

FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

EARLE C. COOLEY
ROBERT L. MEADE
BLAIR L. PERRY

JOHN M. MAGUIRE, COUNSEL

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

May 27, 1958

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Grinnell College paper informs me that you are to take your Honorary Degree at commencement time.

I am confident that I said I would surely be there on that occasion. If I didn't say it to you, I thought it to myself. But Agnes and I are moving to The Cape at just the wrong time for me to be in attendance, and with sadness I am forced to say I shall not be there.

I somewhat suspect that every honorary degree which involves making a speech is truly an earned degree. It follows that I think it is useless to say formally that I hope you have a good time in Grinnell. You will, however, find it a good college with lots of stimulating and interesting people, and as I contemplate signing this letter, I grow more and more sad.

Is there, I wonder, the faintest possibility that you and Mrs. Murrow, and Casey as well, could sometime fly up to Harwichport for a weekend with us? It must be too much to hope for on our part, since I know what your life is like, and what attractive invitations you must constantly have for such limited time as you have for pure fun. But it remains true that we love the place we have on the tight little harbor of Harwichport, and think it a little special. It would indeed be special if it were to be graced by a visit from you and Mrs. Murrow.

In addition, and by way of a teaser, I have a feeble little idea about a television program. But the "out" about that is that it involves

The undersigned,

J. N. Welch

J. N. Welch
(gcc)

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue, New York

Welch, Joseph

TO:

JOSEPH N. WELCH BOX 215 HARWICHPORT MASS.

SUGGEST DINNER INFORMALLY EIGHT THIRTY WEDNESDAY JANUARY 7 AT 580 PARK REGARDS

ED MURROW

514-70

Welch, Joseph

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

TELEPHONE HUbbard 2-3300
CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
VIRGIL C. BRINK
JOSEPH N. WELCH
DANIEL L. BROWN

ANTHONY BRAYTON
GEORGE H. FOLEY

JOHN KIMBALL, JR.
JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN CHRISTOFORO

GRAFTON L. WILSON
LUCIUS E. THAYER
EDWARD J. KEELAN, JR.
DAVID BURSTEIN
JOHN T. POWELL
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD

RICHARD G. DORR
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN

JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

C. KEEFE HURLEY
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS
SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN

JOHN A. DOLAN
FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.

REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

February 7, 1957

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you for your note of sympathy, which came in during my absence.

It will delight me, Sir, to have lunch with you when we can arrange it. There is every indication I will be in New York more or less during the next couple of months, and I shall try to make a date with you.

Sincerely,

Joe

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Welch, Joseph

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW

DUDLEY H. DORR
ROGER D. SWAIM
REGINALD HEBER SMITH
GEORGE W. WIGHTMAN
VIRGIL C. BRINK
JOSEPH N. WELCH
DANIEL L. BROWN

ANTHONY BRAYTON
GEORGE H. FOLEY

JOHN KIMBALL, JR.
JAMES A. BRINK
JOHN CHRISTOFORO

GRAFTON L. WILSON
LUCIUS E. THAYER
EDWARD J. KEELAN, JR.
DAVID BURSTEIN
JOHN T. POWELL
EDMUND BURKE
A. FREDERICK RICHARD

RICHARD G. DORR
CARLTON W. CHAMBERLIN

JOHN E. LAURSEN
NORMAN B. ASHER
JOHN F. COGAN, JR.

C. KEEFE HURLEY
RAYMOND B. ROBERTS
SAMUEL S. DENNIS, 3D
CARL H. AMON, JR.
JAMES D. ST. CLAIR
PAUL F. HELLMUTH
HERBERT W. VAUGHAN

JOHN A. DOLAN
FREDERICK G. FISHER, JR.

REMSEN M. KINNE, III
ROBERT J. RICHARDS

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300

CABLE ADDRESS "HAFIS"

60 STATE STREET, BOSTON 9

January 23, 1957

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Mr. Welch is absent from the office due to the recent passing of Mrs. Welch.

You will, I am sure, hear from him upon his return. I communicated to him the contents of your letter of January 16th.

Sincerely,

Gertrude E. Casale

(Mrs.) Gertrude E. Casale
Secretary to J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Welch, Joe

January 16, 1957

Dear Mr. Welch:

I was deeply grieved to learn upon my return from Burma that Mrs. Welch had died. This is an occasion when people who work with words recognize that they are useless.

I trust that I may have the pleasure of your company at lunch or dinner when next you are in New York.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Joseph N. Welch
60 State Street
Boston, Massachusetts

rh

Sixty State Street

January 9, 1957

Dear Mr. Murrow:

While you might have thought the gift of a ruler quite an ordinary gesture on your part, it seemed to me a very happy one indeed. That, no doubt, was due to the inscription. Thank you, Sir.

With so busy a life as you lead, you may not have learned that Mrs. Welch died just before Christmas. It had been inevitable for many weeks, but I think that did not mitigate the blow.

Sincerely,

Joe Welch

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting Company
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

HALE AND DORR
COUNSELLORS AT LAW
60 STATE STREET
BOSTON 9

TELEPHONE HUBBARD 2-3300

February 21, 1951

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am looking at what Mr. Friendly would call a check for Five Hundred Fish. Thank you, Sir.

I hope to be in New York on February 25th through the morning of February 28th, and that I get to see you or Mr. Friendly, or both, so that each of us can help the other be indignant about what I have recently been reading in the papers.

Sincerely,

Joe

J. N. Welch

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS News
485 Madison Avenue
New York City 22.

5-C-12

June 30, 1955

Enclosed you will find, on several hand-typed, smudge-stained sheets, the correspondence I had with CounterAttack which I promised you the other evening. I assume that if you are able to pursue the matter, you will find the bottom of CBS' involvement and, I am enclosing only my reply over at CBS, you I assume that, January 15, 19 including the last of

Dear Teddy:

I have been beating the bushes and I can't find any affirmative indication as to your being in any sense blacklisted in this shop. I will pursue my inquiries and come the autumn we shall find an opportunity to put this matter to the test in the manner I suggested to you earlier.

As ever yours,

Mr. Theodore H. White
239 Central Park West
New York 24, New York

rh

I want points about the stuff herewith:

a) On now as kind of namby-pamby. I wrote a fight or threaten legal action to know how they operate, possi a story on just what they are was simply attended to set down, their specific charges.

b) Although they replied with rather cold courtesy, they never did send a later explanation as they promised.

c) The reply of a year ago stands today with one slight amendment: On page 3, Item 4, I replied to them that I couldn't remember a specific testimonial luncheon to me by the IPR. [illegible] was quite true. Harry and I have since been [illegible] and I assumed that it is true that in 1946 Ned Carter of the IPR threw a luncheon in my honor. Ned Carter -- may his soul rest in peace -- was a dear old man. I [illegible] enough time to give a luncheon in [illegible] by the way, nor do I think that the IPR was ever taken over by the Communists. [illegible] this out [illegible] yes, I [illegible] luncheon with Ned Carter and so that. They were so many luncheons, speeches, testimonials in the early years [illegible]

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

REPLY TO MY LETTER OF [redacted] 4/29/54
COPY COPY COPY COPY

COUNTERATTACK THE NEWSLETTER OF FACTS TO COMBAT COMMUNISM, 55 WEST 42nd Street, New York 36, New York, Longacre 3-4608

Mr. Theodore H. White,
239 Central Park West,
New York 24, New York.

May 14, 1954

Dear Mr. White:

This is simply to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 29, 1954.

Due to an unusually heavy workload here, I have not had an opportunity to acknowledge your letter before.

Our present rushed condition is due to the departure of Frank McNamara, our editor, to assume the job of National Director of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Un-American Activities Commission. Under the circumstances, I have not had a chance to check the points you raise in detail and compare them with the documentation used in our issue of January 15. We will do so at the very earliest opportunity and I will write you at greater length as soon as possible afterwards.

Cordially Yours,

Arthur E. Cullen,
Vice-President.

****

NOTE: The subsequent letter promised by Cullen was never sent to me and, presumably, never written.

White, Theodore

THEODORE H. WHITE 168 EAST 64 STREET NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

Tuesday. Feb. 17, 1959

Dear Ed:

Have just finished the day's quota of pages and will be strolling home in a few minutes, passing your apartment house, and thought I would drop this note off as I pass.

The day's headlines on Murrow have been moiling around in me as I tried to work and distracting me. And so, though we celebrate our friendship on more substantial things than letters, I thought perhaps I ought to write this note and tell you how much diminished, personally, I feel by your absence from the air for a year.

Not that I think it is a bad thing for you. I think your statement was good; it was solid, and smacks of honesty; and I take it at face-value with all the reasons you gave. It is a wise, a sound thing for you to do at this stage of life. You will come out richer. But I know, having been through this, that after a few weeks or a few months there will be those days of doubt, those days of wondering whether it was or was not the proper thing to do. When you leave an office where you have been happy, you never know until quite a while after how much you miss the companionship and presence of the people you work with day after day. All I want to say is that I live around the corner and there I am; that ever so often I've wanted to call up and say come on over and shoot the breeze; and have known you were so busy that any hour of quiet anybody took from you was an imposition. I suppose you've chosen some private decompression chamber of your own for the next few weeks; but when you come out of it, call me up and let's spend a few hours together and I'll introduce you to the society of the Non-Organization Men.

It would be embarassing for me to write here what I think you have meant to television, to American culture, to the common good of this country. Which is why I am so eager to accept at face value the thought that this is simply a one-year rest, and then on to battle again.

Affectionately,

Teddy

Teddy White

Acad.. by phone

(not included in Griffin Index) White, Theodore

THEODORE H. WHITE 168 EAST 64 STREET NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

3-C-49

May 14, 1957

Dear Ed:

Lest my last letter disturbed you: (attached)

Barnes checked in yesterday with a very kind letter. The gist of it was that after a series of high-level conferences (do people in TV ever have any low-level conferences?) the powers at CBS had wiped out the concept of a major interview program of the kind we had discussed. And that he had been silent all this time because the whole concept was under debate and had not wanted to write until he could say yea or nay definitely.

So my feelings are soothed, and there's no need for you to burden yourself with any private investigation for me.

I'm out here on Fire Island (telephone Number: Fire Island 4-5899M) and will stay here until about August when this novel should be finished. No sane man ever quit a job to write a novel; but now that the opportunity is here I should use it. In August, I should be back in town working on the book project I discussed with you (if I can raise the dough); or making myself available to anyone who wants to use some hard-working, high-priced talent.

Bestest to you and Janet.

Sincerely, Teddy

Teddy White.

You'd be surprised how nicely the evening broadcast sounds out here on the island, away from the disturbance of the city where I can enjoy radio. You come in loud, clear, and eloquently.

THEODORE H. WHITE 168 EAST 64 STREET NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

May 9, 1957

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York City

Dear Ed:

Here's just a brief note to tell you I'm estivating (is that the word?) at Fire Island for the rest of the summer. I've got to finish this book fast in order to finance myself for the adventures of the fall. The address will be: Theodore H. White, Fair Harbour, Fire Island, New York. I'll have a phone in a few days and will passit on to your secretary when I know the number.

If,ultimately, you ever find out what happened in Mr. Barnes' shop, drop me a note and let me call you to hear the report-- I shall be coming into town during the summer on odd and unpredictable days, whenever the going at the typewriter gets too rough, and would like, out of curiosity, to find out what happened.

There is, of course, another reason for writing this note: it would be too embarassing to say to you personally how much your kindness and thoughtfulness in the past few months has meant to me. I'm sure, in a few months, I will be thoroughly re-established -- but your own helpfulness will be one of the pleasant thoughts of this period when I look back.

Bestest,
Teddy

Teddy White.

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

March 24, 1955

Dr. Ed Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York.

Dear Ed:

Enclosed you will find, on several hand-typed, smudge-stained sheets, the correspondence I had with CounterAttack which I promised you the other evening. I assume that if you are able to pursue the matter, you will find the CounterAttack blast at the bottom of CBS' worries and , therefore, you should have my reply. I am enclosing only my reply to them and their response to me, for I assume that, over at CBS, you have a file of CounterAttack including the blast of January 15, 1954 against me.

I want to make a couple of points about the stuff herewith:

a) On re-reading my reply it strikes me now as kind of namby-pamby. I wrote it to them, however, not to pick a fight or threaten legal action but in the hope that I might get to know how they operate, possibly meet their personnel and write a story on just what they are up to and their techniques. My reply was simply intended to set down, factually, the data refuting each of their specific charges.

b) Although they replied with rather cold courtesy, they never did send a later explanation of their action as they promised

c) The reply of a year ago stands today with one slight amendment: On page 2, Item 4, I replied to them that I couldn't remember a specific testimonial luncheon to me by the IPR ---- which was quite true. Nancy and I have since been unpacking our cases and our old letters and files and I learned that it is true that in 1946 Ned Carter of the IPR threw a luncheon in my honor. Ned Carter-- may his soul rest in peace-- was a dear old man, I was deeply fond of him, am still fond of his memory and it is a pleasant thought that he thought enough of me to give a luncheon in my honor. Old Ned was never a Commie in any way, nor do I think that the IPR was ever taken over by the Communists. I point this out simply for the sake of testimony because today I would testify, yes, I did have a luncheon with Ned Carter and so what. There were so many luncheons, speeches, banquets, broadcasts in the busy year 1946 of so many kinds that I feel I can be excused a slip in memory.

It was great seeing you the other night. I wish New York were arranged so that people who like each other could see each other more often. We watched the show after dinner with heightened pleasure and, like all the Murrow shows, it was grand. Take care and don't work too hard and let's try to make contact when I have less melancholy matters to discuss. Bestest.

Teddy

Teddy

certain decency requires that you list them all; and report what they said.

2. Yes, I did speak at the Independent Citizens Committee of Arts, etc. But the transcript of that evening's remarks should be available to you. If you examine them, you should note that my remarks were in the nature of a eulogy of the heroism of the soldiers of Chiang K'ai-shek.

3. You say I sponsored a dinner for the Hollywood Ten. That is totally untrue-- so untrue as to be a pure product of imagination. The records again should help you correct this statement. I lived in Europe continuously from June, 1948 to October 1953. That case developed while I was overseas. I know nothing of it except from my recollection of old news dispatches. I was never approached, do not know who the men are, never took any part in their defence and was not, repeat, not a sponsor. If any letterhead or statement bearing my name in their defence appears in your files I would appreciate having a photostat of it. For then I could sue whoever it was who so violently and without permision made free of my name and abused my reputation.

4. I have lunched with members of the Institute of Pacific Relations many times. I have been a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I cannot remember a specific "testimonial luncheon". The Institute of Pacific Relations carried on its membership roles the names of practically every student of the Far East as well as some of the most distinguished names in American public life and industry. There is no doubt that the Communists penetrated the Institute, trying to take it over. They did not succeed. You cannot charge membership in the Institute as evidence of taint of subversion.

5. I shall not debate Thunder Out of China with you. But if you mention the Daily Workers Comment, you should note that their review called the book "anti-Communist". If the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy or Amerasia used the book as a premium it was done without my knowledge. There is no law I know of to prevent them from buying books and using them as bait.

6. You quote correctly from Mr. Chambers, but Mr. Chambers was in error. I never at any moment signed any round-robin letter against Mr. Chambers when we worked at TIME. I was never even asked to. If necessary, I am willing to testify to that effect under oath of law. If such a letter can be produced with my signature I shall make out a check for all my royalties from my current book and donate it to your favorite charity.

7. On my relations with Time Inc. You say I was fired. I left Time Incorporated in July of 1946. I quit after a series of discussions with Henry Luce which made it obvious we were too far in disagreement to continue working together. But it was I who made the final break. On

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

COPY COPY COPY COPY COPY

April 24, 1954

The Editors of CounterAttack,
55 West 42n Street,
New York 16 New York.

Gentlemen:

I have only now, after much traveling and long delay received from a friend of mine a copy of your attack on myself in your issue of January 15th. Had a copy been sent to me directly I would have answered you at once.

Let me say at once that I seek neither apology nor retraction from you. As a journalist myself, I know how easily error creeps into the public record; and, for the purpose of this letter, I assume that what you have presented here is an attack based on error and misinformation rather than out of malice. Whether or not you correct your records is a matter of conscience. I feel that it is my primary duty only to set you straight, for thereafter a repetition of these statements can be interpreted only as malice.

It is obvious that you and I represent fundamentally divergent political views. In our form of democracy I must respect and protect your right to express your views as much as it is incumbent on you to protect those with whom you disagree .

The following points are, therefore, corrections of fact or omission which should be in your files if you desire to re-Open attack on me in any honest form.

1. Committee For a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. I was never a member; nor a sponsor; nor lent my name to any of its committees. The dinner to which you refer did take place at the Hotel Roosevelt. And I did speak. It occurred only a few months after I had returned from the war and before I thoroughly understood the purposes and control of that Committee.

The fundamental fact that you leave out is that the principal speaker of that evening meeting was Senator Tobey of New Hampshire. I was asked to appear for a few minutes on a program with that distinguished Senator whom I had never met; and, wanting to meet him, I accepted the invitation.

I make this statemat with no slightest intent to injure Senator Tobey's reputation whom you must consider, as I do, a Republican of highest integrity. Yet if you list the speakers at that meeting a he personnel records of Time, the separation was recorded as "separation by mutual agreement". Mr. Luce wrote me a most courteous note on my departure. We have since enjoyed friendly relations. I consider him a distinguished American. I cannot bring myself to believe that he said what you quote him as saying.

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

8. Mr. Burnham's review is the expression of his opinion. He did not like my book. I did not like his review. In our country that's the way liberty operates and we can boh go on talking.

9. You claim I wrote exclusive dispatches for the Daily Compass as Chief Correspondent for the Overseas News Agency. This is not true. The Daily Compass was one among several score clients of theOverseas News Agency (among others: The New York Times, the Buffalo Courier-Journal, the Louisville Courier-Journal, the Milwaukee Journal, the Washington Post, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch etc, etc). I was never asked to and never did write an exclusive dispatch for them. (the Compass) Your error is partially excusable forthe Compass did, without our permission, slug some of the Agency's dispatches as "exclusive". The mangling and distortion of the Overseas News Agency copy by the Compass was so flagrant that ultimately it led to a breach, and the cutting off of our news copy from them.

I present these facts hoping that if you attempt again to trace the difference between my point of view and yours, you will do so with accurate information.

This difference between us is deep and real. As a foreign correspondent, I have seen more of Communism in power and action than, I think, anyone on your staff. I know, far better than you, how wicked, dangerous and malevolent it is. I know its tactics and cruelties. I believe the only strategy of our defence is twofold-- the first being the preservation of our material strength, by arms, the second being the preservation of our spiritual strength, which is liberty. It is my profound belief that Communism thrives in an atmosphere of suspiciion and fear, of rumor and lie. I believe thatyou, inadvertently, may be playing directly into the hands of the Communists and weakening our entire fiber of resistance to the threat.

Should you ever find yourself in need of material about me, I can assure you of my whole-hearted cooperation. You need only call to check whatever you wish to say.

Sincerely Yours,

Theodore H. White

See Publications
Counterattack

THE NEW
COUNTERATTACK
FACTS TO COMBAT COMMUNISM

REGISTERED IN THE UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE

55 WEST 42 STREET, NEW YORK 36, N. Y. LONGACRE 3-460

January 15, 1954
Vol. 8, No. 3

Dear Subscriber:

"CHINA EXPERT" NOW PRESCRIBES DANGEROUS US POLICIES.

THEODORE WHITE is the author of the recently published book "Fire In The Ashes: Europe in Mid-Century" (William Sloane Associates.$5). WHITE was head of the Time magazine China Bureau during the years 1939-45.

The Book of the Month Club made WHITE's book its selection for Nov, 1953. EDWARD R MURROW featured WHITE...and plugged his book...on his nation-wide "Person to Person" TV show (NBC). The NY Times and NY Herald Tribune gave WHITE's book the full page-one treatment in its Sunday book review sections. The Saturday Review raved about it. It has been praised highly by CHARLES SEYMOUR, former Pres of Yale Univ, Columbia U's Prof HENRY STEELE COMMAGER, RAYMOND GRAM SWING and many others.

Obviously this is a very important book...or so these critics and publicists will have the world believe. Now here is WHITE's background on the subject of Communism.

Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, speaker (with AGNES SMEDLEY, the late Soviet spy; ALBERT E KAHN, leading pro-Soviet propagandist; HUGH DEANE, CP fronter and Far Eastern "expert" for the defunct Communoid "Daily Compass"; former OSS Sgt and Army Capt GEORGE S WUCHINICK, who recently refused to tell Senate Internal Security subcommittee if he was a Communist Party member, and former Congressman HUGH DE LACY, who has been identified as a Communist Party (CP) member.

Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, speaker, radio show.

Testimonial Dinner for the Hollywood Ten, sponsor.

Insitiute of Pacific Relations, honored by testimonial luncheon.

WHITE co-authored "Thunder Out of China" with ANNALEE JACOBY. Both the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy and "Amerasia" magazine (the office of which was used for photographing and storing stolen U S secret documents) offered this book as a premium to prospective subscribers. Amerasia praised the book as "required reading" for anyone who (in 1946) wanted to understand current events in China. The Daily Worker also praised the book, as did JOHN K FAIRBANK, LAWRENCE K ROSINGER, and EDGAR SNOW, "China experts" who have been identified as Communists (FAIRBANK and SNOW deny the charge, ROSINGER has taken refuge in the Fifth Amendment).

WHITE also edited "The Stilwell Papers" (1948), another book which was slanted on the question of China. The Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, cited as subversive by the Dept of Justice, distributed this book and sent out special literature promoting it.

WHITTAKER CHAMBERS has cast some light on the role WHITE played at Time magazine. In his book "Witness", CHAMBERS described what happened when he became editor of Time's foreign news section and started telling the truth about the Kremlin gangsters. A group of Time foreign correspondents who were Published weekly. Copyright 1954 by American Business Consultants, Inc.; J. G. Keenan, President;

A. E. Cullen, Vice-President; F. J. McNamara, Editor; L. F. Budenz, Contributing Editor.

Chester Williams

FROM.....

From Chester Williams

CHESTER S. WILLIAMS
431 EAST 20TH STREET
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.
GRAMERCY 3-3306

March 26, 1965

Mrs. Edward R. Murrow,
New York Hospital
New York City

Dear Janet:

I was so happy to see the notice in the paper that Ed had entered the hospital for a check up since we had been told by one of his doctors that he was suffering a brain disorder.

We hope it is true that he will be out soon on his own steam. We saw you on the recent TV program and hoped you were not facing a period of uncertainty.

I'm writing to you at the hospital in hopes that you will let us know whether and when we can see Ed.

Also I'm enclosing an announcement of our TV-radio series. It begins April 5 on the subject: "What's a 'modest but adequate' family budget?" What I'd prize more than anything else is to present Ed on our program, which as you know is practically the "secret TV channel" -- of N.Y. City-- channel 31, on a program called "Personal Message to Teen-agers" from Edward R. Murrow.

But, in any case, do let us know where we may reach you when Ed leaves the hospital.

I'm also enclosing a copy of our current issue of BETTER TIMES with a story about the social workers in SELMA, including Jack and Joyce.

These are certainly critical days which remind me of the 1930s. We both send our love and our hope of seeing Ed and you when he may be able to spend an evening with old friends.

Sincerely,

Chet

Williams, Chester S.

9503 La Jolla Farms Road
La Jolla, California
April 23, 1964

Dear Chet,

Ed was delighted to hear from you and has asked me to reply to your letter. He is recovering from a bout of pneumonia, and doesn't feel up to much.

We both hope that you are enjoying your new job. The Community Council is lucky to have you working for them and I am sure that you will like it much more than you would have working in Phoenix.

Ed too has been giving educational television a good deal of thought, but he has no idea what he will be doing next -- he is really too unwell to consider anything.

We move back to Washington next week. I hope that during the summer we will have the good fortune to see you and Elizabeth.

Sincerely yours,

(Mrs. Edward R. Murrow)

Mr. Chester S. Williams
431 East 20th Street
New York 10
New York

CHESTER S. WILLIAMS
431 EAST 20TH STREET
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.
GRAMERCY 3-3306

April 12, 1964

Dear Ed:

Good to hear you expect to be back in these parts soon. We'll hope to have a chance to kick things around again.

The enclosed will let you know what I'm up to currently.

Interesting that you should raise the point about educational TV since it just happens that I delved into it a few months ago to decide whether a spot in the educational station in Pheonix would be my cup of tea. I decided not to go in by that door, at least. In general, the shoestring financing seems the main frustration. It seems obviously the most important channel for adult education, and I see no reason why institutional advertising shouldn't be tapped to pay a good part of the bill. Indeed, many of the legitimate commercials of substantial industry are educational--or could be helpful in enlightening listeners on rapidly changing technology and what it portends for human relations.

Elizabeth joins in sending our fond good wishes to you and Janet.

Cordially,

Chet

Williams, Chester S.

9503 La Jolla Farms Road
La Jolla, California
March 23, 1964

Dear Chet:

Belated thanks for yours of February 26. We have taken a house here in La Jolla and will remain here at least until the end of April. I don't know what I am going to do, because that will be determined in large part by what I am able to do. I have had a flock of offers from publishers, but presently have no appetite to write a book.

Deeply distressed to hear of your accident, but happy to hear of your recovery.

What do you know about educational television and its prospects?

As ever yours,

Edward R. Murrow

Mr. Chester S. Williams
431 East 20th Street
New York 10
New York.

ERM:apa

CHESTER S. WILLIAMS
431 EAST 20TH STREET
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.
GRAMERCY 3-3306

February 26, 1964

Dear Ed and Janet:

Elizabeth and I have thought of you often and hope that this finds you rested and renewed in vitality. I'm sending this to the farm, assuming that with the arrival of spring weather you will return there.

Your old dream of withdrawing from high-pressure activity for a year or two to indulge in reading and reflection is now within reach, and I hope you take advantage of it. As one who paved the way for a new media of reporting and set a standard "to which the wise and honest" can repair, you owe it to the rising generation to tell the story of that heroic and successful struggle in detail. It is also the story of the end of an era. Few can illuminate its meaning and portent with greater insight than you.

If I could lend a hand in such an enterprise, I'd be delighted to explore it with you. I'm doing some free lance writing and consulting at the moment. The arrangement by which I was to have taken over the direction of Freedom House foundered when its founder-director changed his mind on his retirement plans. So since November I have been unconnected.

We have been exploring the possibilities of retiring ultimately in Arizona. The climate there seems most helpful to Elizabeth's acute sinus trouble. A recent visit suggested that the likelihood of finding a full-time job of real interest is rather remote in that area. Perhaps the time has come to develop that second career which can be pursued without the dismal prospects of being retired at a set age. I've always thought that writing would be it. Maybe the time has come to make the transition. I have no illusions about the difficulties in breaking in when one's writing craft has been exercized largely in organizational and institutional connections. But I have no wish to re-enter the rat race of industrial public relations. The financial independence gained in that enterprise was about the only rewarding result of a decade in it.

Incidently, I spent almost 3 months in a body cast from neck to navel this year. I slipped on a floor I was refinishing in Jack's house and broke a fusion of over 50 years standing. Fortunately, the shoulder mended well and at a slightly improved angle.

It would be a delight to get together again when you are in these parts. Meanwhile, all our best wishes.

Sincerely,

Chet

Chet Williams

November 23, 1960

Dear Chet:

Belated thanks to you and Elizabeth for the flowers.

I'm back in the office a few hours a day, and we must meet soon.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester Williams
Messrs. Gaynor & Ducas
400 Madison Avenue
New York City, New York

m

NEW YORK

Chester Williams

LOS ANGELES

GAYNOR & DUCAS, INC.

ADVERTISING · PUBLIC RELATIONS

400 MADISON AVENUE · NEW YORK 17, N.Y.

PLAZA 5-5750

October 31, 1960

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
485 Madison Ave.,
New York, N.Y.

Dear Ed:

The copy of your note of October 10 to Mr. Kiliper reached me the other day when I returned from a business trip. It was forwarded by the American Cancer Society.

Since our talk, I have made further notes and will send you my thoughts on the proposed book shortly. Perhaps we can get together after the election subsides to discuss both the book and the other plans you have in mind.

Sincerely,

Chet

Chester S. Williams

Williams, Chester

AMERICAN CANCER SOCIETY, INC.

521 WEST 57th STREET, NEW YORK 19, N. Y. • PLAZA 7-2700

HONORARY LIFE MEMBERS
FRANK E. ADAIR, M.D.
JAMES S. ADAMS
GUY AUD, M.D.
ELMER H. BOBST
GEN. WILLIAM J. DONOVAN
ERIC A. JOHNSTON
CHARLES C. LUND, M.D.
MRS. R. E. MOSIMAN
C. C. NESSELRODE, M.D.
ALTON OCHSNER, M.D.
MRS. E. LEE OZBIRN
MRS. ANNA M. ROSENBERG
ALFRED P. SLOAN, JR.
JAMES V. STUART
EDWIN B. WILSON, PH.D.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS
LANE W. ADAMS (UTAH)
GEORGE C. ADIE, M.D. (N. Y.)
AUSTIN H. BELL, M.D. (OKLA.)
JOHN S. BOUSLOG, M.D. (COLO.)
G. V. BRINDLEY, M.D. (TEXAS)
HARRY A. BRINKMAN (ILL.)
JAMES M. BRITTAIN (PA.)
ENOCH CALLAWAY, M.D. (GA.)
WILLIAM H. CANTWELL (DEL.)
THOMAS CARLILE, M.D. (WASH.)
JOHN W. CLINE, M.D. (CALIF.)
L. T. COGGESHALL, M.D. (ILL.)
MRS. ELWOOD COILE (KAN.)
WARREN H. COLE, M.D. (ILL.)
JAMES E. CONLEY, M.D. (WIS.)
MURRAY M. COPELAND, M.D. (D.C.)
FRED A. DURAN (ALA.)
RUTHERFORD L. ELLIS (GA.)
RALPH H. ERICHSEN (MO.)
FRANK W. FOOTE, JR., M.D. (N. Y.)
H. FLEMING FULLER, M.D. (N. C.)
MRS. W. PARMER FULLER, JR. (CALIF.)
MRS. POWELL GLASS (VA.)
MRS. ROGER GOODAN (CALIF.)
JAMES H. GOSMAN, M.D. (IND.)
JOHN F. GRIFFIN, M.D. (N. MEX.)
JOHN R. HELLER, M.D. (MD.)
MRS. MILDRED R. HERMANN (ALASKA)
HERMAN E. HILLEBOE, M.D. (N. Y.)
CHARLES D. HILLES, JR. (N.Y.)
DONALD W. HORNBECK (OHIO)
DONALD E. JOHNSON (MICH.)
STUART H. KEAY (N. H.)
CALVIN T. KLOPP, M.D. (D.C.)
WALTER J. KOHLER (WIS.)
MRS. ALBERT D. LASKER (N. Y.)
GLENN H. LEAK, M.D. (N. Y.)
WILLIAM B. LEWIS (N. Y.)
JAMES E. LOFSTROM, M.D. (MICH.)
HARRY MCENERNY, JR. (LA.)
LESLIE A. MILLER (WYO.)
S. THOMAS MILLER, M.D. (DEL.)
ARTHUR L. MONTGOMERY (GA.)
JAMES T. MOUNTZ (MASS.)
HARRY M. NELSON, M.D. (MICH.)
EUGENE P. PENDERGRASS, M.D. (PA.)
MRS. JOHN T. PIRIE, JR. (ILL.)
ALFRED M. POPMA, M.D. (IDAHO)
MONROE J. RATHBONE (N. Y.)
I. S. RAVDIN, M.D. (PA.)
J. ELLIOTT SCARBOROUGH, M.D. (GA.)
WENDELL G. SCOTT, M.D. (MO.)
WENDELL M. STANLEY, PH.D. (CALIF.)
ERNEST L. STEBBINS, M.D. (MD.)
WALDO I. STODDARD (MICH.)
FRANK L. TAYLOR (N. Y.)
HOWARD C. TAYLOR, JR., M.D. (N. Y.)
OZELL M. TRASK (ARIZ.)
OSSIP J. WALINSKY (N. Y.)
TRAVIS T. WALLACE (TEXAS)
CHARLES H. WALTERS (CONN.)
GEORGE W. WATERMAN, M.D. (R. I.)
GRANVILLE WHITTLESEY, JR. (N. Y.)
FRANCIS J. WILCOX (WIS.)
ASHBEL C. WILLIAMS, M.D. (FLA.)
FRANK E. WINSLOW (MD.)
DAVID A. WOOD, M.D. (CALIF.)
WILLIAM O. WUESTER, M.D. (N. J.)

April 10, 1959

Mr. Ed Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Dear Ed:

In checking when I got back to the office I find that I did send you a copy of the report on the Freedom House Patterson Memorial Conference. But as you indicated, you have been overly-protected against exposure to first hand sources. So here's another copy.

It was delightful to see you planning the long-postponed withdrawal from schedule pontifications. I know you are going to enjoy every minute of it.

Do let us know when you can come out to Huntington with Janet and Casey.

Best wishes,

Sincerely,

Chet

Chester S. Williams

CSW:ps

Enc.

"ONE NATION INDIVISIBLE"

An American Dialogue on Race Relations and the Law

Robert P. Patterson Memorial Conference

Report by Oliver Allen and Chester S. Williams

Published by FREEDOM HOUSE
20 West 40th Street
New York 18, N. Y.

Twenty-five cents a copy — 100 copies $15.00

393

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

Last September's angry events in Little Rock brusquely dramatized—and severely complicated—a major crisis of human relations in the United States. Suddenly the nation became aware, to its dismay, that the desegregation of the public schools of the United States, which the Supreme Court ruled must take place "with all deliberate speed" following its famous decision of May 17, 1954, was not going to come about as peacefully as earlier events had led many to expect. Race relations seemed at a strangely explosive impasse as an irresistible force of law met an immovable object of social customs built up over generations. Beclouded by misunderstandings and aggravated by bitterness on all sides, the dilemma was revealed anew as infinitely complex and profound. But the dilemma had to be faced and ways out of it sought, for the U. S. in the 20th century plainly could not afford any more Little Rocks.

To try to find pathways out of the crisis, an unusual conference was held last January 17-19 at Arden House in Harriman, N. Y. There a group of 38 distinguished educators, political leaders, authors, businessmen, lawyers and other public-spirited citizens of both races from 10 states in North and South met for a series of off-the-record discussions. They had experienced and grappled personally with the problem of race relations. They had real differences of opinion and met to probe their differences. The main thing they had in common was an overwhelming desire to find a constructive solution to the problem at hand. Given assurance that their remarks would not be attributed to them personally in any way, they spoke freely and with candor.

The conference was held in the name and the spirit of the late Robert P. Patterson, who in his many roles, including service as Secretary of War, personified devotion to country above party in time of national emergency. A grant made available to Freedom House by the Fund for the Republic was earmarked for this program.

This report attempts to sum up the flavor and content of the discussions as recorded in nearly 500 pages of transcript, and to provide the highlights of what turned out to be some very valuable and characteristically American dialogue. It is released by the Robert Patterson Memorial Committee of Freedom House and includes the names of those conferees who have agreed to make public their participation.

The Conference Committee earnestly hopes that this report will encourage other Americans, with honest differences of opinion, to have recourse to the democratic process of discussion in a search for alternatives to the current national debacle.

New York, April 18, 1958

I. BACKGROUND TO A CRISIS

One plain but alarming fact stands out in any consideration of America's racial dilemma. It is a fact on which all reasonable men are likely to agree, however reluctantly. The fact is, simply, that the race problem in the United States is not of merely local but of world-wide significance, and that on its reasonable solution our safety in the world may depend. It was on this note of somewhat disturbing unity that the Patterson Memorial Conference got under way.

The United States is in the throes of a social revolution which the whole world is watching. Caused by the powerful and unremitting pressure of one race to win for itself a measure of equality and recognition from another, the upheaval was given new impetus by the 1954 Supreme Court decision, a decision which highlighted and intensified the dislocations already under way. Today Americans are forced to deal at home with complex, emotionally-charged issues of human relations while countering unprecedented dangers from abroad, and what they do about the domestic problem strongly influences their capacity to meet the foreign threat.

"The best minds in the South," said one participant, "aren't working on the real problems of the world now. They are all preoccupied with this problem. They aren't thinking about foreign affairs, world policies, the strategy of the free world. They aren't thinking about freedom. They are just thinking about their own problem; they are thinking about nothing else."

"In our resistance to ruthless and cynical world communism," observed another leader, "we are engaged in the greatest struggle any nation or people has ever entered. And in part, it is a struggle for the minds of a majority of the world's population. This majority still uncommitted, is a non-white majority. There is no doubt about the extent to which our country is measured in the minds of these people in terms of its attitudes and practices regarding race.

"I believe that the world press showed that nothing raised our standing in Asia, the Middle East, even in Latin America and parts of Europe, more than the announcement of the Supreme Court decision on the public schools, a decision which was hailed in the press in India. Conversely, I can't think of anything in recent years which has done us so much harm as the publicity about the tragic events in Little Rock—publicity which was exploited by the communists all over the world with telling effect."

A note of anxiety began to recur early in the discussions as conferees outlined the divisive, disruptive character of the problem and its effect on the people of the South.

"I am much disturbed by the situation as it now exists," said one Southerner, "and as it is developing throughout the South, because I think it could lead to dire consequences for the whole nation."

"Some of the best informed and most thoughtful people," said another, "feel that if this thing goes on, it will destroy this nation."

"Many of the women have a strong conviction," said a woman panelist, "that the law must be respected. They are greatly concerned about what the resistance to the Supreme Court decision has done to the young people in their attitude toward the law."

"In my community," reported a Southerner, "I saw many of our people transformed into individuals carrying loaded guns in their pockets. We did not know when serious violence might break out."

"You all cannot imagine how baffled we are," said another. "We do not see the next steps. We don't see the light on the path ahead at all. We don't know what to do."

But others looked beyond the pessimism and saw a hopeful outcome.

"It's true that the Little Rock experience was very costly to the country internationally," said a participant. "But it may prove to have a real constructive value internally. The question is, what might have been done to avoid the tragedy in Little Rock, and what can we do in our communities to prevent a repetition of it?"

Changing Patterns of Race Relations

Before essaying any actual roads to a solution of the problem, the two roundtable groups into which the conference was divided devoted several hours to developing a factual basis for further discussion. Several of the members were nationally recognized experts who supplied background information from their studies. Many others gave revealing testimony from their own personal experience.

A measure of agreement soon became apparent here, too, as everyone recognized that racial problems are hardly the exclusive property of one region or one country.

> "Wherever two or more races are in contact with each other," someone remarked, "you have problems of race relations. That's true clear across the United States and all around the world. It's true in India. . . . We have had some of the most dramatic instances of racial feeling and racial discrimination among the colored people themselves. Now it's true that these problems take different forms in different parts of the country, but by and large these are differences in detail rather than in the fundamental nature of the problems.
>
> "Some of the issues we are discussing may go back beyond the murky mists of history. Some of them may be things that none of us feel we can understand. It seems to me that one of the things all of us can do is to suggest that we earn the right to have a view about such matters at a distance by doing what we can about the problems in our own neighborhoods; in this way we can develop some of the compassion that is needed to get at some of these questions."
>
> A Northerner echoed this by saying, "The discrimination practised in some of the Northern cities provides no basis for any feeling of a monopoly of moral virtue above the Mason-Dixon line."

Although the race situation in the U. S. has changed many times over the years, the history of race relations has had an oddly predictable course as it has swung back and forth like a pendulum.

> "Several times in our history," recalled one panel member, "We have seen a rigid, highly emotional hardening of white attitudes following a period of toleration—the hardening caused by a fear that drastic changes otherwise will occur. Up until the 1830's, for instance, it was perfectly proper for a white Southerner, a leader, to attack slavery as an evil and undesirable thing which must in time pass. As late as 1832 William Gaston, a justice of the North Carolina Supreme Court, in a commencement address made an all-out attack on slavery and was widely applauded in the state, because there was no real likelihood that anything would be done about slavery, and as long as there wasn't any, the free Negro population was growing slowly and had some place in the community.
>
> "Then came the abolitionist movement and the outbreak of slave insurrections and you had the rigid hardening of the slave codes.

This lasted right into the Civil War itself, and there was no change until it was broken up by force. Then you had the same thing happening again with respect not to slavery but to suffrage. As soon as federal troops were withdrawn in the 70's you had a quick period of violence through the Klan; that didn't eliminate Negro voting but did cut it down to a manageable level.

"With no real prospect of liberal Negro control, in the 90's you had the rise of the populist movement, which was able to carry many of the Southern states in the elections. Then, all of a sudden, the opportunity was open for large-scale Negro voting coupled with lower class white voting, and this gave suppressed economic groups, white and Negro together, a chance to participate in state governments. The result again was a rigid freezing with the rise of new organizations like the North Carolina Red Shirt Movement, and you had a series of acts, such as literacy tests and the 'grandfather clause' which stamped out Negro voting, which had become quite common by then. It took the depression to break that pattern as it had taken the Civil War to break the previous one.

During the '30's and '40's admission of Negroes to institutions of higher education and other softenings around the edge were tolerated without much excitement. After all, the basic structure was not being challenged. Then came the Supreme Court decision, producing the current wave of rigidity."

New Social and Economic Pressures

Throughout the United States vast social changes are taking place which affect the racial picture. As Southern whites and Negroes move to the North and Northern industry expands into the South—to name two current and simultaneous changes—new pressures are brought to bear on the political and economic scene. There are, so to speak, Southern communities in the North and Northern communities in the South and these two have had their effect on such matters as housing, employment and education. Often these social dislocations have a far greater effect on racial patterns and practices than do the most widely heralded court cases.

Among the trends the conference noted were these:

1. Negroes moving. As Negroes move to other parts of the U. S. they affect the color balance wherever they go.

"And the Negro will continue his pressure for release from the harsh and cruel aspects of segregation," said a Southern leader. "While I would like to think that the Negro is happier in my home town—individually—than he would be in Chicago in a strange environment, I am sure that he has one advantage in Chicago, and that is that a legal segregation must be lifted from him, and he no longer walks in the darkness of that handicap."

2. Shortage of skilled labor in the South. With Negro labor moving out and industry moving in there is more and more of a deficit in the human resource needed for the South's economic development.

"The real thing the South has is people," commented a Southern observer. "But we seem to be very eager to get rid of them. Many people with whom I have talked have been somewhat startled and concerned that most Southern people seem to think that this was a very fine thing, that one way to solve the race problem is to let the Negroes go and have our labor pool depleted rather than try to educate them and make them a skilled resource."

3. Rural-urban migration. In 1900 only 15 out of every 100 Americans lived in urban centers. By 1950 the ratio had become 50-50.

"Studies were done in Mississippi in population changes," reported a panelist, "the assumption being that everybody was getting on the Illinois Central and taking off for Chicago. Instead, Negro farmers were moving from one part of Mississippi to another part which had a very small Negro population, and going into the cities.

"The same thing is happening in Jackson, Mississippi that is happening in Washington, D. C. The white people are going into the suburbs, and the Negroes are moving into the central cities."

4. New urban problems. Radical changes in the racial composition of cities like Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit and New York are creating tensions and such interrelated problems as overcrowded housing, unemployment, greater need for social welfare agencies and increased strain on both medical facilities and schools. These conditions are complicated by loss of tax revenues as the middle class migrates out of these cities to the suburbs.

"Chicago is probably one of the hottest cities in the country in terms of the race picture," said one authority. "The St. Lawrence Seaway plan is opening up a boom there, and they figure two million more people in Chicago in the years ahead.

"A very substantial number of these people will be Negro families. Chicago's residential development is peculiar. It has been spotty, and already there has been a spotting of Negro families outside of the so-called Black Belt. There is a shortage of housing, and this makes for a great deal of antagonism.

"This kind of thing swamps the public housing programs. It swamps any neighborhood that offers reasonably cheap rents, and where white and Negro families both are just on that borderline where they almost have their feet out of the muck."

5. Overcharging. The urban housing shortage works special hardships on Negroes, Puerto Ricans and other minorities, who are usually charged more for less.

"They see the pressures of population moving in on them before they can get the money for the next rental payment."

6. Pressure of Negro middle class. As more Negroes move into the skilled, professional and business fields, new pressure is exerted for access to better housing, public services, and educational opportunities everywhere.

"We have a situation in Atlanta that is a little different from anybody's in the world. We have developments of the suburban type for Negroes in Atlanta and the result is that Atlanta probably has the best housing among Negro people anywhere in the world. We have been able to develop whole suburban areas with Negro capital and federal capital, with the result that we have a showplace right now for any visitor who comes in."

7. "Panic" selling. Racial changes in neighborhoods through property sales are occurring both in the North and the South, with the initial resistance usually greater in the North. It is hard to tell whether the resistance is caused more by racial feelings or by fear of property devaluation. In the latter instance a curious corollary is that often, after the first sale, competition among Negro buyers forces real estate prices up.

"While you might have panic selling in Northern areas when a Negro family moves into a community," observed a participant, "in the South I think you are likely to find that the values of houses increase when a Negro family moves in. The man who sells his house first might sell it at a nominal figure, but the man next door who has an opportunity to sell his house to a Negro family immediately doubles or at least vastly increases the price of his house, and pretty nearly gets it.

"Then you get all this wholesale selling, because everybody in the community finds he can get a little more for his house than he thought it was worth. And meanwhile he can move to suburbia."

8. Discrimination in hiring. Many of the new textile mills in the South have maintained the segregation customs of their new communities, though International Harvester and Firestone have been cited as encouraging exceptions to the practice. In the North, though there is much silent discrimination, there is also an increased demand for genuinely skilled Negro labor.

"One trouble is that in the professional fields Negro education has only recently been producing men at the graduate level who can fill responsible posts in large numbers. And then when employers go out to look for people of this sort, rosters and employment agencies break down. There doesn't seem to be any way of locating the right people."

"I think," replied someone, "that the problem is not one of employment, but underemployment. I think there are a good many Negroes who could do a good deal more than they have a chance to do."

"The American people," added another, "have made a tremendous mistake, both in the North and the South, in not trying to discover—and discover early—the folks who have brains, children with talent. Find this talent! The country needs it. There's a lot of talent among Negroes that is just—well, we haven't discovered it, and where we have discovered it there's very often a lack of motivation, and there is also a lack of finances to enable these youngsters to go on."

9. Increased Negro purchasing power. Especially in the South, Negro economic advancement has had a marked effect on commercial establishments which are forced to question certain segregation practices in order to attract the Negroes' patronage.

10. The varied picture in education. The racial make-up of both Northern and Southern school districts is highly complex, as revealed by the following series of roundtable remarks:

"Statistically, this may interest you," remarked a school expert. "There are some 9000 school districts in the 17 states affected by the Supreme Court decision. But only 3008 have pupils of both races. So in only one third of the school districts affected is there now a problem of desegregation.

"I think the general impression, looking from the North down at the South, is that there is a considerable intermixture of races. But it is really quite spotty from area to area. There are four counties in Georgia without any Negro school children, and I think there are 13 counties in Tennessee without any Negro residents."

"And 6000 districts have only one race?" asked another panelist.

"In 6000 districts the school children are either all white or all Negro."

Asked another, "Would you define 'district' a little more clearly? In Florida you have huge school districts, in Kentucky tiny ones."

"There's no way to define a school district by size. The jurisdiction can be for just one school, or a county school system or a city system. In Missouri nearly every school is a district unto itself with its own school board."

"Have these districts been gerrymandered?"

"A few recently, perhaps, but not necessarily. In the cities, at least, the districts have grown up around housing areas. It's perfectly normal to have a Negro school in a Negro residential district."

"What is the situation in the 3000 mixed districts?"

"Since 1954, 762 have desegregated in practice or policy. Of these, all but 15 are in the border states or Texas. None are in the 'deep South' where about 60 percent of your Negro children of school age live."

"All this would indicate," observed another, "that there is a great deal more segregation in housing in the South than we have been told."

"As for population," the school expert added, "the total school attendance in the 9000 districts is about 9 million whites and 2.7 million Negroes. Of this total of nearly 12 million children only about 2 million white children and 375,000 Negro children are in what could be called integrated situations. Most of the Negro children live in the cities of Baltimore, St. Louis, Washington, Louisville, Kansas City and so forth—the large cities of the border states. Texas has 841 school districts with children of both races and of these just 123 have been desegregated."

New Attitudes Among White and Negro

Out of the factors noted above and out of the 1954 Supreme Court decision have come new attitudes toward the racial situation on the part of both whites and Negroes.

1. Segregation vs. exclusion. In the South, with fairly stable neighborhood arrangements, the focus is on segregation in the schools, but in the more geographically fluid North the focus is on housing and property exclusiveness.

"Just recently," said a Northerner, "I read an article that said we are headed for a great deal of racial tension in the North as a result of the housing pattern, and that what is happening in the South is just a dress rehearsal. Personally I do not quite agree. I think Northern communities can absorb a rather considerable increase in their Negro populations, and while there will be some tension and difficulty, and I don't mean to say there won't be, I don't see the element of terror or of real pressure. You get exclusive clubs, exclusive social life, churches, Bronxville, et cetera—but it isn't segregation as a concept."

"If somebody gets hit, though," replied a Southerner, "it doesn't make any difference what hit him, whether it's a piece of lead pipe or a brick. Like the business in Levittown, Pa.—it doesn't matter what the reason behind it is, whether it's exclusiveness or racism, when the guy gets hit."

"I think it does," said the Northerner.

"Not to him."

"Yes, to him too. In Levittown the police were basically committed to the proposition of law and order. The Negro who went in maybe felt he was getting the rough edge of things, but in the long run he felt that the weight of the thing was on his side."

2. World-wide color consciousness. What is happening in the United States is only an echo of the rise of non-white peoples all over the world.

"The American Negroes," observed a New Yorker, "are sharing in this world-wide color consciousness. The whites are a minority of the two and one-half billion people on this planet. We shouldn't forget that."

"There has been a shift in the white South's position," added someone else, "into a definite minority psychology. The white South thought of itself as a majority, and it did a very effective job of persuading the North for a long time. The realization recently by the Southern whites that they could no longer identify themselves with the nationwide majority came as something of a shock, and I think this precipitated a change. A majority can permit difference of opinion and dissent but a minority finds it more difficult. The South's realization of its minority status has produced a tightening of the lines, demands for unity and the crushing of dissent."

3. Young people's feelings. A large proportion of younger people, especially those with a college education, have shown a readiness to break with custom and adopt more liberal viewpoints. This is true of both races and further complicates regional attitudes.

"Of all the polls that have been conducted on campuses," observed one expert, "almost all show that the attitude of college students and even of high school students is different from that of the generations before them."

"One reason might be," replied someone, "that the parents are not the product of modern schools. They didn't come out of the new type of school, if they came out of school at all."

4. Fears and frustrations. Economic and racial dislocations have sharpened the hatreds and bitterness already present in some of the poorer elements of the population.

"People who haven't been able to make a living for 120 years in those hillsides in East Tennessee—they are the ones who made most of the trouble at Clinton," said a resident of the South. "It was a perfect spot for them to come together and try to get back at all their frustrations."

"I hope," replied a Northerner, "that all of us saw that news item recently about the five boys who were arrested in Queens, N. Y.—a borough of New York City—for trying to steal money from a church in order to build up an organization to save the Nordic race. If any of us have any traces of holier-than-thou feeling about the North, it would be good for us to reconsider."

II. THE 1954 DECISION

For all its tremendous impact, the Supreme Court's decision of May 17, 1954, which ruled against racial segregation in the public schools of the United States, is misunderstood throughout much of the nation. Of those who have some knowledge of it—and a surprising percentage of Americans have never heard of it at all—many think that it is a political edict requiring immediate integration of the races in all public schools everywhere. Others—and this includes a large proportion of the educated white South—believe that because the 1954 decision was a reversal of a ruling which had been accepted for more than 50 years, and because the Court is politically appointed and could conceivably change its mind again, the 1954 ruling will somehow go away if nobody pays much attention to it. Out of these two misconceptions has come much of the South's defiance and intransigeance of the past four years.

The conference was particularly fortunate, therefore, in being able to hear from an experienced and well-informed lawyer, who gave a reasoned explanation of what the decision means.

> "A particular decision," he noted, "decides only the particular case that is before the Court. But if this decision results in a new interpretation of the Constitution, the Court's resulting interpretation is immediately binding on all the lower federal courts, and indeed on all the state courts as well. In order to produce a similar decision on a different set of circumstances another suit may have to be brought in the courts. But when this happens the federal court concerned would ordinarily follow the Supreme Court's judgment in disposing of that suit. Thus the many suits that have been brought in other states since the basic decision in 1954 have all come out the same way as the 1954 one, because all those courts were bound by the oath of the judges to obey the Constitution of the United States. And what the Constitution says is what the Supreme Court says that it says."

Beyond the basic ruling, however, there is the question of how the decision is to be enforced. A year after its original decision the Supreme Court decreed that the specific formulas for compliance were to be adjudicated by the lower federal courts, and that compliance should take place "with all deliberate speed." Each new interpretation from a district court has therefore been given much attention.

> "The most recent interpretation," continued the lawyer, "was written by Judge Richard R. Rives for the U. S. Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, sitting in New Orleans on December 27, 1957. Judge Rives said that although the Supreme Court forbade discrimination against entrants to public schools on the grounds of race, it did not require that anybody go to any particular school, or that schools should combine the races.
>
> "The problem, therefore, is whether a particular student seeking entrance to a public school is denied entrance upon grounds of race; I think that's a fair interpretation of the decision."

Judge Rives' decision was significant in that it reversed the judgment of a federal district court that had ordered systemwide desegregation without a full hearing of local communities' plans for compliance. The conference had before it a report on the Rives ruling, including the language he quoted from another court to support his opinion that "only racially discriminatory segregation in the public schools is forbidden."

> The Supreme Court's rulings, Judge Rives went on, "do not compel the mixing of the different races in the public schools. . . . The order of the court is simply that no child shall be denied admission to a school on the basis of race or color. Indeed, just so a child is not through any form of compulsion or pressure required to stay in a certain school, or denied transfer to another school, because of his race or color, the school heads may allow the pupil, whether white or Negro, to go to the same school as he would have attended in the absence of the ruling of the Supreme Court. . . ."

The decision's immediate effects

In the heat of today's controversy it is often forgotten that the nation's first reaction to the 1954 decision was favorable, and even in the South it was not received with violent antagonism. Feelings of resignation—that the decision "was bound to come sooner or later"—were mingled with those of relief—that it finally had settled the question—and of cautious compliance—"we can live with this." It was only as time went on that the spirit of resistance rose and antagonistic attitudes crystallized.

> "My first reaction to it," said a Southern observer, "was: this is good. I felt we had to do something to improve our prestige abroad. There was no immediate outcry from the people. But finally there was a delayed explosion. The violent reaction began among the poorer people and gradually the feeling spread until it embraced the most 'aristocratic.' It reached a peak when the President sent troops to Little Rock."

> "If somehow we could reestablish the kind of understanding," offered another man from the South, "that we seemed to have immediately after the Supreme Court decision in some of the public statements to the press, even from the politicians—if there could be some reminder that that frame of mind did exist—then I think there might be some kind of moving forward in this situation."

As attitudes hardened in the months after the decision, segments of the Southern population made known their various feelings.

1. Politicians. For many office holders the Court's ruling was a great stroke of good fortune—an issue they could ride indefinitely.

> "It is a beautiful train to ride," said one who is involved in political life. "The hysteria that comes when race feeling is involved is just the easiest thing in the world to ride. The politician who does this plays on all those elements that are ignoble in human life—envy and suspicion and misunderstanding."

2. The press. Newspapers in the South were never particularly favorable to the decision, and even those originally neutral have in the intervening years come out against desegregation. In 1954 only 12 of the South's 30 leading dailies could be counted as not strongly opposed to compliance. Since then the number has dropped to nine.

3. Business leaders. While they may have strong private feelings against desegregation, Southern businessmen as a group have a vested interest in peaceful economic development. Those who have been working to lure Northern capital into the South have a special fear of disorder.

A Southern industrialist is quoted in Harry Ashmore's book, An Epitaph for Dixie: "My God, if the Klan starts riding again and kicking Nigras around, my company couldn't borrow fifty cents in Wall Street. And nobody in his right mind would build a plant in a town where people are throwing dynamite at each other. What we've been selling is peace and order—telling 'em that what we've got down here is stability."

4. Rural populations. Back country people had a reason all their own for objecting to desegregation.

"What a lot of people fail to understand," said one who knows the country folk, "is that in the South, and especially in the rural communities, the school is a social center, very definitely. It is often said that the Negro has no desire to invade the purely social life of the white people. But in the case of the rural schools you can't get away from the social side of it."

5. The clergy. A number of Southern ministers, especially in the rural areas, denounce the Supreme Court's ruling as contrary to what they claim is the Bible's approval of segregation. A preponderant number of the clergy—perhaps the majority—believe in desegregation but are afraid to speak out. A growing minority is outspokenly against segregation. Its ranks have been strengthened greatly by the recent joint statement of 80 Atlanta ministers urging obedience to the law. But the clergy's influence among laymen is problematical.

"The ministers are beginning to realize," said one panelist, "that they have not educated their people. When you get what we call a church court assembled—that's an assembly of both ministers and laymen in the Presbyterian church—a curious thing happens to these laymen. When they are away from home at the church court they will vote for the right thing. But when they go home, back to their own congregation, they wouldn't dare vote the same way."

6. Diehard organizations. Since 1954 more than 50 segregationist organizations have been formed in the South. Of these the most powerful have been the White Citizens' Councils (in some states they have other titles like Patriots or States Rightists), and in the Northern mind they are associated with the most rabid stand. Several moderate Southerners at the conference reported that this view was oversimplified.

"I am not a member of the Citizens' Council, or the Patriots, or any of these groups, but I would like to call attention to the fact that despite a very explosive situation there have been very few acts of violence. Had it not been for the Citizens' Councils, made up of some good men, some good citizens, some believers in peace among the others, there would have been in the South the other extreme, the Ku Klux Klan. At any rate, their role has not been completely that of agitator. They have held down some trouble, I think."

"I agree, with reservations," said another moderate. "I think you have to distinguish between Citizens' Councils. They are part of the Southern scene, and they are free to advocate what they believe in, and where they link it to a nonviolent approach I find little fault in it. . . . Now in my state they don't seem to work out that way. They've been pretty much on the side of violence."

"I think it would be unrealistic, though," observed a third, "not to recognize that the White Citizens' Councils are made up of very sophisticated people. The white sheets and terror of the Klan aren't effective any more, and they know that, but there are other methods that are equally effective, if not more effective in the long run. It's more effective, for example, to bring economic pressure."

7. Traditionalists. Many older white people in the South experienced a kind of shock at the sudden overturning of a legal principle which had stood strongly for more than 50 years.

"My generation, rightly or wrongly," observed one panel member, "was brought up to believe that 'separate but equal' was the law of the land. We thought it was a part of the Constitution of the United States. Of course we had received ample warning. The Supreme Court's decisions leading up to the 1954 one had given us notice, but notice wasn't taken by many people, and actually the Court's ruling came as a terrific psychological shock to the masses of people.

"These people believe that they live in a government based on consent, and they are outraged that this decision, which changes the whole social pattern of life, was made in court by persons whom they have not chosen."

Given this viewpoint, it has not been difficult for traditionalists to argue that the Court—whose decisions never affected them so profoundly in the past—had somehow exceeded its authority and was exercising power that properly belonged to the legislative branch.

"I wonder how much of a threat," asked one Southern panelist on behalf of these protagonists, "is posed to our liberties by a situation, not just this particular decision, but any decision which allows nine men to interpret the Constitution in the light of political and social theories that are their own? Haven't we set up a dictatorship of the judiciary? And what is to prevent there coming a time when, by some strange freak—I'm confident it will never happen—when there shall be nine men, or five men, of entirely different social views to change it again?"

"The 1954 decision was consistent with the whole course of Supreme Court history," replied a Northern lawyer, "in that the Court has always taken the view that in interpreting the Constitution of the United States it was never bound—as it considers itself bound in most other fields—by mere precedent, because the problem is to interpret the Constitution correctly. If an error was made by an earlier Court, it ought to be corrected."

8. The Negroes. The group most directly affected by the 1954 decision, the Southern Negroes, received it with apprehension and a sense of caution. It gave them a new sense of status and a feeling of confidence in due process of law and led many to expect an early deliverance from the stigma of "second class citizenship." But few of them outside the border states have moved to take advantage of their new legal status.

The decision's long-term effects

Of the many repercussions of the 1954 decision, two big problems stand out in bold relief. The conferees agreed that these problems are of far greater consequence than any others, and that their seeming insolubility forms the core of today's racial distress.

1. The breakdown of communication. The upsetting of old customs and old relationships produced a climate of suspicion and distrust which has largely throttled communication not only between whites and Negroes but also among whites themselves and among Negroes. There is a disinclination to sit down and talk about ways out of the morass. Many at the conference gave eloquent testimony to this calamity.

"The thing that troubles me most in my part of the South is that communication between the two races has broken down almost entirely at the level of the most intelligent and thoughtful leadership of both groups."

"We had this business of communication all worked out in the South, and then it got disrupted. In slavery times there was lots of communication: the slave said what the white man wanted him to say. It worked perfectly. It seems to me that now for the first time the Southern white man is seeing the Negro as an equal, and this is a new kind of communication."

"I don't think in my lifetime there has ever been as little communication between responsible leaders of the two races as there is now. In my part of the South there is increasing mistrust and dislike and concealed resentment. I hear things said on both sides that wouldn't have been said a few years ago."

"This isn't entirely a white problem. The Negro leader, North or South; the Negro leader from the North going South; the Negro leader in the South; all have problems of communication with the mass of Negroes, and this is especially true when you go into the smaller towns, the towns with a population of 10,000 or so."

"They taught me an expression in Georgia, something that Negroes use. They say someone is 'talking at the big gate.' You see, down from the big house is the big gate. When he gets there he is likely to say what he really thinks; he wouldn't say it when he's up talking to the resident of the big house. I discovered in the South that there was a very great deal of that. The communication has been about what the majority group wanted to talk about.

"Now something has happened, the Negroes aren't talking at all, and we have got to find out whether Negroes are thinking a lot differently and acting differently from the way they did before."

"In the South in the old days there was a sense of humor. The situation was miserable, but the white man and the Negro could laugh with each other as they discussed it, each with a certain understanding of the other's position, yet the white man never completely understanding the Negro. I think one of the greatest fallacies about the South is that we Southerners say we understand the Negro. I don't think we do.

"All that sense of humor has gone now. There is a grimness. Nobody is laughing any more."

2. The silence of the moderates. The reasonable, cautious, liberal-minded people of the community have been afraid to speak up. The loudest voices have been those of the extremists, on the one hand saying "Now!" and on the other "Never!"

"Most of the people whom you would ordinarily think of as providing leadership in the community have been rendered speechless by the fact that the extremists have taken over."

"This thing has deteriorated. We have come to a situation where extremism is in control on both sides. We are at a complete impasse. Not only is there no communication, but the minute a person gives evidence that he has taken one side or another, he becomes the focus of attack."

"From what I have heard I gather that the tendency to extremism has characterized both sides, both races, and that the breakdown in communication has been caused by a hardening, an intensification, of feeling in both directions.

"It is worth noting, however," commented a religious leader, "that extremes are measured not only in terms of position but in terms of process. When we think of the NAACP as one of the extremes, it seems to me we leave out of account the fact that they are proceeding by due process, while the others are proceeding by nullification. As we press for justice we must not allow those who use due process to be arbitrarily considered as extremists."

III. "ALL DELIBERATE SPEED"

Before reasonable men can come to a meeting of minds on what can be done about the present crisis, the conference found the question of how soon must generally be faced. From Southern leaders, both moderate and conservative, comes a repeated and fervent plea for more time. Only if we are given more time, they say, can we even begin to talk about a solution. That the plea is largely a defensive move among the diehards even the moderates do not deny, but the latter have good reasons of their own for calling for time as they do. Sharp and bitter incidents have occurred in the past four years, and the moderates know that far too often such incidents aid the extremists. Theoretically therefore anything which calms the waters should help. One way to achieve calm, they reason, is to slow everything down. Because there is a widespread belief through the South that a "timetable exists for desegregation and that it is preordained (without regard for local conditions) by the federal government in concert with the NAACP, the plea for time is generally directed Northward.

"If you continue putting on force," said one Southerner, "and if you keep on saying 'you must do it now,' the time could very well come in several states of the South when they will close down their public school systems. And then, as far as losing face in international affairs is concerned, we will really have lost it."

"I am convinced," said another, "that if we try to move too rapidly with the school problem—and I'm dealing at this moment only with the schools, not with areas like transportation where there has been a surprising change in segregation patterns—we will have violence in the deep South. We will have it even with federal troops. We had only minor incidents at Little Rock—no deaths, no bloodshed —but I am convinced that in areas of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and some other states you would confront a much more violent situation.

"It takes a long time," observed a third, "to develop the desire in people for schooling. I am thinking about these millions of little children who need the schooling, and the interest of our country in giving it to them. But if we are going to protect the interests of this present generation of Negro children, and many of our white children, we must somehow find a way to slow down. I think our Supreme Court may have been wiser than it knew when it used the term 'deliberate speed.' We must put more emphasis on the deliberate than on the speed. Now, I think if we can find a way to stay the impending danger so that these young folks will get their schooling, we can then perhaps relieve the tension."

"The Supreme Court was right in its decision," observed a Southern woman, "and the South is going to have to find a way of accepting this. It was a decision which had to be made some time. The Negro would not have been given these rights for many years without federal action. But I feel also that no matter when this decision came it was bound to be too early for the South, both Negro and white. Unless you are living side by side with the Negro and the white Southerner I do not see how you can understand the situation—it only takes a little time away from it for it to grow dim."

The appeal for time gives rise to two difficult questions: if time is given, how will it be used? And even if there is some agreement to grant more time, who has the power to grant it?

How is the time to be used?

Almost four years have passed since the Supreme Court handed down its decision, and in those four years only some seven hundred out of three thousand school districts have been desegregated. This has caused even some moderate Southerners to wonder who would actually benefit from any granting of time, and how such time would be used.

"I am willing to admit that time may be needed in Arkansas, after what they have been through," said a conferee, "but in Virginia the plea for time troubles me. What is going to be the result of more time in a state like Virginia? The past three years have been used in Virginia to drive the moderates underground. As everyone knows, there isn't a single school district thus far in the entire state complying with the Court's ruling. The time has been used to create a totalitarian atmosphere. It has been used to silence all questions with smears. . . . If more time can be used by moderates to reestablish communications, to create understanding, then, fine! But the question haunts me."

The most reasoned spelling out of how the time was to be used came from one who had observed racial disorder at first hand.

"As one advocate of time concession," he remarked, "I would say that it is purely to suspend for a little while further federal government pressures, because official pressures exacerbate the problem of discussion at the local level. And the local community is one place where you can really make progress, if a discussion in which change is advocated doesn't put you on the side of those advocating force from outside the community and outside the state."

But he was challenged by a participant who wanted a further definition of the "pressures" to be suspended.

"There has been no legislative pressure from Washington," said the questioner. "There has been no executive pressure. I presume you mean court pressure?"

"Well," came the reply, "I mean a gesture of understanding of the difficulties which beset the South. I see no reason for those outside the South objecting to that kind of plea in good faith by the moderates, by those who believe in justice and equality and the elimination of segregation; because ultimately this must be done. I think it's the clearing of the atmosphere, really, that we are pleading for. But coupled with that we would hope for the suspension of too much coercion, sweepingly applied."

"If there is going to be time," remarked someone else, "the time should be used to enable those moderates who are willing to act to begin to devise strategies for action in a variety of local communities which will recreate the possibility of negotiation."

Because the role of the federal government is inextricably involved in any consideration of how much time there is and how much can be granted, two comments from persons who had witnessed the Little Rock crisis last fall were meaningful.

"Not enough attention," said one, "has been directed to the policies of the federal government, or more properly to the lack of them. It is a vast distance from the Supreme Court decision of May, 1954, which was moderate and actually gradualistic in its practical application, to the final resort to armed force by the President in Little Rock three years later. And it is a distance that spans a critical void, for while some of the Southern political leaders were, by design or default, paving the way for massive resistance, the federal government took no single, constructive step in recognition of a worsening situation.

"The consequences are now evident. When the inevitable direct challenge came, there was no plan to meet it. The attempts at conciliation were bound to be futile since the situation had already deteriorated to the point where compromise was impossible."

"I am inclined to think," said the other when asked what lessons could be learned from the Little Rock disturbance, "that perhaps if the federal court had used its marshals to enforce the order of the court, which is usually done in cases when the federal court issues an injunction, perhaps the ardor of those disturbers would have been cooled. They should have been brought down to the federal court by the marshal and fined. You know, not a person has yet been charged with violating the injunction of the court."

A further comment came from a border state resident:

"I think it would be of service," he said, "in moving toward a reasonable approach, to keep in mind, when we speak of moderation and time and the things we are going to compromise on, that a lot of moderation went into the Supreme Court decision, and a lot of moderation and compromise goes into individual cases as they come up.

"I don't think of this decision or the effort to implement it as extreme. It is itself a compromise, and it seems to me that we must keep that before the people when we talk to them. Otherwise we may find ourselves compromising until nothing substantial is left."

Who can grant more time?

Throughout the discussions of time and how it was to be used ran an undercurrent of questioning: if time is to be given, who can give it, and how? Can the processes of history and the demands of great bodies of public opinion really be slowed down or ameliorated? If so, by whom?

"The roots of these pressures," said a Negro participant, "are in people's minds and hearts and aspirations. They are not faucets that can be turned on and off. There is an awakening of Negroes in the South to the values of our way of life, to concepts that were not familiar to them before. And the pressures arise oftentimes because these things are in the air. Events develop out of decisions of individuals. Rosa Parks' decision not to move to the rear of the bus in Montgomery was a spontaneous one. You cannot control that kind of decision. I'm afraid there isn't enough appreciation of this fact; there is a tendency to assume that somebody or some organization can turn these pressures on and off."

"I think one of the most appalling things in the South today," remarked a woman participant, "is how little the white Southerners understand the movement in the hearts of the Negro Southerners. They want to believe—and they do believe in a majority of cases—that this is something imposed from the outside, that other forces are bringing this in, stirring up trouble; but, as someone has told us, the thing that's moving in the hearts of people in Montgomery is the same thing that's moving in the hearts of people in Mandalay today."

"The most the NAACP can do," said a Northener, "is to say in a particular place 'We will' or 'We will not' press a particular suit at this time. But they can't even control this, because a parent may decide that he's tired of waiting, for one reason or another—inferior teaching, or because the child, he feels, is getting wrong attitudes or has too narrow a racial approach to things—he may decide he doesn't want his child to go to the Negro school any more, so he's willing to force the issue of attendance in the white school. And then the organizations have no choice, because they can't let this person down. They have to move."

Perhaps the only releasing of pressure that could be effected in any way is the kind the federal government can grant, as pointed out by the spokesman above who asked for "a gesture of understanding." But even this careful and thoughtful a plea must take into consideration the pressures that are constantly brought to bear on the federal government itself. They are pressures which cannot and should not be ignored.

"I'm troubled about one thing," said a Northerner. "Almost nothing has been said about Northern sentiment, Northern agitators. A great many advances in the South have been brought about by Northern agitation. It required Northern agitation to get some action on the poll tax, didn't it? Lynching! Lynching was an evil from 1865 to 1915, and I don't think it was stamped out until the Northern agitation became very vehement.

"I would be all for removing pressures on the South—that is, Northern pressures on the South—but I think Northern pressures on the South will have to be replaced by some Southern pressures for action, or else the old agitation will spring up spontaneously. It can't be governed."

In a lighter vein another Northerner echoed him.

"I'd like to know what is meant by that plea for more time. Does it mean that for the next six months, a year, two years, Northern citizens and Northern newspapers should not publically criticize the present government of Virginia? If these people think that I should refrain from criticizing Mr. Byrd and the State of Virginia they can jump in the lake. I hope that when they talk about easing of pressure they don't mean that I am going to keep my big mouth shut for three years, because I'm not going to do that."

IV. COMMON GROUND

Despite many differences of view on specific points, the participants in the Patterson Memorial Conference discovered that on some of the larger issues they were very much in agreement. This in itself was an encouraging sign, one that gives hope for the future of the racial situation in America. For if moderate men and women of both races can get together and evoke such a large area of unanimity there is reason to believe that others of reasonable disposition and outlook in both North and South can do the same, with results of positive value.

First of all there was a basic, if not directly stated, agreement on some fundamental values which bear on the problem:

A. What is inevitable. Two powerful forces are at work in the nation, both impossible to deny and both capable of producing strong feelings and dramatic, sometimes catastrophic events.

1. The rise of the Negro people. The demand of Negroes in both North and South for better schooling, better housing and greater economic opportunity cannot be pushed aside.

2. The conservative resistance. Southern feelings of rigidity against school desegregation and Northern fears of housing devaluation strike deep. Although it is the extremists who try to exploit these emotions, many cautious but fearful moderates bow to them in times of stress and crisis.

B. What is mandatory. In the face of strong popular feelings and crosscurrents, certain fundamental American ideals and standards must be maintained and reaffirmed.

1. Respect for the law. Because we live in a government of law, not of men, we must at all times protect the principle of due process.

2. Education for all. The right of every American child to receive the best possible schooling at public expense is not only a cornerstone of our social system but a necessary guarantee of our future safety.

"We must have training," said a Southerner. "We must educate the people. It's compulsory upon all of us in America. We must raise the standard of all the Negro people throughout the South. We have got to do it as a matter of safety, as protection for ourselves; for health; and for the generations of minds that will develop future cultural ideals."

3. Equality of opportunity. Of all the rights to be protected, this is the most valuable and critical.

"The concept of equality of opportunity," said a prominent lawyer at the conference, "while it is not specifically a constitutional principle, it is at the very root of the American notion that there shall be unlimited opportunity for American citizens and those in the United States who are not citizens. Our people should be allowed to realize the fullest reach to which their effort and energy and capacity may entitle them.

"If anybody were to say to any American, 'You tell me what you think the most basic principle is,' he would undoubtedly answer equality of opportunity."

4. No coercion. Moral and social judgments imposed under a bayonet are not very effective.

"Here in the element of morality," said one speaker, "I think you find the core of the problem. For no problem is ever settled until it is settled right. We'd better accept that as a background for all of our thinking."

5. Sense of responsibility on both sides. Not only must whites allow the Negro to make his way toward his rightful place in society but they must help the Negro to live up to the new responsibilities this requires.

"I do feel that the white people have overprotected the colored people," remarked a panelist from the South. "It's a definite fault on the part of the whites to protect the Negroes as you would a child, and the Negroes to look for that rather than to seek responsibility."

"There has to be trust in a person," said a Northerner. "There has to be an element of personal trust before the Negro who, after all, has been engaged in a very severe, now almost century-old fight for survival, will have trust in return."

6. Clarity of national policy. With the possibility of new racial crises always present it is imperative that there be firmer, clearer leadership from Washington. It was significant that no one at the conference seriously disputed the indictment made by one Southern moderate.

> "I recognize that I am a partisan," he said, "but I think we have had a bankruptcy of leadership in the last three years in this respect which is perfectly appalling. The President of the United States has done nothing to make it easier for moderates to rally the forces of decency."

C. What is misunderstood. The conferees were eager to work toward dispelling the many misunderstandings which needlessly hamstring so many efforts toward racial harmony.

1. The Supreme Court's decision will not go away.

> "I think it would be astonishing," said a Southerner, "to most Northerners to realize how many people you talk with throughout the South who feel that this is a momentary unhappiness, a sort of affliction that is either going to be repealed or, by their lack of approval of it, is going to be modified so greatly that they will not have to comply."

2. The crisis is not a creature of the North.

> "The white South," said a panel member, "has a misconception that the NAACP has come in and stirred up perfectly happy, contented, nice colored people. They don't resent their own colored people, and I don't think they would resent local leadership asking and getting done what should be done, but they do resent outsiders."

3. Nor is complete integration necessarily the goal.

> "I think that the white South has not been touched in a communication of what the Negro really wants. I recall one very eminent Negro saying once that he didn't want to be with anybody—he simply didn't want to be locked out because of his color. How can we communicate to the South that the Negro merely wants the same simple human dignities? We feel in our community that the real demand among the Negroes is for the removal of the stigma of inequality."
>
> "It's sometimes difficult to say what the Negro wants," said a Negro panelist, "in the sense of being with white people, except to say that he does not want to be, per se, with anybody. He wants the opportunity. He wants the right."
>
> "As I understand the situation," said another Negro, "it seems to me that we would be very much helped if we thought of the word

'desegregation' rather than 'integration.' I think they are two different concepts, and bearing this in mind makes it much easier to understand, really, what I conceive to be the Court's decision; that is, that it is to avoid any discrimination on account of race. It is not a forcing of anything. It is an elimination of artificial barriers."

D. What our assets are. Not all the forces at work are negative, destructive ones.

1. Economic progress in the South. The need for trained manpower and for industrial and commercial expansion throughout the South helps break down racial barriers.

"You can't industrialize and keep segregation," said a conferee. "After you get beyond a certain point you can't perpetuate this thing. If you have an expanding community and expanding job opportunities, and people recognize this as a central factor in their prosperity, then there is more incentive to pass legislation. Here is a whole new market, and the entrepreneurs don't want to get caught in the radical squeeze."

"The Firestone company," reported another, "granted desegregation as a result of court action. They had wanted to give in, but a majority in the white union of the rubber workers did not want certain Negroes to get positions that their skill entitled them to. So they went to court, and under the court's ruling a plan was worked out between management and the union that permitted the progress of these Negroes, and it was all done quietly."

2. Countrywide distaste for violence. The American instinct for fair play limits the effectiveness of extremists.

"Whatever people feel about the social patterns in Little Rock," said one who had observed that scene, "its citizens are people who believe in law and order. The violence that was done, the first threats that were made, the political results that were finally brought about, were by a well-organized minority predominantly from outside the city."

3. Flexibility of the Court's decree. The elastic but gently insistent "all deliberate speed" formula allows for an infinite number of solutions to an almost infinite number of problems.

"I always had the feeling," commented a panel member, "that the white South was disturbed over the high school situation much more than over the grammar school situation, and I have once or twice proposed that we go back to separate high schools on the basis of sex in the hope that that would give the South some feeling of, maybe, escape on this social angle of the situation. At least it is one way out."

4. Past accomplishments. The number of victories already won point the way to future gains. Principally, these consist of the desegregating of institutions of higher education and the opening of public facilities such as transportation and park services.

Using these values as a fromework the conference went on to tackle the core of the problem: what can be done. Two steps were recognized as having paramount importance: an immediate resumption of communication and a return of the moderates in the South to the center of the stage.

Building A Bridge of Communication

The prime task ahead is the restoration of bridges of understanding—between the two races and among the members of each race.

Quite early in the conference someone identified the key to restoring communications. It is to be content with small steps, and to find issues other than racial ones on which to start talking.

"It has been obvious," he said, "that if you say your objective is to integrate or to resist integration, either statement tends to feed the fire of the extremist. So you have to express your objective in a way that will mitigate rather than increase tension.

"Now, if you are out to achieve a complex objective, the way to begin is to fiind a series of possible sub-objectives toward which to work. You have to bite off chunks of this thing and find a way to make those chunks practicable.

"One way is to express the issue locally—get it focused on local communities. Another way is to express it economically. Another would be religiously."

"In my humble judgment," said another panelist, "we shall or shall not make progress in solving our racial problems to the extent that we are able to get the two groups to sit down together, consciously sitting down together to work on some common problems. Maybe they would not be racial problems to begin with; but the very fact psychologically of Negroes and whites sitting down together to work on common problems would, I believe, go a long way toward building up that climate in which they could then begin to work on some of the more explosive and difficult questions."

"I don't think it's fair," observed a Northerner, "to ask people to sacrifice just for the good of humanity. I do know that most advances in civil rights—the larger ones—have been tied into something bigger that was a real concern, economically or materially."

Several panelists suggested that because extremists invariably "go to the limit" in any controversy, it is important in any attempt at opening up avenues of communication to keep from discussing ultimate aims.

"It seems to me that a Southerner can keep his beliefs," said one panelist from the South, "and still realize that in our kind of society our formal constitutional structure must deal with each citizen with an even hand. We are a procedural country, not a country of objectives, and the procedure is supposed to open up a maximum number of objectives."

"There is a serious difficulty in arriving at understanding in the South," said another, "due to the fact that every organization operating there is dedicated to achieving one particular goal. There are so many interracial groups saying, 'Come, let us reason together as reasonable men of good will and find some way that we can to arrive at integration with as little trouble as possible,' and to a lot of people that's doubletalk for saying, 'Come, let us reason together as reasonable men and find some way that we can cut our throats.'

"Now I haven't heard it expressed before, but I would hope there could be an organization that would say, 'Come, let us reason together and discuss our problems and not set a goal. Let's see where our discussion leads us.'"

The following dialogue was highly illuminating (both participants are Southerners):

A. "Why can't we approach this problem in this way: instead of getting groups together to talk about any phase of this integration question, why can't we get groups to talk together about whatever community problems there are that are not related to race in any way, and thereby begin to build up mutual confidence in the status of people as individuals and in their integrity and in their intellgence?"

B: "I don't thnk you can sit down and calmly discuss . . ."

A: "Juvenile delinquency?"

B: ". . . juvenile delinquency, when the house is on fire. And I don't think that analogy is overdrawn. In this racial business the house is on fire, and I think we need to discuss it."

A: "Don't you think, if everybody came to realize the house was on fire, that sooner or later somebody would try to take a little water and put it on the fire, even though what they had really come together to do was to make bricks out of straw? The very fact that people were willing to meet together would be an indication that they were willing to do something about the fire."

Organizations already in existence can be models for others.

"The Southern Regional Council is not an action group," reported one who knows that body. "It's a communication group. It's a bridge. It attempts to get local people together so that they can sit around a table, Negro and white—it's interracial in all its activities. It is made up of some of the finest people in the South. It does a great deal of work without fanfare, because that's the only way it can do it."

In some cases, local groups working on completely non-racial matters have been valuable in maintaining links between the races.

"Let me take an example," said a Southerner. "Our city is in as unhappy a situation as any that I know of. But one of the few agencies that has existed and which has provided some measure of communication has been a small interracial committee working on an entirely different problem. It is the local committee sponsoring the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis drive."

Restoring the Moderates

Once a bridge of communication has been reestablished in a community it may be possible to pursue the second and greater goal: restoring the reasonable, moderate citizens to the center of the stage.

First of all, what is a moderate?

"I wonder whether we could say," offered one panel member, "that a moderate is a man who in human problems seeks for a constructive outcome, and is willing to make reasonable compromises."

"Let me add to that," said another. "I would say that a moderate is one who is willing to admit that there are two sides to the question, and is willing also to sit down and discuss the other side with someone who believes the other side."

"He's not so damn sure he's right," added a third.

Moderates must begin to organize at the local, community level, and they must seek out other moderates.

"You have to know your community," remarked someone. "You must know where in the community there are people who have some influence, and you must include every kind of influence. And I would emphasize that the first thing in each community is to make an analysis of what that community presently is, and where there are people who, speaking together, could move the community off dead center."

"There is a tendency," said another, "for people who adopt a moderate position to bring other people with them—people of status and substantial wealth. I think we should take advantage of this tendency. If these people of status occupy a greater position in the community than the extremists, that should have an effect."

There must be strong leadership within the local group.

"It takes both the devoted groups who support each other locally," observed a Northerner, "and a leader who is dynamic and has a sense of direction to help orient those groups."

"The moderates can often be gotten together," added a Southerner, "but the leadership too often is missing. As soon as it appears, the followers often appear."

Initial leadership often comes from women.

"I am a firm believer," said one, "that it's going to take the women to do it because they have more time. Their convictions are stronger, and their livelihood is a little safer."

Local groups of moderates must formulate plans of action so that they will know exactly what to do when and if a crisis occurs.

"What I have been working on in my community," reported one community leader, "is at getting agreement among the citizens who are responsible for policy—the mayor of the town, the chairman of the school board, the men who are going to make the public decisions later—getting agreement among them as to what they are going to do when the crisis arises. When the crisis does come they can get things rolling and appeal to the people in the interests of a policy that has been previously formulated."

Constant vigilance must be exercised against outsiders and extremists.

"It occurs to me," observed someone, "why North Carolina hasn't had any incidents. They were able to keep out the Kaspers and the Griffiths. I think no matter how much preparation you make, if at the last week or the last day or the last minute you let people like that come in—the crusading segregationists—why, they can upset the apple cart. The day Kasper came into Winston-Salem the community was prepared for him and they kept him moving."

But the moderates in Little Rock—or most of them—thought they had laid all the proper groundwork and taken all the necessary precausions. What went wrong?

"The moderates thought they had reached everyone," said someone who had studied the situation, "but there were too many people left outside. The moderate leadership overestimated their own importance. Virgil Blossom carried out a plan that I think most of us, if we had looked at it in advance, would have thought was pretty good. He carefully identified about 200 targets in the power structure of the city, and he thought that he was working with them. And yet, when the chips were down it turned out there were any number of really important centers of power which had not been included. They were not quite as visible or quite as far up on the social prestige scale, but they were operationally effective and they had not been brought in. The plan was not adequate. The wisdom was not sufficient. Maybe the Little Rock moderates were wise, but they were not wise enough."

If moderates are looking for a rallying point they will find none better than the church. But religious leaders have not thus far done as much as could be hoped.

"In Atlanta," reported a panelist, "there is a rather large interracial church—the Unitarian Church—which has not suffered at all during this whole period, and goes right along every Sunday and every weekday."

"I found in Little Rock," said someone who was more critical of what the churches have done, "that the churches should have begun five or ten years earlier. They had not done so. And when one pastor preached his sermon—a very mild sermon—in support of the school board plan three or four months ahead of the integration date, a considerable proportion of his congregation withdrew, or threatened to withdraw, and his board immediately concluded: 'we haven't done our home work.' They are going to do it now."

In both North and South, men of good will can promote the cause of moderation by giving emphasis to the constructive deeds being done. Many participants in the conference were surprised to learn of the great progress being made in Atlanta and hoped more notice could be taken of it.

"The question is," said someone, "how can you take the emphasis off Little Rock and put it on Atlanta? How can you put it on the efforts of a decent community to redress the situation? If you could solve this, you would bring about a major revolution."

"I think it would help the South to get a new image of itself," observed someone else. "There are many traditions in the South. There is a tradition of violence and a tradition of good will. The tradition of violence makes news, but I think it's very important for isolated Southerners to be aware that the other tradition is still in effect too. It would be very constructive to have an awareness not only in the South but in the North that these things are taking place —the judge who does this, the constructive things that are happening every day."

"Most of the people here probably agree," added a third participant, "that the greatest single influence in the South is the church, and that the church has very few outlets in terms of news or comment. I think if liaison could be made or strengthened between church groups in the North and those in the South, then by repercussion it would almost certainly have a beneficial effect on the South. It would indicate that we up here are not unfair, not given to patting ourselves on the back all the time, but anxious to cooperate with men of good will, whoever they may be, everywhere."

As the conference concluded, two statements were made which deserve special attention. The first was by a man in public life:

"I think you should know that the preachers have fought hard to lead our people correctly in this, and when a Virginia politician says, 'Oh yes, the preachers are against us, but the people are with us,' the fact remains that he took the preachers into account.

"So you come to the injunction that the minister makes as he gives you these three rules. They happen to be my own.

"First, seek a nonviolent solution to the problem. That's got to be presented in every community.

"Second, don't seal the lips of the minister. The extremists would like to. They believe in applying economic, social and political pressure to the ministers; but they bottle up the truth when they do it.

"Finally, do justice in specific situations."

The other statement was by a thoughtful woman who has come to know the South well:

> "The time has come, it seems to me, for tender hearts and tough minds. Too often in the past some of our very constructive groups have had the tender hearts but have lacked the tough minds. Our demagogues and our politicians have had the tough minds.
>
> "A tender heart today without intelligence has no meaning and less effectiveness. A tough mind without the tender heart will overlook the very crucial emotional points upon which this question, it seems to me, is going to be resolved in the South. It will be resolved not by statistics alone, not by knowledge alone of the head, but by knowledge of the heart. If we can combine a feeling of humanity with the tough thinking that is required for, indeed, our very survival, then this conference will perhaps be a springboard, not to outer space, but to inner freedom."

PARTICIPANTS

Several who participated in the Arden House sessions requested that their names be withheld, because in the present climate prevailing in the South "they may be quoted out of context" or "comments by others might be identified with them" thus distorting their true positions.

The authorized list of participants includes:

Buford Boone, Editor, Tuscaloosa News, Alabama; Dr. Lyman Bryson, Columbia University, New York; Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, Under Secretary, United Nations, New York; Father Francis J. Burkley, New Orleans, Louisiana; Dr. Harry J. Carman, Dean Emeritus, Columbia College, New York; Dr. Rufus Early Clement, President, Atlanta University, Georgia; George Field, Executive Secretary, Freedom House, New York; Dr. Luther Hilton Foster, President, Tuskegee Institute, Alabama; Dr. Frank S. Horne, Director, Commission on Intergroup Relations, New York City; Mrs. Katherine Gauss Jackson, Editor, Harpers Magazine, New York; Dan Mabry Lacy, American Book Publishers Council, New York; Charles Livermore, Executive Director, State Commission Against Discrimination, New York; Rev. Charles Wesley Lowry, Foundation for Religious Action, Washington, D. C.; Edward John Meeman, Editor, Memphis Press-Scimitar, Tennessee; Col. Francis Pickens Miller, civic and religious leader, Charlottesville, Virginia.

Also Rev. Claud D. Nelson, National Council of Churches, New York; Dr. Allan Nevins, historian, New York; Virgilia Peterson, author and critic, New York; Elizabeth M. Riley, publisher, New York; Dr. Dean Rusk, President, Rockefeller Foundation, New York; Dr. James Russell, National Education Association, Washington, D. C.; Whitney North Seymour, attorney, New York; Mrs. Elder Shearon, civic leader, Memphis, Tennessee; J. K. Shepherd, business and civic leader, Little Rock, Arkansas; Dr. George N. Shuster, President, Hunter College, New York; Mrs. Caroline K. Simon, attorney, New York; Mark Starr, Education Director, International Ladies Garment Workers Union, New York; Wilma Dykeman Stokely and James Stokely, authors, Tennessee; Rex Stout, author, Brewster, New York; Mrs. Dorothy Tilly, Southern Regional Council, Atlanta, Georgia; Robert Penn Warren, author, Yale University, Connecticut; Dr. C. Vann Woodward, author and historian, Johns Hopkins University, Maryland; and the authors of this report.

FREEDOM HOUSE

BOARD OF TRUSTEES

WHITNEY NORTH SEYMOUR, Chairman of the Board

HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE, Chairman, Exec. Committee

HARRY D. GIDEONSE, President

RALPH J. BUNCHE
LEO CHERNE
GEORGE B. FORD
Vice-Presidents

REX STOUT, Treasurer

MRS. HENRY GALE, Assistant Treasurer

GEORGE FIELD, Executive Secretary

•

Herbert Agar
Ulric Bell
Lyman Bryson
Cass Canfield
Harry J. Carman
Norman Cousins
Christopher T. Emmet
Thomas K. Finletter
Arthur J. Goldsmith
Nathaniel L. Goldstein
Samuel Goldwyn
Harold K. Guinzburg
Helen Hayes
Henry W. Hobson
Mrs. Andrew Jackson
Jacob K. Javits
J. M. Kaplan
Maxwell A. Kriendler
Goodhue Livingston, Jr.
Francis Pickens Miller
Edgar Ansel Mowrer
Allan Nevins
James A. Pike
Whitelaw Reid
Elizabeth M. Riley
Francis E. Rivers
Mrs. Kermit Roosevelt
Elmo Roper
George N. Shuster
Mrs. Caroline K. Simon
Nathaniel Singer
Spyros P. Skouras
Louis Stulberg
Channing H. Tobias
J. Waties Waring
W. W. Waymack
Robert M. Weitman
William L. White
Roy Wilkins

February 13, 1959

Dear Chet:

What a thoughtful guy you are to send me the note from the Atlanta Biltmore. Give me a shout on the 'phone at your convenience and let's lunch. It is much too long since we met.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester S. Williams
431 East 20th Street
New York 10, N.Y.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Va.

Jan. 26, 1959

Dear Ed:

Remember 1930? I couldn't resist after your great show on Virginia dropping you a note from this hotel.

I had dinner tonight in the Empire Room. The headwaiter Mr. Brown - said to me as I left - "Your faces is familiar - when did I see you last?" I replied, "Not in December 1930?" He said, "I was here!" I said "Ed Murrow and I were here with a convention of student leaders."

His face lighted up and he leaned close to whisper - "Yes, I remember - the first time Negro students ever came in the front door of the Biltmore! No trouble!"

It's been a long time...
Hope you'll have lunch with me at the Overseas Press Club sometime in February.

Jack - my youngest, oldest and only - is marrying a Birmingham, Alabama girl next Saturday night. Her father, an engineer, said when he saw Ralph Bunche's name on the invitation list - "Wonder if he'll come? If he does, he'll have to sit in the balcony - and I'll sit with him."

Times change.

Best -

Bert

SIN

March 23, 1956

Dear Chet:

Many thanks for taking time to write as fully as you did on March 14. The reaction to the piece has, on the whole, been favorable. I very much fear that an explosion is inevitable.

I am off to Florida for two weeks and will call you when I get back.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester Williams
World Information
608 Fifth Avenue
New York, New York

rh

My new address
WORLD INFORMATION
608 Fifth Ave.
New York, N.Y.

Ci- 5- 8734

March 14, 1956

Dear Ed:

While the reactions of myself and guests to your Arab-Israel program are still fresh, let me give you the highlights - such as they may be worth.

Our guests included: two specialists in the Middle East from the UN Secretariat, an Egyptian Secretariat Member who was associated with Nasser on his welfare program, George Denny, an Air Force officer, and an editor who served USIS in the Middle East during and shortly after the war.

As you can guess, the reactions were quite varied. Those who had no particular background or experience in the area felt that your program was very fairly balanced and surprisingly "pro-Egyptian". Those who looked at it through first-hand knowledge of the area and the Palestine problem felt in varying degrees that it was "loaded" in favor of Israel.

This struck me as an interesting contrast - one that emphasizes that everyone reads into what he sees or hears what he already knows and feels about the subject. To those who felt very pro-Israel every second devoted to Egypt seemed like a minute and every minute allocated to Israel seemed like a second. Those who knew the most about the situation were most keenly aware of things left out - and considered the selectivity a deliberate distortion.

For example, the Egyptian and two or three of the "old hands" in our living room felt that the selection of refugees who vented their antagonism toward the U.S. was designed to prejudice Americans against them. Others didn't take it that way. Everybody seemed to agree that the Israeli side was invested with emotional content while the Egyptian side was rather coldly intellectual and factual.

The discussion went on vigorously for two hours after the program. I would summarize it like this: in terms of the realities and facts known to people who have experienced and studied them, the editing was quite "loaded" on the Israeli side; while in terms of this program in comparison with other TV and mass media treatment of the issues was strikingly balanced and in effect challenging to many Zionist claims. We felt that Nasser made a good impression compared to Ben Gurion - created an image that would be hard to distort into "devil".

I had expected to see and hear an interesting series of contrasting answers by Nasser and Ben Gurion on the same questions - after what you had told me. So I was somewhat surprised that Ben Gurion didn't deal with some of the crucial questions which were put so bluntly to Nasser. I dare say that an even more exciting and enlightening program could be made from the scraps on the cutting-room floor than was made with the material you selected. But on balance it was a very interesting and useful performance. I had the feeling that Smith's bold reporting and editorializing on Sunday, March 4, put you under heavy pressures.

I would appreciate the return of the papers I lent you - if it is not too much trouble. Best to you and yours.

Clet

William Chester

October 26, 1953

MEMO ON INTERPRETATION OF WORLD TRADE PICTURE

News pegs

Administration reports on foreign economic policy, particularly the Committee headed by Randall, will be made early in 1954. Recommendations will affect new legislation.

Capehart Committee will also be reporting from the Senate.

Group led by Coleman is getting tooled up for public education effort on practical measures to substitute trade for aid.

Conflicting interests will come to sharp focus in the emerging debate involving protectionist bloc, export needs of grain farmers, elements of labor on both sides, and increasing activities of Soviet trade missions.

Issue of U. S. leadership in organizing a workable trading pattern to keep united and to strengthen the non-Communist world may become the key to the foreign policy debates of 1954 and 1956.

Background understandings needed

How multilateral, circular world trade works - how it worked under British organization before World War I, and works after a fashion today with U. S. foreign aid bridging a big gap.

What World War II did to the trading patterns in Europe and Asia.

What trade means to certain free countries such as Britain, Scandinavian states, Japan, etc., and how their dependence on trade to live affects our foreign policy objectives.

What the Stalin-Malenkov policy shift to economic pressure, exploiting lack of free world trade organization, means to us. How the program is supposed to work to weaken and divide the Western coalition.

Kinds of obstacles to trade that complicate the policy of substituting trade for aid.

How trade affects people personally - housewife, worker and farmer in field relying on considerable export market, or threatened with competition from imports, government procurement of essentials for defense, steel or auto importer of components.

How WORLD INFORMATION could contribute to a projected program

Provide background data and analysis.

Liaison with committees involved and specialists, pin-pointing emphasis in up-coming reports and recommendations.

Consult on program-planning - offering suggestions and checking on treatment.

WORLD INFORMATION
Research Consultants
EMPIRE STATE BUILDING · NEW YORK 1, N. Y.
LACKAWANNA 4-8663

CHESTER S. WILLIAMS
HERBERT HARRIS

see Ciu

October 6, 1953

Mon. 10/26
3:00

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Ed:

You may recall my reference to plans I was exploring last spring to develop a research and liaison service for certain firms and organizations in need of a better bridge to international agencies and the diplomatic as well as technical specialists. Herbert Harris - a former assistant to Hoffman and later to Harriman in ECA - and I found enough interest and an initial client to justify setting up our shop this fall.

It occurs to me that we may be in a position to take on a special project or two for you. The coming to a head of the world trade issues - on which we are working in another connection - calls for the kind of dramatic interpretation you give such difficult issues.

You are no doubt familiar with Harris' work in this field at Fortune Magazine, UN World and currently for Nation's Business. We have in mind an approach to the world trade story that may be of interest to one or another of your sponsors.

Perhaps we can arrange to get together in the near future to explore the possibilities.

Best wishes,

Cordially,

Chet

Chester S. Williams

CSW:dew

Williams, Chester S.

Chester S. Williams
431 East 20th Street
New York 10, N. Y.

December 2, 1952

Dear Ed:

Elizabeth and I thought your atomic piece with the whiplash ending was terrific. You are holding up to a very high standard - even over-shooting it at times. Congratulations on the renewed sponsorship of Alcoa.

It was good to get a glimse of you the other day at the Century Club; sorry I didn't get a chance to say "hello".

You may get an inquiry about me in connection with an application for a position on which I gave your name as one of the references. I had particularly in mind your knowledge of my survey in Britain in 1942, and the preliminary work I did for you on "CBS Reviews thePress".

I resigned from the U.S. Mission last April to undertake a survey and planning job regarding the world affairs councils program which the Ford Fund for Adult Education was trying to realize through the FPA. The plans were adopted and a half million in additional grants were made by the Fund, but I declined the post of director under prevailing circumstances obstructing the realization of the plans. I let go of the job I had in prospect for the fall when I thought the FPA reorganization commitments gave real promise. So now I have to pursue new leads. Two look somewhat hopeful at the moment - both large corporations in the international field. But it does take time.

Meanwhile a few consultant opportunities have come my way. I'll give you a ring soon as it might be very helpful to have your suggestions. Any short-term work that might be done on a fee basis would interest me because I want to be in a position to wait for the opportunity that really appeals to me.

Give our best wishes to Janet.

As Always,

Chet

Telephone: GRammercy 3 - 3306

P.S. Jack is a sophmore at Miami Univ. in Oxford, Ohio. How time marches on

December 19, 1951

Dear Chet:

Many thanks for yours of December 6. As a matter of fact I was in Paris when that issue of Colliers hit the stands and a considerable number of my friends took me to task for it and they were of course entirely justified. I offer no excuses but expect that it was a case where a number of reasonably responsible people were "sold" individually on what turned out to be an irresponsible project. You will I am sure be glad to know that my latest report indicates that the project to publish the thing in book form has been abandoned. Bob Sherwood, Joe Barnes, and myself all did what hatchet work we could to prevent the book from coming out.

Thanks again for writing with your usual wisdom and frankness. I shall hope to see you when you return; meanwhile best of luck.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester S. Williams
Hotel Astoria
131, Avenue des Champs-Elysees
Paris (8e) France

UNITED STATES DELEGATION
TO THE
GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Hotel Astoria
131, Avenue des Champs-Elysées
Paris (8e) France

December 6, 1951

Dear Ed:

This is a personal letter.

Shortly before we left for Paris, I saw the Colliers' special edition in which you, Bob Sherwood and others collaborated in picturing a third world war. It struck me at the time as a highly dubious and perplexing effort, but not until we got to Paris did I realize what a terrific propaganda blunder it was in the light of the overall world situation. I have a hunch that you, too, were surprised at how it looked when the sensational pictures and text were put together.

I understand that arrangements are now being made to publish it in pamphlet form in French and other foreign languages for mass circulation. This I would regard as a major disaster for our country. If Colliers did circulate the editorial under the title, "The Unwanted War", without the sensational pictures and fantastic crystal-gazing, it might do some good, because this part has been almost universally lost.

I don't know what you can do about it, though it would seem a bit frustrating not to be able to prevent one's name from being used in an expanded publication effort which threatens such a disadvantage to one's own country.

I am enclosing a copy of a letter written by a very shrewd observer who is the head of a large international organization here, who has spent 35 years in Europe, and part of this time in Eastern Europe and Russia. I do not

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

quote his name because he has given me permission only to send you the contents of a private letter he has sent to his office in New York. I also enclose a statement which some representatives of other organizations have, in one way or another, used in reporting back to their headquarters in New York. These are just two of many, many indications of a similar reaction.

Best wishes.

Sincerely,

Chet

Chester S. Williams

P.S. Feel free to pass this on to Bob Sherwood or any of the others ~~whom~~ you think may be interested. CSW

Since dictating this I have learned that the further promotion plans have been reconsidered - I hope this means "abandoned."

Statement by the Head of an International Organization of Great Reputation

- -

"Altho most folks at home may be surprised to learn it, one of the minor scandals around the U.N. Assembly here is the unbelievably inept October 27th issue of "Collier's", devoted to a future war with Russia. From here it is difficult to understand how authoritative writers or even the magazine itself could have perpetrated such a woeful error. The "big names" make most European readers think it was government-inspired. And altho we hoped its effect in Europe would gradually subside after the first shock, the thing goes on and on, engaging the attention of journalists and politicians and propagandists more today, than when the issue first appeared, and may plague the U. S. Delegation right thru to the end of the Assembly.

"To the Communists it was a gift from the gods; As a result of the sober, constructive disarmament proposals of the Big Three, Soviet Russia was facing a dilemma: either this suggestion must be taken seriously and met half-way, or else it must be attacked with scorn and ridicule. Vishinsky tried that in his first speech, altho his second was in a less belligerent tone. Of course he quoted "Collier's". He brought it in again on Saturday last. "L'Humanite", the Paris Communist paper, reproduced a large part of the contents. It is an ideal means of enlisting sympathy for the Communist position, from millions who are otherwise flatly opposed to communism. A Swiss weekly reports that it has been reproduced and widely distributed in Soviet Russia. To most Europeans, including the Soviet government, this appears to be an attempt to frighten with propaganda such propaganda masters as the Communists. We know very well that the Soviet leaders are impressed by acts, and not words. The incident can be used to obscure the disarmament issue, almost completely. It can seriously undermine not only the belief in U. S. Delegates' genuine desire for disarmament, but confidence in the responsibility of our country, at a time when the free world expects sober and mature leadership.

"Not only in the Communist press, but in papers of all other parties, much ink has been spilled over this number of "Collier's". It is called "dangerous naivete", "a major psychological error", "blasphemous trifling with the fate of millions". Our friends point out that its simple optimism is dangerous for us. How many crushing defeats in history have been the result of over-confidence in the attacker? Further, there is no more reason to believe, as "Collier's" hints, that world-welfare and peace would be completely assured by World War III, than they were by the other two. And despite the fact that most people here know that one weekly magazine does not represent either the general opinion or the government of our country, many of them wonder if this issue does not reveal the thinking of a certain minority, who, perhaps subconsciously, would prefer such a terrible climax as against a prolonged state of international tension.

"Just suppose a magazine like that had been published in Moscow, with the roles reversed, of course - what a storm of indignation and fear it would arouse, not only in the United States, but all over the world! "Collier's" has done our country, the United Nations and the world peace in general, a great disservice.

"This note about an apparently minor matter is not written because I feel that anything much can be done about it. There is a report current here, that the contents of the publication in question are to be republished in book form, and not only in America, but also in France. This would be compounding the error. We all trust this will not be done, and the American NGO delegates here hope to discuss it with a "Collier's" editor, now in Paris. Of course any possible editorial comment in the American press indicating unhappiness about this "Collier's" issue would help counteract its baneful effect. No American here thinks that there was anything but good intention behind this number of "Collier's". Its effect in Europe has been to weaken confidence in American leadership, to frighten our friends rather than our enemies, thus weakening our capacity for collective action, and to obscure the real issue of preventing war by practical cooperation."

Americans in Paris, where the General Assembly of UN is in session, are confronted on every hand by critical questions about the special issue of Collier's visualizing the "war we do not want". This sensational publication has stirred up a hornet's nest here, just when the United States has taken the initiative in a proposal for disarmament.

Now we learn that the contents of this publication are to be republished in paper book form, not only for mass circulation in the United States, but also in France and other countries. The editors and collaborators no doubt assumed that this dramatic presentation would help and not harm the cause of the free world. But from here the good intentions seem to have misfired. The promoters of this sensational document, while hoping to influence the Kremlin against starting the "war we do not want", have played right into the hands of the Communists.

We have watched the French press and talked with leaders from many countries in the free world. The reaction is close to unanimous: this Collier tour de force has produced exactly the opposite effect of that proclaimed and intended.

It has shaken confidence in American stability and responsibility in the midst of great tension. Despite efforts to convince Europeans that the publication was in no way a reflection of an official position, the majority believe the publication was officially inspired. This is due to the fact that Robert Sherwood and others who had high governmental positions during the war collaborated in its production. People here find it difficult to believe that such men would not have consulted their government on the desirability of releasing such a bomb-shell on the eve of the most critical United Nations meeting in its history.

The format, the blazing, provocative pictures, and the attempt to write history before it happens, put the whole enterprise in the category of the fantasia publications. The editorial on The Unwanted War, explaining its purpose and rejecting the inevitability of the war which was depicted in lurid colors, was almost universally overlooked. It has been received by the press and public opinion as the most blatant warmongering, reflecting a dangerous irresponsibility in the country which has been relied upon for sober and careful leadership.

It seems to have played into the hands of European Communists as no other act since the war. It has given the Communist propaganda machine a theme by which to relate itself to public apprehensions aroused by the entire non-Communist and anti-Communist press.

We feel that the editors and writers for this journalistic effort have fallen into a fundamental error in their assumption that the way to influence the isolated men in the Kremlin is by lurid, sensational words and pictures. Sober and responsible leaders of the free world have been patiently pursuing the thesis that the Soviet leaders are impressed by acts rather than words.

Our objective is to build strength and an unshakable unity of the free nations.

The Soviet propagandists have hoped that they could stymie the building of real economic and defensive strength, and split the unity of the free. Thus they could maintain their preponderance of might and use it to expand their empire by pressures both from without and from within free countries.

Now, what was the effect of the Collier flight into the unknown future, picturing a third world war as if it had happened? The effect was to shake confidence in American leadership and thus make more difficult the task of building strength cooperatively. The effect was to frighten our friends, not our enemies. The effect was to weaken our capacity for collective action. The effect was to divert attention from plans to prevent war by practical cooperation.

As individuals, not in any sense speaking for the American organizations which have designated us as observers at the United Nations, we concur in this analysis of the effect of the special Collier issue, and express the hope that the publishers will not persist in compounding the error by further exploiting this dangerous sensationalism at this critical time.

Ed:

Sorry I forgot to give you this with the other material. It is, of course, a prepublication draft. I think you will find it a useful reference.

Chet

NEW YORK LOS ANGELES

GAYNOR & DUCAS, INC.
ADVERTISING • PUBLIC RELATIONS
400 MADISON AVENUE • NEW YORK 17, N.Y.

CHESTER S. WILLIAMS PLaza 5-5750

Revised
9-14-60

Murrow -
Chapter 1 of a new book by Dr. Herman Kahn "On Thermonuclear War" to be published by Princeton Univ. Press in December this year.

ALTERNATIVE NATIONAL STRATEGIES

Introduction

On July 16, 1960 the world entered the sixteenth year of the nuclear era. Yet we are increasingly aware that after living with nuclear bombs for fifteen years we still have a great deal to learn about the possible effects of a nuclear war. We have even more to learn about conducting international relations in a world in which force tends to be both increasingly more available and increasingly more dangerous to use, and therefore in practice increasingly unusable. As a result of this continuous secular change in the basic structure of the international situation, foreign and defense policies formulated early in the nuclear era badly need review and reformulation.

In considering these basic foreign and defense policies it is desirable to distinguish many different military postures and the corresponding possible strategies for both the United States and the Soviet Union. This treatment of thermonuclear warfare will mostly concern itself with four typical possible postures, which I will call Finite Deterrence, Counterforce as Insurance, Preattack Mobilization Base, and Credible First Strike Capability, respectively. I will discuss the possibilities and implications of these postures from the point of view of the Soviet Union and the United States. While there is no reason why the two most powerful nations should have similar views, I will not initially dwell on possible asymmetries, deferring discussion of the separate national problems. A number of typical basic postures (important concepts underlined for emphasis) are listed in Chart 1, roughly in order of increasing ability to wage general war.

Chart 1*

ALTERNATIVE NATIONAL POSTURES

1. Internal Police Force plus "World Government"

2. Minimum Deterrence plus Limited War plus Arms Control

3. Add insurance to the Minimum Deterrent:

   a. for reliability (Finite Deterrence)

   b. against unreliability (Counterforce as Insurance)

   c. against a change in policy (Preattack Mobilization Base)

4. Add Credible First Strike Capability

5. "Splendid" First Strike and no Limited War Capability

6. Dreams

---

*I am indebted to Richard B. Foster of Stanford Research Institute for the suggestion to make a list of this sort. He has used a somewhat different breakdown in some unpublished investigations on the actual strategic views held by U.S. decision makers.

Probably the most valuable thing that the Executive Office could do to improve over-all defense planning would be to select one of these postures and the corresponding strategies, or possibly some clearly defined alternative not on the list, and let the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, the Department of Defense, and the Department of State know its decision. The decision could then be debated at the proper level, and it would not be necessary to conduct a philosophical debate at the staff level, on what business the Department of Defense should be in every time somebody brought up a technical question on Air Defense, Command and Control, and so on. National debates should be conducted at the national level where feasibility, desirability, and possible consequences can be discussed responsibly and from proper points of view. It is not possible to do this even at the level of a senior but technical advisory group attached to Departments or even to the Executive Office, much less at lower staff levels. Advisory groups and agency and departmental staffs should be mainly concerned with implementing the general policy and reporting back to their superiors on cost, performance, and feasibility. In actual practice the great national debate on what business the Department of Defense should be in often occurs at the advisory group or relatively low staff levels, and important projects whose approval or disapproval may set crucial constraints on over-all policy are approved or rejected on the basis of some very narrow and parochial views of what this over-all national policy ought to be; sometimes the effects on over-all national policy are not even examined. All of this could be eliminated if the big decisions were consciously formulated, debated, and then decided at the proper level rather than treated as a number of fragmented issues to be treated on an ad hoc basis.

In this first chapter I will consider the postures in Chart 1 from an over-all point of view, deferring details to later chapters. In this discussion I will define certain widely used terms in a manner that disagrees with some (but not all) usage. In general, I feel it is better to do this than to invent some completely new word or term, and I will normally continue this practice throughout the book. One of the most important things which could be done to facilitate discussion of defense problems would be to create a vocabulary that is both small enough and simple enough to be learned, precise enough to communicate, and large enough so that all of the important ideas that are contending can be comfortably and easily described. One of my major objectives in writing this book is to facilitate the creation of such a vocabulary.

1. Internal Police Force plus "World Government"

There seems to be little point in discussing the view that finds a solution in a totally disarmed world. Neither our own emotional desires nor the fact that there are many earnest proponents for this policy should sway us toward a position that ignores some of the basic realities. It has probably always been impractical to imagine a completely disarmed world, and the introduction of the thermonuclear bomb has added a special dimension to this impracticality. Given the large nuclear stockpiles in the Soviet Union, the United States, and the British Isles, it would be child's play for one of these nations to hide completely hundreds of these bombs. Even if some caches were found, one could not be sure that these were not decoys to allay suspicions, and yet there would be a great loathness to cancel the agreement just because "a few malcontents had conspired against the peace." The violator would then have an incredible advantage if the agreement ever broke down and the arms race started again. This surely means that even if all nations should one day agree to total nuclear disarmament, we must presume that there would be the hiding of some nuclear weapons or components as a hedge against the other side doing so. An international arrangement for banishing war through disarmament will not call for total disarmament but will almost undoubtedly include provisions for enforcement that cannot be successfully overturned by a small, hidden force. Otherwise, it would be hopelessly unstable. Even if the problem of what we may call the "clandestine cache" were solvable, the writer still is of the belief that one could not disarm the world totally and expect it to remain disarmed. But the problem of the clandestine nuclear cache in itself makes total disarmament especially infeasible.

While total disarmament can be ruled out as an immediate possibility, one can conceive of some sort of international authority which might have a monopoly of war-making capability. Such a postulated international authority would have to have enough power to be able to overwhelm any nation that had reserved hidden destructive potential. An international agency with a near-monopoly of force might come from any of the following possibilities (listed in order of apparent probability rather than desirability): (1) a Soviet or U.S. dominated world arising most likely out of war; (2) some other kind of postwar organization; (3) an S.U.-U.S. combination which is in effect a world government, though it may not openly be called that; (4) some of the NATO nations and China added to the above combination as influential, if not equal partners; (5) the Haves against the Have Nots, most likely without exploitation, but with stringent arms control in which authority and responsibility are roughly proportioned to military and economic development and, perhaps, with aid to underdeveloped nations; (6) a sort of World Federal state where power is proportioned to sovereignty and population as in the U.S. Congress. However, it is most doubtful in the absence of a crisis or war that a world government can be set up in the next decade. There are to date no serious proposals along such lines[1] unless the concept (occasionally advocated by Khrushchev) of Soviet-U.S. get-togethers to settle all problems be considered in such a light. Certainly the official suggestions occasionally put out by the Soviet and U.S. governments are not to be taken seriously as possible solutions.

While it may seem high time to spell out practical proposals for world government, no such attempt will be made in this book. In fact, I will not even discuss any "impractical" suggestions. While this writer believes that even a poor world government might be preferable to an uncontrolled arms race, I also believe that the practical difficulties are so large that it is a digression to dwell on such possibilities as a possible solution for the problems of the sixties. And the problems of the sixties are important! About the only way "world government" and other long-run considerations

---

[1]The most serious recent attempt to describe a possible world government is given in the book, World Peace Through World Law (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1958), by Grenville Clark and Louis B. Sohn. One problem with proposals such as those in the Clark-Sohn book is the same problem that many of the white colonists in Africa have in trying to deal with African independence movements. If independence is granted, they are not sufficiently protected from the new government; if only limited sovereignty is granted the nonwhite population gets to be very unhappy at the attempt to maintain the unsatisfactory status quo. It is worth noting in this connection that it is easier to be a hero than a saint. It really would not be difficult to find thousands of Westerners willing to give up their lives for a world government of a satisfactory sort but one would find very few willing to accept Chinese or Indian standards of living or any appreciable risk of their occurring, for either themselves or their families. Similarly, the underdeveloped nations are going to resent any real or fancied hindrances to their working out their salvation.

affect the kind of analysis done here is the avoidance of otherwise desirable short-term measures that might seriously hinder or foreclose desirable long-term possibilities. Even this modest ambition toward shaping the seventies is difficult to realize because there are controversies over where we want to be at that time, as well as how to get there. This book will concentrate on the problem of how to get there. This seeming unconcern for long-term objectives will distress some readers, but some of our immediate problems must be understood more clearly than in the past if we are to control the direction in which we are going. It is the hallmark of the amateur and dilettante that he has almost no interest in how to get to his particular utopia. Perhaps this is because the practical job of finding a path may be more difficult than the job of designing the goal.[2] Let us consider, then, some of the practical military alternatives that we face in the 1960-1975 time period.

2. Minimum Deterrence plus Limited War plus Arms Control

This view, or the modest variant of it called Finite Deterrence, is probably the most widely held view in the West of what is a desirable and feasible strategic posture. Among the adherents to this position can be found most intellectuals interested in military affairs, staff people in [2]One of my "amateur" friends has pointed out that "It is the hallmark of the expert professional that he doesn't care where he is going as long as he proceeds competently." This seems to be a reasonable charge against this book, but I still believe that the limited focus of this book is valuable. Of those readers who are most interested in long-term goals, very few will have ever seen much discussion of the military problem as a "military problem" or the interactions of military calculations, or the lack of them, with policy. Some of these readers will deny the existence of such interactions. Just as it would do the "militarists" some good to be exposed to utopian thinking, it will do the "utopians" even more good to be exposed to some military thinking.

---

the federal government, civilians who seek to qualify as "military experts" (including scientists and technicians), many military planners in the three services, and the vast majority of foreign and domestic lay analysts. What, then, is meant by Minimum Deterrence?

The notion is dramatic: It is that no nation whose decision makers are sane would attack another nation which was armed with a sufficiently large number of thermonuclear bombs. Thus all a nation that is so armed has to worry about is insanity, irresponsibility, accident, and miscalculation. Even such a sober expert as General Maxwell Taylor expressed this view as follows:

> The avoidance of deliberate general atomic war should not be too difficult since its unremunerative character must be clear to the potential adversaries. Although actual stockpile sizes are closely guarded secrets, a nation need only feel reasonably sure that an opponent has some high-yield weapons, no matter how indefinite their exact number, to be impressed with the possible consequences of attacking him.[3]

The above was written in 1956 but is quoted in a book he published in 1959. It is only fair to add that General Taylor's views have changed and, as expressed in the book, now show much more concern with the problem of deterring general war than this quotation would indicate. He also mentions that it was very difficult for him to change his views and take the problem of deterrence seriously. It is even more difficult for laymen who do not have access to the same information to achieve this feat.

In general, the believers in Minimum Deterrence seem to view the deterrence of a rational enemy as almost a simple philosophical consequence of the existence of thermonuclear bombs. They argue that the decision to initiate thermonuclear war is such a momentous one--the risks are so great--that it is unlikely that such a decision will be affected by the relatively minor details of each side's military posture. One is tempted to call this "the layman's view," since people holding it show only the slightest interest in such matters as the status of the alert forces, holes in the warning networks, the range of the bombers, reliability of missiles, the degree of protection offered by current arrangements for hardening, dispersal, and concealment, and the multitude of other questions that bother sober students of the problem of retaliation. Nevertheless, the Minimum Deterrence view is held by such a surprisingly large number of experts that it may be gratuitously insulting to call it a layman's view.

---

[3] Maxwell D. Taylor, The Uncertain Trumpet, Harper and Brothers, New York, 1959, p. 184.

An extreme form of the Minimum Deterrence theory is the view that the current strategic forces of the United States and the Soviet Union, if used, will automatically result in world annihilation or at least mutual homicide. In 1955, fifty-two Nobel laureates signed a statement (the Mainau Declaration) which included the following: "All nations must come to the decision to renounce force as a final resort of policy. If they are not prepared to do this they will cease to exist." There is a beautiful simplicity about this statement. It does not differentiate between attacker and defender, belligerent and neutral, Northern and Southern Hemisphere, but simply says all nations. It does not talk about degree of damage but simply says cease to exist.

Everybody recognizes that statements such as the above are sometimes no more than rhetoric. If this were all there is to it one would not worry. But belief follows language as much as the other way round. Contemporary phrases, used by both experts and laymen in describing war, expressions like "balance of terror," "thermonuclear stalemate," "suicidal war," "mutual annihilation," "inescapable end of civilization," "destruction of all life," "end of history," "live together or die together," and "nobody wins a suicide pact," indicate a widespread inclination to believe that thermonuclear war would eventuate in mutual annihilation as the result of almost any plausible turn of military events. The view of the phrasemakers is reinforced by the use of deterrence analogies, such as two people on a single keg of dynamite--each with a button, two scorpions in a bottle, two heads on a single chopping block, or the bee that dies when it stings.

Popular literature has picked up the idea of ultimacy. An example is Neville Shute's interesting but badly researched book On the Beach, which presumes and describes the total extinction of humanity as a result of all-encompassing and inescapable atmospheric radioactivity coming from a thermonuclear war. Many shorter pieces have been written along similar lines. Western (but not Soviet) reviewers and critics have almost uniformly taken the theme of world destruction seriously. These Westerners and their readers do not consider it a fantastic notion that nuclear war would mean the inevitable end of the world! The world annihilation possibility is considered to be a sober and accurate appraisal of the destructive power of existing weapons systems.

Not all agree, of course. In fact, some "diehards" are tempted to dismiss such a statement as the Mainau Declaration as an extremist expression of some left wing or radical scientists. This is too strong a denial. A cursory examination of the names of the signers indicates that this hypothesis does not seem tenable for a majority of them. The Nobel laureates who authored the "cease to exist" statement probably had more than rhetoric and literature in mind. Many of them had either made calculations or seen calculations (or at least thought they had) which indicated to them that world annihilation or some practical equivalent was a reasonably sober estimate of the results of nuclear war. Most of the signers would be willing to go before a technical audience with a defense of the "end of history" position as a sober estimate--and the believers in recovery and recuperation would often have some difficulty in documenting their side of the case. It is important to realize that there are "experts" who believe in world annihilation and who hold strongly to this view, experts who can and will argue their position vehemently, quantitatively, and often persuasively.

The automatic mutual-annihilation view is not unique to the West. As discussed in Lecture III, Malenkov publicly introduced it to the Soviet Union several years ago, apparently arguing in the now-classical fashion that with nuclear war entailing the end of civilization, the capitalists would not attack; the Soviet Union, he said, could afford to reduce investment in heavy industry and military products and concentrate on consumer goods. A different view seems to have been held by Khrushchev and the Soviet military. They agreed that war would be horrible, but at the same time they argued that this was no reason for the Soviet Union to drop its guard; given sufficient preparations only the capitalists would be destroyed. With some important modifications their views seem to have prevailed.

Why do reasonably sober and knowledgeable people hold some version of this view of automatic mutual annihilation? In this first lecture, I will try to describe some of the data and calculations that have given rise to these cataclysmic expectations and explain why it is that the situation is not, at least for the immediate future, as they describe it.

A thermonuclear war is quite likely to be an unprecedented catastrophe for the defender. Depending on the military course of events, it may or may not be an unprecedented catastrophe for the attacker, and for some neutrals as well. But an "unprecedented" catastrophe can be a far cry from an "unlimited" one. Most important of all, sober study shows that the limits on the magnitude of the catastrophe seem to be closely dependent on what kinds of preparations have been made, and on how the war is started and fought.

While the notions in the above paragraph may strike some readers as being obvious, I must repeat that they are by no means so. The very existence of the irreconcilable group predicting total catastrophe is proof. One can divide military thinkers into two classes: those who believe that any war would result in no less than mutual annihilation, and those who feel this is not necessarily so or even that it is in all likelihood wrong. The latter group is probably correct, at least for the military capabilities that are likely to be available in the next decade or so. Yet on the whole they have not done very much "homework" to prove their point. The total disaster group has done a great deal of homework. This could mean that the first group is likely for a time to win many an argument on this question.

The concept of mutual homicide, sure and certain, has in many ways been peculiarly comforting to those holding it. It makes plausible the conviction that when governments are informed of the terrible consequences of a nuclear war they will realize there could be no victors. There would be no sense to such a war. Would a sane leader ever start such a cataclysm? Of course not. The expected violence of war would deter him. Those who hold this comforting concept may even get angry at anyone who ventures to assay estimates of the precise degree of risk a "successful" attacker might actually face.

The mutual homicide theory yields other comforts. If one grants that each side will utterly destroy the other, one must also grant that expensive preparations to reduce casualties, lessen damage, and facilitate postwar recuperation are useless. Can we not spare ourselves the financial burden of such preparations? The "logic" has sometimes been carried further, some arguing that modern weapons are so enormously destructive that only a few are needed to deter the enemy. Therefore, the argument goes, war can be deterred with much smaller forces than in the past; in any case we certainly do not need more.

The view from this plateau is attractive to many groups who are determined on disarmament and certain types of arms control. For them, the Minimum Deterrence notion implies a certain kind of automatic stability which makes it safe to be casual about both agreements and possible violations. One must concede that the very concept of Minimum Deterrence implies that the two nations involved have in effect signed a reliable nonaggression treaty with their populations as hostage to insure adherence to this treaty; the only strategic problem that seems to be left is an accidental or unauthorized violation of this nonaggression "treaty." It is such possibilities that are the subject of arms control negotiations.

The mutual annihilation view is also comforting to many idealistic individuals, particularly to those who have an intrinsic abhorrence of any use of force. The bizarreness of a war in which both sides expect to get annihilated confirms their intuition that this whole business of military preparations is silly, a stupid and dangerous game which we ought to discourage nations--our own country, at least--from playing. At the same time these idealists can afford to scoff at attempts to reduce casualties from, say, 100 million to 50 million Americans, reflecting that the situation is hopeless anyway and that preparations are silly, and that the only Respectable Cause is the total elimination of war. They regard programs other than their own as foolish or sinister and designed to cause people discomfort by making it sound plausible that there really is a national security problem toward the relief of which considerable amounts of money, energy, and intelligence need to be allocated.

Among those who take the view that Minimum Deterrence is a desirable, feasible, or the only possible strategic goal are many who nevertheless seek to add a Limited War Capability. They recognize that even if the United States and the Soviet Union cannot wage all-out war against each other this does not mean that the role of force will be entirely eliminated. There may still be many disputes between the two nations--disputes which may tempt one side to use force on a small scale. If the only counter the other nation has is to commit suicide by starting a thermonuclear war, that nation most likely will not act. Therefore, one needs Limited War capabilities to meet limited provocations. Those who adhere to the Minimum Deterrence theory often feel that the "nonaggression treaty" of mutual deterrence is so binding and so stable it is impossible to provoke the other side to violate it by anything less than an all-out attack. Seen in this perspective, cannot one safely use the most extreme forms of violence in a limited war?

We must expand on this point. Some of those who feel strongly that it is easy to make deterrence reliable suggest using the threat of limited or controlled nuclear retaliation to "regulate" Soviet behavior. An extreme form of this notion might go as follows: If the Soviets threaten to take over Berlin, the U.S. could threaten to blow up a major Soviet city in retaliation, perhaps after warning the inhabitants to evacuate it. In their anger and distress the Soviets would then blow up one U.S. city in exchange. We would be enraged in turn, but because we would want to stop the tit-for-tat exchange, we would call a halt after warning the Soviets that any similar aggressions in the future would also result in a city exchange. However angry both of us would be, we would not start an all-out war, according to this argument, because suicide is not a rational way of expressing one's anger. It would be in the interests of both to stop the exchange at this point. By then, from the Soviet point of view, the taking of Berlin would seem unprofitable, since the loss of the Soviet city would appear more costly than the value of Berlin plus the destruction of a U.S. city. We have gained through making it clear to the Soviets that similar future actions would be equally unprofitable. On the other hand, by destroying a U.S. city the Soviets have made it clear that we should not use controlled thermonuclear retaliation as a casual tactic. While the whole idea sounds bizarre, concepts like this are bound to be a logical consequence of a world in which all-out war has been made to seem rationally infeasible, but one in which we feel it is necessary to punish or limit the other side's provocations. The timid or sober may feel that Minimum Deterrence might be strained to the breaking point by such acts; for them there must be caution on the types and levels of violence to accompany limited war or limited provocations.

3. Three Kinds of Insurance

The next view of what could result in a satisfactory strategic capability adds several kinds of "insurance" to the simple Minimum Deterrence position.[4] There are at least three kinds of insurance which a survival-conscious person might wish to add, the first being Insurance for Reliability. We will label the view that worries about the details of obtaining a "punishing" retaliation, but does not want any more strategic capability than this, the Finite Deterrence strategy.[5] In many ways and with some inconsistencies this is the official U.S. view. The believers in Finite Deterrence do not quite accept the idea that reliable deterrence can be obtained simply by stocking thermonuclear bombs and having a weapon system which could deliver these bombs in peacetime. They notice that when the problem of retaliation is studied, rather than asserted, it is difficult to retaliate effectively; since the enemy can do many things to prevent, hinder, or negate retaliation. Evaluation of the effectiveness of retaliation must bear in mind that the Russians can strike at a time and with tactics of their choosing. We will strike back, no doubt, but with a damaged and not fully coordinated force which must conduct its operations in the postattack environment. The Soviets may use blackmail threats to intimidate our post-attack tactics. Under these conditions the Russian Defense System is likely to be alerted. Indeed, if the strike has been preceded by a tense period, their active defense forces would long since have been augmented, and their cities may be at least partially evacuated.

---

[4]The addition is meant in terms of the capability of the force that is being procured; the entire force may be redesigned to get some appropriately modified version of the original capability (possibly at a reduced level) and the new insurance one.

[5]Originally Minimum Deterrence and Finite Deterrence meant the same thing. The word "Minimum" was coined by some Polaris enthusiasts who argued we needed very little to deter the Soviets. Because the word "Minimum" carried a connotation of gambling with the nation's security for budgetary reasons, it was changed to "Finite" (which had the connotation of wanting enough and no more and also suggested that the opponents wanted an infinite or at least an unreasonable amount).

Any of the considerations referred to by the italicized words can change the effectiveness of a retaliatory strike by an order of magnitude. Yet almost all of them are ignored in most discussions of the effectiveness of our deterrent force. Sometimes they are even relegated to the position of unimportant "technical details." They are far more than this. The possibilities indicated by the italicized words will be discussed at some length in Lecture II. I only want to mention here that the believer in Finite Deterrence is somewhat aware of these problems; he wants to have ready more than the bare minimum force that might be able to retaliate effectively (the Minimum Deterrence position). The advocate of Finite Deterrence wants enough forces to cover all contingencies. He may even want mixed forces, considering it may be possible for a clever enemy to discover an unexpected countermeasure against a single kind of force no matter how large. Thus he may well want different types of missiles, bombers, strategic submarines, aircraft carriers, and so forth. In addition, sober advocates of Finite Deterrence wish to have the various weapons systems so deployed and operated that they will have a guaranteed capability, even in a crisis in which the enemy has taken extraordinary measures to negate the capability. They want these forces dispersed, protected, and alert; the arrangements for command, control, and communications must be able to withstand degradation by both peacetime and wartime tactics of the enemy. These sober believers in Finite Deterrence tend to insist on an objective capability as opposed to one that is only "psychological." And even those believers in Finite Deterrence who would be satisfied with a facade yearn for an impressive-looking facade. One might characterize the Finite Deterrence position as an expert version of the Minimum Deterrence position, held by an expert who wants to look good to other experts.

The notion of Finite Deterrence is therefore not as dramatic as the notion of Minimum Deterrence. The believer in Finite Deterrence is willing to concede that it takes some effort to guarantee Mutual Homicide, that it is not automatic. However, the notion of Finite Deterrence is still dramatic, since most followers of this doctrine believe that the advent of thermonuclear bombs has changed the character of an all-out war in such a way that if both opponents are prepared the old-fashioned distinctions between victory, stalemate, and defeat no longer have much meaning. It was once believed that if one country had forces twice as large as those of another country, the first country was the stronger. Those who believe in Finite Deterrence challenge this view. Sometimes they rest their case on this idea: the only purpose of strategic forces is to deter rather than to fight; once one has the ability to damage, seriously, say, 10 or 20 enemy cities, this is enough force to deter, and therefore enough force. More often, backers of Finite Deterrence take a more extreme position. They argue that you can do no more than kill somebody once; to overkill by a factor of ten is no more desirable than overkilling by a factor of two--it is simply a waste of effort. They also usually argue that with some thought it should be easy to design strategic systems that can overkill, even in retaliation. Once we procure the limited (i.e., finite) forces required to do this job we have enough strategic forces and do not need any more--no matter what the enemy does.

In the year 1960 I believe that even adherents to an extreme Minimum Deterrence position tended to agree, under pressure, that the nation should buy whatever insurance is needed to make retaliation at least "look" potentially reliable and effective. In this sense, the orthodox Minimum

Deterrence school is no longer as respectable as might once have been inferred from the remarks of the most enthusiastic proponents of a defense built solely around small Minuteman and Polaris systems. Most of the more sober analysts have come to talk about Finite Deterrence, by which they mean having a generous adequacy for deterrence, but that is all they want for the general war. Specifically, they often tend to be against any counterforce capability (the word "counterforce" includes not only an active counterforce that can destroy or damage the enemy's force on the ground, but also other methods of countering the opponent's force, such as Active Defense and Passive Defense).[6]

Some believers in Finite Deterrence are against counterforce as a useless diversion of forces; others would not even be interested in having any counterforce even if it were free, because they consider it destabilizing. They notice that there is at least one circumstance in which an enemy is likely to attack even if he is worried about the retaliatory destruction that he will suffer. This circumstance occurs when he believes his attack is pre-emptive, that by striking first he is only forestalling an attack being launched on him. Most believers in Finite Deterrence are so convinced

---

[6]The word "counterforce" is usually used to apply to an ability to destroy the enemy on the ground. It is true that the best counter against an unprotected SAC base is a bomb on the base. But the best counter against a hidden missile may be a shelter; the best counter against a bomber carrying many bombs may be active defense; the best counter against the enemy destroying our cities may be the use of retaliatory threats; the best counter against fallout-type attacks is shelters plus anticontamination. I will use the term counterforce to cover all of the above--to include anything which might counter the use or effectiveness of the enemy's force. While many of my colleagues object to my generalizing the definition in this manner, the new definition has the important virtue of discouraging parochial attitudes. It emphasizes that any method of countering the enemy's force may be useful, and that the allocation between the different methods should be made by objective considerations and not by slogans or outworn doctrine.

of the efficacy of their deterrence that they believe such an idea could only arise as a result of miscalculation, since no rational man could order an attack against an enemy who has made at least moderate preparations to ward it off. However, they recognize that if both forces are in a condition of super alert it may be easy to have such a misunderstanding. Or equally likely, there is the problem that Thomas Schelling of Harvard (and RAND) has called "the reciprocal fear of surprise attack," where each side imputes to the other aggressive intentions and misreads purely defensive preparations as being offensive. There are unfortunately many postures possible in which a disastrous train of self-confirming actions and counteractions could be set into motion. In order to prevent this from occurring, some believers in Finite Deterrence think it is important for us to disabuse ourselves of the idea that there can be any circumstance in which it makes sense to attack the Soviet Union, and they want us to adopt a posture which makes it clear to the Soviets that we are so disabused. As part of this posture we should make as few preparations as possible to alleviate the effects of the war or protect ourselves from a Soviet retaliatory strike. This will convince the Soviets that we do not intend to attack them except in retaliation; they will then be able to relax and not be trigger-happy. As one (partial) adherent to Finite Deterrence, Oskar Morgenstern, expressed it in his book, The Question of National Defense, "In order to preserve a nuclear stalemate under conditions of nuclear plenty it is necessary for both sides to possess invulnerable retaliatory forces. ...it is in the interest of the United States for Russia to have an invulnerable retaliatory force and vice versa."[7] [7] New York, Random House, 1959, pp. 74, 76.

---

Many who accept the Finite Deterrence view have another reason for not defending or protecting anything but the retaliatory capability; they see no need for programs to protect people and property, because they think it isn't feasible to protect either people or property. These people often argue that it does not matter whether one dies immediately from blast, heat, or radiation, or dies later from the effects of radioactivity, disease, or starvation--as long as one is going to die! And they go on to assert that modern war is so horrible that everyone or almost everyone will be killed immediately or will eventually be destroyed by one of the after-effects.

A surprisingly large number of official military experts and planners seem to hold views, at least unconsciously, which are really a variation of the Finite Deterrence view that the only purpose of the strategic forces is to deter. This is illustrated by the following apocryphal quotation:

Chart 2

ONE PROFESSIONAL'S VIEW OF HIS PROFESSION

> "If these buttons are ever pressed, they have completely failed in their purpose! The equipment is useful only if it is not used."
>
> --General Aphorism

Even though the above statement may be intended to be rhetoric rather than policy, it is far from being innocuous. If one were to deduce the beliefs of some policy makers from the decisions they make, he would find that in a rather high percentage of cases the planners seem to care less about what happens after the buttons are pressed than they do about looking "presentable" before the event. They show slight interest in maintaining an appreciable operational capability on the second day of the war; if deterrence should fail, they, as well as many scientists, could not be less interested in the details of what happens--so long as the retaliatory strike is launched.

It is my contention that failure to launch an effective retaliatory attack is only the first of many possible failures. Even if one retaliates successfully, there can ensue significant and meaningful failures. These will occur one after another if the attitude exemplified in the last quotation becomes too universal in either the making or executing of policy. And even Deterrence-only advocates should realize that there are subtle but important differences between a posture whose main purpose is to be a facade which impresses the enemy, and one which is supposed to have an objective capability.

Insurance Against Unreliability. Some of the preponents of Finite Deterrence do not have an antipathy toward all forms of counterforce. They are willing to insure against unreliability. That is, even though deterrence has been made as reliable as they think it can be made, they realize that it may still fail; for example, from accident, human irrationality, miscalculation, or unauthorized behavior. Given this nonzero probability of a war, they find it difficult not to go through the motions of doing "something" to mitigate its effects. Even totally convinced "mutual annihilation" decision makers may be unwilling to admit openly that there are no preparations to alleviate the consequences of a war. It is difficult for any government to look at its people and say in effect, "We can no longer protect you in a war. We have no answer to blackmail except a counter-blackmail threat, and we have no preparations to deal with accidental war except trying to make it so dreadful that everybody will be careful in advance."

A facade of being able to alleviate may also be useful in international relations. It reassures one's allies about one's resolve and induces uncertainty and (hopefully) fear in the enemy. Even if it were true that both sides in the cold war conflict were unwilling to risk a thermonuclear war over any issue that could arise between them, it would weaken their diplomatic strength to admit this openly since the admitting power would be conceding that the other power could always get its way by staking a little more.

Some decision makers who accept the Finite Deterrence view are willing to pay for insurance against unreliability for more than political or psychological reasons. Even those who hold that war means mutual annihilation are sometimes willing for us to act beyond their beliefs--or fears. While this is inconsistent, it is not necessarily irrational. They understand that paper calculations can be wrong and are willing to hedge against this possibility. Sometimes these decision makers are making a distinction that (rather surprisingly) is not usually made. They may distinguish, for example, between 100 million dead and 50 million dead, and argue that the latter state is better than the former. They may distinguish between war damage which sets the economy of a country back fifty years or only ten years. Actually, when one examines the possible effects of a thermonuclear war carefully, one notices that there are indeed many postwar states that should be distinguished. If most people do not or cannot distinguish among these states it is because the gradations occur as a result of a totally bizarre circumstance--a thermonuclear war. The mind recoils from thinking hard about that; one prefers to believe it will never happen. If asked, "How does a country look on the day of the war?" the only answer a reasonable person can give is "awful." It takes an act of iron will or an unpleasant degree of detachment or callousness to go about the task of distinguishing among the possible degrees of awfulness.

But surely one can ask a more specific question. For example, "How does a country look five or ten years after the close of war, as a function of three variables: (1) the preparations made before the war, (2) the way the war started, and (3) the course of military events?" Both very sensitive and very callous individuals should be able to distinguish (and choose, perhaps) between a country which survives a war with, say, 150 million people and a gross national product (GNP) of $300 billion a year, and a nation which emerges with only 50 million people and a GNP of $10 billion a year. The former would be the richest and the fourth largest nation in the world and one which would be able to restore a reasonable facsimile of prewar society; the latter would be a pitiful remnant that would contain few traces of the prewar way of life. When one asks this kind of question and examines the circumstances and possible outcomes of a future war in some detail, it appears that it is useful and necessary to make many distinctions among the results of thermonuclear war. The following figures illustrate some distinctions which one may wish to make at the outset of his deliberations in this field.

Chart 3

TRAGIC BUT DISTINGUISHABLE POSTWAR STATES

Dead	Time Needed for Economic Recuperation
2,000,000	1 year
5,000,000	2 years
10,000,000	5 years
20,000,000	10 years
40,000,000	20 years
80,000,000	50 years
160,000,000	100 years

Will the survivors envy the dead?

Here I have tried to make the point that if we have a posture which might result in 40 million dead in a general war, and as a result of poor planning, apathy, or other causes, we deteriorate from this posture and a war occurs with 80 million dead, we have suffered an additional disaster, an unnecessary additional disaster that is almost as bad as the original disaster. If on the contrary by spending a few billion dollars, or by being more competent or lucky, we can cut the number of dead from 40 million to 20 million, we have done something vastly worth doing! The survivors will not dance in the streets or congratulate each other if there have been 20 million men, women, and children killed; yet it would have been a worthwhile achievement to limit casualties to this number. It is very difficult to get this point across to laymen or experts with enough intensity to move them to action. The average citizen has a dour attitude toward planners who say that if we do thus and so it will not be 40 million dead--it will be 20 million dead. Somehow the impression is left that the planner said that there will be only 20 million dead. To him is often attributed the idea that this will be a tolerable or even, astonishingly enough, a desirable state!

The rate of economic recuperation, like the number of lives saved, is also of extreme importance. Very few Americans can get interested in spending money or energy on preparations which, even if they worked, would result in preindustrial living standards for the survivors of a war. As will be explained later, our analysis indicates that if a country is moderately well prepared to use the assets which survive there is unlikely to be a critical level of damage to production. A properly prepared country is not "killed" by the destruction of even a major fraction of its wealth; it is more likely to be set back a given number of years in its economic growth. While recuperation times may range all the way from one to a hundred years, even the latter is far different from the "end of history."

Perhaps the most important item on the table of "distinguishable states" is not the numbers of dead or the number of years it takes for economic recuperation; rather, it is the question at the bottom: "Will the survivors envy the dead?" It is in some sense true that one may never recuperate from a thermonuclear war. The world may be permanently (i.e., for perhaps 10,000 years) more hostile to human life as a result of such a war. Therefore, if the question "Can we restore the prewar conditions of life?" is asked, the answer must be "No!" But there are other relevant questions to be asked. For example: "How much more hostile will the environment be? Will it be so hostile that we or our descendants would prefer being dead than alive?" Perhaps even more pertinent is this question, "How happy or normal a life can the survivors and their descendants hope to have?" Despite a widespread belief to the contrary, objective studies indicate that even though the amount of human tragedy would be greatly increased in the postwar world, the increase would not preclude normal and happy lives for the majority of survivors and their descendants.

My colleagues and I came to this conclusion rather reluctantly; not because we did not want to believe it, but because it is too hard to believe. Thermonuclear bombs are so destructive, and destructive in so many ways, that it is difficult to imagine that there would be anything left after their large-scale use. One of my tasks with The RAND Corporation was to serve as project leader for a study of the possibilities for alleviating the consequences of a thermonuclear war. That study was made as quantitatively and objectively as we could make it with the resources, information, and intellectual tools available to us. We concluded that for at least the next decade or so, any picture of total world annihilation appears to be wrong, irrespective of the military course of events.[8] Equally important, the picture of total disaster is likely to be wrong even for the two antagonists. Barring an extraordinary course for the war, or that most of the technical uncertainties turn out to lie at the disastrous end of the spectrum, one and maybe both of the antagonists should be able to restore a reasonable semblance of prewar conditions quite rapidly. Typical estimates run between one and ten years for a reasonably successful and well-prepared attacker and a somewhat longer time for the defender, depending mainly on the tactics of the attacker and the preparations of the defender. In the RAND study we tried to avoid using optimistic assumptions. With the exceptions to be noted, we used what were in our judgment the best values available, or we used slightly pessimistic ones. We believe that the situation is likely to be better than we indicate, rather than worse, though the latter possibility cannot be ruled out.

Exactly what is it that one must believe if he is to be convinced that it is worth while to buy Counterforce as Insurance? Listed in Chart 4 are eight phases of a thermonuclear war. If our decision makers are to justify the expense (and possible risk of strategic destabilization) that would be incurred in trying to acquire a capability for alleviating the consequences of a war, they must believe that they can successfully negotiate each and every one of these phases, or that there is a reasonable chance that they can negotiate each of these phases.

---

[8] Report on a Study of Non-Military Defense, The RAND Corporation, R-322-RC, July 1, 1958.

Chart 4

A COMPLETE DESCRIPTION OF A THERMONUCLEAR WAR

Includes the Analysis of:

1. Various time-phased programs for deterrence and defense and their possible impact on us, our allies, and others.

2. Wartime performance with different preattack and attack conditions.

3. Acute fallout problems.

4. Survival and patch-up.

5. Maintenance of economic momentum.

6. Long-term recuperation.

7. Postwar medical problems.

8. Genetic problems.

I repeat: To survive a war it is necessary to negotiate all eight stages. If there is a catastrophic failure in any one of them, there will be little value in being able to cope with the other seven. Differences among exponents of the different strategic views can often be traced to the different estimates they make on the difficulty of negotiating one or more of these eight stages. While all of them present difficulties, most civilian military experts seem to consider the last six the critical ones. Nevertheless, most discussions among "classical" military experts concentrate on the first two. To get a sober and balanced view of the problem, one must examine all eight.

As an example of the necessity to be concerned about the last six phases, it might be appropriate to quote from testimony before the 1959 Johnson subcommittee on military preparedness during the hearings on the Berlin crisis (italics mine).

> Mr. Weisl: General White, I hate to keep you here so long, but there are some matters that we feel ought to be in the record to make it complete.
>
> On March 9 of this year Dr. Libby, a Commissioner of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, in a public speech stated as follows:
>
>> "Now the fallout we fear in the case of a nuclear attack on this country, or in any other country for that matter, is the local fallout, and this arises solely from bombs which hit the surface."
>
> Then I go on to what I consider the important quote:
>
>> "But in any case, the area covered can amount to several thousand square miles at such an intensity that it would be hazardous to life to stay out in the open for more than an hour, and the density would be high enough so that farmland in this area would be ruined for something like 40 years for anything except the culture of feed for beef cattle, or possibly swine, because of the strontium-90 that would be taken into any other kind of farm product."

I don't know whether it is fair to ask you whether you agree with that or not, but at least that is the statement of a responsible member of the Atomic Energy Commission.

General White: I think there are other responsible scientists, though, who do not agree. I think Dr. Edward Teller is one such. While I agree that fallout is a terrific hazard and one that we don't know as much about as I hope we are going to know, and it is certainly a consideration in atomic war, I don't think that every horror story should be accepted 100 per cent.

Mr. Weisl: I do agree that every horror story should not be accepted, but coming from a responsible member of the AEC, whose duty is to look into these problems, one must take account of it and not look upon it, at least I wouldn't look upon it, as solely a horror story.

Senator Symington: If the counsel will yield, Dr. Teller has opposed those who believe that strontium-90 and cesium-137 will be too damaging from the standpoint of current testing. If there is anything he has said from the standpoint of strontium-90 in answer to Dr. Libby, on the premise of an all-out war, with nuclear surface blasts, I wish you would put it in the record at this point.

General White: I think the only thing I can say is I am sure there is disagreement among scientists as to the exact effects. I can't go beyond that.[9]

It is clear that if "farmland in this area would be ruined for something like 40 years," recuperation will be difficult. In that case we had better abandon Counterforce as Insurance and retreat to the Finite Deterrence position. However, we are going to consider the strontium-90 problem quantitatively below and will come up with some different results. The only point to be made now is that those waging a modern war are going to be as much concerned with bone cancer, leukemia, and genetic malformations as they are with the range of a B-52 or the accuracy of an Atlas missile. Senior military advisors in particular will increasingly be forced to deal with what would have once been called "nonmilitary" problems. They will need to be armed with documented studies rather than opinions.

---

[9]United States Senate, Committee on Armed Services, Hearings before the Preparedness Investigating Committee, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., March 1959 (Part 1), pp. 132-133.

Once one accepts the idea that deterrence is not absolutely reliable and that it would be possible to survive a war, then he may be willing to buy insurance--to spend money on preparations to decrease the number of fatalities and injuries, limit damage, facilitate recuperation, and to get the best military result possible--at least "to prevail"[10] in some meaningful sense if you cannot win.

Insurance Against a Change in Policy. One of the things which I will try to make clear in Lectures II and III is that the military problem really is complicated and that it is impossible for fallible human beings to predict ahead of time exactly what capabilities they will wish or need. This does not mean, of course, that one has to buy everything. Resources may not be as limited as some of the more budget-minded people think, but they are still quite limited. However, it does mean that whenever it is cheap to do so (and sometimes when it is moderately expensive), we should be willing to hedge against changes in our desires. The fact that it is expensive to buy and maintain a complete spectrum of military capabilities in being does not mean that we should not have what might be called "mobilization bases" for a complete spectrum of adequate military capabilities. The government, [10] The word "prevail" is much used in official statements. It is a carefully chosen word that shows that the user is trying to do the best he can even though he is aware that many deny the old-fashioned distinction between victory and defeat. Because its use is ambiguous, the reader does not know whether the author is serious about his goal or is just making a meaningless concession to old-fashioned thinking; it probably does more harm than good to set it up as a goal. It would be better to use the old-fashioned concept of victory, as denoting the one who writes the peace treaty, while at the same time making explicit that victory can be costly.

---

relying on current doctrine, current military capabilities, its estimates of the capabilities and intentions of potential enemies, or some aspects of the political situation, might be satisfied with current allocations for national defense. But it should still be willing to hedge against the possibility that circumstances may so change that the reluctance to spend money will also change, either increasing or decreasing. This hedging can be accomplished by spending a relatively small amount on advance planning and physical preparations. We will then be in a position where we can make the most rapid and effective use of larger funds if they become available, or we will be able to get the most value out of a smaller military budget if it seems desirable to cut back on expenditures.

There are many different kinds of programs that come under the heading "Hedging Against a Change in Policy." It is obvious that there is need for very broad research and development programs. While research is not cheap, it is far from true that research is so expensive that it can be afforded only on clearly needful items. The opposite is true. The penalty for not having researched on an item that turns out to be useful is so great that we must have an extremely broad program to be certain that all the things that could conceivably be useful will in fact be investigated. Development is somewhat more expensive than research. As a result, we cannot afford to have quite as broad a menu. But even here we should develop many more items than we actually procure. We may also procure some systems in part, even if we do not feel they are absolutely needful. Requirements can change. For example, many people today feel that in the ballistic missile age air defense is obsolete. As I will try to explain later, this is by no means true. But even if it were true that air defense should be termed obsolete because it might be unable to guarantee protection against Soviet missiles, we might still be willing to have a "base" for air defense because we may be able to discover an answer to the missile threat or we may later decide we want air defense against countries like China--or ultimately even smaller countries. We may find it easy to protect against small bomber forces, which could be very lethal if they had a free ride--very much more lethal, indeed, than any small missile forces these same countries might procure. (Of course, such an air defense system might look quite different from our current one.)

Similarly, while it might be our policy at a given moment to fight limited wars with atomic weapons, we may still be glad to have a large reserve force armed with conventional high-explosive equipment. After all, it is relatively cheap to keep up such reserves, and we recognize that we might change our minds--as we did in Korea. The existence of such a force could enable us to fight a war which otherwise we would have to lose by default, simply because we were unwilling to use nuclear weapons when the occasion actually arose.

There is a special type of mobilization base which I will call a Preattack Mobilization Base. This can be extremely important. It is a capability for being able to improve rapidly our ability to fight or to threaten to fight either a limited or a general war. It includes preparations for putting in adequate civil defense programs. It also includes the procurement of very long lead time items for our strategic air defense and air offense, so that by just spending money rapidly we could bring all of these capabilities up to an adequate level. There is a very broad spectrum of preparations possible here. One kind of preparation would be useful only if a situation occurred in which substantial tactical warning (hours) was available; another set of preparations would be most useful in situations in which we had strategic warning--days, weeks or even months. And still another set of preparations could be made to improve our ability to compensate for a possible deterioration in the international situation or an increase in our standards for an acceptable level of defense. I will defer to Lecture II discussion of the role that a Preattack Mobilization Base might play in deterring and correcting provocations or providing extra insurance against a failure of deterrence. I will only make here the obvious point that what might be called the Finite Deterrence function of the strategic force is too important to depend on warning. There should always be an adequate capability in-being to deter a surprise attack.

There are large resources available for defense if it becomes necessary to use them. Many economists have estimated that the United States could allocate between 40 and 50 per cent of its gross national product to military purposes for some years without subjecting individual citizens to any appreciable physical hardships. (Postattack living standards would be adequate by almost any reasonable standard. The situation would be much like World War II where we spent, at peak about 43 per cent of our GNP on military products, and we could still buy phonograph records even if we couldn't buy phonographs.) In fact, if we make allowances for current unutilized resources, the country should be somewhat better off than in World War II. Such spending would undoubtedly leave a very unpleasant post-crisis legacy of debt, economic dislocation, some inflation, and so on. But if it ever came to a serious question of choosing between such spending and a high risk of national defeat, I think there is no question that the United States would choose to spend between $200 and $300 billion annually on national security--rather than face the alternative. We are actually spending today about one-fifth of this potential. Clearly there is an enormous amount of fat which could be converted into muscle if we felt that circumstances warranted this step. The problem is, "Could we move fast enough?" Whether we could would depend not only on how critical the military situation was, but also on our stop-gap military preparations, on our ability to recognize that circumstances have changed, on our resolve, and on the preparations already made for such an expansion. It would be most important that the physical plant and equipment of the Department of Defense (including installations) be such that it could be used as an existing base for a higher capability.

4. Credible First Strike Capability

The next position on Chart 1, that there are circumstances in which a nation may wish to have a Credible First Strike Capability, may seem to many Americans like a possibility for the Soviets--but not for us. One sees many statements to the effect that "We will never strike first." In the context in which the remark is usually made (a "dastardly" surprise attack out of the blue against an unprepared enemy), this position is undoubtedly correct. Such a capability would not be worth much to the United States. However, we have many treaties and other obligations. There is the obligation to come to the aid of NATO nations if they are attacked. It is generally supposed that this aid includes the use of our SAC against the Soviet heartland, even if the Soviets attack Europe but not the United States. From a technical point of view this means that in this instance we would strike first! The agonizing decision to start an all-out thermonuclear war would we ours. Surely there is a serious question whether we would live up to our treaty obligations under such circumstances.

That this doubt is plausible can be seen in the response of Christian Herter to a question by Senator Morse on the occasion of the hearings on his nomination: (italics mine) "I cannot conceive of any President involving us in an all-out nuclear war unless the facts showed clearly we are in danger of all-out devastation ourselves, or that actual moves have been made toward devastating ourselves."[11]

A thermonuclear balance of terror is equivalent to the signing of a nonaggression treaty which states that neither the Soviets nor the Americans will initiate an all-out attack, no matter how provoking the other side may become. Sometimes people do not understand the full implications of this figurative nonaggression treaty. Let me illustrate what it can mean if we accept absolutely the notion that there is no provocation that would cause us to strike the Soviets other than an immediately impending or an actual Soviet attack on the United States. Imagine that the Soviets have taken a very drastic action against our allies in Europe. Let the action be as extreme or as shocking as the reader's imagination permits. Suppose, for example, that the Soviets have dropped bombs on London, Berlin, Rome, Paris and Bonn but have made no detectable preparations for attacking the United States and our retaliatory force looks good enough to deter them from such an attack. As far as we can tell they have done this horrible deed simply [11] Hearings on the Nomination of Christian A. Herter to be Secretary of State, before the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 9-10. Whether he means it or not, Khrushchev speaks a different language. On January 14, 1960, in a speech to the Supreme Soviet, he said: "I am emphasizing once more that we already possess so many nuclear weapons, both atomic and hydrogen, and the necessary rockets for sending these weapons to the territory of a potential aggressor, that should any madman launch an attack on our state or on other Socialist states we would be able literally to wipe the country or countries which attack us off the face of the earth" (italics mine). New York Times, January 15, 1960.

---

to demonstrate their strength and resolve. Suppose also that there is a device which restrains the President of the U.S. from acting for about twenty-four hours. It is probably true that if the President were not restrained he would order an attack on the Soviet Union (even if he had previously bought either the Minimum Deterrence or Finite Deterrence positions that no sane decision maker initiates a thermonuclear war against an enemy who can retaliate). However, we have assumed the existence of a 24-hour device which forces him to stop and think and make his decision in cold blood. The President would presumably call together his advisors during this time. Most of the advisers would probably urge strongly that the United States fulfill its obligations by striking the Soviet Union. (After all, you have to draw a line somewhere, and the Soviets have obviously more than crossed this line.) Now let us further suppose that the President is also told by his advisers that even though we will kill almost every Russian civilian, we will not be able to destroy all of the Soviet strategic forces, and that these surviving Soviet forces will (by radiation or strontium-90 or something else) kill every American in their retaliatory blow--all 180 million of us.

Is it not difficult to believe that under these hypothetical circumstances any President of the United States would initiate a thermonuclear war by all-out retaliation against the Soviets with the Strategic Air Command? Few would contend that there is any plausible public policy which would justify ending life for everyone! It should be clear that our retaliation would not restore Europe; we could only succeed in further destroying it either as a by-product of our actions or because the surviving Soviet forces would subsequently destroy Europe as well as the United States. I am not saying that the United States would stand idly by. We would clearly declare war on the Soviets. We would make all kinds of limited military moves. We would go into a crash mobilization on at least the hundred-billion-dollars-a-year level. But there is one thing that we almost certainly would not do: We would not launch an all-out attack on Soviet cities.

There were two important caveats in the situation described: 180 million Americans would be killed, and the President would have twenty-four hours to think about his response. Let us consider these in turn. If 180 million dead is too high a price to pay for punishing the Soviets for their aggression, what price would we be willing to pay? This is a hard and unpleasant question. I have discussed this question with many Americans, and after about fifteen minutes of discussion their estimates of an acceptable price generally fall between 10 and 60 million clustering toward the upper number. (Their first reaction, incidentally, is usually that the U.S. would never be deterred from living up to its obligations by fear of a Soviet counterblow--an attitude that invariably disappears after some minutes of reflection.) The way one seems to arrive at the upper limit of 60 million is rather interesting. He takes one-third of a country's population; in other words, somewhat less than half. No American that I have spoken to who was at all serious about the matter believed that any U.S. action, limited or unlimited, would be justified--no matter what our commitments were--if more than half of our population would be killed in retaliation.

The 24-hour delay is a more subtle device. It is the equivalent of asking, "Can the Soviets force the President to act in cold blood and full knowledge, rather than in the immediate anger of the moment?" This depends not only on the time he has to learn and ponder the effects that would flow from his actions (and I will describe many circumstances in which this time for reflection would occur), but also on how deeply and seriously the President and his advisers have thought about the problem in advance. This latter, in turn, would depend on whether there had been any tense situations or crises which forced the President and the people to face the concept that war is something which can happen, rather than something that is reliably deterred by some declaratory policy that never need be acted upon. (The effects of the war are usually considered irrelevant to one's declaratory policy, since it is assumed that the declarations will deter the war.)

Let me give an example of a crisis that the Soviets could precipitate that would, by forcing both the Europeans and the Americans to face the possibility of a war seriously, give the effect of a 24-hour waiting period. Assume that both the United States and the Soviet Union could reliably annihilate each other in a retaliatory blow so that there was no special advantage in one side hitting the other first. Assume also that the Europeans had bought their own independent nuclear deterrents because they assess such a balance of terror as extremely dangerous to themselves. As De Gaulle explained in a press conference in November 1959: "Who can say that if the occasion arises the two, while each deciding not to launch its missiles at the main enemy so that it should itself be spared, will not crush the others? It is possible to imagine that on some awful day Western Europe should be wiped out from Moscow and Central Europe from Washington. And who can even say that the two rivals, after I know not what political and social upheaval, will not unite?"[12] However, because they are so close to the Soviet Union, the independent European nuclear deterrent is so vulnerable to a Soviet strike it can't retaliate effectively. Small in size because of economy and relative technological backwardness, it is not large enough to destroy the Soviet Union if it goes first. The European deterrent, in summary, can only inflict about as much damage on the Soviet Union as the Soviets suffered in World War II. Therefore, the Soviets can threaten the Europeans with a disarming attack if they go first and with an annihilating retaliation if the Europeans go first, accepting whatever damage the Europeans do on their first strike. They are willing to run the risk of a European first strike because they feel that under these conditions the risk is very small, smaller perhaps than the risk of an accidental war caused by the proliferation of nuclear systems. The Soviets then deliver the following ultimatum: unless the Europeans disarm themselves in 30 days (they have no other demands), the Soviets will proceed to disarm them by force. They could make this demand after some incident, say, after a nuclear missile had been fired accidentally (or by intentional Soviet sabotage) at Soviet territory.

---

[12] New York Times, November 11, 1959.

The Soviets might couple their disarming ultimatum with another one that would make specific their immediate goals. They could announce that from then on, Europe, Asia, and Africa would be considered as being in the Soviet sphere of interest; further, they would be willing to respect the Western Hemisphere, Australia, and maybe the British Isles and Japan as being in the American sphere of interest; and they would say they were suggesting this method of organizing humanity in order to head-off an uncontrolled arms race which had already resulted in an incident that could have touched off a cataclysm. The Soviets would claim to be willing to accept responsibility for their area and they would hold the United States accountable for its area.

While the above will strike most people as being closer to paranoia than to analysis, it is still worthwhile to observe that the basic assumption of a firm belief on both sides of a reliable balance of terror is not unreasonable. Given this belief, it is most unlikely that even a Soviet ultimatum as provoking as the above would result in an attack by the United States! Given the time available, the U.S. would feel compelled to ponder the results of an attack before ordering one. We might even feel it was possible to negotiate the Soviet demands. The Europeans would also be unlikely to start hostilities. They would be more likely to do the opposite and take off alert whatever forces they have on alert to reduce the possibility of accident or sabotage. Having another European missile shot at the Soviets would now clearly bring intolerable consequences.

The Soviet ultimatum in this instance duplicates most of the pressures of the original hypothetical 24-hour delay situation. While some British and American readers may consider such a Soviet ultimatum even more improbable than the hypothetical situation just outlined, I suspect that a number of continental Europeans find it all too plausible. It is most important that we be able to convince our continental allies that the U.S. posture is such that the Soviets really would find it too dangerous to give such an ultimatum, and that if they did the U.S. would be able to take some corrective action that would not result in most of the Northern Hemisphere being wiped out or in a situation such as De Gaulle described in his press conference. I will discuss some of the possibilities in Lecture II.

It should now be clear what I mean by a Credible First Strike Capability. Credibility does not involve the question "Do we or the Soviets have the capability to hurt the other side on a first strike?" It is well known that this capability exists and in all likelihood will continue to exist.

Credibility depends on being willing to accept the other side's retaliatory blow. It depends on the harm he can do, not the harm we can do. It depends as much on air defense and civil defense as on air offense. It depends on will as well as capability. It depends on the provocation and on the state of our mind when the provocation occurs. One should also note that being able to use a Credible First Strike Capability to influence Soviet or European behavior depends not only on our will, but also on Soviet and European estimates of our will. Serious problems may be created for us if either of them does not believe in our willingness to attack under certain kinds of provocation.

Let us consider some European estimates first. I have discussed with many Europeans the question of how many casualties an American decision maker or planner would be willing to envisage and still be willing to see this country live up to its obligations. Their estimates, perhaps not surprisingly, range much lower than the estimates of Americans, that is, roughly 2 to 20 million (clustering toward the lower numbers). In fact, one distinguished European expert thought that the U.S. would be deterred from retaliating with SAC against a major Soviet aggression in Europe by a Soviet threat to destroy five or ten empty U.S. cities.[13]

Will the Soviets find the threat of U.S. retaliation credible? I have not asked any Soviet citizens, so I lack the advantage of any introspection by Russians. But we do know that their formal writings strongly emphasize that decision makers should be able to control their emotions. The Soviets do not believe in cutting off their noses to spite their faces; they write and seem to believe that one should not be provoked into self-destructive behavior. They probably would assume that we do likewise. One would not think that the Soviets could believe that the U.S. would willingly commit suicide. In fact, I would conjecture that they would feel fairly certain about this matter. They could easily underestimate our resolve. We might easily be irrationally determined to resist the Soviets. We have no tradition in the United States of controlling our emotions. We have tended to emphasize the opposite notion (e.g., "Give me liberty or give me death"). A Soviet underestimation of U.S. resolve could create the worst of all situations--one in which we had not made preparations for the failure of deterrence because we knew we had enough resolve, but the Soviets didn't believe it so they went ahead and provoked us and we were forced to initiate a war in retaliation, a war in which we were not prepared to do anything more than kill Russians.[14] But it seems likely that unless we institute remedial measures, the Soviets may estimate that we will be deterred, and they will be right in their estimate. It should be realized that a very low additional probability of war might not deter the Soviets. It is not as if there were no probability at all of war and their action had created this probability. It would be much more reasonable to say that just the existence of the U.S.-S.U. rivalry means that somehow there is always a probability of war of, say, one in fifty every year, and that if the Soviet [14] Nathan Leites points out to me that a convinced Communist might be perfectly willing to believe that the cold-hearted capitalist ruling class would be willing to lose 60 million or so of the "lower" classes; but even this ideological estimator would probably feel safe from an attack if a Soviet retaliation could kill many more than 60 million Americans.

---

[13] After observing, in passing, that the case for more civil defense was "perhaps best put eighteen months ago in a study by The RAND Corporation," the London Times of January 4, 1960 editorialized, "No amount of money or concrete could guarantee to prevent the deaths of some millions of city-dwellers from blast and heat, and it is just as difficult to imagine an American President willing to risk deaths of five million Americans as of fifty million."

---

action increased this by, in any one year, 50 per cent--from the assumed .02 to .03--that this might not be, for many reasons, as deterring as raising the probability from zero to .01. As the engineer would put it, the increased probability of war must dominate "the noise level" to be deterring. This is particularly true if the Soviets believe that their action would either decrease the long-run probability of war or increase markedly their chance of coming out of such a war very much better than if they had not improved their position. In addition, if the Soviets were not to risk all by a single attempt but tested our resolve more gradually by instigating a series of crises, then without running excessive risks they could probably find out experimentally a great deal about our reactions to extreme provocations. No matter what our declared policy might be, our actual policy could be probed. Most important of all, it is difficult to believe in the absence of adequate measures for air defense and civil defense that the Europeans will have faith in our declared policy when it is strained. The Soviets may be able to make their gains more easily by working on the will and resolve of the Europeans than by working on ours. We must convince the Europeans as well as the Russians of our resolve if we are to prevent appeasement or an undue degree of accommodation.

Here again is a summary of the situation:

Chart 3

TRAGIC BUT DISTINGUISHABLE POSTWAR STATES

Dead	Time Needed for Economic Recuperation
2,000,000	1 year
5,000,000	2 years
10,000,000	5 years
20,000,000	10 years
40,000,000	20 years
80,000,000	50 years
160,000,000	100 years

Will the survivors envy the dead?

The first three lines in this chart indicate circumstances under which some Europeans still believe in U.S. "retaliation." The next two lines show circumstances in which most Americans seem to believe in it, and the last two lines indicate states in which neither Europeans nor Americans (nor presumably the Soviets) would believe that the use of our Strategic Air Command against the Soviet Union is credible--no matter what the Soviets did in Europe--providing they gave U.S. decision makers time to ponder seriously on the consequences of a war.

Unclassified published estimates of the casualties that the United States would suffer in a nuclear war generally run around 50 to 80 million. If these estimates are relevant (which at this writing is doubtful since they generally assume a Soviet surprise attack on an unalert United States), we are already deterred from living up to our alliance obligations. If these casualty estimates are not relevant, then we ought to make relevant estimates for now and the future.

The critical point is whether the Soviets and the Europeans believe that we can keep our casualties to a level we would find acceptable, whatever that level may be. In such an eventuality the Soviets would be deterred from such provocative acts as a ground attack on Europe, Hitler-type blackmail threats, or evacuation of their cities and presentation to us of an ultimatum. But if they do not believe that we can keep casualties to a level we would find acceptable, the Soviets may feel safe in undertaking these extremely provocative adventures; or at least the Europeans may believe that the Soviets will feel safe, and this in itself creates an extremely dangerous negotiating situation--one in which the possibility of extreme pressure and blackmail will always be in the background, if not the foreground.

The situation is actually worse than the mere estimate of the casualties or economic damage is likely to indicate. The most crucial and difficult question is the one asked at the bottom of the chart: "Will the survivors envy the dead?" Unless the President believes that the postwar world will be worth living in, he will in all likelihood be deterred from living up to our alliance obligations. We must give some attention to the conditions of postwar life, to the full impact of a thermonuclear war as indicated on Chart 4 below (the chart first appeared on page 29).

Chart 4

A COMPLETE DESCRIPTION OF A THERMONUCLEAR WAR

Includes the Analysis of:

1. Various time-phased programs for deterrence and defense and their possible impact on us, our allies, and others.
2. Wartime performance with different preattack and attack conditions.
3. Acute fallout problems.
4. Survival and patch-up.
5. Maintenance of economic momentum.
6. Long-term recuperation.
7. Postwar medical problems.
8. Genetic problems.

As has already been explained, one does not have to be trying to achieve a Credible First Strike Capability to be interested in trying to cope with the eight phases of a thermonuclear war. Even if one believes in mutual annihilation, he may still be willing to endorse Counterforce as Insurance Capability (the insurance against unreliability discussed in the previous section). This is because a reasonable person generally knows that his beliefs can be wrong. Many will agree, therefore, that some portion of the defense budget should be allocated to Counterforce as Insurance and to other measures designed to alleviate the consequences of a war. Because paper calculations can be misleading, it is rational to have even an inconsistent program which hedges against this possibility.

There is, however, a difference between Counterforce as Insurance and Credible First Strike Capabilities. In the case of the latter we do not say that there is a modest probability that the mutual annihilation theory is wrong; instead, we require that there be a very high probability that it is wrong. In short, the time has come when we must believe that our programs are very likely to be successful under wartime and postwar conditions.

When this has been said, it is still important to know (abstractly, we hope) that a war in which the U.S. made the first strike would result in more favorable conditions for us than would the wars that are generally considered. And even here we are more interested in deterrence than in striking first! We are more deeply interested in what the Soviets will conclude when they ask themselves, "If we try this very provoking act, will the United States strike us?" than in speculating on what could happen to us if we should actually strike them. It is quite possible that the Soviets may conclude when contemplating action that their risks are too high (even though the fact may be that we have already concluded that we would not actually dare to initiate the war). It is for such reasons that even a facade may be invaluable. Everyone knows that there is an enormous difference between a probability and a certainty.

5. Splendid First Strike and no Limited War Capability

It is difficult for most people to believe that any nation would initiate a thermonuclear war against an opponent capable of retaliation no matter what capabilities it had and no matter how much it was provoked; nevertheless, there are many military planners who oppose having limited war capabilities to handle modest provocations. They say this is a diversion of our resources from more important and essential central war capabilities. They seem to feel that our strategic force can be so effective in Soviet eyes that they would not dare to provoke us in even a minor way. They also believe that if the Soviets did provoke us we should then hit them at "a time and place of our choosing," thereby punishing the Soviets for their provocation. This is, roughly speaking, the massive retaliation theory as enunciated by former Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. While a Credible First Strike Capability to correct or avenge a limited but major aggression also involves massive retaliation, the distinction is that it is massive retaliation over major issues--not minor ones. It should also be clear that if the terror in the "balance of terror" intensifies, the line between major and minor issues will shift so that the level of provocation we will accept without triggering SAC will increase.

I believe that anyone who studies even superficially the effects of thermonuclear war will inevitably reach certain conclusions. Chief among these is the idea that even if one could launch a very successful first strike, the net damage, if only from the backlash (i.e., the fallout on the U.S. and the world from the bombs dropped on Russia, not to speak of the Russian people who would be killed), would make it unreasonable to make such a strike on a minor issue. Is it not true that if we were to launch such a war it would not be over the minor issue bothering us but really because we had decided to engage in a form of preventive war? In the real world we would have to worry about far more than just the backlash from our blow; we would have to worry about Soviet retaliatory action. For such practical reasons alone, not to speak of vitally important moral and political ones, the notion of having a "Splendid" First Strike Capability seems fanciful to me.

6. Dreams

If a "Splendid" First Strike Capability seems in the light of facts and reason to be fanciful, it is no less strange than many of the ideas which make the rounds in Washington or in European capitals. In such places one finds consideration given to very implausible notions. One of these is a conflict in which a thermonuclear blow is followed by a three-year war of production accompanied by the kind of mobilization we had in World War II. Another is the notion that the enemy can go ahead and strike us first but that our defenses would keep us essentially untouched, and that we in turn can strike back and then survey the situation. There is the fervid belief in the possibility of a "leakproof" active defense system. There is the concept of a long drawn-out conflict, a "broken backed war," waged with conventional weapons because both sides have simultaneously used up all their nuclear weapons. There is the claim that in a thermonuclear war it is important to keep the sea lanes open. And there is the quaint idea that the main purpose of civil defense is to support a thermonuclear war effort with men and materials. Or the equally quaint notion that after a massive interchange of thermonuclear bombs the major objective of the U.S. Army forces in the United States will not be civilian recuperation but to move to a (destroyed) port of embarkation for movement overseas. While all of these views are most implausible, they can be found in various types of official and semiofficial statements.

Where do such ideas come from? They generally result, it can be assumed, from doctrinal lags or from position papers which primarily reflect a very narrow departmental interest or which are the result of log-rolling compromises between several partisan departments of the government. We are fortunate that on the whole these views are no longer taken seriously even by many of the decision makers who sign the papers. Unfortunately, this does not prevent the papers themselves from influencing public opinion and policy to an important extent.

It should be noted that those who are convinced of the efficacy of Minimum or Finite Deterrence tend to believe that the Counterforce as Insurance, the Credible First Strike Capability, and the "Splendid" First Strike Capability views are as fanciful as the dream capabilities mentioned above. If anything, they find them more dangerously fanciful because so many people take them seriously. In this book only the following strategic positions will be considered seriously: Finite Deterrence, Counterforce as Insurance, Preattack Mobilization Base, and Credible First Strike Capability--all with varying degrees of Arms Control and Limited War Capability. The burden of my discussion will be on the nature, feasibility, and problems associated with each of the above strategies, with the purpose of suggesting which one should be the basis of national policy. Our national policy at this writing seems to be drifting (mostly as a result of decisions evaded or decided for relatively minor technical reasons) toward accepting a strategy between Finite Deterrence and Counterforce as Insurance. It is one of my main arguments that at least for the immediate future we should be somewhere between the Preattack Mobilization Base and the Credible First Strike Capability. This posture would have, at least, enough capability to launch a first strike in the kind of tense situation that would result from an outrageous Soviet provocation, so as to induce uncertainty in the enemy as to whether it would not be safer to attack us directly rather than provoke us. The posture should have enough of a retaliatory capability to make this direct attack unattractive. It should have enough of a Preattack Mobilization Base to enable us to increase our first strike and retaliatory capabilities rapidly enough so that, if international relations deteriorate seriously, we will be able to acquire sufficient power in time to control or influence events. There should be enough Counterforce as Insurance so that if a war occurs anyway--perhaps as a result of accident or miscalculation--the nation will continue and unnecessary death and destruction will not occur. And lastly the posture should include enough Arms Control and Limited War Capability to deter and correct "minor" conflicts and to make the day-to-day course of international relations livable until more permanent and stable arrangements are set up.

Williams, Chester S

June 4, 1951

Dear Chester:

Belated thanks for yours of May 2. This time the booklet arrived and we shall undoubtedly make plenty of use of it. Again my best thanks.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester S. Williams
United States Mission to the United Nations
2 Park Avenue
New York 16, New York

UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

2 PARK AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.
MURRAY HILL 3-6810

16.

May 2, 1951

Dear Ed:

Here is another copy of the booklet I sent to you on January 23 and which was apparently lost in transit. You might find it useful in scrounging around for your "word for today". Also, the text of Ambassador Austin's speech on the occasion of Benjamin Franklin's anniversary contains a pretty useful statement from Franklin's last speech at the Constitutional Convention. Americans seem to be getting pretty hysterical over the rather obvious fact that, when you gather men from many different countries and languages "to have the advantage of their joint wisdom", it takes a lot of discussion to find a common course. They do not jump forward to accept every proposal which bears the label, "Made in America". Far too many Americans take the impatient view that, if they can't agree with us but quick, let them go to Hell--without realizing that we would follow close on their heels.

Sincerely,

Chet

Chester S. Williams
Deputy Chief of Public Information

Mr. Edward Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

ADVANCE RELEASE
FOR RELEASE SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1951 at 12:30 P.M., E.S.T.

Press Release #1117
January 18, 1951

AMERICA'S FUTURE IN WORLD AFFAIRS

By

Ambassador Warren R. Austin

Remarks at the Luncheon of the International Benjamin Franklin Society, presenting him with the Gold Medal Award of the Society, Hotel Commodore, Saturday, January 20, 1951.

It gives me unusual pleasure to accept the Gold Medal Award of the International Benjamin Franklin Society on this occasion of his 245th anniversary.

Dr. Franklin was our first great diplomat, and truly a world citizen. A modern practitioner of the arts of international conference will do well to model himself after this world statesman.

"America's Future in World Affairs" is the subject of my brief discourse. I propose to concentrate on one, vital question, namely: how shall we treat with our friends and enemies to assure ourselves a democratic future in a free and peaceful world?

I take for my text a significant paragraph from Benjamin Franklin's last address to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, 1787:

I quote: "When you assemble a number of men, to have the advantage of their joint wisdom you inevitably assemble with those men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected?"

You will recall that Dr. Franklin is here commenting upon the consumation of the American Constitution. He goes on to say: "It therefore astonishes me, Sir, to find this system approaching so near to perfection as it does; and I think it will astonish our enemies, who are waiting with confidence to hear, that our councils are confounded like those of the builders of Babel, and that our States are on the point of separation, only to meet hereafter for the purpose of cutting one another's throats." End of Quote.

How timely an utterance! It needs to be repeated at the United Nations in New York and in the Congress of the United States in Washington.

In the United Nations we are negotiating continuously with both friends and enemies. The avowed enemy of the free world has tried his best to divide the majority. So far his tactics have actually helped to unite the many and to isolate the aggressive few.

MORE

America's future depends upon how wisely it carries its responsibilities of leadership in the United Nations. In the midst of this crisis, instead of helping to keep the central point clear, some Americans are spreading confusion by distorting and belaboring every subordinate issue which arises in the course of coping with complicated world problems.

The central point is the unification of the free world in the face of aggression and threats of aggression. The aim is peace. The method is collective action.

Each member of the free world, standing alone, is too weak to resist the pressures or the attack of a powerful empire. Not one of them, counting the United States, can make itself powerful enough for separate self-defense. Collective measures are dictated by necessity. As Dr. Franklin put it: "Unless we all hang together, we most assuredly will hang separately."

But acting together the members of the free world constitute a two-to-one preponderance of power. Their expressed determination to build up their united strength through the Collective Measures program, which they adopted in the United Nations a few weeks ago, is the last best hope of peace. Division among them would be an open invitation to aggression.

We shall never effect that unity and avoid that division by carping criticism of our friends, questioning their motives, denouncing their defects, and berating the United Nations through which they are consulting and trying to reach a consensus.

Each nation in the free world is searching its soul as we push forward with our planning for collective measures. Each faces the inescapable question: Do we choose to stand aloof and alone, relying solely upon our own strength for our security and independence?

I am convinced that not a single government in the free world is prepared to answer "yes" to that question. On every issue involving that question by implication the votes in the United Nations have been overwhelmingly on the side of collective security, usually 53 to 5.

Of course every member needs and wants the collective support of all the others. They want that support organized and coordinated.

Some may want to "eat their cake and have it too" - want the benefits of collective support without the responsibility of contributing to the collective power. But it must now be clear: he who wishes to stand aloof risks standing alone. The price of protection by the many is full participation by each in proportion to his ability in the system of collective security.

This is the central point and core of United Nations' policy. Let us never be diverted from it. Every other question must be put in its proper relation to this over-riding necessity.

We are plagued today, as Ben Franklin was in his day, by arrogant claims of infallibility. Franklin admonished his wrangling colleagues against this form of egotism.

He said, "Though many private persons think almost as highly of their own infallibility as that of their Sect, few express it so naturally as a certain French lady who in a dispute with her sister said, 'I don't know how it happens, sister, but I meet with nobody but myself that's always in the right.'"

MORE
1117

Most of the delegates at the United Nations have become weary with the raucous speeches of certain apostles of infallibility. In contrast, the American delegation has won confidence by its respect for the opinions of others, and its policy to join in deliberation rather than to dictate. I trust that we shall not fall into the serious error of our adversaries who hold that a differing opinion is not only wrong but also dishonest.

When I listen to the voices of certainty in our own country expounding the one and only way of salvation, I recall the mellow wisdom of Dr. Franklin. In the beginning of his historic speech to the Constitutional Convention, he said: "Having lived long, I have experienced many instances of being obliged by better information or fuller consideration to change opinions, even on important subjects.... It is therefore that, the older I grow, the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment."

It is in that spirit we must treat with our friends, seeking always to avail ourselves of their wisdom and experience.

At the same time, we owe to them a forthright expression of our own views. We must at all times argue stoutly for the right as we see it.

Recently in the United Nations we have been laboring with our friends day and night to find a common course of action. In this endeavor we and they have at all times agreed on the goal toward which we chart this course.

The United States has not always shared the hopes and beliefs of many of our friends concerning their peace-making proposals. We have said so plainly. But we have recognized their sincerity in trying to leave no stone unturned in seeking a peaceful solution.

The rebuff of the Peiping regime, and its arrogant demands upon the United Nations, should be a sufficient answer, both to those who had hopes the Communists would accept a peaceful procedure, and those who feared the proposals would be accepted as a bribe and a sell-out.

With the "better information and fuller consideration," the United Nations now confronts the next steps. We can now move forward in greater unity.

Among friends who so desperately depend upon each other there must be respect and understanding. Else we shall lose the great goal, and fall one by one into the hands of the enemy.

We must also treat with the enemy. In this we must be alert to his purposes, thoroughly conversant with his methods, and acutely aware of his vulnerability. Let us not assume that he is either less intelligent or more intelligent than we are.

Our object here is to restrain the enemy, to warn him away from the step which would cause general devastation even though it would bring about his own downfall.

So we must not be afraid to confer and negotiate. Nor should we underestimate the great values of contending with a powerful adversary in open conference. He must be given opportunity to test the unity of the free world; for it is this unity which may deflect him from an act of miscalculation.

Negotiating with a recognized enemy to avoid a conflict is not appeasement. Going to Munich was not the appeasement; what came out of Munich was. Let us be clear about this as we treat with friends and enemies in the days ahead.

MORE
1117

If you start with the necessity for friends, you will begin with the heart of policy. Then you have the acid test to apply to each line of action: does it unite or divide; in effect, does it strengthen the hand of the enemy, or tend to stay the hand of the enemy?

America's future in world affairs is decided to some extent by each citizen; for we are guided and ultimately controlled by public opinion. Let that opinion rise to the challenge of our times. Let it reflect the appealing phrase from the Declaration of Independence which reads, "with a decent respect for the opinions of mankind."

* * * * **

Williams, Chet

UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

2 PARK AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.
MURRAY HILL 3-6810

January 23, 1951

Dear Ed:

It has been a long time since we have met face-to-face, though Elizabeth and I feel that we have almost daily contact with you through the 7:45 show.

We sold our place in Great Neck and now have an apartment at 431 East 20 Street. Let's get together soon - sometime after I get back from a cruise in February.

Meanwhile, it occurs to me that you might find the enclosed booklet useful in scrounging around for your "word for today". Also, the text of Ambassador Austin's speech on the occasion of Benjamin Franklin's anniversary contains a pretty useful statement from Franklin's last speech at the Constitutional Convention. Americans seem to be getting pretty hysterical over the rather obvious fact that, when you gather men from many different countries and languages "to have the advantage of their joint wisdom", it takes a lot of discussion to find a common course. They do not jump forward to accept every proposal which bears the label, "Made in America". Far too many Americans take the impatient view that, if they can't agree with us but quick, let them go to Hell--without realizing that we would follow close on their heels.

Best wishes to the family.

Sincerely yours,

Chet

Chester S. Williams
Deputy Chief of Public Information

Mr. Edward Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Williams, Chester

September 7, 1948

Mr. Chester S. Williams
Public Liaison Officer
United States Mission to the United Nations
2 Park Avenue
New York 16, N. Y.

Dear Chet:

Many thanks for yours of the 1st. The best of luck to you in Paris; I may see you there yet!

Best regards to Elizabeth.

As ever yours,

UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

ARK AVENUE
YORK 16, N.Y.
RAY HILL 3-6810

September 1, 1948

Dear Ed:

Thanks for your note of August 25. I sent you a copy of my letter to Bryson simply because I thought you would be interested in the idea. It appears that there will be one or two such broadcasts and NBC is having a special assembly program on the 22nd of October directed to several thousand high school assemblies being set up by the NEA.

Of course, we have a number of plans in the works for cooperation with the commentators of the various networks in Paris.

I am afraid last-minute preparations will preclude acceptance of your kind invitation. It would seem to me that you would run out of "words for the day" unless you fly over to Paris for a fresh supply. Elizabeth is accompanying me. Why don't you bring Janet over and we will have a drink there?

Best wishes to you both.

Very sincerely,

Chet

Chester S. Williams
Public Liaison Officer

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Williams, Chester S.

August 25, 1948

Dear Chet:

Thanks for the copy of your letter to Bryson. As you know, I no longer have anything to say regarding CBS programming. I hope they follow your suggestion, but I don't think they will.

Come and have a drink before you push off for Paris.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chester S. Williams
United States Mission to the United Nations
2 Park Avenue
New York 16, New York

U.S. Mission to the U.N.
2 Park Ave N.Y.16

August 23, 1948

Dear Mr. Bryson:

The United States Mission to the United Nations has made arrangements to provide liaison services for approximately forty or fifty American organizations. I am enclosing a list of the organizations and representatives at present registered with us for this purpose. I believe there will be another dozen organizations and individuals added to this list before we leave for Paris on September 13.

This group of organizations and individual leaders is quite representative of the American people, having composite memberships of many millions.

The constituents of these organizations, as well as radio listeners, generally would appreciate an opportunity to hear reports from Paris by short-wave over various American networks during the General Assembly. Our thought is that perhaps four such reports could be planned with three or four leaders of the organizations represented participating in each program. One might be broadcast in late September, a couple in October and one in November.

If you feel that your network would be interested in arranging such a program, please let me know and put me in contact with your representative in Paris so that I can assist him in arranging a program. If you would like to carry such a program please propose alternative dates and times.

Very sincerely,

Chester S. Williams
Public Liaison Officer

Mr. Lyman Bryson
Columbia Broadcasting Company
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N.Y.

P. S. You remember I wrote to Wells Church with a copy for you sometime back about this idea. Subsequently, I had a conversation with Bill Nelson, who felt that CBS might be interested in doing three or four such programs in view of the pending plans fora CBS American assembly this year, involving participation of most of these national organizations. A few reports from the leaders of these organizations in Paris would certainly be grist for that mill. I believe you were taking the matter up with the News Department and felt that the details would be worked out by the CBS representative in Paris. The plan, of course, should be outlined to him in some detail as soon as possible.

cc:
Mr. W. Nelson
Mr. Victor Rattner
Mr. E. Murrow

ORGANIZATIONS TO BE REPRESENTED AT PARIS

Name, Address of Organization	Tel. Number	Executive in Chg.	Name, address of Paris Rep.
American Farm Bureau Federation Munsey Building Washington, D. C.		Mr. W. R. Ogg Dir. of Dept. of Int'l. Affairs	William Raymond Ogg
American Federation of Labor 570 Lexington Avenue New York, N. Y.		Matthew Woll	Irving Brown Major William Rutz
American Friends Service Comm. 20 S. 12th St. Philadelphia 7, Pa.	Rittenhouse 9372	Clarence E. Pickett Exec. Secy.	William Huntington, 17 Ru Notre Dame de Champ, Paris
American Institute of Pacific Relations, Inc. 1 E. 54th Street New York 22, N. Y.	El 5-1759	Edward O. Carter, Exec. V. P.	Miss Virginia Thompson (Mrs. Adloff) Mr. Richard Adloff, Villa Ez des-Roses, Eze Bord-de-Me Alpes Maritime France
American Jewish Committee 386 4th Avenue New York 16, N.Y.	MU 5-0181	Simon Segal	Joel D. Wolfsohn 30 Rue La Boetie Paris 8
American Jewish Congress 1834 Broadway New York 23, N. Y.	CI 6-1900	Samuel Caplan, Secy.	Dr. David Petegorsky
The American National Red Cross National Headquarters Washington 13, D. C.		P.E. Ryan, Dir. Int'l. Activities	Mr. William L. Gower 5 Place Vendome Paris
American Peace Society 1712 H Street Washington 6, D. C.	National 7409	A.J. Peaslee, Pres.	Dr. Franklin Dunham
Association of the Junior Leagues of America, Inc. The Waldorf-Astoria New York 22, N. Y.	EL 5-4380	Miss Dorothy W. Greer, Exec. Secy.	Mrs. Howard B. Passel
B'nai B'rith 1003 K St., N.W. Washington 1, D. C.		Maurice Bisgyer Int'l. Secy.	Maurice Bisgyer
Carnegie Endowment for International Peace 405 E. 117th Street New York 27, N. Y.	UN 4-1850	Alger Hiss	Dr. Howard Wilson B. Trowbridge Erik Trancy Miss Helen Scanlo Mme. Perreux Anne Winslow
The Church Peace Union 170 E. 64th St. New York 21, N. Y.	RE 7-3703	R.W. Sockman, Pres.	Dr. Henry A. Atkinson Mrs. Edgerton Parsons

Name, Address of Org.	Tel. Number	Exec. in Charge	Name, address of Paris Rep.
Commission to Study the Organization of Peace 45 E. 65th Street New York 21, N. Y.	BU 8-8000	Prof. J.T.Shotwell Hon. Chairman	Clark M. Eichelberger Cyril Bath Howard Wilson Dr. O. Frederic Nolde Dr. Henry Atkinson, etc.
Committee on Women in World Affairs 300 Park Avenue New York, N. Y.		Mrs. W. H. Davis, Chairman	Mrs. Edgerton Parsons Highover Hadlyme, Conn. (Paris) Reid-Hall Rue de Chevreus Paris 6
Congress of Industrial Organizations 718 Jackson Pl., N. W. Washington 6, D. C.	Executive 5581	Michael Ross, Dir. Int'l. Affairs	Mr. Elmer Cope 3 Rue du Recher. Suresnes (Seine Paris
Cooperative for American Remittances to Europe, Inc. 50 Broad Street New York 4, N. Y.	HA 2-6484	Paul C. French Exec. Dir.	Mr. Jackson Wright CARE Mission 149 Rue de Grenelle Paris 7e
Country Women's Council USA 1706 E. Washington Street Bloomington, Ill.		Mrs. Spencer Ewing Chmn.	Represented by Associated Country Women of the World
The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America 297 Fourth Avenue New York 10, N. Y.	GR 5-3475	C.P.Taft, Pres.	Rev. Walter W. Van Kirk (tentatively) Hotel Farnese 32 Rue Hamelin Paris 32
Foreign Missions Conference of North America 156 Fifth Avenue New York 10, N. Y.	CH 2-3230	Miss Gloria Wysner, Secy.	Rev. Walter W. van Kirk Hotel Farnese 32 Rue Hamelin Paris 32
Foreign Policy Association, Inc. 22 E. 38th Street New York 16, N. Y.	MU 5-5740	Miss Frances Pratt	Herbert L. May 12 Grand Mezel Geneva, Switzerland
General Brotherhood Board Church of the Brethren 22 South State St. Elgin, Ill.	5010	W. Harold Row Secy.	Dr. M. R. Zigler Church of the Brethren 20 Rue du Cendri Geneva, Switzerland
General Federation of Women's Clubs 511 Madison Avenue New York, N. Y.		Mrs. Charlotte Payne	Mrs. W.D.Sporbor Boson's Forest House Enfield, New Ham Mrs. M. W. Ambor 1070 Park Ave., N Mrs. W. H. Boardley Summit St. Springfield, Vt.

Name, Address of Org.	Tel. Number	Exec. in Charge	Name, Address of Paris Rep.
Lions International 332 S. Michigan Ave. Chicago 4, Ill.		Melvin Jones, Sec.-Gen.	Fred W. Smith
National Association for the Advancement of Colored People 20 W. 40th Street New York 18, New York	LO 3-6890	Walter White, Secy.	Walter White
The National Board of the YWCA's of USA 600 Lexington Avenue New York 22, New York	PL 3-4700	Dorothy Groeling Secy for Int'l Ed.	Mrs. G. Beresford Fox World's YWCA Quai Wilson 37 Geneva, Switzerland
National Catholic Welfare Conference 17 E. 51st Street New York 22, N.Y.		Miss Catherine Schaeffer	Richard Pattee 14 Rue de Romont Fribourg, Switzerland
National Council of Jewish Women, Inc. 1819 Broadway New York 23, N.Y.	CI 6-3175	Mrs. J.M. Welt Nat'l.Pres.	Mrs. Adolf Robison Box 158 Ocean Beach Fire Island, N.Y.
National Council of Women of the United States 501 Madison Ave. New York 22, N.Y.	PL 5-6513 PL 9-4870	Mrs. W.B.Parsons, Jr.	Mrs. Edgerton Parsons (summer address) Highover-Cove Acres-Hadlyme,Con (Paris) Reid-Hall 4 Rue de Chevreus Paris 4
National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs Inc. 1819 Broadway New York 23, N.Y.	CO 5-3934	Mildred Burgess, Dir.Int'l Reltns.	Mildred Burgess
National Jewish Welfare Board 145 East 32nd Street New York 16, N.Y.	LE 2-4949	Frank L. Weil, President	Rabbi Samuel Gordon
National Order of Women Legislators 626 W. Kalamazoo St. Lansing, Michigan		Mrs. Elizabeth L. Belen, Pres.	Mrs. S. Grover Rich 271 Ninth Ave. Salt Lake City Utah
National Peace Conference 8 W. 40th Street New York 18, N.Y.	CH 4-6236	Mrs. Bertha V. Louis, Secy.	Rev. Walter V. Van Kirk Hotel Farnese 32 Rue Hamelin Paris Mrs. Edgerton Parsons Reid-Hall 4 Rue de Chevreus Paris 4. Miss Helen Kittredge

Name, Address of Org.	Tel. No.	Exec. in Charge	Name, Address of Paris Rep.
Pan-Pacific Women's Assn. 555 Park Ave. New York 21, N. Y.		Mrs. Edgerton Parsons, Chmn.	Mrs. Edgerton Parsons Reid-Hall 4 Rue de Chevreuse Paris 4 Mrs. Pearl F. Richardson
Synagogue Council of America 3785 Broadway New York 32, N. Y.	WA 6-8930	Rabbi W.F.Rosenblum President	Rabbi Simon G. Kramer
The United Council of Church Women 156 Fifth Avenue New York 10, N. Y.	CH 2-3230	Miss Mabel Head	Miss Helen Kittredge c/o Compagnie Elect Comptable 3-5 Place Vendome Paris 1 Mrs. C. B. Fox c/o LeFoyer des Etudiantes 93 Boulevard St. Michel Paris 5
United World Federalists, Inc. 7 E. 12th St. New York 3, New York	OR 3-9000	Cord Meyer, Jr.	Mr. Edgar Mowrer 3301 Garfield St NW Washington, D. C. Cord Meyer, Jr.
Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace 1 E. 57th Street New York 22, N.Y.	EL 5-3142	Mrs. Dana Converse Backus, Interim National Chmn.	Mrs. L.H.Fradkin Hotel Bedford Rue de L'Arcade Paris Mrs. Edgar Mowrer 146 Rue de L'Université, Paris 7 Miss Mary Dingman Foyer International des Etudiantes 93 Boulevard St. Michel, Paris
Women's International League for Peace & Freedom 41 Greenwich Avenue New York 14, N. Y.	CH 2-4267	Gladys D. Walser Field Rep.	Mrs. Ruth Gage Colby International Union for Child Welfare 43 Quai Wilson Geneva, Switzerland
World Alliance for International Fellowship 170 E. 64th St. New York 21, N. Y.	RE 7-3703	R.W.Sockman, Pres.	Dr. Henry A. Atkinson Mrs. Edgerton Parsons
World Federation of YMHA's & Jewish Community Centers 145 E. 32nd St. New York 16, N. Y.	LE 2-4949	F.L.Weil, Pres.	Samuel H. Gordon Hotel Continental 3 Rue de Castiglione Paris

---

American Women's Voluntary Services, Inc. 99 Park Avenue New York 16, N. Y.	LE 2-1722	Mrs. Ogden L. Mills, Pres.	Mrs. Alfred F. Hess

[Ernst, Morris]
Worthy, Wm., Jr.
ERM Personal Confidential
'47-'59

LAWRENCE S. GREENBAUM (1915-1951)

EDWARD S. GREENBAUM
HERBERT A. WOLFF
MORRIS L. ERNST
LEO ROSEN
HARRIET F. PILPEL
WILLIAM F. WOLFF, JR.
WIRTH H. KOENIG
MAURICE C. GREENBAUM
HERBERT A. WOLFF, JR.
JOHN A. WIENER
CHARLES E. HEMING

CASSRELL GREENBERG
PLATT V. KETCHAM
JULIA PERLES
FREDERIC S. NATHAN
BARRY LEE COHEN
RICHARD M. ADER
MARY MOERS WENIG
NANCY F. WECHSLER
MORTON DAVID GOLDBERG
ALAN U. SCHWARTZ
NORMAN W. ARNHEIM

GREENBAUM, WOLFF & ERNST
285 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 17, N. Y.

TELEPHONE MURRAY HILL 5-1582

CABLE ADDRESSES:
GREWOLFERN, NEW YORK
MORERNST, NEW YORK

January 15, 1959

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

Dear Ed:

Re: Worthy

I enclose a rough draft of the Amicus brief in the Worthy case. Please look it over for mood, to see whether we are on the right track. Once we get your overall opinion, we shall proceed accordingly and shall strengthen it with some necessary citations and the like without which lawyers feel unarmed. You will note that the brief has been drafted in your name only, but this of course can be changed if you do get the desired people to file it with you.

I have been in contact with the Justice Department, who seem to be somewhat concerned about this case. They have been rather sticky about giving consent for you to file this brief, claiming that if they let you file, why shouldn't they let every other reporter file. Needless to say this is something of a phony argument and is not in line with their previous precedence. We are certainly prepared to file a motion asking the court for leave to file the brief, but we think it would be most preferable from every point of view if you might not give Rogers or someone else at the top a ring to see whether you can get the consent directly. This is a neater, simpler, and quicker way to proceed.

The fact that the Justice Department is somewhat worried about your brief is encouraging. They know that they have a fight on their hands in the case as a whole and they are defending themselves already. It seems to both Morris and myself that this issue is of vital importance right now. We are sure you agree.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.

January 15, 1959

I hope you get a chance to look this over shortly since time, although not of the essence, is rather short. I would be more than happy, as you well know, to meet you at any time to discuss the thing further, and would love to have your comments. Please let me know.

Morris has asked me to remind you about getting your secretary to put your manuscripts in order, so that they may be given away as tax deductible gifts. Although you certainly are very busy, you should not forget about this since it will be of some use to you financially. I am of course always available to help out with this when the time comes.

Morris is off to London and points East tomorrow morning and things here have been rather hectic. He has asked me to send you his best, as always.

I thought lunch on Saturday was wonderful and I was proud to be there.

Sincerely yours,

Alan

Alan U. Schwartz

bmo

enc.

DRAFT

BRIEF OF EDWARD R. MURROW

Amicus Curiae

Edward R. Murrow, appearing herein as amicus curiae with the consent of both parties, filed with the Clerk of this Court, has a special interest in this case by virtue of his long professional experience in gathering and dissemination of news to the American public. Since the issues here involved relate necessarily to restrictions upon the source of news available to the American people, amicus is particularly grateful for this opportunity for the expression of his views in the hope that they may be of some aid to the Court.

I

In the early days of our Republic when newspapers were few and movies and radio and television were not even thoughts in the minds of the most imaginative, our constitutional guaranties of free speech and free press were designed for the benefit of the disseminators of information, such as the printer, the publisher, or the soap box orator. As our country grew both in size and complexity, so did its need for the dissemination of news. Word of mouth or even a small pamphlet every now and then would no longer suffice. The gap in communication between the American in Oregon and the American in New York was bridged by an intricate and constantly expanding network of newspapers, movies, radio and television.

In this way was molded our informed citizenry of today, essential, we believe in constitutional terms, for our democracy. And with this process of evolution came a new interpretation by our courts of the constitutional protections of free speech and free press. Holmes and Brandeis pointed out that in modern society the ultimate value of free speech and free press lies not so much with the disseminators of ideas and facts but with the ideas and facts themselves. If truth were to be discovered it would be discovered only by competition of ideas in the marketplace, in a community where fact and theory alike were available for consideration, debate and selection by the public. In constitutional terms the First amendment now protects the right to hear, to see and to read. Because of the increased recognition given to the value of an informed public, it is now well settled law that the protection given by the Constitution to free speech and free press attaches to the eventual recipients of this information rather than to its disseminators.

The main concern of amicus in this case, then, is not primarily with the rights of appellant or any other individual. The application of the principles of freedom of speech and press to the appellant in this case is a result not of his position as an individual, but of his particular function as one who gathers and disseminates news to the American public. For purposes of this case he must be considered as a faceless individual whose own particular merits are immaterial. It is his function, not his person, which must be considered. As a news reporter he is acting as the servant of the people in fulfillment of their basic constitutional right to be informed. This is not the case of a merchant or ordinary pleasure traveler who desires complete freedom to travel for his own ends. Nor should this situation be confused with the possible constitutional right to deny passports in cases such as persons escaping judicial orders, running from fraudulently created debts, or persons suffering from communicable diseases, and the like. This is the case of one who must be free to travel, not for his own sake or even because of his own rights as a citizen, but in order to provide the American people with what they are constitutionally entitled, namely, information in the search for truth.

The right to information is not an abstract right. In areas of general human understanding democratic government cannot survive unless the electorate has at its disposal all available information on which to reach intelligent conclusions about the future of our country, and indeed, our world. A leadership responsible only to an uninformed or partially informed electorate can bring nothing but disaster to our world.

The State Department takes the position that foreign policy is within its exclusive jurisdiction. We do not draw an issue on this position. Amicus does not deem it necessary to urge that the Legislative branch of the Government has the power to make foreign policy in this Passport area. Assuredly, foreign policy is not within the province of the Judicial branch of our Government. In simple terms, the problem facing the Court is whether, in the light of the First Amendment to the Constitution, the people of our Republic can be denied knowledge gathered by our citizens -- in this case, in China -- as not only an individual right of citizens to travel throughout the world but, more particularly, as a right of our people to have the potential power to reflect public opinion so that the foreign policy of our nation, enunciated by the Secretary of State, rests, at least in part, on the reflexes and reactions and debates of the people of our Republic.

The present debate in the marketplace is slanted and distorted in violation of the Constitution by the denial of the people to be informed through the eyes and cultural attitudes of our citizens travelling in China. It may be that the State Department would have the power to appraise and enunciate a foreign policy, in total disregard of even a unanimously expressed position of our people, after reading reports from our citizens traveling in China. It may even be that such debate in our marketplace of thought might be totally wrong in fact and that the secret reports to our State Department might properly indicate a different foreign policy than that derived by the people of our Nation as informed by our citizens reporting out of China.

Amicus suggests that the rights under the First Amendment should not be curtailed so as to deny our people the right to have information indigenously arising out of our cultural attitudes through reporters in China. In no way does this basic right imply that the people have the power to make the foreign policy.

Amicus does not mean to suggest that all documents of secret diplomacy be made available to the American public. He recognizes in these times more than ever the vital need for sober and unpublicized debate around the conference table. He is concerned only with the gathering and dissemination to the American public of the vast amounts of non-secret information which awaits discovery by perceptive reporters in Communist China and elsewhere around the globe.

The action of the Secretary of State in the instant case puts out of reach of the American public sources of non-secret first-hand information without which it is impossible for them to exercise intelligently their democratic responsibility, and such action is clearly violative of the constitutional right of the people to be informed.

II.

The Secretary of State contends that the Department's prohibition on travel to Communist China has not substantially limited the scope of news available to the American people. This is hardly a tenable contention. Because Communist China is closed to American newsmen, the American public is put in the anomolous and dangerous position of having to learn about that country from reporters of foreign countries, foreign governments (usually the Communist Chinese government itself) and perhaps an occasional "turncoat" United States soldier.*

---

* The irony of this situation is best illustrated in the recent issue of LIFE MAGAZINE (January 5, 1959). At p. 44 of this issue appears one of the few articles by LIFE on Communist China under the title, "Misery-Oppression" by James Bell. The extensive photographs which accompanied the article were taken by a Frenchman, Cartier-Bresson. When asked why the article by Mr. Bell was written from Hong Kong while the photos by Mr. Cartier-Bresson were taken in Communist China itself, a spokesman for LIFE said, rather unhappily, that Mr. Bell is an American who couldn't enter the country while Mr. Bresson was French and could enter as he pleased. It is important also to note that the overwhelming majority of important articles on Communist China which have appeared in American magazines in recent years were based either on second-hand information, or first-hand information grown stale with age. Moreover, our largest television networks have had to rely for recent programs on Communist China upon films supplied to them from non-United States sources. And, finally, and what is perhaps most indicative of the fallacy of the Secretary of State's position in this matter, when television station WNEW-TV in New York showed a two-part series on Communist China on October 22nd and October 29, 1958, it relied solely upon comments made by appellant in this case and upon comments made by two of the students recently in Red China in violation of the ban of the Secretary of State. It is not hard to realize that these three participants were the only first-hand sources of information available for dissemination to the public.

3 years - former Canadian Reporter

It is folly to assume, as does the Secretary in this case, that information about Communist China gathered by non-United States sources can be of real benefit to the American public. Clearly information received from the Peking Government or from United States "turncoats" is tainted with self-interest conscious or unconscious. In addition news obtained from other foreign sources, whether governmental or reportorial, is generally misleading to us since it is news reported and screened by individuals who are necessarily less than intimate with the needs, aims and objectives of American foreign policy. The First Amendment right of the people to be informed is rendered impotent if Americans are made to view information through foreign eyes only. For the public is thereby given a synthetic, rather than real, marketplace in which to test for truth.

III.

The Government contends, among other things, that the State Department may control the travel of its citizens, including newsmen, since it must bear the burden of their protection in foreign lands. However, informed people everywhere, and especially newsmen, know that this burden is not very great. We are past the days of sending gunboats into shallow foreign inlets. Amicus makes no constitutional or statutory claim that our Nation must protect the life of every citizen traveling abroad. He claims no implied contract between the Government and its citizens in this regard. Indeed, a traveler could be easily disabused of any idea to the contrary at the time he is issued his document of introduction, which is the passport. The protection theory is the result of a view of the passport as a document of privilege. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court have overruled this view and have made it clear that a passport evidences a right rather than a privilege.

In addition it should be kept in mind that the collection of news is often a hazardous business in itself, and a reporter accepts such risks as a part of his function and duty to the public. The constitutional right of the people to be informed cannot be subsumed under the niceties of safety or convenience, especially when the newsmen themselves are willing to take the risk. Indeed, the most important news generally emanates from troubled areas, as our Government, which has sanctioned the presence of newsmen in many shooting wars, well knows.

IV.

It cannot validly be contended that observance of the First Amendment guarantees owed by the Government to its electorate stops at our shores. In a world shrunk by the technical ingenuity of man it is more important than ever that the information owed to the public be collected from all over the globe. Especially is this true of information which emanates from powerful countries antagonistic to United States interests. It is only by the clear flow of news from these countries that the American people can best evaluate how to proceed in their own behalf. By setting aside prohibitive areas of travel, "in the interests of foreign policy", as he has done in this case, the Secretary of State has deprived the American people of their constitutional rights without due process of law. Moreover it is futile to consider the due process required to be that of a hearing the sole function of which is to determine whether an individual such as appellant has violated the area restrictions imposed by the Secretary of State. Although Amicus does not herein concede that any hearing based upon a determination by the Secretary of State as to what is "in the interest of foreign policy" would provide sufficient due process for restricting the movements of a newsman, whether he work for a newspaper, radio, television or the newsreels, he does contend that in order for there to be at least a semblance of due process there must be a public hearing on the merits of excluding each respective area. So long as the Secretary of State is allowed to determine, in his absolute discretion, those areas to which American newsmen are prohibited from travelling there is no legal safeguard which would prevent him from abusing his discretion in the most outlandish terms. For example, travel to the Arctic could be prohibited without recourse simply because the Secretary felt that people should not run the hazards of snow and ice or because of explorations on that ice. Such a result would indeed be possible under the present situation where no procedure is established for questioning the geographical limitations imposed by the Secretary of State. In this way the constitutional right to travel and to free speech and press may be rendered useless by the work of one man. Surely, our democracy cannot be said to rest upon such filmsy supports.

CONCLUSION

Appellant stands before this Court as a faceless person in a representative capacity. He is a newsman, and while fulfilling his function he is acting as an arm of the American people in the furtherance of their fully protected right to be informed. To restrict his movement is to restrict the information received by the American people and is therefore to allow them less than they are entitled to under the Constitution. It is further to hamper the United States in its dealings with other nations since, as modern man has learned from history, to deal from ignorance is to deal from weakness.

Worthy

BRIEF FOR APPELLANT

IN THE

United States Court of Appeals

For the District of Columbia Circuit

No. 14,807

WILLIAM WORTHY, JR.,

Appellant,

vs.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES, Secretary of State,

Appellee.

Appeal From the United States District Court for the District of Columbia

WILLIAM M. KUNSTLER,
511 Fifth Avenue,
New York 17, N. Y.

WALTER E. DILLON, JR.,
1625 Eye Street, N. W.,
Washington, 6, D. C.
Attorneys for Appellant.

ROWLAND WATTS,
% American Civil Liberties Union,
170 Fifth Avenue,
New York 10, N. Y.,
of Counsel.

Statement of Questions Presented

1. Whether the Secretary of State has the statutory authority to refuse to renew a passport to prevent the appellant from traveling to certain countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations.

2. Whether the Secretary's passport regulations (22 C. F. R. §§ 51.135-51.170, hereinafter referred to as "the passport regulations") and, in particular 22 C. F. R. § 51.136, are invalid because they are not authorized by Congress and because they conflict with controlling statutes, viz., Section 6 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, 64 Stat. 993, 50 U. S. C. § 785; and the Expatriation Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 223-224, R. S. § 1999.

3. Whether the passport regulations, on their face and as applied to appellant, abridge First Amendment rights of speech and travel; constitute a bill of attainder and an ex post facto law in violation of Article I, Section 9, of the Constitution; and deprive appellant of his right of travel and to due process under the Fifth and Ninth Amendments.

4. Whether the foreign policy considerations advanced by the Secretary of State as reasons for his refusal to renew the appellant's passport to prevent him from traveling to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations, justify the abridgement of his constitutional right to travel.

5. Whether the refusal by the Secretary of State to renew applicant's passport is an abridgement of the constitutional guarantee of the freedom of the press.

INDEX

	PAGE
Statement of Questions Presented	i
Jurisdictional Statement	1
Statement of the Case	1
Statement of the Facts	2
Statutes and Regulations Involved	4
Statement of Points	4
Summary of Argument	5
Argument	8
I. The right to travel is a constitutional right, and like other constitutional rights it may be limited or abridged only when there are overriding considerations of the public safety	8
II. The Secretary of State does not have the statutory authority to deny a passport to prevent travel to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations	12
A. The Primary Function of the Power Over the Issuance of Passports is the Control Over Exit	12
B. Whatever Power the Secretary of State Has Over Exit of Individuals From the United States, He Has Solely by Virtue of an Act of Congress	13
C. Congress Has Not Authorized the Secretary of State to Deny Passports for the Reasons Given	24
D. Area Restrictions, as Applied by the Secretary of State, Lack Statutory Authority	27

PAGE

III. Alternatively, to the extent that the power to deny a passport to prevent appellant from traveling to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations is based on the Executive power over foreign relations, it is still subject to applicable constitutional provisions: and the reasons given by the Secretary for the denial in this case do not warrant the abridgement of constitutional rights 31

IV. The Secretary's refusal to renew appellant's passport is an abridgement of the constitutional guarantee of the freedom of press 37

Conclusion 46

Appendix 51

Citations

Cases

Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board, 301 U. S. 103 44

Associated Press v. United States, 326 U. S. 1 44

Bauer v. Acheson, 101 App. D. C. 247, 160 F. Supp. 445 .....9, 12, 32

Briehl v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116 11

Briehl v. Dulles, 101 App. D. C. 285, 248 F. 2d 561 .....14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22

Bridges v. State of California, 314 U. S. 252 ..... 11, 38

Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495 .....21, 24, 26

Buxham v. City of Riverside, 29 F. Supp. 3 38

Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296 ..... 21, 24

Connelly v. General Construction Company, 269 U. S. 385 26

Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 35 9

PAGE

Dayton v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 144 11
Dayton v. Dulles, 99 App. D. C. 47, 254 F. 2d 71 .... 14, 16

Ebert v. Poston, 266 U. S. 548 23
Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160 9

Federal Trade Commission v. Bunte Bros., 312 U. S. 349 ..... 20, 24
Five Per Cent Cases, 110 U. S. 471 ..... 20, 24

Hague v. C. I. O., 307 U. S. 496 ..... 21, 24
Hughes v. Superior Court of California, 339 U. S. 460 38

In re Mack, 386 Pa. 251 44

Kent v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116 .....3, 8, 10, 11, 12, 15, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29
Konigsberg v. State Bar of California, 353 U. S. 252 37
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214 ..... 11, 34
Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290 26

Latva v. Nicolls, 106 F. Supp. 658 38
Lovell v. Griffen, 303 U. S. 444 ..... 21, 24

Mack, In re, 386 Pa. 251 44
Miller v. United States, 294 U. S. 435 ..... 21, 24

National Lead Co. v. United States, 252 U. S. 140... 20, 24
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U. S. 697 44
Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268 .....21, 24, 26

Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U. S. 331 44

Saia v. New York, 334 U. S. 558 ..... 21, 24
Savorgnan v. United States, 338 U. S. 491 13
Schactman v. Dulles, 96 App. D. C. 287, 225 F. 2d 938 10, 32
Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47 11
Small v. American Sugar Refining Company, 267 U. S. 233 26
State v. Pierce, 163 Wis. 615, 158 N. W. 696 37
Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U. S. 313 21
Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381 ..... 21, 24

PAGE

Sweezy v. U. S., 354 U. S. 234 26
Swendig v. Washington Water Power Co., 265 U. S. 322 ..... 20, 24

Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516 ..... 11, 38

United States v. Belmont, 301 U. S. 324 16
United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U. S. 304 .....16, 17, 30
United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201; aff'd Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494 ..... 11, 38
United States ex rel. Keefe v. Dulles, 222 F. 2d 390, cert. den. 348 U. S. 952 14
United States v. Pink, 315 U. S. 203 16
United States v. Rock Royal Cooperative, 307 U. S. 533 ..... 21, 24
United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41 ..... 21, 38
United Press v. Valente, 281 App. Div. 395 44
United States v. Witkovich, 353 U. S. 194 21
Urtetiqui v. D'Arbel, 34 U. S. 692 ..... 15, 18

Walker v. Chief Quarantine Officer, 69 F. Supp. 980 47
Watkins v. United States, 354 U. S. 178 ..... 26, 37
Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1 ..... 20, 24
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnett, 319 U. S. 624 38
Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270 .....9, 21, 24
Winter v. New York, 330 U. S. 507 26

Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579 16

Constitution, Treaty and Statutes

Constitution:

Article I, Section 9 i
First Amendment 38, 44
Fifth Amendment ..... i, 9, 32
Ninth Amendment ..... i, 32

PAGE

Treaty:

Treaty between United States and the Italian Republic, Feb. 2, 1948, Art. 1, Sec. 1, 2 U. S. Code Cong. Svc. (1948) 2814 10

Statutes:

Act of 1856, 11 Stat. 60 18

Act of July 3, 1926, c. 772, § 1, 44 Stat. 887, 22 U. S. C. § 211(a) (17 F. R. 8013) . . .4, 5, 13, 18, 22, 51

Expatriation Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 223-224, R. S. § 1999 .....i, 4, 6, 13, 53

Internal Security Act, Sept. 23, 1950, c. 1024, Title I, § 6, 64 Stat. 993, 50 U. S. C. §§ 785, 792(1)(2) ..... i, 23, 51

Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, §215(a), 66 Stat. 190, 8 U. S. C. § 1185 .....4, 6, 12, 22, 23, 52

Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, §215(a), 66 Stat. 190, 8 U. S. C. § 1185(b) 12, 22

3 U. S. C. 301 16

Executive Orders and Proclamations

Executive Order:

Executive Order No. 7856, Mar. 31, 1938, 3 F. R. 681, 22 C. F. R. §§ 51.75, 51.77 ..... 29, 55

Proclamations:

Proclamation No. 3004, 18 F. R. 489, 3 C. F. R., 1953 Supp. p. 20, 67 Stat. c. 31 .....12, 23, 53

Proclamation No. 2974, 66 Stat. c. 31 22

Proclamation No. 2914, 64 Stat. A. 455 22

Departmental Orders, Regulations, etc.

PAGE

Department of State:

State Dept. Press Release No. 341, May 1, 1952.. 28, 31

1 Dept. of State Bull. 345 (1939) 34

State Dept. Dep'tal Regulation 108.303, 21 Fed. Reg. 8577 (1956) 36

Passport Regulations:

22 C. F. R. (1954 Supp.) § 51.135-51.170 ..... i, 22

§ 51.136 .....i, 4, 7, 20, 23, 25, 56

§ 53.1-53.9 23

§ 53.8 .....4, 29, 57

Other Congressional and Executive Materials

Bulletin, Department of State, Colligan, "Americans Abroad", Vol. 30, No. 775 (May 3, 1954) 47

House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Hearings on H. R. 11947, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. (1926) 19

House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Hearings on H. R. 13760, 85th Cong., 2nd Sess. (1958) 30

Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on Passport Legislation, Hearings 85th Cong., 2d Sess. (1958), 27, 30, 37

Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Hearings, 84th Cong., 1st Sess. ("Hennings Hearings") 40, 46

Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on Dept. of State Passport Policies, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. (1957) 31

PAGE

Sen. Doc. 170, 82nd Cong., 2d Sess., The Constitution of the United States of America (ed. Corwin, 1953) 21

The Right to Travel and United States Passport Policies, A Staff Study Prepared for the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary (1958) 17

9 Op. Atty. Gen. 350 (1859) 13, 18

Texts, Articles and Miscellaneous Materials

Barnett, Passport Administration and the Courts, 22 Oregon L. R. 193 (1953) 13

Berkner, Earth Satellites and Foreign Policy, Foreign Affairs (Jan. 1958) 46

Blackstone, Commentaries 134 (1st Worcester Ed. 1790) 9, 48

Boudin, The Constitutional Right to Travel, 56 Columbia L. R. 47 (1956) 9

Brand, Italy and the English Romantics (1957) ... 46

Chafee, Three Human Rights in the Constitution (1956) 9, 47

Comment, Passports and Freedom of Travel, The Conflict of a Right and a Privilege, 41 Georgetown L. J. 63 (1952) 9

Comment, The Passport Puzzle, 23 U. Chi. L. Rev. 269 (1956) 13, 19

Diplock, Passports And Protection In International Law, 32 The Grotius Proceedings, 42 (1946) 14

Doman, A Comparative Analysis: Do Citizens Have the Right to Travel? 43 A. B. A. J. 307 (1957).... 13,19

Freedom to Travel, Report of the Special Committee to Study Passport Procedures of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York (1958), 28, 30, 31, 33

PAGE

Grundfest, Science and the Department of State, Science (Oct. 12, 1956) 46

Hackworth, Digest of International Law, Vol. 3 (1942) 36

Hunt, The American Passport (1898) 18

Jaffe, The Right to Travel, Foreign Affairs, October, 1956 .....9, 48-49

Karamazin, Letters of a Russian Traveler (1789-1790) (1957) 46

Learsi, The Jews In America: A History (1954) .. 17

Malone, Jefferson and the Rights of Man (1951) 46

Moore, Digest of International Law, Vol. 3 (1906).. 18

New York Herald Tribune, May 14, 1957 40

New York Post,
- April 2, 1957 42
- May 5, 1957 39

New York Times,
- July 8, 1951 47
- September 6, 1955 47
- April 3, 1957 40
- April 24, 1957 39
- April 25, 1957 .....39, 40, 43, 45
- May 2, 1957 ..... 36, 39
- May 3, 1957 ..... 8, 45
- May 15, 1957 .....13, 43, 44, 45
- August 23, 1957 ..... 29, 41
- September 6, 1957 29
- November 21, 1957 ..... 29, 41
- December 7, 1957 ..... 29, 41
- January 23, 1958 46
- January 28, 1958 ..... 36, 47

PAGE

Note, Passport Refusals for Political Reasons, Constitutional Issues and Judicial Review, 61 Yale L. J. 171 (1952) 15, 34, 47, 48

Note, The Passport Puzzle, 23 U. Chi. L. Rev. 269 (1956) 13, 19

O'Connor, The State Department Defends, The Saturday Review, Jan. 11, 1958, 11 15

Parker, The Right to Go Abroad: To Have And To Hold a Passport, 40 Virginia L. R. 853 (1954) ... 9, 19

Shils, The Torment of Secrecy (1956) 46

The American Jewish Year Book—5672 (1911) 17

The Geneva Conference of Heads of Government (1955) 47

Travel Abroad—Frontier Formalities (Joint Publication of UNESCO and Int'l Union of Official Travel Organizations) 12

Treaty Between the United States and the Italian Republic, Feb. 2, 1948, Art. 1, Sec. 1, 2 U. S. Code Cong. Svc. (1948) 2814 10

United States Information and Educational Exchange Act, Public Law 402, 80th Cong., 2d Sess. (1948) 47

United Nations Department of Public Information Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1949), S. Doc. 123, 81 Cong., 1st Sess. 1156 10

Vestal, Freedom of Movement, 41 Iowa L. R. 6 (1955) 9, 10

Washington Post and Times Herald, November 15, 1957 29

Wyzanski, Freedom to Travel, Atlantic Monthly (Oct. 1952) 31, 46

Jurisdictional Statement

The judgment of the District Court was entered on October 6, 1958 (J.A.). The notice of appeal was filed on October 16, 1958 (J.A.). The jurisdiction of the District Court rested on D. C. Code, Secs. 11-305 and 11-306, on Sec. 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U. S. C. Sec. 1009, and on 28 U. S. C. Sec. 2201 as set forth in the complaint (J.A.). The jurisdiction of this Court rests on 28 U. S. C. 1291 and 5 U. S. C. 1009.

Statement of the Case

On February 25, 1957, the appellant, William Worthy, Jr., applied to the appellee, John Foster Dulles, through his agent, the United States Passport Office, for renewal of his United States Passport No. 558363, which was due to expire on March 4, 1957 (J.A.). On March 29, 1957, through his agent, the Director of the Passport Office, appellee tentatively denied the application for renewal (J.A.).

After an informal hearing on April 29, 1957, pursuant to § 51.137 of the Passport Regulations (22 C. F. R. § 51.137) at which the appellant appeared and gave testimony, the appellee, on September 18, 1957, through his agent, the Acting Director of the Passport Office, advised the appellant that the original decision denying the application for renewal would stand (J.A.).

The appellant then appealed to the Board of Passport Appeals of the Department of State, pursuant to § 51.138 of the Passport Regulations (22 C. F. R. § 138) (J.A.). Following a hearing on December 10, 1957, at which the appellant was represented by his attorney, the passport renewal application was again denied on March 24, 1958 (J.A.).

On April 9, 1958, the appellant filed a verified complaint in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, praying for a decree ordering the appellee to renew the appellant's passport forthwith (J.A.). On June 9, 1958, issue was joined by the filing of appellee's answer (J.A.). On June 23, 1958, the appellant filed a motion for summary judgment and on July 16, 1958, appellee cross-moved for summary judgment in his favor (J.A.). After a hearing on these motions before District Judge Edward M. Curran of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, on October 2, 1958, the appellant's motion was denied and appellee's granted from the bench (J.A.).

Statement of the Facts

Appellant William Worthy, Jr. has served in China, Russia, Hungary, Africa and other parts of the world as a foreign correspondent for the Afro-American Newspapers, the New York Post, the Columbia Broadcasting System, and other news media (J.A.).

On March 4, 1955, he was issued United States Passport No. 558,363, which contained endorsements purportedly invalidating it for travel to those countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations, including Communist China and Hungary (J.A.).

On December 6, 1956, the appellant obtained a transit visa for Hong Kong from the British Consulate in Boston, Massachusetts; on December 20, 1956 he obtained a visa for Hong Kong, valid for six months, at the British Consulate in New York City, after having received a cablegram on December 16, 1956 from the Chinese Foreign Ministry in Peking authorizing him to visit China (J.A.).

Appellant left the United States on December 22, 1956, arriving in Hong Kong on December 24th (J.A.). Later that day he departed for Communist China, entering that country at Sumchon. His passport was not required as a condition of entry or stay in Communist China, which, for the sake of brevity, will be henceforth referred to as China (J.A.).

During a forty-one day stay in China, appellant obtained visas from the Soviet and Hungarian Embassies in Peking. The visa for Hungary was stamped on a separate piece of paper.

On or about February 3, 1957, appellant arrived in Moscow. On February 7th he arrived in Hungary, which he left on February 8th returning to the United States on February 10, 1957 (J.A.).

On February 25, 1957, appellant applied to the State Department Passport Office for renewal of his passport, which was to expire on March 4, 1957 (J.A.). On March 29, 1957, the Director of the Passport Office tentatively denied the application for renewal (J.A.).

After hearings before the Passport Office and the Board of Passport Appeals, renewal was again denied upon the grounds that the appellant had violated previous restrictions in his passport, and that appellant would give no assurance that he would not use his renewed passport in violation of such restrictions (J.A.). The refusal to renew appellant's passport was based on 22 C. F. R. § 51.136 in that such violations would be "prejudicial to the orderly conduct of foreign relations" (J.A.).

The appellant then sought relief in the District Court for the District of Columbia, arguing that under the Supreme Court decision in Kent v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116 (1958), the grounds for denial of his application for passport renewal were invalid and without statutory authority (J.A.). The District Court denied relief on the ground that within the exercise of foreign relations the executive had the power to restrict the travel of citizens to certain geographic areas of the world (J.A.).

Statutes and Regulations Involved

The statutes involved are the Act of July 3, 1926, c. 772, § 1, 44 Stat. 887, 22 U. S. C. § 211(a); the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, § 215 (a), 66 Stat. 190, 8 U. S. C. § 1185; and the Expatriation Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 223-224, R. S. § 1999. The pertinent provisions of these statutes are reproduced in the Appendix, infra, pp. 51-53.

The principal regulations involved are 22 C. F. R. § 51.136, and 22 C. F. R., § 53.8, which read as follows:

> "SEC. 51.136. Limitations on issuance of passports to certain other persons. In order to promote and safeguard the interests of the United States, passport facilities, except for direct and immediate return to the United States, will be refused to a person when it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that the person's activities abroad would: (a) violate the laws of the United States; (b) be prejudicial to the interests of the United States; or (c) otherwise be prejudicial to the interests of the United States."
>
> "SEC. 53.8. Discretional exercise of authority in passport matters. Nothing in this part shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of State from exercising the discretion resting in him to refuse to issue a passport, to restrict its use to certain countries, to withdraw a passport already issued, or to withdraw a passport for the purpose of restricting its validity or use in certain countries."

Other pertinent passport regulations are reproduced in the Appendix, infra, pp. 56-57.

Statement of Points

1. The District Court erred in denying appellant's motion for summary judgment.
2. The District Court erred in granting the Secretary's motion for summary judgment.

Summary of Argument

I

The denial of a passport is a denial of the right to travel. It is unlawful to travel to almost all countries without a passport. Even where lawful, it is, as a practical matter, a requisite for admission to most countries. Accordingly, a denial of a passport must be justified as a denial of the right to travel.

This right is protected by the Constitution. It is an attribute of personal liberty. In many instances, as in the case of appellant, it is important to the pursuit of a livelihood and the furtherance of a career. The educational value of travel and the opportunities it affords for the exchange of ideas and experiences justifies its characterization as an exercise of First Amendment rights. It is important also for the creation of an informed citizenry which, on the basis of its own independent observation of countries abroad, can critically participate in the formation of our government's foreign policy. Finally, the action of the Government in preventing the citizen from leaving the country is tantamount to imprisoning him.

II

The 1952 regulations under which the Secretary of State denied a passport here were the first regulations in American history to establish political, or any substantive, qualifications for a passport other than citizenship. The Secretary, however, lacked the authority to issue these regulations.

The regulations purport to find their source of authority in the provisions of 22 U. S. C. § 211(a) enacted in 1926. This statute, however, was merely a reenactment with minor revisions of the first Passport Act enacted in 1856. Its limited purpose was to centralize the issuance of passports in the Department of State. The statutes were enacted in a period when passports were not a mechanism for the control of travel and hence Congress could not have intended by this legislation to control travel in any respect. The legislative history of the statutes demonstrates that the sole discretion vested in the Executive under them was to issue regulations of an administrative and routine nature; and not to establish classes of eligibility for passports. This has been the construction given the statute for almost a century prior to the 1952 regulations, and deference must be accorded to this administrative construction.

Moreover, the construction given to the 1926 statute by the government would render it unconstitutional. If viewed as a grant of power to the Executive to control travel, the absence of any standards as a guide to the exercise of that power would constitute an invalid delegation of power.

Nor can any authority for the regulations be found in the provisions of 8 U. S. C. § 1185(b). This statute makes it unlawful during a national emergency, proclaimed by the President, for a citizen to leave the country without a passport. But this statute contains no standards whatever for determining to whom passports should be denied, and it does not grant authority to the Executive to make such determination.

Furthermore, the regulations conflict with Congressional policy as set forth in the Expatriation Act of 1868 favoring freedom of expatriation. Expatriation is not possible without freedom to depart from one's country.

The regulation permitting geographical restrictions upon travel is an exercise of law-making authority beyond the power of the executive branch. Under our constitutional system the Executive has no power to make law in any field, whether it be that of foreign relations or otherwise.

III

Secondly, the denial of the right to travel is not the conduct of foreign affairs. It involves the relationship of the government to its own citizens and constitutes a restriction upon their liberty. Such a power cannot be considered to be an inherent power of the Executive.

IV

a. The regulations as written and applied violate the First Amendment because the interference with appellant's right to travel is explicitly based upon the vagaries of foreign policy which are much too vague and fluctuating to justify the abridgement of a constitutional right.

If there are any circumstances under which this fundamental liberty of movement may be curtailed, they could only be such as present a substantial threat to the security of the state. No such threat exists in the exercise of the right of travel generally or by appellant whose legitimate reason for travel is not contested by the government.

The government's alternative suggestion that a passport is a kind of diplomatic document guaranteeing protection is neither a correct construction of the passport nor a justification for its denial.

The explanation of the court below that travel to certain areas of the world may be restricted when claimed to be necessitated by foreign policy considerations is not a justification for so drastic a limitation upon movement.

b. The regulation denied due process in fundamental respects. It employs such vague criteria as "prejudicial to the orderly conduct of foreign relations" and "prejudicial to the interests of the United States." 22 C. F. R. § 51.136. Such vague terms are particularly pernicious where they adversely affect the exercise of First Amendment rights.

c. The regulation also violates the Ninth Amendment inasmuch as the Secretary's denial of appellant's renewal application is based upon past conduct and is a denial and disparagement of one of the most fundamental of unenumerated rights retained by the people, that of free movement.

V

The refusal to permit responsible and accredited newsmen to travel to certain areas of the world is an abridgement of the First Amendment guarantee of the freedom of the press. If the news cannot be gathered, it cannot be published. If publication were the only criterion, then it would be possible, as a practical matter, to prevent it by merely prohibiting the gathering of the news. As the New York Times editorialized on May 3, 1957: "Would Mr. Dulles contend that freedom to produce a blank page is 'freedom of the press'?"

ARGUMENT

I

The right to travel is a constitutional right, and like other constitutional rights it may be limited or abridged only when there are overriding considerations of the public safety.

In the United States, the right to travel has recently been judicially recognized as a constitutional right. See Kent & Briehl v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116, 125, 130 (henceforth cited as Kent v. Dulles). However, it has long been held in England to be a most important aspect of the personal liberty of individuals:

> "Next to personal security, the law of England regards, asserts, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. This personal liberty consists in the > power of locomotion, of changing situation, or removing one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct; without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law." 1 Blackstone, Commentaries 134 (1st Worcester ed. 1790).

See also Jaffe, The Right to Travel, Foreign Affairs, October, 1956; Comment, Passports and Freedom of Travel, the Conflict of a Right and a Privilege, 41 Georgetown L. J. 63, 70 (1952); Parker, the Right to Go Abroad; To Have and to Hold a Passport, 40 Virginia L. R. 853, 868 (1954); Chafee, Three Human Rights in the Constitution, 162-213 (1956); Boudin, The Constitutional Right to Travel, 56 Columbia L. R. 47 (1956).

Recent historical analysis has shown that this right is a part of the word "liberty" as used in the Fifth Amendment:

> " * * * [I]n light of the history of the common law, of the freedom which English subjects had enjoyed for two centuries before Blackstone's time, of the complaint against the King in the Declaration of Independence, and of the freedom of travel guaranteed by the Articles of Confederation, there would seem to have been little place for doubt that 'liberty' in the Fifth Amendment means freedom to go any place, whether it be another state, another country, or another planet." Comment, Passports and Freedom of Travel; The Conflict of a Right and a Privilege, supra, at 71-2.

See also, Vestal, Freedom of Movement, 41 Iowa Law Review 6 (1955); Parker, the Right to Go Abroad, supra.

With respect to movements between states, the Supreme Court early recognized the right to travel as a constitutional right. See Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 35, 44, 47; Williams v. Fears, 179 U. S. 270, 274; Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160. In Bauer v. Acheson, 101 App. D. C. 247, 106 F. Supp. 445, 451, involving a foreign correspondent whose passport had been summarily revoked by the Secretary of State, the three-judge court said:

> "* * * It is difficult to see where, in principle, freedom to travel outside the United States is any less an attribute of personal liberty. Especially is this true today, when modern transportation has made all the world easily accessible * * * Personal liberty to go abroad is particularly important to an individual whose livelihood is dependent upon the right to travel * * *"

This recognition of the constitutional right to travel abroad was reaffirmed by this Court in Shachtman v. Dulles, 96 App. D. C. 287, 225 F. 2d 938 where it held unlawful the refusal of a passport on the ground that the applicant was chairman of an organization on the Attorney General's list; and more recently by the Supreme Court in Kent v. Dulles, supra, where refusal of a passport on grounds of belief in or association with Communist causes was held to be without statutory authority. "Freedom to travel", said the Supreme Court, "is, indeed, an important aspect of the citizen's 'liberty' " and "is basic in our scheme of values", 357 U. S. 116, 127, 126. Cf. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 13 (2), 43 Am. J. Int'l L. 127, 129 (1949 Supp.); Treaty between United States and the Italian Republic, Feb. 2, 1948, Art. 1 § 1, 2 U. S. Code Cong. Svc. (1948) 2814; Vestal, Freedom of Movement, supra, n. 61.

It is conceded that no constitutional right, however, is an absolute right. At various times the courts have sustained the limitation or abridgment of constitutional rights when the security and safety of the nation have demanded such action. The theory upon which such limitations have been sustained is that constitutional rights may not be asserted in a way which threatens to destroy the government which is entrusted with their protection. If there is no government, the rights themselves will be destroyed. Accordingly, it is preferable to limit constitutional rights until the threat to security shall pass rather than to allow unlimited exercise until these rights are totally destroyed. See Korematsu v. U. S., 323 U. S. 214.

Clearly, however, the situations which demand the curtailment of constitutional rights must be of an exceptional and severe emergency nature. See Thomas v. Collins, 323 U. S. 516 and Bridges v. State of California, 314 U. S. 252. The alleged existence of an "emergency" must not be used as a guise for the suppression of individual rights. The courts have recognized the difficulty in setting down any rigid or fixed standards to balance the conflicting interests here involved. In an effort to furnish rough and ready guides, the Supreme Court has relied, to some extent, upon such standards as "clear and present danger," Schenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 52, "gravest imminent danger to the public safety," Korematsu v. United States, supra, at 218 and "that the gravity of the 'evil,' discounted by its improbability, justifies such invasion of free speech as is necessary to avoid the danger," United States v. Dennis, 183 F. 2d 201, 212, adopted in Dennis v. United States, 341 U. S. 494, 510. Admittedly such standards are difficult to apply, but they are nonetheless expressive of the very minimum threat which may be used to justify the limitation of constitutional rights. In Kent v. Dulles, supra, at 128-129, the Court, in distinguishing the Korematsu case, stated:

> "There the Congress and the Chief Executive moved in coordinated action; and, as we said, the Nation was then at war. No such condition presently exists. No such showing of extremity, no such showing of joint action by the Chief Executive and the Congress to curtail a constitutional right of the citizen has been made here."

The Secretary's quarantine of the appellant can be no more justified under the above or under any other tests than were those of Walter Briehl, Rockwell Kent and Weldon Bruce Dayton. Kent v. Dulles, supra; Dayton v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 144.

II

The Secretary of State does not have the statutory authority to deny a passport to prevent travel to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations.

A. The Primary Function of the Power Over the Issuance of Passports is the Control Over Exit.

Section 215(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, 66 Stat. 190, 8 U. S. C. § 1185(b) (1952) makes it unlawful after a prescribed Presidential proclamation, for anyone to enter or depart from the United States without a valid passport. The required proclamation has been made. Presidential Proclamation No. 3004, 67 Stat. c. 31 (January 17, 1953) entitled "Control of Persons leaving or entering the United States by the President of the United States of America." Whatever may have been the significance of a passport prior to the effective date of Section 215(a), this statute necessarily makes control over the issuance of passports tantamount to control over exit. The Supreme Court has clearly recognized this fact. In Kent v. Dulles, the court said, "Its [a passport's] crucial function today is control over exit." 357 U. S. 116, 129.

Even if it were not a crime to go abroad without a passport, it would not be possible as long as most foreign countries require the presentation of such a document, a practice not likely to be discontinued for many years to come. See Travel Abroad—Frontier Formalities (a joint publication by UNESCO and International Union of Official Travel Organizations). Bauer v. Acheson, (supra, at 451) made it quite clear that the factual impossibility of traveling abroad without a passport is tantamount to being legally prevented from traveling.

Incidentally, it might be appropriate at this point to indicate that as early as 1868, Congress recognized that "the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness". Expatriation Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 223-224, R. S. § 1999. See also Savorgnan v. United States, 338 U. S. 491, 498-499. Although this statute has never been repealed, it is, as a practical matter, nullified by appellee's action based on passport regulations which are invalid because they conflict with the Act of 1868. See also 9 Op. A. G. 356-363.

B. Whatever Power the Secretary of State Has Over Exit of Individuals From the United States, He Has Solely by Virtue of an Act of Congress.

The underlying assumption of the appellee's position is that the power over the issuance of passports is primarily a tool of foreign policy, and that the Secretary of State has the right to use private individuals and their constitutional rights as pawns of diplomacy. In his press conference of May 14, 1957, the Secretary indicated that he would not permit "American correspondents with American passports into areas where they would involve or conflict with the United States foreign policy". New York Times, May 15, 1957.

There is an easy fallacy in the assumption that, because the Secretary of State is the officer of our government chiefly concerned with foreign relations, and because he has been given the power to issue passports pursuant to 22 U. S. C. § 211(a) (1926), there is a necessary connection between foreign relations and passports. As will be shown, the power to issue passports was given to the Secretary of State merely to centralize and administer the procedure of passport issuance. To that end this power could just as easily have been given to every federal marshal, or to the Secretary of Agriculture. See Note, The Passport Puzzle, 23 U. Chi. L. Rev. 269 at 272, n. 25 (1956); Doman, a Comparative Analysis: Do Citizens Have The Right to Travel?, 43 A.B.A.J. 307, 308 (1957); Barnett, Passport Administration and the Courts, 22 Oregon L. R. 193, 194 (1953). Surely such an arrangement would not lead one to say the primary purpose of a passport is an adjunct to law enforcement or crop control.

However, it is argued that a passport implies the intention of the American government to extend diplomatic protection to the bearer, and that requests for and extensions of protection involve negotiation with foreign governments. Therefore the issuance of a passport necessarily involves foreign relations, a contention that was denied by this Court in Dayton v. Dulles, 99 App. D. C. 47, 254 F. 2d 71 and which Judge Bazelon, in Briehl v. Dulles, 101 App. D. C. 285 , 248 F. 2d 561, 596, called "mere pretense". Such an argument places an undue significance upon the passport itself. One has a privilege of diplomatic protection because he is a citizen and not because he bears a passport. See Diplock, Passports and Protection in International Law, 32 The Grotius Proceedings, 42, 45 (1946). The passport is merely indicative of citizenship or allegiance. And although an American passport bears on its face a request for protection, it is doubtful that such a request has any legal significance whatever. United States ex rel. Keefe v. Dulles, 99 App. D. C. 8, 101 App. D. C. 266, 222 F. 2d 390, 393-94, cert. denied 348 U. S. 952.

If indeed there is a connection between foreign relations and passports, the nature of this connection is wholly unclear; and to base the abridgement of constitutional rights upon such a tenuous relationship results in extreme doubt as to the validity of any such abridgement. The real meaning in the Secretary's cross-indexing of foreign relations and passports can be divined from his spokesman's statement in discussing the ban on travel by newsmen to China that:

> "The Secretary of State's power to withdraw or withhold a citizen's passport * * * is designed as an instrument of foreign policy."

O'Connor, the State Department Defends, Saturday Review, Jan. 11, 1958, 11, at page 12. Clearly, the control over travel is thus utilized to stifle criticism or promote espousal of a particular foreign policy which is subject to sudden and frequent change at the whim or caprice of one official. It is China today which is off limits—tomorrow it may be Argentina, France or Indonesia.

Control over exit is significantly distinguishable from the sort of situation which courts have placed in the foreign policy area. See dissenting opinion, Bazelon, Circuit Judge, Briehl v. Dulles, 101 App. D. C. 285, 248 F. 2d 561, 589-590; Passport Refusals for Political Reasons, Constitutional Issues and Judicial Review, 61 Yale L. J. 171, 187 (1952). The Supreme Court, in Kent v. Dulles, supra, after recognizing that the crucial function of a passport is the control over exit, went on to say:

> "* * * as we have seen, the right of exit is a personal right included within the word 'liberty' as used in the Fifth Amendment. If that 'liberty' is to be regulated, it must be pursuant to the lawmaking functions of Congress" 357 U. S. 116, 129.

The Secretary of State must find his authority to issue and deny passports, not in the uncertainties or vagaries of whatever foreign policy he may have at any one moment, but within the limits of the power given to him by Congress.

In Kent v. Dulles, supra, the government relied upon the argument that the Secretary has inherent foreign relations power under the Constitution to deny passports to petitioners.

Since a passport is no longer merely a "political document" evidencing the fact of American citizenship (see Urtetiqui v. D'Arbel, 34 U. S. 692, 698-699) but has, extralegally, subtly evolved into a tool with which the Department of State can prevent the presence of any American citizen in a foreign country (Kent v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116, 121-122), the power claimed is truly formidable.

The government's contention is untenable for two reasons: First, the regulations constitute law-making, which is beyond the Executive's power; and, second, the denial of a passport to petitioner has nothing whatsoever to do with foreign relations.

The Supreme Court's decision in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579, is decisive on the first point. Presidential "power must stem either from an Act of Congress or from the Constitution itself" (id. at 585); the President is constitutionally empowered to execute the laws, not to make them (ibid.).

The Secretary's establishment of certain "off limits" countries is a plain exercise of law-making authority beyond the power of the Executive Branch.[1] The subject of foreign relations is not an exception to the constitutional restriction upon Presidential law-making. Even the President's great power in the field of foreign relations has been exercised only in such clearly non-legislative matters as the recognition of foreign governments, United States v. Belmont, 301 U. S. 324; United States v. Pink 315 U. S. 203; and the determination as to whether an embargo authorized by Congress should be invoked, United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U. S. 304.

Secondly, it has been recognized that "the issuance of a passport is not the conduct of foreign affairs". Dayton v. Dulles, 99 App. D. C. 47, 254 F. 2d 71, 76. For as the regulations show, and as Judge Bazelon said: "Travel is being controlled today for purposes of internal security. To call it a matter of foreign relations is mere pretense" (Briehl v. Dulles, supra, at 596). In reality, travel control is thought control and intellectual control.

---

[1] We have treated the regulations as if they had been promulgated by the President. However, any power to control travel, whether it stems from a statute or otherwise, would reside not in the Secretary of State but in the President. As noted by Judge Bazelon in Briehl v. Dulles, 101 App. D. C. 285, 248 F. 2d 561, 580-582, the President has never delegated to the Secretary any of the powers that he may possess as President to control travel. Assuming that so drastic a power were capable of delegation under 3 U. S. C. §301, 65 Stat. 712, there has been no effort to apply or conform to that statute. (Cf. the Executive Orders in 3 U. S. C. § 301, 1957 Supp.)

The decision to close off certain foreign countries to travel by American citizens involves the relationship of the government to its own nationals and a restriction upon their liberty. This is not a matter of foreign affairs as it would be if it involved relations between this country and foreign powers.[2] In the Court below, appellee argued that passport control must be classified as part of the conduct of foreign relations over which the Executive has unusual powers and cited United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., supra, as controlling authority. In that case, the Supreme Court held that a statute which authorized the President to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunition to foreign countries when he believed that such prohibition would contribute to the establishment of peace was not an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power because it involved foreign relations. However, it must be remembered that the case involved to a greater degree the relations between the executive and legislative branches of government whereas the passport problem involves to a greater degree the relations between the government and the individual. See The Right to Travel and United States Passport Policies, A Staff Study prepared for the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary (1958) p. 3.

---

[2] An example of foreign relations is the abrogation in 1913 of our commercial Treaty of 1832 with Russia because of its discrimination against American Jews. See Learsi, The Jews in America; A History (1954) 224-229; The American Jewish Year Book—5672 (1911), 19-128. See also Judge Bazelon's enumeration in Briehl v. Dulles, 101 App. D. C. 285, 248 F. 2d 561, 589.

Finally, as Judge Bazelon said in his dissent:

> "In our complex world there are very few pure internal affairs. Foreign problems cast their shadows on the domestic scene and internal events influence foreign policy. The Department of State has declared 'That there is no longer any real distinction between "domestic" and "foreign" affairs.' If that is so, the inherent power doctrine could produce an extension of the executive power beyond any limits theretofore conceived; and the President, through his Secretary of State could preempt the internal security functions of Congress." Briehl v. Dulles, supra, at 591.

A brief historical analysis is helpful in understanding the extent of the authority Congress has given to the Secretary of State with respect to the issuance of passports:

In earlier times the passport was conceived to be a "political document" which entitled the bearer to recognition in foreign countries as an American citizen and insured whatever advantage or protections might be his as a result of such citizenship. Urtetiqui v. D'Arbel, supra. Prior to 1856, a multitude of petty local, state, and national officials had issued certificates of identity or citizenship, or the functional equivalents of passports. See Hunt, The American Passport, 36-40 (1898). To prevent the many abuses which had arisen in the issuance of such documents (see 9 Op. A. G. 350 (1859); III Moore, International Law Digest 863 (1906)), Congress, in 1856, enacted what remains today our basic passport statute. Act of August 18, 1856, 11 Stat. 60. Later revisions and codifications made four unimportant changes in the basic statute. As codified by 44 Stat. 867, 22 U. S. C. § 211(a) (1926), this provision reads:

> "The Secretary of State may grant and issue passports * * * under such rules as the President shall designate and prescribe for and on behalf of the United States, and no other person shall grant, issue, or verify such passports."

This statute, which is the basic enabling statute for the issuance of passports by appellee, obviously was meant to establish uniformity in the issuance of passports. Congress did not intend in any way to grant to the Executive power to formulate substantive conditions in the issuance of passports. Rather, this statute merely enables the executive to prescribe the required procedural formulae. See Doman, Do Citizens Have the Right to Travel?, supra; Parker, The Right to Go Abroad, To Have and To Hold a Passport, supra; Comment, The Passport Puzzle, supra.

The statute neither grants nor was intended to grant any additional authority to the Executive. Former Assistant Secretary of State Carr, testifying before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs with respect to the nature of the rules contemplated by the 1926 statute, stated that:

> "these rules are administrative rules * * * [governing] * * * the different things that must be provided for that will come up from time to time under different conditions, different modes of travel and various things that arise in the course of a period of time * * * the object [of the Secretary's rule-making power] being to provide for administrative rules to be issued by the Secretary of State so as to avoid troubling the President with many details."[3]

And the stated reason for the delegation of rule-making power to the President was so that Congress "would not be bothered with all these small administrative changes." Id.

The regulations issued pursuant to the 1856 and 1926 statutes were of that routine administrative nature. These regulations, whether Presidential or departmental, prescribed the identifying information required on an application, the size of passport photographs, the contents of the affidavit of a supporting witness as to the citizenship of an applicant, etc.—all clearly matters of administrative routine.[4] The first regulations of a substantive character issued by the Secretary of State were the regulations of 1952, § 51.136 of which is herein in issue.

---

[3] Hearings before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on H. R. 11947, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. (1926), pp. 5-6.

Thus, for almost one hundred years, the Executive construed the passport statutes as authorizing only the power to issue regulations of an administrative character. It was not until 1952 that the statute was invoked as a source of authority to define classes of citizens ineligible for passports. In determining the meaning of the 1856 and 1926 statutes, deference must be accorded to this century of administrative construction. Swendig v. Washington Water Power Co., 265 U. S. 322; National Lead Co. v. United States, 252 U. S. 140; Five Per Cent Cases, 110 U. S. 471. The failure of successive Secretaries to assert any power to make substantive regulations for so long a period is a persuasive indication that no such power was ever granted. Federal Trade Commission v. Bunte Bros., 312 U. S. 349.

The classical statement on the power of Congress to delegate authority to co-ordinate branches of the government was made by Chief Justice Marshall in Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 43. " * * * [I]mportant subjects [he held] must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself [while as to matters] of less interest * * * a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details."

But "before another agency can 'fill up the details', Congress must enact something to be thus supplemented.

---

[4] See Department of State, The American Passport, Chapter IV (1898); Executive Order No. 654, June 13, 1907; Executive Order No. 4359-A, Dec. 19, 1925; Executive Order No. 4392-A, Feb. 12, 1926. Executive Order No. 4488, August 3, 1926; Executive Order No. 5960, June 22, 1932; Executive Order No. 6650, March 23, 1934; Executive Order No. 7856, March 31, 1938; Departmental Order No. 749, March 31, 1938; Departmental Order No. 366, Feb. 12, 1926 (recited in Hearings before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on H. R. 11947, 69th Cong., 1st Sess. (1926), pp. 25-28; Departmental Order No. 749, March 31, 1938, 22 C.F.R. 51.101-51.134 (Passport Regulations, Department of State Publication 1165 (1938), pp. 20-25).

In the current idiom, the law makers must first adopt a policy or set up an 'intelligible standard' to which administrative action must conform". The Constitution of the United States of America (ed. Corwin, 1953), Sen. Doc. 170, 82nd Cong., 2d Sess., p. 75, citing Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U. S. 381, 398, and United States v. Rock Royal Cooperative, 307 U. S. 533, 576. Thus, if viewed as a grant of power, the absence of standards would render the statute unconstitutional as an invalid delegation of law-making power, since Congress cannot delegate to the Executive the power to make judgments and issue regulations which are legislative in character. Miller v. United States, 294 U. S. 435. And since the right to travel is "an attribute of personal liberty", Williams v. Fears, supra, at 274, such standards, totally lacking here, would have to be especially precise. Saia v. New York, 334 U. S. 558, 560; Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296; Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U. S. 444; Hague v. C. I. O., 307 U. S. 496; Niemotko v. Maryland, 340 U. S. 268, 271; Burstyn v. Wilson, 343 U. S. 495.

The uncontrolled discretion which the view of the Court below would vest in the Secretary insofar as foreign relations are concerned, would render the statute clearly unconstitutional. "It is settled by a long line of recent decisions of this Court that [a statute] which, like this one, makes the peaceful enjoyment of freedoms which the Constitution guarantees contingent upon the uncontrolled will of an official—as by requiring a permit or license which may be granted or withheld in the discretion of such official—is an unconstitutional censorship or prior restraint upon the enjoyment of those freedoms." Staub v. City of Baxley, 355 U. S. 313, 322.

Statutes must be narrowly construed to avoid, rather than to create, constitutional problems, particularly where the suggested construction will, as here, concededly infringe upon fundamental rights. United States v. Rumely, 345 U. S. 41, 46; United States v. Witkovich, 353 U. S. 194.

For all of these reasons, the 1856 and 1926 statutes must be construed as authorizing the Secretary to issue regulations only of an administrative character. Accordingly, the statute on which § 51.136 of the regulations expressly relies does not authorize it.

In an effort to avoid the dilemma of the 1926 statute, the government in its argument in Briehl v. Dulles, supra, placed reliance for the Secretary's power to issue the passport regulations upon the provisions of 8 U. S. C. § 1185(b). This statute provides that during the existence of any national emergency proclaimed by the President "it shall, except as otherwise provided by the President, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President may authorize and prescribe, be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter, or attempt to depart from or enter, the United States unless he bears a valid passport". The difficulties of justifying the passport regulations under this statute are even greater than under the 1926 statute.

In the first place, the regulations themselves do not claim authority from this statute but rest exclusively on the authority claimed to be conferred by 22 U. S. C. § 211(a). The reasons for this are plain. The regulations were issued on August 28 of 1952. 17 F. R. 8013, 22 C. F. R. §§ 51.135-51.143. 8 U. S. C. § 1185 did not become effective until December 24, 1952. The statute which it replaced, the Act of June 21, 1941, was limited in its operation to time of war or to the duration of the emergency proclaimed on May 27, 1941. This emergency had been terminated on April 28, 1952 by Proclamation No. 2974, 66 Stat. c. 31. Thus, at the time of the issuance of the regulations there was no statute forbidding the departure of citizens without a passport.[5] [5] A state of emergency had in fact been proclaimed earlier on December 16, 1950, Proclamation No. 2914, 64 Stat., A 455, but could have had no obstructive effect on the travel of citizens since at that time the travel control statute was operative only in actual war or during the specified emergency of 1941. 22 U. S. C. § 223 (1952 ed.), repealed by the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, supra.

---

The statutory authority granted by 8 U. S. C. § 1185(b) was expressly invoked by the President on January 17, 1953, Proclamation No. 3004, 67 Stat. c. 31. This proclamation by its terms expressly incorporated and confirmed the existing regulations of the Secretary relating to the necessity of a passport for travel to particular countries during war or national emergency proclaimed by the President; these, which appear at 22 C. F. R. §§ 53.1 to 53.9, had been issued pursuant to the 1941 statute. The proclamation made no reference whatsoever to the regulations allegedly made pursuant to the 1926 statute, viz. 22 C. F. R. §§ 51.135 to 51.170 which prescribe those persons who are ineligible for passports.

In the second place, § 1185 contains no standards whatever for determining to whom passports should be denied. Although it forbids citizens to travel without passports, it nowhere contains a grant of authority to either the President or the Secretary of State to determine which categories of citizens might and which might not receive passports. On the contrary, Congress itself had made that determination two years earlier in the Internal Security Act. 64 Stat. 993, 50 U. S. C. § 785. Any attempt to base the substantive regulations of the Secretary on § 1185 would stamp that section as an invalid delegation of legislative power, for the reasons which apply to the 1926 passport statute itself.

The courts cannot supply this omission on the theory that Congress intended to grant such power to the Executive. This would be judicial legislation rather than statutory construction. Ebert v. Poston, 266 U. S. 548.

Leaving aside the vagueness of the standards suggested, the failure of Congress to speak on a question cannot be remedied by judicial legislation. The present case is not one of a broad or vague grant of power with ambiguous standards which under certain circumstances might conceivably be construed in such a way as to save constitutionality. In the present case there was no grant of power at all, and there are no standards for the exercise of the power, not even vague and indefinite ones. (See cases cited, supra, pp. 20-21).

C. Congress Has Not Authorized the Secretary of State to Deny Passports for the Reasons Given.

Despite the above historical analysis, Secretaries of State have recently relied upon the broad language of the statute to buttress their claim of absolute discretionary power. However, the Supreme Court has now expressly rejected this position. In Kent v. Dulles, the Court said:

> "Since we start with an exercise by an American citizen of an activity included in the constitutional protection, we will not readily infer that Congress gave the Secretary of State unbridled discretion to grant or withhold it." 357 U. S. 116, 129.

The Court then made an historical investigation of administrative practices to discover under what circumstances the Secretary of State might have discretion to withhold or deny a passport. Its examination disclosed two categories of circumstances, established by administrative practice for the denial of passports; one ground of refusal related to questions of citizenship and allegiance; the other to questions of criminal or unlawful conduct. Neither category of circumstances is present here:

> "Freedom to travel is, indeed, an important aspect of the citizen's 'liberty'. We need not decide the extent to which it can be curtailed. We are first concerned with the extent, if any, to which Congress has authorized its curtailment.
>
> "The difficulty is that while the power of the Secretary of State over the issuance of passports is expressed in broad terms, it was apparently long exercised quite narrowly. So far as material here, the cases of refusal of passports generally fell into two categories. First, questions pertinent to the citizenship of the applicant and his allegiance to the United States had to be resolved by the Secretary, for the command of Congress was that 'No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified for any other persons than those owing allegiance, whether citizens or not, to the United States.' 32 Stat. 386, 22 U. S. C. S. 212. Second, was the question whether the applicant was participating in illegal conduct, trying to escape the toils of the law, promoting passport frauds, or otherwise engaging in conduct which would violate the laws of the United States? See 3 Moore, International Law Digest (1906), § 512; 3 Hackworth, Digest of International Law (1942), § 268; 2 Hyde, International Law (2d rev. ed.), § 401.

"The grounds for refusal asserted here do not relate to citizenship or allegiance on the one hand or to criminal or unlawful conduct on the other. Yet, so far as relevant here, those two are the only ones which it could fairly be argued were adopted by Congress in light of prior administrative practice. One can find in the records of the State Department rulings of subordinates covering a wider range of activities than the two indicated. But as respects Communists these are scattered rulings and not consistently of one pattern. We can say with assurance that whatever may have been the practice after 1926, at the time the Act of July 3, 1926, was adopted, the administrative practice, so far as relevant here, had jelled only around the two categories mentioned. We, therefore, hesitate to impute to Congress, when in 1952 it made a passport necessary for foreign travel and left its issuance to the discretion of the Secretary of State, a purpose to give him unbridled discretion to grant or withhold a passport from a citizen for any substantive reason he may choose. More restrictive regulations were applied in 1918, and in 1941 as war measures. We are not compelled to equate this present problem of statutory construction with problems that may arise under the war power. Cf. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579." Id., 127-128.

The apparent grounds for the Secretary's refusal to renew appellant's passport in this case are based on 22 C. F. R. § 51.136:

> "Limitation on issuance of passports to certain other persons. In order to promote and safeguard the interests of the United States, passport facilities * * * will be refused to a person when it appears that the person's activities abroad would * * * (b) be prejudicial to the orderly conduct of foreign relations; or (c) otherwise be prejudicial to the interests of the United States."

Such a regulation denies procedural due process by its hopelessly vague criteria. What are acts which are "prejudicial to the orderly conduct of foreign relations" or "to the interests of the United States"? These standards are no more definite than the terms "un-American" or "subversive", language condemned by the Supreme Court as not susceptible of definition. Watkins v. United States, 354 U. S. 178; see also Sweezy v. United States, 354 U. S. 234. The use of a term that is so vague and indefinite that "men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law". Connelly v. General Construction Company, 269 U. S. 385, 391; Small v. American Sugar Refining Company, 267 U. S. 233, 238-240. The vagueness of the regulation is especially pernicious where, as here, First Amendment rights are involved. Burstyn v. Wilson, supra; Winter v. New York, 330 U. S. 507; Niemotko v. Maryland, supra; Kunz v. New York, 340 U. S. 290.

Moreover, in light of the decision in Kent v. Dulles, supra, it is appellant's position that any denial of a passport based on this provision lacks statutory authority. There is no question in his case of either criminal conduct on the one hand, or citizenship or allegiance on the other. The decision in Kent v. Dulles makes it mandatory that the appellee renew appellant's passport.

The State Department has itself conceded that the effect of the Supreme Court decision in Kent v. Dulles is to curtail its discretion. While testimony was being received before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on proposed passport legislation, the following colloquy took place between Deputy Under Secretary of State Robert Murphy and Senator William Fulbright:

> "Fulbright: As I understand it, you seek to have legislation which would make it very difficult to upset your findings.
>
> Murphy: As the matter now stands, we have no right to exercise discretion at all.
>
> Fulbright: Under the Supreme Court decision?
>
> Murphy: Under the Supreme Court decision." Hearings Before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on Passport Legislation, 85th Cong., 2d Sess., 32-33 (1958).

In his earlier prepared statement, Mr. Murphy admitted that, in the absence of new legislation, the Secretary had no authority to deny a passport to a non-criminal American citizen. In his own words:

> "But the need for action to remedy this situation is urgent. The President in his personal message last week to the Congress, emphasized the urgent need for action. The need is urgent because, as the President pointed out, the Supreme Court's decision of June 16 severely limited the authority of the Secretary of State to deny passports. The Supreme Court specifically said that the Secretary has no authority, in the absence of statute, to deny passports." Id., 21.

Appellant's position is that this Court is bound by the decision in Kent v. Dulles, supra, and has no alternative but to reject this attempt on the part of the Secretary of State to circumvent it, and to order him to renew appellant's passport.

D. Area Restrictions, as Applied by the Secretary of State, Lack Statutory Authority.

Area bans first appeared during the war of 1812 and were imposed, in one form or another, in every subsequent war in which the United States has been involved. No objection is raised here to the understandable practice of closing off warring countries to the travel of United States citizens even though this country is not directly involved in the conflict. However, it must be remembered that, even during hostilities, broad exceptions to the general prohibition have been made. For example, during the Italo-Ethiopian war in 1935, the State Department permitted such travel by "Recognized representatives of American newspapers, press associations, magazines and motion picture companies", as well as "well-known writers who are not directly associated with any of the foregoing organizations". Freedom to Travel, Report of the Special Committee to Study Passport Procedures of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, 1958, 16 (hereinafter cited as Freedom to Travel). In large measure, this was also the case during the Spanish Civil War, 1936-1939.

After the close of World War II, area restrictions were lifted until May 1, 1952 when the State Department announced a new policy that henceforth passports would not be valid for travel to:

> "Albania, Bulgaria, China, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics unless specifically endorsed under authority of the Department of State."

At the same time, the Department stated that this was not a travel ban. In its own words " * * * [T]his procedure in no way forbids American travel to those areas * * *." See Press Release No. 341, dated May 1, 1952.

On October 31, 1955, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania and Russia were opened to travel while "those portions of * * * Korea and Vietnam under Communist control" were added to the interdicted list.[6]

This marked the beginning of the official policy to disapprove travel to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations. However, it has operated on a somewhat uneven basis. In 1957, for example, travel to Albania and Bulgaria by selected persons having compelling reasons for such travel was authorized. See Washington Post and Times Herald, Nov. 15, 1957; New York Times, Sept. 6, 1957. With reference to China, passports were validated for three mothers of Americans held prisoner in that country (New York Times, Dec. 7, 1957) and for an attorney (Id., Nov. 21, 1957). Furthermore, the State Department validated passports for twenty-four newsmen, but the Chinese government refused to issue visas (Id., Aug. 23, 1957). Other relaxations of appellee's policy will be referred to hereinafter.

---

[6] Passports have been stamped, "Not valid for travel in Hungary" since November, 1956.

While the arguments already advanced apply equally to area restrictions, it is thought that some elaboration of them is appropriate at this time. Authority for their imposition is claimed under the statute of 1926 (supra) and Executive Order No. 7856, 22 C. F. R. § 51.75 (1938) which reads in part as follows:

> "124. The Secretary of State is authorized in his discretion to refuse to issue a passport, to restrict it against use in certain countries, to withdraw or cancel a passport already issued, and to withdraw a passport for the purpose of restricting its validity or use in certain countries."

Accordingly, the Secretary issued regulations providing:

> "Discretional exercise of authority in passport matters. Nothing in this part shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of State from exercising the discretion resting in him to refuse to issue a passport, to restrict its use to certain countries, to withdraw or cancel a passport already issued, or to withdraw a passport for the purpose of restricting its validity or use in certain countries." 22 C. F. R. § 53.8 (1938).

It is conceded that the power of the Secretary to impose such restrictions has not been the subject of judicial determination except insofar as Kent v. Dulles, supra, is controlling. See testimony, Roderic L. O'Connor, House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Hearings on H. R. 13760, 85th Cong., 2d Sess. (1958), p. 17. In the words of the Special Committee to Study Passport Procedures of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, henceforth referred to as the Special Committee:

> "The power to prohibit travel by all American citizens to particular countries is a broad and far-reaching power. The impact of a decision by the Secretary of State to invalidate passports for travel to a particular country may severely affect those individuals who wish to visit that country. In addition to the individual effects, the United States as a whole is affected by the fact that all of its communication through its citizens with the country to which travel is proscribed may be interrupted." Freedom to Travel, supra 50-51.

It is also conceded that the Executive, as the major organ of the federal government in the field of international relations, possesses powers in that area which do not require an Act of Congress for their authorization. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., supra, at 319-320. However, even the Special Committee, which is not unsympathetic to certain area restrictions, feels that they should be employed "only in situations of gravity and seriousness" (Freedom to Travel, supra, 53), and in the words of its Chairman, "only in situations of exceptional gravity". Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Hearings, July 28, 1958, 85th Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 105.

The only two types of conditions which the Special Committee felt would clearly justify area restraints were (1) to punish or prevent aggression, and (2) to prevent or end hostilities or to avoid American involvement. Freedom to Travel, supra, 56. Obviously, none of these conditions now prevails in any of the countries presently on the Department's Index. Furthermore, the reasons advanced by the Secretary for his ban on China travel do not measure up to the "gravity and seriousness" or "exceptional gravity" necessary to support the subversion of a constitutional right.

The Special Committee has adequately pointed out the self-defeating nature of area restrictions:

> "It becomes a close question, too often, whether the real penalty is imposed upon the foreign government which is the target of the area prohibitions or upon the people of this country, both those who choose to stay at home and those who desire to travel abroad. Those who remain at home through choice are denied information from their fellow citizens and local news sources about the proscribed country, and those who wish to travel, but are denied passports to their areas of choice, are prevented from directly informing themselves and their associates." Freedom to Travel, supra, 54.

See also Wyzanski, Freedom to Travel, Atlantic Monthly (October, 1952), 66.

The State Department itself apparently feels that area restrictions stamped in passports by it do not prohibit the travel itself. See Dept. State Press Release, No. 341, May 1, 1952, supra; Hearings Before Sen. For. Rel. Comm. on Dept. of State Passport Policies, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. at 59 (1957).

III

Alternatively,* to the extent that the power to deny a passport to prevent appellant from traveling to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations is based on the Executive power over foreign relations, it is still subject to applicable constitutional provisions: and the reasons given by the Secretary for the denial in this case do not warrant the abridgement of constitutional rights.

Granting, arguendo, that there is a connection between the foreign relations power and the power over passports, the exercise of the power over foreign relations is nonetheless subject to applicable constitutional provisions. In

Bauer v. Acheson (supra) the District Court for the District of Columbia said:

> "It is true that the conduct of foreign relations is a political matter within the discretion of the legislative and executive branches of the government, and that the courts recognize the plenary power of the President and of Congress, singly or in combination, to perform acts peculiarly within the realm of political affairs without judicial interference. There is, however, the recognized limitation on the power of the political departments of the government that their acts must be within the Constitution and not in conflict with any provision thereof." 101 App. D. C. 247, 106 F. Supp. 445, 449.

And in Shachtman v. Dulles, Judge Fahy said:

> "Even though his [passport] application might be said to come within the scope of foreign affairs in a broad sense, it is also within the scope of the due process clause, which is concerned with the liberty of the individual free from arbitrary restraint." 96 App. D. C. 287, 225 F. 2d 938, 944.

In addition to the due process rights of the individual under the Fifth Amendment referred to by Judge Fahy, the appellant has the special property interest in his occupation as a foreign correspondent of which he has been deprived without due process. His right to travel, furthermore, is clearly one of the unenumerated rights protected by the Ninth Amendment but here denied and disparaged by the appellee.

The Secretary's arguments to justify his refusal to renew appellant's passport to prevent him from traveling to countries with which the United States does not maintain diplomatic relations are, in the main, two. First, he says that diplomatic protection of the United States cannot be extended to American citizens traveling in such countries. By itself, this statement is undoubtedly true. But even so it can in no way be said to justify the limitation of a constitutional right. To assert that the privilege of benevolent, paternalistic protection is paramount to the constitutional right to travel is to take a step down the road to oppression.

Furthermore, the argument is an extremely weak one on which to base the subversion of a constitutional right.

> "However, it seems clear that the existence of diplomatic relations does not necessarily improve the ability of a country to protect its citizens in another country. For example, diplomatic relations were in effect with Czechoslovakia in 1951 at the time an American newspaperman was subjected to a denial of justice and imprisoned many years. Furthermore, the Department has not consistently invalidated passports for travel to countries with unrecognized regimes. Passports were issued for travel to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics from 1923 to 1933, during which period the Soviet government had not yet been accorded recognition by the United States, for travel to Spain after the Civil War in 1939 and prior to recognition of the Franco government." Freedom to Travel, supra, p. 53.

Here the Secretary's argument is particularly dangerous. Since the appellant is a foreign correspondent, he serves the important function of providing for those who cannot travel the opportunity of at least a minimum of knowledge of other countries. However, appellant is not at this time arguing the existence of any special privileges which are his because he is a member of the press. Rather, his position is based on the broader ground that the deprivation here is one of his rights as a private citizen.

> "The right of individuals to go abroad and gain their own impressions of people and events in other countries is a matter of importance to them as citizens and to a government which draws all its powers from their votes. The First Amendment, and indeed the entire conception of effectively functioning democratic society, rests on a belief in the need for a free and fully informed exchange of opinion prior to the > making of decisions. Travel abroad contributes to that exchange and thereby can help both our own nation, and the world community of which it is a leading member, to make decisions wisely." 61 Yale L. J. 171, supra, at 191.

If it were true that the extension of protection to a citizen traveling abroad would necessarily and inevitably involve the government in foreign relations, there would be no reason why a citizen-traveler cannot waive this privilege of protection. Assertions to the effect that this privilege cannot be waived fly in the face of history. For example, in 1939 the State Department called upon citizens to refrain from their right to travel on foreign vessels. The implication of this request was clearly that those who did so would thereby waive any protective privileges. 1 Dept. State Bull. 345 (1939).

The second argument of the Secretary is generally that the isolation of Communist China is a useful adjunct to foreign policy. He argues that to allow persons to travel to China would result in a lowering of our prestige in world opinion. Yet what greater effect is there on our prestige abroad when we confine a citizen of unquestioned allegiance and integrity within the borders of our own country! The Secretary says that a cultural exchange with Communist China would result in an implied recognition of that "illegal" regime, which we must avoid at all costs. Even if this were true, it would not follow that the Secretary has the right to use United States citizens as tools of foreign diplomacy. And surely such a reason cannot be said to meet the minimum test of "gravest imminent danger to the public safety." Korematsu v. United States, supra.

The other reasons advanced by the Secretary for his action in denying appellant's application for a renewal of his passport do not merit the denial to the American public of its right to on-the-spot reporting of news developments in China. These reasons (with brief parenthetical rebuttals) are, in the main, set forth in the margin: *

To allow the Secretary to use such foreign policy considerations as the justification for abridging constitutional rights is to allow such rights to be turned off and on at the discretion of a single man. Tomorrow the Secretary may decide that the United States has been gravely insulted and its prestige is threatened by, for example, the

---

* 1. No peace treaty has ended the Korean War and a quasi-state of war still exists, necessitating the continued application of the Trading-With-The-Enemy Act. (The United States was never at war with Communist China and the gathering of legitimate and important news was never encompassed by the Act, a fact implicitly recognized by the Secretary in his failure to prosecute appellant and other correspondents.)

2. Communist China poses a threat to Formosa. (So does Russia to Pakistan, allied to us through SEATO, and to Norway, allied to us through NATO.)

3. There are no United States facilities to protect travelers in China. (The same is true, in a practical sense, in other Iron Curtain countries.)

4. The return of prisoners held by the Chinese would be jeopardized by the presence of American reporters. (This is ridiculous on the face of it and, if Chinese statements are to be believed, their presence would have the opposite effect.)

5. China has violated the Korean Armistice Agreement. (So has Russia the Yalta agreement.)

6. The United States would be yielding to Chinese blackmail. (The alleged purpose of the "blackmail" is to open news sources to American reporters, in other words, to lift the Bamboo Curtain.)

7. America's world leadership would be endangered. (Hardly likely.)

8. Communist China's prestige would be enhanced and that of Nationalist China weakened. (An extremely speculative and unrealistic argument that has been further weakened by our willingness to sit at the conference table with Chinese representatives during the recent Quemoy crisis and as early as 1951 at Panmunjom as well as at Geneva beginning in 1955.)

9. The entry of newsmen would cause a general influx of Americans into Communist China. (Easily controlled by the State Depart-action of our Norwegian ally in recently refusing to allow an atomic submarine to make port there. To repair this damage to our prestige, we must cut off all cultural exchange; and thus another area of the world is placed behind an Iron Curtain of our own making.

> "In some ways the intrinsic social detriment is maximal when geographical restrictions are invoked. Denial of a passport to an individual affects only that one person directly; the larger community only incidentally. But a prohibition enjoining all citizens from travelling in a proscribed area imposes a gen-ment as with Egypt, Syria and Israel in the 1956 Suez crisis. See State Dept. Dep'tal Regulation 108.303, 21 Fed. Reg. 8577 (1956).)

---

10. American opposition to Communism would appear to be weakened. (If so, to be logical, we should withdraw permission for travel in Russia and other Iron Curtain countries instead of signing cultural exchange agreements. See New York Times, Jan 28, 1958, p. 8.)

11. The presence of American reporters might precipitate a war-provoking incident. (Unreasonable speculation.)

12. The Chinese might insist on certain reporters only. (In their original invitation on August 5, 1956 they named twenty-two anti-Communist correspondents including top reporters of the New York Times, New York Herald Tribune, radio and television networks and wire services.)

13. The United States does not recognize China. (This has never been used as a reason to bar the press before and is without logical foundation, e.g., travel was permitted in Franco Spain prior to recognition. III Hackworth, Digest of International Law 534 (1942).)

See Dulles letter to Sulzberger, New York Times, May 2, 1957.

As for Hungary, the Secretary's reasons in the Court below are equally weak. In the main they are as follows:

1. The Hungarian government is engaged in a systematic persecution of Hungarian employees of the United States legation. (Hardly a reason to abridge appellant's right to travel.)

2. The safety of American citizens cannot be fully protected in Hungary. (Rebutted above.)

3. Atrocities committed during the Hungarian revolt of October and November, 1956. (Never used to deny passports before, e.g., Nazi Germany.)

> eral harm." Statement of the American Jewish Congress, Hearings, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, supra, p. 142.

The constitutional rights of persons are gravely impaired by the limitations which the Secretary has attempted to impose upon the travel of citizens abroad; such limitations can be justified only by a showing of "the gravest imminent danger to the public safety." None of the argument advanced by the Secretary disclose this minimum standard of justification for the abridgement of constitutional rights.

IV

The Secretary's refusal to renew appellant's passport is an abridgement of the constitutional guarantee of the freedom of press.

Freedom of speech and freedom of press are fundamental personal rights and liberties (Konigsberg v. State Bar of Cal., 353 U. S. 252) which are the corner stones of Anglo-Saxon institutions. (State v. Pierce, 163 Wis. 615, 158 N. W. 696.)

> "It is recognized in England, Canada and in America, in fact, in every English speaking government that the press is one of the most potent factors in the establishment and maintenance of free government known to an enlightened civilization. The Framers of the Constitution of the United States * * * were not unmindful of this fact when they wrote into these instruments the provisions guaranteeing the freedom of speech and of the press. A free government has never tolerated the muzzling of the press or the stifling of free speech. At most, it has only held those who enjoy this freedom answerable for an abuse thereof." State v. Pierce, supra, at 700.

It is a truism that neither the United States (Watkins v. U. S., supra) nor any state thereof can infringe the freedom of speech or of the press. (Hughes v. Superior Court of California, 339 U. S. 460). This is no less the case when a governmental agency is involved (Buxham v. City of Riverside, 29 F. Supp. 3).

It is only when these freedoms must be subordinated to the greater rights of general public interest and to the right of government to maintain and protect itself that they lose their preferred position in the hierarchy of the constitutional guarantees. (United States v. Dennis, supra.) However, as has been indicated, only a showing of the greatest and most immediate danger to interests which the government may lawfully protect can justify their subversion (West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnett, 319 U. S. 624). Only the gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests can justify a limitation on free speech (Thomas v. Collins, supra), and the substantive evil that will result must be extremely serious and the degree of imminence extremely high (Bridges v. State of California, supra).

The Secretary has not, by law, custom or tradition, the right to prohibit accredited press representatives from visiting either friendly or unfriendly countries in peacetime. Such a ban is an administrative invasion of the freedom of press guarantees of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. The courts have consistently held that, even when an absolute power of Congress was involved, it had to yield to the provisions of the First Amendment. See Latva v. Nicolls, 106 F. Supp. 658; United States v. Rumely, supra. It would seem that this should be no less the situation where the Executive Branch is concerned.

The Secretary of State does not seem to understand the breadth of the freedom of the press portion of the First Amendment. In a letter dated April 30, 1957, addressed to Arthur Hays Sulzberger, the publisher and chairman of the board of The New York Times, reprinted in The New York Times, May 2, 1957, Mr. Dulles stated as follows:

> "You [Sulzberger] suggest that our policy with respect to Americans going to China 'abridges the freedom of the press'. The constitutional 'freedom of the press' relates to publication, and not to the gathering of news." (The italicized portion is the Secretary's emphasis.)

This statement, if implemented, would amount to a complete perversion of the freedom of the press guarantees of the Constitution. As The New York Times editorialized on May 5, 1957, "In other words, we are free to publish the news provided we do not insist on our rights to get it." According to Mr. Sulzberger (and most, if not all, American newspapers) "I cannot escape the feeling that the Administration is abridging the freedom of the press and using the press as an instrument in its diplomacy. I agree that other principles are involved, but in the long view this one seems to me to be fundamental." (Letter, Arthur Hays Sulzberger to John Foster Dulles, April 23, 1957; reprinted in The New York Times, May 2, 1957.)

Furthermore, not only is the Secretary treading unconcernedly in the sands of unconstitutionality, but he is contradicting his own professed convictions. For example, in his press conference of April 23, 1957, he stated that "The more the American people know the facts about Communist China, the better pleased we are." New York Times, April 24, 1957. As Arthur Krock stated on April 25, 1957, in The New York Times:

> "Access to news sources both here and abroad is not a 'privilege' granted through government favor or caprice and thus something to be extended, withdrawn or denied on the same basis. It is the only orderly means by which the people of this Republic can be assured of their right to know in peacetime all that is happening around them."

And it hardly seems necessary to emphasize that this is precisely what the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they prohibited Congress from making any law "abridging the freedom of the press."

In his press conference of April 23, 1957, the Secretary stressed the fact that he was afraid of a mass demand from Americans, other than newsmen, for permission to travel in China. He overlooked the fact that he has in the past, even during actual hostilities, established a dual policy with respect to other countries (such as Israel, Syria and Egypt) by which correspondents were permitted to travel in those nations while the general public was not. We do not concede his "dual policy" power.

The Secretary's reasons for refusing to permit American newsmen to travel in Communist China have been condemned by every responsible press facility. Moreover, they have been labeled "nonsensical" by Senator Hubert H. Humphrey (New York Times, April 3, 1957) and severely criticized by members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Hearings, 84th Cong., 1st Sess. As Senator Estes Kefauver stated on April 24, 1957, "I am in favor of letting American reporters go to Red China without any limitations. It is better to get our news from there through our own people than from canned information from some Communist bureau. Our people are entitled to know what is going on in Red China." (New York Times, April 25, 1957.) In addition, the United Press reported, on May 13, 1957, that mail received by the Department was running better than three-to-one against its ban on travel by newsmen. (New York Herald Tribune, May 14, 1957.)

Not only has the Secretary been inconsistent in his reasons for barring newsmen from the Chinese mainland, but he has been equally inconsistent with reference to those who have violated his prohibition. For example, to the best of our knowledge, no action of any kind has been taken against Messrs. Edmund Stevens and Philip Harrington, the Look magazine reporter-photographer team, who visited Communist China at the same time as did appellant. After Mr. Stevens arrived in Moscow following his visit to China, he was asked by U. S. Ambassador Bohlen, on February 6, 1957, to bring his passport to the American Embassy so it could be stamped valid only for immediate return to the United States. He refused to do so without a hearing and, through his employer, requested one either in Moscow or in Washington. To date, no answer has been received from the Department by either Mr. Stevens or his employer, and he is apparently still in possession of his passport.

Mr. Harrington's passport was renewed at the American Embassy in Stockholm just prior to his visit to Communist China, and he is presently back in the United States. At no time has he received any communication from the State Department with reference to either his trip or his passport. Furthermore, it is our understanding that Senator George Malone (R., Nev.) openly violated the Department's ban against travelling in Bulgaria during the summer of 1955 without any apparent adverse effect. In addition, as has been stated previously, the Secretary has validated the passports of a lawyer who took depositions in China (New York Times, November 21, 1957) and three mothers who visited their prisoner-sons in that country (New York Times, December 7, 1957). On August 22, 1957, the Secretary announced that 24 American newsmen could enter China because "* * * [N]ew factors have come into the picture making it desirable that additional information be made available to the American people respecting current conditions in China." (New York Times, August 23, 1957.)

Moreover it is contended that the Department does not have the right to use access to news sources as a license or a privilege which can be extended or withdrawn at its pleasure. The press cannot constitutionally be used as an instrument of foreign policy. To permit it to be so used is to threaten a watering-down of the First Amendment in that the Department could close any foreign source of news in peacetime by a "finding" that such action would be beneficial to even the most nebulous foreign policy. News coverage cannot be regulated by foreign policy fluctuations without laying the cornerstone for governmental press control, too tragically often in the recent past the first step on the road to tyranny.

On the positive side, there are many cogent arguments in favor of permitting newsmen to enter Communist China and other off-limit countries. Under the present restrictions, American news media must rely on Peking sources, which are usually only propaganda relay stations, or dispatches from foreign reporters who are not particularly concerned with American interests. The Secretary at one time recommended the latter as a solution to the problem, a proposal which The New York Herald Tribune classified as "unthinkable". The only other alternative is to rely on State Department news releases unless the press is willing to ignore China completely. Whichever tack is taken, the American public must remain woefully ignorant as to a major area of foreign policy application. As the Writer's Guild of America wired the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in April of 1957:

> "This act of censorship means that American audiences, if they are to get first-hand reports from China, must get them from writers of other lands. A veil is thrown over China—not by others, but by our own government." New York Post, April 2, 1957.

Furthermore, the Communist world has been given a convenient and an effective propaganda drum to beat, one which they are exploiting to the fullest.

These and many other reasons have been advanced so persistently and so often by the newspapers, the press associations and the radio and television networks that repetition here is patently unnecessary. It is sufficient to call the Court's attention to the remarks of speakers at the American Newspaper Publishers' Association meeting in New York City in April, 1957. William Dwight, the then president of the A. N. P. A., in his presidential address on April 24, 1957, summed it up as follows:

> "The A. N. P. A. has asked that newspapermen who are American citizens and employed by American publications and news-gathering services to gather and write news or express opinions on facts, be accorded by our government freedom to travel for that purpose in any country in the world with which the United States is not at war. The A. N. P. A. has in mind particularly the granting of the right to go to Red China and report back to the American people. The Bamboo Curtain now hangs by order of our government between us and Red China. Arguments based on the evils of the Peiping regime have been advanced to bolster the decision to keep us from finding out for ourselves what is taking place over there. They should not prevail over the majestic principle of the people's right to know, a precious right inherent in our way of life." (New York Times, April 25, 1957)

To buttress his weak constitutional position, the Secretary informed his press conference on May 14, 1957, that the United States Supreme Court has not interpreted the First Amendment to give "newspaper people in exercise of the freedom of the press the right to freely travel everywhere." New York Times, May 15, 1957. After this press conference, the Department cited four Supreme Court opinions and two by the highest courts of New York and Pennsylvania, respectively, purporting to uphold the Secretary's constitutional views (Id.). None of the cited cases is concerned with the question of whether the control of news-gathering, as differentiated from the right of publication, violates the First Amendment. Near v. Minnesota (283 U. S. 697) involves the constitutionality of a Minnesota statute designed to abate "malicious, scandalous and defamatory" publications. The only issue before the Supreme Court, which held the statute's application to be unconstitutional, was prior restraint on publication. In Pennekamp v. Florida (328 U. S. 331), the convictions of the editor and publisher of a newspaper for contempt because of articles impugning a court's integrity were reversed. In Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board (301 U. S. 103), the court held that the gathering and dissemination of news by the Associated Press involved interstate commerce and that it was therefore subject to the National Labor Relations Act. In Associated Press v. United States (326 U. S. 1), the Associated Press was held subject to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The two state cases cited by the Department concerned the right of Pennsylvania courts to prohibit the taking of photographs within forty feet of a courtroom (In re Mack, 386 Pa. 251), and that of a New York court with the consent of the accused to close the courtroom to the press (United Press v. Valente, 281 App. Div. 395). Not a single one of the above-cited cases, relied upon by the Department to support its view that it may control the gathering of news, supports that contention. The Secretary clearly recognized this by relying in the court below on a dissenting opinion in In re Mack, supra, which referred only incidentally to the "right to gather news."

Incidentally, the Secretary was asked the following question at the above-mentioned news conference:

> "If you can control the sources of news, of what value is the right to publication, since you have nothing to publish? * * * Isn't that the classic way to stop the publication of news?" New York Times, May 15, 1957.

He answered his questioner by stating that there were "ample ways" of obtaining news from China "without sending American correspondents with American passports into areas where that would involve a conflict with the United States foreign policy." He stated that publishers who desired to obtain news from the Chinese mainland "can send anybody there if they do not have a United States passport." This, he argued, would not violate the spirit of his ban. Furthermore, he again insisted that he was willing to let the "news gathering community" devise a plan for sending a small group of reporters to China on an experimental basis. He justified this experiment on the ground that "there are some cases where pure logic has to give way before a measure of compromise" (Id.).

The obvious paradox of these remarks is readily apparent. If his arguments for refusing to permit American newsmen to enter China had validity, then none should be allowed to do so. If the Secretary is willing to admit "a chosen few," then it is an admission that the arguments he has offered to sustain his absolute prohibition are without substance.

Furthermore, he seems to feel that permitting newsmen to visit China would be a discrimination in their favor. As Arthur Krock pointed out in his article in The New York Times on April 25, 1957, newsmen have always enjoyed greater rights than the private citizen to visit areas where news was being made. A reporter's press card has by tradition been honored everywhere, giving him the right to cross police and fire lines and to visit battlefronts. The Secretary recognized this fact of life when he permitted newsmen to visit Egypt, Syria and Israel while closing those countries to other American travelers. As the New York Times editorialized on May 3, 1957, "Full and free information is the very lifeblood of democracy; and we submit that there is a difference in principle between a reporter sending back information from China and a business man sending back goods and dollars."

Conclusion

Obviously, the professional work of the appellant is interfered with by the restrictions imposed on the places where he can perform it, his earning power as a foreign correspondent is being curtailed and his professional standing impaired.

The educational value of travel is as real today as it was for those who, in an earlier day, took the Grand Tour.[7] The close relationship between intellectual progress and freedom of movement is virtually an axiom in the scientific field today. Hence, the vigorous criticism by educational, scientific and government leaders of our restrictive passport and visa policies.[8]

Judge Wyzanski has brilliantly related travel to the exchange of ideas and experiences protected by the First Amendment:

> "This travel does not differ from any other exercise of the manifold freedoms of expression—from the right to speak, to write, to use the mails, to publish, to assemble, to petition. In all these liberties the principal element is the stretching of the mind to accommodate the growing spirit." Wyzanski, Freedom to Travel, supra, at 68.

---

[7] See e.g. C. P. Brand, Italy and the English Romantics (1957); Malone, Jefferson and the Rights of Man (1951) 112-150; Karamazin, Letters of a Russian Traveler (1789-1790) (1957).

[8] See e.g. the testimony of Dr. Warren Weaver, Vice-President of the Rockefeller Foundation, before a House Government Operations Subcommittee on Government Information (N. Y. Times, Jan. 23, 1958, pp. 1, 9); also the testimony of Godfrey F. Chew, Chairman, Passport Committee, Federation of American Scientists (Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Hearings, Nov. 15-16, 1955, 84th Congress, 1st Sess., herein called the "Hennings Hearings", pp. 86-103; Berkner, Earth Satellites and Foreign Policy, Foreign Affairs, Jan. 1958, 221 at 226, 229-30; Shils, The Torment of Secrecy (1956); Grundfest, Science and the Department of State, Science, Oct. 12, 1956, p. 687.

It is essential, in a democracy, that citizens acquaint themselves at first hand with the effects aboard of our government's policies, foreign and domestic, and with conditions abroad which might affect such policies. Chafee, supra, at 196; Comment, 61 Yale L. J., supra, at 191.[9]

Moreover, travel is an aid to the free interchange of ideas among nations, to the increased knowledge of foreign countries and to the better understanding of one's own country. One of our national objectives is "to lower the barriers which now impede the opportunities of people to travel anywhere in the world for peaceful, friendly purposes, so that all will have a chance to know each other face-to-face."[10]

Finally, to prevent a citizen from leaving the country is pro tanto to confine him within the limits of the United States, and is accordingly a restriction on his liberty. Cf. Walker v. Chief Quarantine Officer, 69 F. Supp. 980. According to Blackstone, one of the attributes of personal [9] See, for example, the remark of Senator Allen J. Ellender that impressions he gained first hand on a trip abroad "differ sharply" from those he received from the State Department. New York Times, Sept. 6, 1955, p. 4, col. 3.

---

[10] President Eisenhower, quoted in The Geneva Conference of Heads of Government (1955), 63. And President Truman wrote to Nikolai M. Schvernik, President of the Soviet Presidium, that "peoples who are denied the normal means of communication will not be able to attain that mutual understanding which must form the basis for trust and friendship. We shall never be able to remove suspicion and fear as potential causes of war until communication is permitted to flow, free and open, across international boundaries." N. Y. Times, July 8, 1951, p. 5, col. 1. This policy is expressly set forth in the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act, Public Law 402, 80th Congress, 2d Sess. (1948). See also Colligan, J., Americans Abroad, State Dep't Bulletin, May 3, 1954, Vol. 30, No. 775; Agreement Between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on Exchanges in the Cultural, Technical and Educational Fields, N. Y. Times, Jan. 28, 1958, p. 8.

liberty at common law was the "power of locomotion, of changing situation, or moving one's person to whatever place one's inclination may direct", 1 Commentaries 134. And it has been observed that "the distinction between restriction to a jail, to a city, to a state, or a nation is merely one of degree." Comment, 61 Yale L. J. supra, at 190.

All of the above considerations apply in the case of the appellant. He desires to go abroad in order to further his livelihood and his career and, in particular, to visit such countries as China where news of far-reaching importance is occurring. He has shown a creditable concern with public issues, and his travel abroad would enhance his ability to fulfill his responsibilities as a citizen.[11]

This case represents a new type of interference with civil liberty—liberty of movement. The Government has never presented any adequate justification for its wholesale denial of so vital a right of American citizens. The Secretary has arrogated this power to himself without either legislative or constitutional justification.

His passport regulations, substantively and procedurally, go far beyond anything authorized by the Congress or the President. They openly seek to prevent the future exercise of First Amendment rights because of governmental disapproval of the manner in which such rights were previously exercised.

In conclusion, one of the most articulate condemnations of our passport policies was expounded by Prof. Louis L. Jaffe, almost two years before the decision in Kent v. Dulles, when he wrote in the October 1956 issue of Foreign Affairs:

> "It is intolerable, I think, that a bureau should thus trammel the individual on grounds no more palpable than 'the interests of the United States.' The right to go abroad may not be of so exalted a nature as the right to move about, to associate and to speak within one's country; thus to participate in the community's life is the paramount opportunity and duty of the citizen. But it is nevertheless a right of great moment; it is liberating for the individual and fructifying for his own community."

[11] See Chafee, op. cit. supra, 196.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the District Court should be reversed, and the appellee ordered to issue a passport to appellant.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM M. KUNSTLER,
511 Fifth Avenue,
New York 17, N. Y.

WALTER E. DILLON, JR.,
1625 Eye Street, N. W.,
Washington 6, D. C.,
Attorneys for Appellant.

ROWLAND WATTS,
% American Civil Liberties Union,
170 Fifth Avenue,
New York 10, N. Y.,
of Counsel.

APPENDIX

22 U. S. C. § 211(a)

The Act of July 3, 1926, 44 Stat. 887, 22 U. S. C. § 211(a) provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> "The Secretary of State may grant and issue passports, and cause passports to be granted, issued, and verified in foreign countries by diplomatic representatives of the United States, and by such consul generals, consuls, or vice consuls when in charge, as the Secretary of State may designate, and by the chief or other executive officer of the insular possessions of the United States, under such rules as the President shall designate and prescribe for and on behalf of the United States, and no other person shall grant, issue, or verify such passports."

22 U. S. C. § 212

The Act of June 14, 1902, 32 Stat. 386, 22 U. S. C. § 212 provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> "No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified for any other persons than those owing allegiance, whether citizens or not, to the United States."

Internal Security Act of 1950, § 6

Section 6 of the Internal Security Act of 1950, 64 Stat. 993, 50 U. S. C. § 785 provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> "(a) When a Communist organization as defined in paragraph (5) of Section 782 of this title is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring such organization to register, it shall be unlawful for any member of such organization, with knowledge or notice that such organization is so registered or that such order has become final—
>
> (1) to make application for a passport, or the renewal of a passport, to be issued or renewed by or under the authority of the United States; or

(2) to use or attempt to use any such passport.

(b) When an organization is registered, or there is in effect a final order of the Board requiring an organization to register, as a Communist-action organization, it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the United States to issue a passport to, or renew the passport of, any individual knowing or having reason to believe that such individual is a member of such organization."

8 U. S. C. § 1185

Section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 66 Stat. 190, 8 U. S. C. § 1185, as codified, provides in pertinent part:

"§ 1185. Travel control of citizens and aliens during war or national emergency—Restrictions and prohibitions on aliens.

(a) When the United States is at war or during the existence of any national emergency proclaimed by the President, * * * and the President shall find the interests of the United States require that restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those provided otherwise than by this section be imposed upon the departure of persons from and their entry into the United States, and shall make public proclamation thereof, it shall, until otherwise ordered by the President or the Congress, be unlawful—

(1) (There follow restrictions enumerated (1) through (7) not here pertinent.)

(b) After such proclamation as is provided for in subsection (a) of this section has been made and published and while such proclamation is in force, it shall, except as otherwise provided by the President, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President may authorize and prescribe, be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter, or attempt to depart from or enter, the United States unless he bears a valid passport."

The Expatriation Act of 1868

The Expatriation Act of 1868, 15 Stat. 223-224, R.S. § 1999, 8 U. S. C. § 800 (1940 Supp.) reads as follows:

> "Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship, and whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants, are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore,
>
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officers of this government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation, is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this government."

Proclamation 3004

The pertinent portions of Presidential Proclamation No. 3004, January 17, 1953, 67 Stat. c. 31, entitled "Control of Persons Leaving or Entering the United States By the President of the United States of America," are as follows:

> "A Proclamation
>
> Whereas section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, enacted on June 27, 1952 (Public Law 414, 82nd Congress; 66 Stat. 163, 190), authorizes the President to impose restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those otherwise provided by that Act upon the departure of persons from, and their entry into, the United States when the United States is at war or during the existence of any national emergency proclaimed by the President * * * and when the President shall find that the interests of the United States so require; and

Whereas the national emergency the existence of which was proclaimed on December 16, 1950, by Proclaimation 2914 still exists; and

Whereas because of the exigencies of the international situation and of the national defense then existing Proclamation No. 2523 of November 14, 1941, imposed certain restrictions and prohibitions in addition to those otherwise provided by law, upon the departure of persons from and their entry into the United States, and

Whereas the exigencies of the international situation and of the national defense still require that certain restrictions and prohibitions, in addition to those otherwise provided by law, be imposed upon the departure of persons from and their entry into the United States:

Now, therefore, I, Harry S. Truman, President of the United States of America, acting under and by virtue of the authority vested in me by section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act and by section 301 of title 3 of the United States Code, do hereby find and publicly proclaim that the interests of the United States require that restrictions and prohibitions, in addition to those otherwise provided by law, be imposed upon the departure of persons from, and their entry into, the United States; and I hereby prescribe and make the following rules, regulations, and orders with respect thereto:

1. The departure and entry of citizens and nationals of the United States from and into the United States, including the Canal Zone, and all territory and waters, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State and published as sections 53.1 to 53.9 inclusive, of title 22 of the Code of Federal Regulations. Such regulations are hereby incorporated into and made a part of this proclamation; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to revoke, modify, or amend such regulations as he may find the interests of the United States to require.

5. I hereby direct all departments and agencies of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary of State in the execution of his authority under this proclamation and any subsequent proclamation, rule, regulation, or order issued in pursuance hereof; and such departments and agencies shall upon request make available to the Secretary of State for that purpose the services of their respective officials and agents. I enjoin upon all officers of the United States charged with the execution of the laws thereof the utmost diligence in preventing violations of section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act and proclamation, including the regulations of the Secretary of State incorporated herein and made a part hereof, and in bringing to trial and punishment any persons violating any provisions of that section or of his proclamation.

To the extent permitted by law, this proclamation shall take effect as of December 24, 1952."

EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 7856

Executive Order No. 7856, 22 C. F. R. §§ 51.1-51.74 is entitled and constitutes the "Rules Governing the Granting and Issuing of Passports in the United States." Several typical excerpts from that extensive document are set forth to indicate that it relates to procedural rather than to substantive matters:

* * *

"3. Unless a request is made by the parental or other guardian that a passport be denied, passports may be issued to minors upon their own application.

4. Children may execute applications in their own behalf when of sufficient intelligence to understand the statements, and the meaning of the oath of allegiance to the United States, contained in the application.

* * *

10. A minor brother or sister may be included in the passport of an older brother or sister.

* * *

39. The applicant must submit with his application duplicate photographs not more than 3 by 3 inches and not less than 2½ by 2½ inches in size, unmounted, printed on thin paper on a light background, showing the full front view of the features of the applicant, and taken within six months of the date they are submitted.

40. When the applicant applies for a passport he should be accompanied by one credible witness who is an American citizen, has known the applicant for a period of two or more years, and has a definite place of residence.

* * *

119. The Secretary of State may require such additional evidence of citizenship as in his judgment may be necessary to establish the citizenship of an applicant for a passport."

* * *

REGULATIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE 22 C. F. R. § 51.136

On August 28, 1952 the Secretary adopted the passport regulations herein involved with the following preamble (17 F. R. 8013):

Pursuant to the authority vested in me by paragraph 126 of Executive Order No. 7856, issued on March 31, 1938 (3 F. R. 681; 22 C. F. R. 51.77) under authority of Section 1 of the Act of Congress approved July 3, 1926 (44 Stat. 887; 22 U. S. C. 211(a)), the regulations issued on March 31, 1938 (Departmental Order 749) as amended (22 C. F. R. 51.101 to 51.134) are hereby further amended by the addition of new sections 51.135 to 51.143 as follows:

§ 51.136, as amended, reads as follows:

> "§ 51.136 * Limitations on Issuance of passports to certain other persons. In order to promote and safeguard the interests of the United States, passport facilities, except for direct and immediate return to the United States, will be refused to a person when it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that the person's activities abroad would: (a) violate the laws of the United States; (b) be prejudicial to the orderly conduct of foreign relations; or (c) otherwise be prejudicial to the interests of the United States."

22 C. F. R. § 53.8

§ 53.8 Discretional exercise of authority in passport matters.—Nothing in this part shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of State from exercising the discretion resting in him to refuse to issue a passport, to restrict its use to certain countries, to withdraw or cancel a passport already issued, or to withdraw a passport for the purpose of restricting its validity or use in certain countries.

---

* Prior to the Secretary's amendment of January 18, 1956, 21 F. R. 336, this section read as follows:

> § 51.136 Limitations on Issuance of Passports to Persons Likely to Violate Laws of the United States. In order to promote the national interest by assuring that the conduct of foreign relations shall be free from unlawful interference, no passport, except one limited for direct and immediate return to the United States, shall be issued to persons as to whom there is reason to believe, on the balance of all the evidence, that they are going abroad to engage in activities while abroad which would violate the laws of the United States, or which if carried on in the United States would violate such laws designed to protect the Security of the United States."

Worthy, Bill

October 8, 1958

Mr. Ronald Shilen
Executive Secretary
Mass Media Fellowships
The Fund for Adult Education
200 Bloomingdale Road
White Plains, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Shilen:

I write in support of the application of my friend, Bill Worthy, for a fellowship in the mass media. Worthy is a good reporter highly respected by his colleagues, both in print and radio.

He has told me in general terms about his project, and I should think that there are few people who, working in association with Harold Isaacs, would be more likely to produce results consonant with the Fund's purpose. He is honest, industrious and agreeable. He is also, as you know, the victim of a passport ruling which I would assume will in due course be righted by the courts.

Sincerely yours,

KRM:skh

Washington Post and Times Herald
October 3, 1958

Court Upholds State Dept. Power to Refuse Passports

By James Clayton
Staff Reporter

The power of the President and the Secretary of State to curtail the travel of American citizens overseas was upheld yesterday by District Judge Edward M. Curran.

Curran ruld that the State Department was justified in refusing a passport to William Worthy Jr., a reporter for the Baltimore Afro-American, on the grounds that he is likely to break the travel restrictions stamped on all passports. Worthy has already been to Red China once in violation of the restrictions and won't promise not to go again.

"The President may properly restrict travel to geographical areas when necessitated by foreign policy considerations," Curran said in a ruling from the bench.

Worthy's attorney, William M. Kunstler of New York City, had argued that the Supreme Court stripped the State Department of any power to refuse passports in its decision last year in the cases of Walter Briehl and Rockwell Kent.

In those cases the Court said that passports could not be denied to American citizens because of their beliefs or associations. Justice Department Attorney F. Kirk Maddrix told Judge Curran that the principle does not apply to Worthy because his beliefs are not involved.

Worthy was denied renewal of his passport last year shortly after he returned from a trip to Red China, Russia, and Hungary. His trip was in open defiance of a State Department ban against travel in China or Hungary.

Worthy has insisted that the refusal of the State Department to give him a passport is an abridgement of the freedom of the press guaranteed by the First Amendment. The refusal, he said, has barred the press from obtaining news about Red China and the other proscribed areas.

Maddrix replied that freedom of the press is not involved in the case because there is no barrier imposed on the press which is not also imposed upon everyone else. Worthy, he said, "can get his news anywhere in the world. Just (so he doesn't) go to Red China."

If Worthy will promise not to go there, Maddrix told Judge Curran, "he'll get his passport."

Kunstler said Curran's ruling will be appealed.

WILLIAM WORTHY
210 EAST 19TH STREET
NEW YORK 3, NEW YORK

SPRING 7-6346

Boston Telephone: HIGHLANDS 5-2844

October 5, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS News
New York 22, New York

Dear Ed:

The good Catholic judge in Washington last Thursday made it certain, the ACLU and Government lawyers agree, that I'll be without a passport until 1960. The crowded Circuit Court and Supreme Court calendars make it impossible to get a final decision until the spring of 1960. Naturally I haven't the slightest intention of caving in, promising not to travel to forbidden areas and thereby getting a passport in five minutes.

In anticipation of this adverse decision and of being grounded, I worked out with Harold Isaacs (now at M.I.T. Center for International Studies) a plan to apply to the Fund for Adult Education for one of their 1959-1960 fellowships in the mass media. Purpose of the awards: "to broaden and better the contribution of the media to liberal adult education; to enable a small number of individuals to engage in study or training likely to improve the quality and effectiveness of their output; to help establish bonds between the mass media and the adult education movement."

Harold has carefully checked and found that, if successful in winning one of the twenty-odd fellowships, I could tie in with the Center's program in the field of international communications and also with his own current project: a study of Americans' images of Africa (which will be material for another "Scratches on Our Minds" type of book by him).

I wonder if you would be willing to send the Fund a letter of recommendation, citing my work for CBS News in Russia, Eastern Europe, Africa and China. A word about the importance and significance to the press of my passport case might also be in order.

October 15th is the deadline. The address is:

Ronald Shilen
Executive Secretary
Mass Media Fellowships
The Fund for Adult Education
200 Bloomingdale Road
White Plains, New York.

I know that a letter from you would weigh heavily with the selection committee. Besides Harold Isaacs, another reference whom you probably know is anthropologist Ethel Alpenfels.

Best personal regards. I'm happy to see that you're going to have my favorite author, Aldous Huxley, lead off next Sunday.

Sincerely,
Bill
Bill Worthy

Worthy

87 Howland St.
Boston 21, Mass.
May 29, 1956

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

Dear Ed:

With appropriately knocking knees I somehow got through the Nieman Committee interview last Friday night and then resigned myself to getting a letter, a week or so hence, "We regret to inform you, etc..."

But apparently I underestimated the power of your telegram -- to which Louis Lyons, the curator, referred. Anyway, he phoned me yesterday to say that I'm among the lucky dozen.

I'm lost for a new way of saying "thanks", so I hope you'll realize that my sense of gratitude is no less sincere for being expressed in this unflowery and succinct paragraph. I know that the year at Harvard is going to mean a great deal in my own development, and I also am keenly aware that after so much kicking around the world I really need this time out to evaluate and digest and gain perspective on my variety of experiences.

It's difficult to envision how a Bill Worthy will ever be in a position to do something for an Ed Murrow. But should the unlikely ever materialize and the opportunity to reciprocate arises, be assured that I'm on call.

Sincerely,

Bill (Worthy)

Worthy

RECEIVED
APR -5 PM 5:36
C.B.S. TRAFFIC DEPT. N.Y.

WU022 DPR COLLECT

ITHACA NY APR 5 356PME

PRESS CBS INC

BURKE FOR MURROW. PLEASE ADD TO STATEMENT EXCHICAGO

WITH EQUAL IRRELEVANCE TO THE ISSUE OF RENEWING MY PASSPORT, STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIALS NEGLECTED TO REVEAL THE SKELETON TO BEAT ANY FAMILYS SKELETONS IN CLOSET.

IN 1916, FIVE YEARS BEFORE I WAS BORN, MY GRANDMOTHER, WHO HAS BEEN DEAD SINCE 1935, WAS ARRESTED IN BOSTON FOR PICKETING THE MOTION PICTURE "BIDXXXBIRTH OF A NATION".

SHE WAS ALSO CHARGED WITH SLAPPING A COPS FACE WHILE PROTESTING THIS FILMED GLORIFICATION OF WHITE SUPREMACY.

BY THE LOGIC OF THOSE WHO CURRENTLY DISPENSE PASSPORTS ONLY TO THE SIMONPURE. THIS INCIDENT FOUR DECADES AGO NO DOUBT MAKES ME DOUBLE INELIGIBLE FOR A PASSPORT IN 1957.

REGARDS

WORTHY

501P

19161XXX 1916 1935 1957..

APRIL 17, 1956

LOUIS LYONS, CURATOR, NIEMAN FOUNDATION
HARVARD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

HAVE JUST LEARNED ABOUT BILL WORTHY AS A CANDIDATE FOR NEIMAN FELLOWSHIP STOP MY OPINION OF HIM BASED ON CONSIDERABLE EXPERIENCE IS THAT HE IS A THOUGHTFUL, ABLE AND CONSCIENTIOUS REPORTER WITH A REAL FUTURE STOP REGARDS.

EDWARD R. MURROW

414-43

fc

New York
DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1958 • 30

Uphold Passport Ban For Red China Visitor

Washington, Oct. 2 (NEWS Bureau).—Federal Judge Edward M. Curran today upheld the State Department's refusal to grant a passport for travel to Red China by William Worthy Jr., who went there without permission last year.

Curran said the President and Secretary of State have the power to ban travel by Americans to Communist and other countries when it is "necessitated by foreign policy considerations."

William Worthy Jr.
He would not promise

Attorney's Plea Overruled

He disagreed with a contention by Worthy's attorney, William M. Kunstler of New York City, that the State Department's power to restrict travel was denied by the Supreme Court ruling last June in the case of artist Rockwell Kent, which held that the right to travel cannot be taken away because of a person's belief or associations.

Justice Department Attorney F. Kirk Maddrix said the Supreme Court ruling did not apply to this case because Worthy's beliefs were not involved.

Worthy went to both Red China and Hungary as a reporter for the Baltimore Afro-American in 1956-57 without a State Department okay. The department then refused to renew his passport.

Maddrix said Worthy's passport was not denied because he went to China but because he wouldn't promise not to go again.

Just in case the original of this gets buried on your desk, I'm taking liberty of sending this copy to your home address.

October 5, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS News
New York 22, New York

Dear Ed:

The good Catholic judge in Washington last Thursday made it certain, the ACLU and Government lawyers agree, that I'll be without a passport until 1960. The crowded Circuit Court and Supreme Court calendars make it impossible to get a final decision until the spring of 1960. Naturally I haven't the slightest intention of caving in, promising not to travel to forbidden areas and thereby getting a passport in five minutes.

In anticipation of this adverse decision and of being grounded, I worked out with Harold Isaacs (now at M.I.T. Center for International Studies) a plan to apply to the Fund for Adult Education for one of their 1959-1960 fellowships in the mass media. Purpose of the awards: "to broaden and better the contribution of the media to liberal adult education; to enable a small number of individuals to engage in study or training likely to improve the quality and effectiveness of their output; to help establish bonds between the mass media and the adult education movement."

Harold has carefully checked and found that, if successful in winning one of the twenty-odd fellowships, I could tie in with the Center's program in the field of international communications and also with his own current project: a study of Americans' images of Africa (which will be material for another "Scratches on Our Minds" type of book by him).

I wonder if you would be willing to send the Fund a letter of recommendation, citing my work for CBS News in Russia, Eastern Europe, Africa and China. A word about the importance and significance to the press of my passport case might also be in order.

October 15th is the deadline. The address is:

Ronald Shilen
Executive Secretary
Mass Media Fellowships
The Fund for Adult Education
200 Bloomingdale Road
White Plains, New York.

I know that a letter from you would weigh heavily with the selection committee. Besides Harold Isaacs, another reference whom you probably know is anthropologist Ethel Alpenfels.

Best personal regards. I'm happy to see that you're going to have my favorite author, Aldous Huxley, lead off next Sunday.

Sincerely,

Bill

Bill Worthy

Worthy Bill

March 5, 1958

Dear Bill:

Thanks for the script. Let's talk about it when we meet again. When are you coming to town?

Sincerely,

Mr. William Worthy
210 East 19 Street
New York 3, New York

mcc

WILLIAM WORTHY
210 EAST 19TH STREET
NEW YORK 3, NEW YORK

SPRING 7-6346

Boston Telephone: HIGHLANDS 5-2844

February 23, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS News
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

Dear Ed:

As you suggested, I had a good talk with Morris Ernst. He's all in favor of my making the trip provided everything is completely open, with advance notification to State prior to my departure -- this for the sake of public opinion. When I see you I'll give you details of what he said.

You said you'd be interested in seeing a script on the 450 captured and missing Korean War GIs. I've tried to get across some of the haunting, on-going tragedy.

Sincerely,

Bill

enclosure

(The hijacking of the South Korean plane by the communists provides a possible news peg for this story.)

Tonight in America, when it comes time to retire, 450 unremembered women will be unable to sleep.

For them this sleeplessness is nothing new. During the past five years they have tossed and turned for night after night. No doctor can help them; no medicine will cure their chronic insomnia.

These 450 women are the mothers of prisoners of war who never came back from Korea. With only one known exception the communists have consistently denied all knowledge of the men and have refused to account for them. In that sole exception the straight-faced Chinese and North Koreans belatedly claimed that a seriously wounded Army captain, who had to have both legs amputated after his capture, "escaped" from their custody.

As recently as two months ago Joseph C. Grew, former Under Secretary of State, reminded the country that "our government has definite proof that these American boys were alive and in communist POW camps after they were captured. For all we know," Mr. Grew continued, "they may still be alive and suffering in communist prisons or slave labor camps."

The 450 men on this U.S. Government list did not disappear without trace. After being captured by the Chinese or North Koreans they were seen by other GIs. Some of them, like Negro Corporal John D. McDonald of Chester, Pa., sent letters home in their own handwriting from the prison camps. Others were mentioned as prisoners-of-war on propaganda broadcasts by the gloating communists who in some cases distributed photographs taken after the men were captured. The Nashville, Tennessee mother of Air Force Major Samuel P. Logan showed me one such picture -p- a clear, unmistakable likeness of her son whom the communists now deny ever having held.

Without the slightest effort the mothers can recite all the details they have laboriously picked up largely on their own: when and where their sons were captured, who saw them in the prison camps or in the North Korean hospitals, who read their names pitifully scratched on the walls of solitary confinement huts, or who on the camp dish-washing details found messages smuggled out of those huts amidst scraps of uneaten food. In one such message, long classified and kept secret by the Pentagon, the prisoner gave his name, rank and serial number and stated that he was "getting the works" from the communist brainwashers during the so-called "germ warfare" campaign.

Apparently the communists never intended to release some of the men. These disappeared from general circulation early in their captivity. But Mrs. E. M. Riddle of Pontiac, Michigan learned that, on the day of repatriation in August, 1953, her son, among other unlucky prisoners, just happened to climb onto one of a number of trucks that, without warning, turned north toward China and the Soviet Union, never to be heard from since. By an equally capricious fate his more fortunate campmates climbed aboard adjacent trucks that headed in the opposite direction for Panmunjom and freedom. A State Department spokesman confirmed this: He told me that only after the massive confusion of repatriation was over did many of the freed captives realize that some of their closest buddies, riding on trucks directly behind them, never crossed the armistice line to Freedom Gate.

Thus the Chinese or North Koreans or Russians could tell all, but won't. On May 5, 1954, nine months after the Korean truce was signed, Washington sent a diplomatic note to Moscow accusing the Russians of having shipped some of the men from Korea to the Soviet Union. As expected, the Kremlin indignantly denied the charge. A Pentagon official gave me one explanation for the tight-lipped stance of the communists. "This," he said, "is a blackmail operation. When we recognize China, perhaps then the communists will render an accounting of the men."

The mothers levy two major charges against the Pentagon. They say that much of the available data on their sons is classified as secret and withheld from them. They also say that the American prisoners-of-war who did come home -- the most likely sources of direct information -- were actively discouraged by their military superiors from contacting the families of the missing men.

When pressed, Pentagon officials admit to withholding data from the men's families. The officially offered justification is that the Government must be extremely careful to make sure that what is given to the relatives is "truly information and not misinformation." This policy has cumulative consequences -- such as the four-year wasting away of one Tulsa, Oklahoma mother from 160 pounds down to 70. She is the mother of Army Capt. Harry D. Moreland, the double amputee mentioned earlier. Not until last May, when a Congressional committee held a hearing, did Mrs. Moreland and her husband learn from a Pentagon witness that the communists had gotten around to admitting the capture of their son. Following this grudging admission the communists added their fantastic claim that, with both legs amputated, the man had "escaped".

In the past five years 450 lonely, resolute mothers have done a quasi-professional detective job of running down leads on the fate of their sons. A few have literally scoured the globe, despite the State Department's reluctance to issue passports to any of them. Mrs. R. H. Shaddick of Coral Gables, Florida and several others have managed to journey to Hong Kong, next door to the communist heartland. All the mothers say that, if Washington would permit them, they would carry the search into China and North Korea itself. Every day they scrutinize English-language newspapers from all corners of the earth. They have corresponded with countless strangers who might conceivably have a little light to shed.

In desperation for information about their sons a few of the mothers have turned to mediums and spiritualists. Others have been in contact with anti-communist undercover agents in Asia -- no doubt at a very steep price. Kept from seeing the files on their sons at the Pentagon, up against the bland "we-know-nothing" replies from the communists, seldom these days finding any promising leads to track down, each of the mothers faces a stark struggle just to keep going.

Some have escaped into insanity. Others I have met are tottering on the brink. Where lies the breaking point for each individual woman? The only reality for all of them today is the return of their sons if alive, conclusive proof of death if dead.

Left alone in the still of night to guess and guess again about the Top-Secret Pentagon files, how long can even the bravest mother and the strongest personality oscillate fitfully between dim sparks of flickering hope and lengthening valleys of black despair?

BOARD OF DIRECTORS
Ernest Angell
Mrs. Katrina McCormick Barnes
Daniel Bell
Mrs. Dorothy Dunbar Bromley
Earl Brown
Ralph S. Brown
Lisle C. Carter, Jr.
Allan Knight Chalmers
Richard S. Childs
William A. Delano
Edward J. Ennis
Morris L. Ernst
John F. Finerty
Osmond K. Fraenkel
Walter Frank
Lewis Galantiere
Walter Gellhorn
Julian E. Goldberg
Louis M. Hacker
August Heckscher
Frank S. Horne
B. W. Huebsch
Mrs. Sophia Yarnall Jacobs
John Jessup
John Paul Jones
Dorothy Kenyon
Saul K. Padover
Elmer Rice
George Soll
Barent Ten Eyck
Norman Thomas
J. Waties Waring
Edward Bennett Williams

NATIONAL COMMITTEE
Chairman
E. B. MacNaughton (Ore.)
Vice-Chairman Emeritus
Bishop Edward L. Parsons (Calif.)
Vice Chairmen
Pearl S. Buck (Penna.)
Prof. Albert Sprague Coolidge (Mass.)
Lloyd K. Garrison (N.Y.)
Dr. Frank P. Graham (U.N.)
Palmer Hoyt (Colo.)
Morris Rubin (Wisc.)
Lillian E. Smith (Ga.)

Sadie Alexander (Penna.)
Thurman Arnold (D.C.)
Bishop James Chamberlain Baker (Calif.)
Roger N. Baldwin (N.Y.)
Alan Barth (D.C.)
Francis Biddle (D.C.)
Dr. Sarah Gibson Blanding (N.Y.)
Catherine Drinker Bowen (Penna.)
Prof. Julian P. Boyd (N.J.)
Van Wyck Brooks (Conn.)
John Mason Brown (N.Y.)
Howard F. Burns (Ohio)
Prof. James R. Caldwell (Calif.)
Dr. Henry Seidel Canby (Conn.)
Prof. Robert K. Carr (N.H.)
Stuart Chase (Conn.)
Grenville Clark (N.H.)
Dr. Rufus E. Clement (Ga.)
Prof. Henry Steele Commager (Mass.)
Morris L. Cooke (Penna.)
Prof. George S. Counts (N.Y.)
Prof. Robert E. Cushman (N.Y.)
Elmer Davis (D.C.)
Prof. J. Frank Dobie (Texas)
Melvyn Douglas (N.Y.)
Rev. Frederick May Eliot (Mass.)
Prof. Thomas H. Eliot (Mo.)
Walter T. Fisher (Ill.)
James Lawrence Fly (Fla.)
Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick (N.Y.)
Prof. Ralph F. Fuchs (D.C.)
Prof. Willard E. Goslin (Tenn.)
Grover C. Hall, Jr. (Ala.)
Prof. Mark DeW. Howe (Mass.)
Quincy Howe (N.Y.)
Dr. Robert M. Hutchins (N.Y.)
Gerald W. Johnson (Md.)
Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson (D.C.)
Dr. Percy L. Julian (Ill.)
James Kerney, Jr. (N.J.)
Benjamin H. Kizer (Wash.)
Dr. John A. Lapp (Ill.)
Prof. Harold D. Lasswell (Conn.)
Mrs. Agnes Brown Leach (N.Y.)
Max Lerner (N.Y.)
Prof. Robert S. Lynd (N.Y.)
John P. Marquand (Mass.)
Prof. Robert Mathews (Ohio)
Dr. Millicent C. McIntosh (N.Y.)
Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn (Calif.)
Dr. Karl Menninger (Kans.)
Harry C. Meserve (N. Y.)
Loren Miller (Calif.)
Donald R. Murphy (Iowa)
Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer (N.J.)
Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam (D.C.)
James G. Patton (Colo.)
A. Philip Randolph (N.Y.)
Elmo Roper (N.Y.)
John Nevin Sayre (N.Y.)
Prof. Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. (Mass.)
Joseph Schlossberg (N.Y.)
Dr. Edward J. Sparling (Ill.)
Prof. George R. Stewart (Calif.)
Mrs. Dorothy Tilly (Ga.)
Prof. Edward C. Tolman (Calif.)
William W. Waymack (Iowa)
Stanley Weigel (Calif.)
William L. White (Kans.)
Aubrey Williams (Ala.)
Dean Benjamin Youngdahl (Mo.)

347

Worthy, Bill

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

170 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.
Founded 1920 ORegon 5-5990 Incorporated

Ernest Angell, Chairman, Board of Directors
Ralph S. Brown, Morris L. Ernst, Dorothy Kenyon, Vice Chairmen
Edward J. Ennis, Osmond K. Fraenkel, Barent Ten Eyck, General Counsel
Katrina McCormick Barnes, Secretary; B. W. Huebsch, Treasurer
John Haynes Holmes, Honorary Board Chairman

Patrick Murphy Malin, Executive Director

Alan Reitman, Assistant Director
Jeffrey E. Fuller, Assistant Director
Louis Joughin, Assistant Director
Margret R. Bloomer, Administrative Assistant
Rowland Watts, Staff Counsel
Irving Ferman, Washington Office Director
Roger N. Baldwin, Adviser, International Work
Marie M. Runyon, Membership Secretary

May 31, 1957

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Bill Worthy suggested that I send you a copy of the memorandum submitted to the Department of State in his passport case. It is enclosed. If you have any questions about the memorandum, please do not hesitate to call.

Sincerely yours,

Alan Reitman

Alan Reitman
Assistant Director

Enclosure

DEPARTMENT OF STATE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

In the Matter of Passport Renewal Application of WILLIAM WORTHY, JR.	APPLICANT'S MEMORANDUM OF LAW AND FACT

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

This memorandum of law and fact is submitted on behalf of WILLIAM WORTHY, JR., the applicant in the within proceeding, pursuant to permission granted by ASHLEY J. NICHOLAS, ESQ., Hearing Officer, Department of State, at the informal passport hearing conducted in this matter on April 29, 1957, in Washington, D. C.

THE FACTS

WILLIAM WORTHY, JR., a newspaper reporter, employed by the Afro-American Newspapers, applied for and was issued United States Passport No. 558363, on March 4th, 1955. Prior to this passport's expiration date on March 4th, 1957, Mr. Worthy applied for a renewal thereof on February 25, 1957, which application was denied by the Department of State (hereinafter referred to as the Department), on March 29, 1957. The denial was contained in a letter to Mr. Worthy signed by Miss Frances G. Knight, the Director of the Passport Office, and indicated that it was based on two grounds, viz.:

1. His travel in Communist China and Hungary in violation of restrictions placed in his passport;

2. The Department's reason to believe that he would not abide by "geographical limitations of general applicability which may be placed in the passport."

It is conceded that Mr. Worthy entered Communist China at Shumchon on December 24, 1956 and departed from that country by air from Peking on February 2, 1957, arriving in Moscow, U.S.S.R., on the next day. He left Moscow on February 6th and arrived in Budapest, Hungary, the following day. He left Hungary on February 8th, arriving back in the United States on February 10th. Prior to his departure from Peking, Mr. Worthy obtained transit visas from the Russian and Czechoslovakian Embassies in the Chinese capital.

His passport (Exhibit A-9) contains no Chinese or Hungarian visas or any writing of any sort attributable to officials of those countries in connection with the visits under scrutiny. In his testimony at the informal hearing, he stated unequivocally that neither Hungary nor Communist China required that he hold a United States passport as a condition of entry. Moreover, the Department did not introduce one shred of evidence to indicate that Mr. Worthy's passport was used or was necessary for such entry. The only testimony in the record relating to the use of the passport in Communist China and Hungary had to do with its exhibition for identification purposes in those countries. It was employed to identify Mr. Worthy to bank cashiers, inquisitive policemen and hotel clerks. In neither Communist China nor Hungary was its production a condition of admission.

Furthermore, Mr. Worthy testified at the hearing that if his passport were renewed he would not use it in violation of any restrictions placed therein. However, he indicated that, if a country in which a United States passport was not valid for travel permitted him to enter without requiring him to have or produce his passport, he would, in peacetime, do so if necessary to fulfil a reportorial assignment.

THE LAW

In addition to the fact that Mr. Worthy does not think that his visits to China and Hungary are violative of any laws or regulation affecting the use of passports, it is his considered opinion that the Secretary of State's refusal to permit American newsmen to travel in those countries, or anywhere else for that matter, is not only arbitrary, unreasonable and unwise, but that it violates two fundamental constitutional concepts, namely, the freedom of the press and the right to travel.

Both of these concepts are inextricably intertwined with the Department's tentative refusal to renew Mr. Worthy's passport. In the first place, as a native-born American citizen, he is being deprived of his right to travel in those countries which required a United States passport as a condition of entry. Since most of the countries of the world require a passport, this, in effect, restricts his travel to a small area of the globe. Secondly, in his capacity as a reporter and, in particular, as a foreign correspondent, he is now unable to visit countries requiring a passport in order to gather and report back to his employer news as it develops in those countries. Thus the Department has effectively curtailed freedom of the press by making it impossible for a foreign correspondent to gather the news from vast areas of the world.

A. The Right To Travel - From Magna Carta to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations, the right to travel has been frequently declared to be a natural right. Most international law authorities (e.g., Grotius) for the last several centuries have spoken of it as guaranteed by the laws of nations. It is claimed by Mr. Worthy that a citizen's right of international locomotion is a constitutional as well as a natural one.

Since 1856, American secretaries of state have insisted that the granting of passports is a matter of absolute discretion for the Executive Branch of the government. Thus, without any expressed delegation of such authority, the State Department has become the supreme arbiter as to whether a person should be permitted to travel abroad for legitimate purposes of his own. The basis for usurping this authority is the Department's position that the issuing of passports is within the exercise of foreign policy.

However, Mr. Worthy does not take the position that the Department's function with respect to the issuance of passports is purely procedural. He concedes that reasonable limitations, under special circumstances, may be imposed. These limitations include:

1. Restriction in time of war to protect the individual or national interest;

2. Restrictions upon fugitives from justice, or those seeking to avoid the jurisdiction of a court; and

3. Restrictions upon persons in such physical or mental condition as to jeoparize the health or safety of persons with whom they come in contact.

But Mr. Worthy does feel that outside of the above situations, the Department is guilty of unconstitutional administrative action when it prevents travel by refusing to issue a passport.

Since 1952 the federal courts have been curtailing the Department's absolute discretion with reference to the issuance of passports. In 1952 the Department was ordered to set forth the reasons for denial and grant a hearing according to announced and clearly defined standards. In subsequent cases it was ordered to produce the grounds for refusal, to make appropriate factual findings against an applicant and to conform to all the requirements of procedural due process. Most recently, the courts have insisted that they have the right to investigate the grounds advanced by the Department for a denial and to overrule it where they feel that the substance of grounds are insufficient to support the denial.

The net result of these cases has been to emphasize that the federal courts are inclined to regard the right to travel abroad as a constitutional right rather than a privilege bestowed upon the citizen in the Department's discretion. In one case, Chief Judge Charles Fahy, of the United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, stated that "the denial of a passport accordingly causes a deprivation of liberty that a citizen otherwise might have" and the Secretary of State may not "in his discretion deprive a citizen of liberty without due process of law." He went on to emphasize that a citizen's "Freedom to leave a country or a hemisphere is as much a part of his liberty as freedom to leave a State." Fifty-five years before, Chief Justice Fuller of the United States Supreme Court had stated:

> "Undoubtedly the right of locomotion, the right to remove from one place to another, according to inclination, is an attribute of personal liberty, and the right, ordinarily, of free transit from and through the territory of any state is a right secured by the Fourteenth Amendment and by other provisions of the Constitution."

It is Mr. Worthy's contention that the Secretary's action has deprived him of this constitutional right to travel, as defined by the courts, and that the Department's refusal to renew his passport is in violation of our democratic concept of freedom of movement.

B. Freedom of the Press - It is also contended by Mr. Worthy that the Department has not, by law, custom or tradition, the right to prohibit accredited press representatives from visiting either friendly or unfriendly countries in peacetime. Firstly, it is felt that such a ban is an administrative invasion of the freedom of press guarantees of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. The courts have consistently held that, even when an absolute power of Congress was involved, it had to yield to the provisions of the First Amendment. It would seem that this should be no less the situation where the Executive Branch is concerned.

The Secretary of State does not seem to understand the breadth of the freedom of the press portion of the First Amendment. In a letter dated April 30, 1957, addressed to Arthur Hayes Sulzberger, the publisher and chairman of the board of The New York Times, reprinted in The New York Times, May 2, 1957, Mr. Dulles stated as follows:

> "You (Sulzberger) suggest that our policy with respect to Americans going to China 'abridges the freedom of the press'. The constitutional 'freedom of the press' relates to publication, and not to the gathering of news." (The underlined portion is the Secretary's emphasis.)

This statement, if true, would amount to a complete perversion of the freedom of the press guarantees of the Constitution. As The New York Post editorialized on May 5, 1957, "In other words, we are free to publish the news provided we do not insist on our rights to get it." According to Mr. Sulzberger (and most, if not all, American newspapers) "I cannot escape the feeling that the administration is abridging the freedom of the press and using the press as an instrument in its diplomacy. I agree that other principles are involved, but in the long view this one seems to me to be fundamental." (Letter, Arthur H. Sulzberger to John Foster Dulles, April 23, 1957; reprinted in The New York Times, May 2, 1957)

Furthermore, not only is Mr. Dulles treading unconcernedly in the sands of unconstitutionality, but he is flying in the face of his own expressed convictions. For example, in his press conference of April 23, 1957, he stated that "The more the American people know the facts about Communist China, the better pleased we are." As Arthur Krock stated on April 25, 1957, in The New York Times:

> "Access to news sources both here and abroad is not a 'privilege' granted through government favor or caprice and thus something to be extended, withdrawn or denied on the same basis. It is the only orderly means by which the people of this Republic can be assured of their right to know in peacetime all that is happening around them."

And it might be added this is precisely what the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they prohibited Congress from making any law "abridging the freedom of the press."

Secondly, the reasons advanced by the State Department for its action in denying Mr. Worthy's application for a renewal of his passport do not merit the denial to the American public of its right to on-the-spot reporting of news developments in Communist China. These reasons (with brief paranthetical rebuttals are, in the main as follows:

1. No peace treaty has ended the Korean War and a quasi state of war still exists, necessitating the continued application of the Trading-With-The-Enemy Act. (The United States was never at war with Communist China and the gathering of legitimate and important news was never encompassed by the Act.)

2. Communist China poses a threat to Formosa. (So does Russia to Pakistan and Egypt to Israel.)

3. There are no United States facilities to protect travelers in Communist China. (The same is true, in a practical sense, in other Iron Curtain countries.)

4. The return of prisoners held by the Chinese would be jeopardized by the presence of American reporters. (This is ridiculous on the face of it and, if Chinese statements are to be believed, would have the opposite effect.)

5. China has violated the Korean Armistice Agreement. (So has Russia the Yalta agreement.)

6. The United States would be yielding to Chinese blackmail. (The purpose of the "blackmail" is to open news sources to American reporters, in other words, to lift the Bamboo Curtain.)

7. American world leadership would be endangered. (Hardly likely.)

8. Communist China's prestige would be enhanced and that of Nationalist China weakened. (An extremely speculative and unrealistic argument.)

9. The entry of newsmen would cause a general influx of Americans into Communist China. (Easily controlled by the State Department as with Egypt, Syria and Israel in the past.)

10. American opposition to Communism would appear to be weakened. (If so, to be logical, we should withdraw permission for travel in Russia and other Iron Curtain countries.)

11. The presence of American reporters might precipitate a war-provoking incident. (Unreasonable speculation.)

12. The Chinese might insist on certain reporters only. (In their original invitation they named twenty-two correspondents but there is no evidence that they would insist only on reporters favorable to China.)

13. The United States does not recognize Communist China. (This has never been used as a reason to bar the press before and is without logical foundation.)

The Secretary of State has emphasized one or more of the above reasons from time to time and it is impossible to ascertain which he considers most important. In his press conference of April 23, 1957, he stressed the fact that he was afraid of a mass demand from Americans, other than newsmen, for permission to travel in China. He overlooked the fact that he has in the past established a dual policy with respect to other countries (such as Israel, Syria and Egypt) by which correspondents were permitted to travel in those nations while the general public was not. Furthermore, American newspaper men have been allowed to visit Russia and other satellite countries for some years.

Mr. Dulles' reasons for refusing to permit American newsmen to travel in Communist China have been condemned by every responsible press facility. Moreover, they have been labeled "nonsensical" by one United States Senator and severely criticized by members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. As Senator Estes Kefauver stated on April 24, 1957, "I am in favor of letting American reporters go to Red China without any limitations. It is better to get our news from there through our own people than from canned information from some Communist bureau. Our people are entitled to know what is going on in Red China." In addition, the United Press reported, on May 13, 1957, that mail received by the Department is running better than three-to-one against its ban on travel by newsmen.

Not only has the Secretary been inconsistent in his reasons for barring newsmen from the Chinese mainland, but he has been equally inconsistent with reference to those who have violated his prohibition. For example, to the best of our knowledge, no action has been taken against Messrs. Edmund Stevens and Philip Harrington, the Look magazine reporter-photographer team, who visited Communist China at the same time as Mr. Worthy. After Mr. Stevens arrived in Moscow, following his visit to China, he was asked by Ambassador Bohlen, on February 6, 1957, to bring his passport to the American Embassy so it could be stamped for return to the United States only. He refused to do so without a hearing and, through his employer, requested one either in Moscow or in Washington. To date, no answer has been received from the Department by either Mr. Stevens or his employer and he is still in Moscow in possession of his unrestricted passport.

Mr. Harrington's passport was renewed at the American Embassy in Stockholm just prior to his visit to Communist China and he is presently back in the United States. At no time, to date, has he received any communication from the State Department with reference to either his trip or his passport.

Furthermore, it is our understanding that Senator George Malone R., Nev.) openly violated the Department's ban against travelling in Bulgaria during the summer of 1955 without any apparent adverse effect.

Thirdly, it is contended that the Department does not have the right to use access to news sources as a license or a privilege which can be extended or withdrawn at its pleasure. The press cannot constitutionally be used as an instrument of foreign policy. To permit it to be so used is to threaten a watering-down of the First Amendment in that the Department could close any foreign source of news in peacetime by a decision that such action would be beneficial even to the most nebulous foreign policy. News coverage cannot be regulated by foreign policy fluctuations without laying the cornerstone for governmental press control, too tragically often in the recent past the first step on the road to tyranny.

On the positive side, there are many cogent arguments in favor of permitting newsmen to enter Communist China and other off-limit countries. Under the present restrictions, American news media must rely on Peking sources, which are usually only propaganda relay stations, or dispatches from foreign reporters who are not particularly concerned with American interests. The Secretary recently recommended the latter as a solution to the problem, a proposal which The New York Herald Tribune classified as "unthinkable". The only other alternative is to rely on State Department news releases unless the press is willing to ignore China completely, Whichever tack is taken, the American public must remain woefully ignorant as to a major area of foreign policy application. As the Writer's Guild of America wired the Senate Foreign Relations Committee some months ago:

> "This act of censorship means that American audiences, if they are to get first-hand reports from China, must get them from writers of other lands. A veil is thrown over China - not by others, but by our own government."

Furthermore, the Chinese Communist and the Soviet world have been given a convenient and an effective propaganda drum to beat, one which they are exploiting to the fullest.

These and many other reasons have been advanced so persistently and so often by the newspapers, the press association and the radio and television networks that repetition here is patently unnecessary. It is sufficient to call the Department's attention to the remarks of speakers at the recent Associated Press and American Newspaper Publishers' Association meeting in New York City last April. William Dwight, the president of the A.N.P.A., in his presidential address on April 24, 1957, summed it up as follows:

"The A.N.P.A. has asked that newspapermen who are American citizens and employed by American publications and news-gathering services to gather and write news or express opinions on facts, be accorded by our government freedom to travel for that purpose in any country in the world with which the United States is not at war. The A.N.P.A. has in mind particularly the granting of the right to go to Red China and report back to the American people. The Bamboo Curtain now hangs by order of our government between us and Red China. Arguments based on the evils of the Peiping regime have been advanced to bolster the decision to keep us from finding out for ourselves what is taking place over there. They should not prevail over the majestic principle of the people's right to know, a precious right inherent in our way of life."

To buttress his weak constitutional position, Mr. Dulles informed his press conference on May 14, 1957, that the United States Supreme Court has not interpreted the First Amendment to give "Newspaper people in exercise of the freedom of the press" the right "to freely travel everywhere." After this press conference, the Department cited four Supreme Court opinions and two by the highest courts of New York and Pennsylvania, respectively, purporting to uphold the Secretary's constitutional views. None of the cited cases is concerned with the question of whether the control of news-gathering as differentiated from the right of publication violates the First Amendment. Near v. Minnesota (283 U.S. 697) involves the constitutionality of a Minnesota statute designed to abate "malicious, scandalous and defamatory" publications. The only issue before the Supreme Court, which held the statute's application to be unconstitutional, was prior restraint on publication. In Pennekamp v. Florida (328 U.S. 331) the conviction of the editor and publisher of a newspaper for contempt because of articles impugning a court's integrity were reversed. In Associated Press v. National Labor Relations Board (301 U.S. 103) the court held that the gathering and dissemination of news by the Associated Press involved interstate commerce and that it was therefore subject to the National Labor Relations Act. In Associated Press v. United States (326 U.S. 1) the Associated Press was held subject to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. The two state cases cited by the Department concerned the right of Pennsylvania courts to prohibit the taking of photographs within forty feet of a courtroom (In re Mack, 386 Pa. 251) and that of a New York court with the consent of the accused to close the courtroom to the press (United Press v. Valente, 281 App. Div. 395). Not a single one of the above-cited cases, relied upon by the Department to support its view that it may control the gathering of news, supports that contention.

Incidentally, the Secretary was asked the following question at the above mentioned news conference:

> "If you can control the sources of news, of what value is the right to publication, since you have nothing to publish? .... Isn't that the classic way to stop the publication of news?"

He answered his questioner by stating that there were "ample ways" of obtaining news from China "without sending American correspondents with American passports into areas where that would involve a conflict with the United States foreign policy." He stated that publishers who desired to obtain news from the Chinese mainland "can send anybody there if they do not have a United States passport." This, he argued, would not violate the spirit of his ban. Furthermore, he again insisted that he was willing to let the "news gathering community" devise a plan for sending a small group of reporters to China on an experimental basis. He justified this experiment on the ground that "there are some cases where a pure logic has to give way before a measure of compromise."

The obvious foolishness of these remarks are readily apparent. If his arguments for refusing to permit American newsmen to enter China had validity, then none should be allowed to do so. If Mr. Dulles is willing to admit some, then it is an admission that the arguments he has offered to sustain his absolute prohibition are without substance.

Furthermore, he seems to feel that permitting newsmen to visit China would be a discrimination in their favor. As Arthur Krock pointed out in his article in The New York Times, on April 25, 1957, newsmen have always enjoyed greater rights than the private citizen to visit areas where news was being made. A reporter's press card has by tradition been honored everywhere, giving him the right to cross police and fire lines and to visit battlefronts. The Secretary recognized this fact of life when he permitted newsmen to visit Egypt, Syria and Israel while closing those countries to other American travelers.

The Secretary of State reiterated at this May 14th press conference his opinion expressed one month earlier that he was now prepared to modify his absolute ban against newsmen travelling in Communist China in favor of a pool of reporters to be sent to that country on an experimental basis. This is a radical departure from the remarks of Robert Murphy, his Deputy-Undersecretary of State, before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 2, 1957, when he stated that no relaxation was possible. This new proposal has been uniformly condemned by the news media but it does indicate an attempt to retreat from an untenable position. Perhaps Mr. Worthy's case, which presents a ready made opportunity to remove the ban completely, will be so used by Mr. Dulles.

WHEREFORE, it is respectfully requested that Mr. Worthy's application for a renewal of his Passport No. 558363 be granted.

WILLIAM M. KUNSTLER
Attorney for William Worthy, Jr.
511 Fifth Avenue
New York 17, N. Y.

ROWLAND WATTS
Of Counsel

NEWS RELEASE

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION, 170 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

E. B. MAC NAUGHTON
Chairman
National Committee

ERNEST ANGELL
Chairman
Board of Directors

EDWARD J. ENNIS
OSMOND K. FRAENKEL
BARENT TEN EYCK
General Counsel

PATRICK MURPHY MALIN
Executive Director

ORegon 5-5990

Alan Reitman, Assistant Director
In Charge of Public Relations

May 31, 1957

FOR RELEASE: TUESDAY A.M. NEWSPAPERS, JUNE 4, 1957

(ADVANCE) NEW YORK, N. Y., June 3.--Secretary of State Dulles' refusal to permit American reporters to travel to unauthorized countries is "arbitrary, unreasonable, and unwise and violates two fundamental constitutional concepts, freedom of the press and the right to travel," newsman William Worthy, Jr. argued today.

Attorneys assigned by the American Civil Liberties Union submitted a memorandum of law and fact to the State Department's Passport Office urging reversal of the Department's refusal to renew Worthy's passport. The Baltimore Afro-American correspondent lost his passport following his travel to Communist China and Hungary last winter, despite the State Department's ban on visits to those countries. He appealed the decision and was given an informal hearing on April 29. The memorandum, prepared by ACLU cooperating attorney William M. Kunstler and ACLU staff counsel Rowland Watts, supplements the oral argument at the hearing. The ACLU has pledged Worthy full legal assistance in challenging the State Department's decision.

Asserting that since 1865 the State Department considered the granting of passports a matter of absolute discretion within the executive branch of government, the memorandum notes that "without any expressed delegation of such authority, the State Department has become the supreme arbiter as to whether a person should be permitted to travel abroad for legitimate purposes." However, the ACLU attorneys argued, since 1952 the federal courts have been curtailing the Department's power and "the net result of these cases has been to emphasize that the federal courts are inclined to regard the right to travel abroad as a consitutional right rather than a privilege bestowed upon the citizen in the Department's discretion."

The Worthy memorandum contends that the State Department's action is an "administrative invasion of the freedom of press guarantees of the Constitution," denies the American public access to news developments about Communist China and improperly uses the press as an instrument of foreign policy.

The memorandum rejects Secretary Dulles' statement that freedom of the press relates only to publication of news, not the gathering of information, expressed on April 30 in a letter to New York Times publisher Arthur Hayes Sulzberger. "This statement, if true," the memorandum asserts, "would amount to a complete perversion of the freedom of the press guarantees of the Constitution."

(more)

Arguing vigorously against the press being used as an instrument of foreign policy, the memorandum said that to permit this is "to threaten a watering down of the First Amendment in that the Department could close any foreign source of news in peacetime by a decision that such action would be beneficial even to the most nebulous foreign policy.

"News coverage cannot be regulated by foreign policy fluctuations without laying the cornerstone for governmental press control, too tragically often in the recent past the first step on the road to tyranny."

On the positive side, the memorandum stated, there are many cogent arguments in favor of permitting newsmen to enter Communist China and other off-limit countries. "Under the present restrictions American news media must rely on Peking sources, which are usually propaganda relay stations, or dispatches from foreign reporters who are not particularly concerned with American interests. The only other alternative is to rely on State Department news releases unless the press is willing to ignore China completely. Whichever tack is taken, the American public must remain woefully ignorant as to a major area of foreign policy application."

Noting Secretary Dulles' statement that he was prepared to modify his absolute position to allow a reporters pool to enter Communist China as an experiment, the memorandum said that while this has been uniformly condemned by the news media it is an attempt to retreat from an untenable position. "Perhaps Mr. Worthy's case, which presents a ready-made opportunity to remove the ban completely, will be so used by Mr. Dulles," the memorandum stated.

# #

WILLIAM WORTHY JR.

210 East 19th Street, New York 3, N. Y.

April 12th, 1956

Dear Ed,

Miss Holder a week ago said she'd put a note on your desk for your return, but I'm writing this because I thought the note might get buried in a pile. What I told her was that I'd be very grateful if you would write a letter of reference to Louis Lyons, curator, Nieman Foundation, Harvard University, Cambridge. Applications and letters of reference are supposed to be in by April 15th, but my guess is that a letter from you a day or two late would be read.

My reasons for applying for a Nieman for next year are no doubt quite ordinary: a felt need to take a year off and evaluate my experience while doing a lot of long-neglected reading and taking a course or two. Besides last year's Moscow trip and coverage of the Bandung conference there was a previous round-the-world trip in 1952 and 1953, winding up with my coverage of the Korean truce signing. By the time that the academic year begins in September I'll also have been over a good bit of Africa.

For your information, my school background is Boston Latin School and Bates College, plus University of Oslo Summer School and a year at a Danish folk school. I majored in sociology.

Over a long period I expect that my main interest will be Africa, and I was indeed glad to hear from John Day (who is also writing a letter of reference) that in his future planning for CBS News he has projected a bureau in southern Africa within the next five years. If lightning strikes and I do wind up at Harvard next fall I may brush up on my French in order to have it as a working tool in Africa in the future.

Tonight I am going up to Boston and, should you wish further info, I'll be at 87 Howland Street, Boston 21 (phone: HIghlands 5-2844) for about a week. I went to see Lyons at Christmas and may see him again in the next few days.

I'll be watching SIN on the 23rd. I've heard you've done a terrific job.

Sincerely,

Bill

87 Howland St.
Boston 21, Mass.

phone: HIghlands 5-2844

December 28, 1955

Mr. Fred Friendly, Producer
See It Now
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Fred Friendly:

After I showed you my visas to South Africa, Kenya and the other countries of Africa I recall your saying that I should see you again about the time that Alexander Kendrick was due back in New York.

I came to my mother's home here in Boston for Christmas and unexpectedly have had to stay longer than I had planned. As of now I expect to be back in New York by Saturday or early Sunday. If by chance you should want to see me before that, I can arrange to leave here earlier.

When I spoke to John Day after you and I had talked, I mentioned what you had said, and he indicated that maybe something vis-a-vis Africa could be worked out jointly since, as he put it, I am now familiar with CBS News operations.

The season's greetings.

Sincerely,

Bill

Bill Worthy

cc: Ed Murrow

210 East 19th Street
New York 3, New York
March 4, 1954

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Yesterday on the telephone Miss Holden told Mr. Peter White that you and Mr. Friendly were discussing my idea concerning repatriated Negro POWs.

Meanwhile, I should like to raise initially another matter, the details of which are largely explained by the enclosed letter to Mrs. Shipley at the State Department. Last summer in Korea Bob Pierpoint and other American correspondents told me that, because of "race discrimination in reverse", I might have a considerably better chance of getting a visa to Red China than would they. Therefore I took the matter up with Alan Winnington (and also once briefly, on the day the truce was signed, with Wilfred Burchett). Now with the Geneva Conference in the offing The Crisis magazine and I are pressing ahead with visa applications to China, Russia and Hungary -- the latter because of the current "Indian summer of freedom" in Budapest.

If Peking, Moscow and Budapest should see fit to let me in, I shall journey to those countries as Crisis correspondent with a special eye out for news of particular interest to Negro Americans. However, because the NAACP is not at present in a position to shoulder my heavy expenses, I shall be obliged to make arrangements with other press, radio and television media for my travel expenditures and remuneration.

Naturally I have no way of predicting the success or failure of my visa applications. I have written critically of world communism, and that fact may weigh more heavily against my chances than the accident of being Negro may count in my favor. In any event, as a long-time admirer of the objectivity of CBS news coverage I thought first of informing you at this stage. You might like to know what at least may be in the wind. In a personal letter this weekend to Alan Winnington at his Peking address I shall remind him of our July conversations at Panmunjom and mention that above all I should now like to interview in Peking the Viet Minh diplomatic mission.

Sincerely yours,

William Worthy

William Worthy

enclosure

17

Worthy

VK

ESKW62.

RECEIVED
APR -4 PM 7:35
C.B.S. TRAFFIC DEPT. N.Y.

WU063 DPR COLLECT

CHICAGO ILL APR 4 517PMC

PRESS CBS INC

NYK

BURKE FOR ED MURROW. MY STATEMENT IN ANSWER TO STATE DEPT TESTIMONY IN WASHINGTON TODAY. AT THIS LATE DATE THE STATE DEPT IS TRYING TO BECLOUD THE ISSUE OF FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT AND FREEDOM OF THE PRESS BY RAISING AN IRRELEVANT MATTER ON WHICH I PUBLICLY TOOK A PRINCIPILED POSITION.

IN 1943 I WAS CLASSIFIED AS A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR. AFTER DISCUSSING THE CASE WITH A. PHILIP RANDOLPH, PRESIDENT OF THE BROTHERHOOD OF SLEEPING CAR PORTERS AND THE LATE WALTER WHITE OF THE NAACP, I REFUSED TO ENTER A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS CAMP BECAUSE THE GOVERNMENT WAS ASSIGNING MEN GEOGRAPHICALLY ON THE GROUNDS OF RACE AND COLOR.

THERE WAS NO REPEAT NO CHARGE OF "DRAFT DODGING" OR EVASION, AND MY STATEMENT OF REFUSAL TO THE GOVERNMENT WAS FULLY PUBLISHED IN THE PRESS, INCLUDING THE BALTIMORE

AFRO-AMERICAN.

RATHER THAN FACE A COURT TEST ON THE RACIAL DISCRIMINATION ISSUE, THE DEPT OF JUSTICE NOLLE PROSSED THE CASE AFTER IT LEARNED THAT I WAS ELIGIBLE FOR A R-F EXEMPTION BECAUSE OF A DUODENAL ULCER. MY MEDICAL RECORDS ARE AVAILABLE AT THE PRATT DIAGNOSTIC CLINIC IN BOSTON AND AT THE EPISCOPAL HOSPITAL IN PHILADELPHIA.

CONTRARY TO TODAY"S TESTIMONY OF ROBERT CARTWRIGHT, ACTING DIRECTOR OF THE STATE DEPT"S BUREAU OF SECURITY AND CONSULAR AFFAIRS, I DID NOT REPEAT NOT SERVE ONE DAY OR ANY LONGER TIME IN JAIL AND I NEVER REPEAT NEVER WENT TO A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS CAMP.

THE RECORDS WERE AVAILABLE TO THE STATE DEPT IN 1951, 1953 AND 1955 WHEN I PREVIOUSLY OBTAINED PASSPORTS WITHOUT DIFFICULTY. IN MARCH 1955, MRS RUTH SHIPLEY, THEN CHIEF OF THE PASSPORT OFFICE, PERSONALLY VALIDATED MY PASSPORT FOR TRAVEL TO THE SOVIET UNION. MY RECORD PRESUMABLY HAD BEEN ESPECIALLY REVIEWED FOR THIS PURPOSE BY THE DEPARTMENT. WHEN I WAS CLEARED FOR PERMANENT PENTAGON ACCREDITATION SEVERAL YEARS AGO FOR VISITING MILITARY INSTALLATIONS IN KOREA AND ELSE-WHERE, I LISTED ALL THE FACTS OF THE CASE. REGARDS

WORTHY

723P..

(THE CRISIS

organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

20 West 40th Street

New York 18, New York)

COPY

March 2, 1954

Mrs. R. B. Shipley, Chief
Passport Division,
Department of State
Washington 25, D.C.

Dear Mrs. Shipley:

On Wednesday, February 24, 1954, from the Hungarian Legation in Washington, Mr. William Worthy Jr. (Passport #416680) spoke by telephone with Mr. Hibbs of the Passport Division. Mr. Worthy informed Mr. Hibbs that on that day he had paid visits to the Russian Embassy and the Hungarian Legation to apply for visas to those countries as a correspondent for The Crisis magazine of New York City. Incidentally, we are also writing the Chinese Foreign Office in Peking in an effort to obtain a visa for Mr. Worthy to visit Communist China.

We are particularly anxious that Mr. Worthy be in the Communist countries, especially China, at the time of the Geneva Conference on Korea and Indo-China.

Last summer Mr. Worthy was our Pentagon-accredited correspondent in Korea and our readers, both white and Negro, were intensely interested in what he had to report. Just now more than ever objective reporting is needed on news from Asia, Africa and Latin America in order to let both white and Negro Americans know what these people are really thinking and feeling. And the 250,000 members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have a keen interest in the views and policies of the Communist governments on colonial problems and issues, and especially the truce in Indo-China and a peace settlement in Korea.

This is why we are seeking for Mr. Worthy the specific endorsement of the Department of State for travel to the Communist countries. For obvious reasons we believe that the United States Government need have no concern for the personal safety of any Negro American traveling in any of the Iron Curtain lands. We also feel certain that a correspondent for The Crisis would be treated with courtesy. I as editor find it difficult to see how the sociological, cultural and political information thus gathered and published would be detrimental to the best interests of the United States.

We should appreciate expeditious removal of the standard restriction now in Mr. Worthy's passport. His passport, renewed a year ago at the American Embassy in Djakarta, Indonesia, is valid until February 16, 1955.

Very respectfully yours,
/s/
James W. Ivy
Editor

JWI:rds

Petr Zenkl
2651 Sixteenth Street, N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

June 26, 1964

Mr. and Mrs. Edward R. Murrow
Glen Arden Farm
Pawling, New York 12564

Dear Friends:

You were so very kind to remember me by your wire at my eightieth birthday. Please accept our sincere thanks and be assured that we too wish you all the good and best success. Particularly of course the fullest possible recovery and the return of former strength which has meant so much for us and also for our efforts to fulfill the aims of our hard exile.

I can add the news that I have finally come to the point of starting systematic work on my memoirs. I am beginning to hope that I shall really complete this work, although the goal of my life endeavors still remains unfinished.

Pavluška and I send our best thoughts.

Cordially,

Petr and Pavla

July 31, 1959

Dear "Epsy":

Many thanks for your cordial note of July 9th. This is merely a note to tell you that I have most regretfully had to decline President Morrill's kind invitation to do the Gideon Seymour Memorial Lecture.

Present plans call for me to be out of the country for most of the coming year, during which time I will try to learn rather than talk.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. E. W. Ziebarth
Dean
University of Minnesota
Minneapolis 14, Minnesota

mcc

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
MINNEAPOLIS 14

DEAN OF THE SUMMER SESSION

July 9, 1959

Personal

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Ed:

I am embarrassed to have delayed writing about your sabbatical until you have actually left the air, but I do hope that this will be a time of rest and genuine relaxation for you after a long period of not only distinguished service, but extreme pressure.

This note has another purpose, however. You will be receiving in a very short time a letter from President J. L. Morrill inviting you to deliver one of the Gideon Seymour Memorial Lectures at the University of Minnesota. Such distinguished people as T. S. Eliot, Walter Lippman, and Scotty Reston have already appeared in the series, and audiences have been among the largest gathered for any lecture series given anywhere in America. It is my hope for personal as well as professional and academic reasons that you will accept President Morrill's invitation when it comes.

Have a fine sabbatical, Ed, and I hope I have the good sense to follow your example and take one eventually!

Most cordially

"Ziebarth"

E. W. Ziebarth
Dean

EWZ:ms

To Leo
How much?
Arthur

EDWARD R. MURROW
485 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N.Y.

December 19, 1958

Dear Arthur

I don't think you have met Petr Zenkl. He was Lord Mayor of Prague before the war. No municipal official in Europe did more in the field of housing, health, and education. He was truly in the tradition of Thomas Masaryk.

I found Zenkl in the Buchenwald concentration camp in 1945. He had spent six years in Nazi concentration camps and had been listed for execution as the American armies approached. He hid in a sewer pipe, and emerged with his spirit unbroken and his faith in democracy unshaken. Zenkl returned to Prague and was Deputy Prime Minister under Benes. When the Communist coup occurred in Czechoslovakia, Zenkl was again arrested and, after many months, managed to escape by the simple process of persuading his Communist guards to go with him. He is one of the few men who have been incarcerated by both the Nazis and the Communists. He now lives in exile in Washington, and is one of the toughest and most gallant men I have ever met.

K.C.
the uncle.

I am asking you for some money for Petr Zenkl - but not for Zenkl personally. His modest needs are provided for, and not a dime of the money will be spent for his maintenance. It will be spent for the following purposes: To aid in the resettlement of the more than four thousand Czechoslovak escapees still in Europe. These are people who managed to make their way across the barrier that separates Czechoslovakia from the free world.

Here 'Tis
Leo

They had to cross through mine-fields and elude the armed guards in the watchtowers, the police dogs and electrically wired fences. Many of them carried only hope as their baggage and the belief that freedom in the West was worth the risk they ran. Many of them have found that being in the free world means a miserable existence in a refugee camp or shack.

Some of the money will be used to encourage the preservation of the Czech language among the children of the Czech exiles and to aid directly in particularly difficult cases of urgent need among the escapees. So far as the language instruction is concerned, please try to imagine yourself in exile from your own country, say in Germany or in France, with your children unable to receive any instruction in English.

I am sending this letter to fifty people. This is an unorthodox appeal. It will not be repeated. And I guarantee that no part of your contribution will be used for "administrative expenses or overhead."

If you are disposed to help in this project, please make your check payable to "The American Fund for Czechoslovak Refugees" and send it to me. You will receive the usual receipt for tax deduction purposes. — $100 —

It is not my practice to write such letters, nor will it become my habit. Thank you for reading this one.

Mr. Arthur Godfrey
49 East 52nd Street
New York 22, New York

gw

Zenkl, Dr Petr

November 25, 1958

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 - 16th Street N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

My dear Petr:

I must apologize to you. This schedule that I am attempting to carry causes me to appear more rude and churlish than I really am.

If you will please tell me when you are next planning to be in New York, I will certainly see to it that we have an opportunity to talk. Friday is not a very good day for me but, aside from that, I will meet your convenience.

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

Petr Zenkl
2651-16th Street,N.W.
Washington D.C.9
November 20,1958

My dear Ed,

For some time now I am trying to arrange an appointment with you through your secretaries, however,without success.I understand fully the pressure under which you are working,and also the fact that even a very short visit means loss of valuable time to you.

However,I desire so sincerely and so urgently to see you and hear you again in person,and not only over the radio or on television,that I have decided to send you this letter.Please be so very kind and let me know,at my Washington address,when it may be possible for you to spare few minutes for me and shall come to New York.

I hape that this time the answer will be a positive one,and I promise not to bother you with my personal worries.

With all my love yours

Petr

AIR MAIL

Zenkl, Peter

May 1, 1957

Dear Peter:

Many thanks for your note of April 20 enclosing your proposal which was put in the Congressional Record by the Honorable Henry Reuss.

If I see an opportunity do do anything with it, you may be sure I shall do so.

Sincerely,

Dr. Peter Zenkl
2651-16th Street, N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

fc

Peter Zenkl
2651-16th Street,N.W.
Washington 9,D.C.
April 20,1957.

My dear Ed:

I am enclosing a proposal of mine,which was put in the Congres sional Record by the Hon.Henry Reuss,April 15th,1957 and I will appreciate if you could give this matter your kind attention.

It would immeasurably support the cause if you would be willing to endorse it by mentioning its importance.

I hope that I shall soon have the opportunity to see you.

Cordially yours,

Peter

Peter Zenkl.

cause there is only one thing in which we are all equal. We are equal in nothing, in appearance, in height and weight, or intellectual attainment, or social background, or wealth. In this alone are we equal, that each one of us is endowed with an immortal spirit within us. That is what Jefferson knew, and that is what no materialist could ever hold. "We hold it self-evident that men are endowed with inalienable rights." No positivist teaching in our secular law schools could subscribe in good conscience to that statement, for the simple reason that his very philosophy of positivism holds there are no such things as inalienable rights, since all rights come from the state and the state if it wishes can take those rights away. And so for the other details you will find in the Constitution, in the first 10 amendments especially because those amendments deal largely with those inalienable rights, give fuller expression and enumeration to them.

Fortunately, there has been some little revival of interest in scholastic philosophy. Some years ago Robert Maynard Hutchins, who may be lamentable for other things, did this job well. He introduced scholastic philosophy almost single-handed at the University of Chicago and created something of a sensation at the campus. The ideas he proposed to his students from Thomas Aquinas and Bellarmine and the other writers caught on like wildfire. The Daily Maroon had nothing in it at all for weeks and months but quotations from the Summa Theologica and from other great scholastic works. He was joined there by Mr. Mortimer Adler. A man named John Wild attended Chicago in those days and he went back to Harvard to teach something that approaches scholasticism. A man named Vetch down at Indiana has been doing something in a limited way.

The lawyers have had second thoughts. When they put the Nazi criminals on trial at Nuremberg, Germany, right after the war, they were faced with this problem: On what basis could they try them? Should they go upon the principle of ex post facto legislation, a principle repudiated in our own Constitution and recognized to be unsound by every good lawyer? If they did not, they had no way to rest their case. It was only then that they came to realize that while there was no international code that Hitler and the others had violated and while the laws of their own country had not prohibited their actions there still remained one law that did forbid their acts and under which those men could be punished, the natural law. This idea was developed first by Zeno and then by Aristotle and brought to the fullness of its perfection by the modern scholastic writers. There is some hope now. The law journals have carried articles about the natural law. We can expect, however, that it will be some time before the positivists die out and scholasticism once more gets a hearing in our State and secular institutions.

Now to return to Walter Lippmann. His great point was this: That unless America is reintroduced through its universities to the public philosophy, the very heritage by which we live will be lost. Because once a people gets away from the essential philosophy that lies behind its fundamental documents, then though those documents may remain in force, and the words may still be there on the paper, but the spirit will no longer be in the hearts of the people. Then it is only a question of time until the very vital lesson, the very living idea would be lost completely. Why hasn't it been lost before? We can attribute it to two great factors, one the inherent good sense of Americans and the fact that these basic documents have been taught as compulsory in our grammar and our high schools for so long. Every youngster has read the Declaration, every youngster has read the Bill of Rights, and they speak so forcefully, so nobly of the things that men believe in that boys and girls in our schools could not help but be impressed. The second factor that has saved us, and here is the point of pride for us, is our Catholic high schools and universities. Year after year, in their quiet way they turn out men and women imbued with the philosophy that inspired the Declaration and the Constitution, men and women, who still keep alive the public philosophy in their minds and hearts. Some of them may not understand it too well perhaps, we know that; some of them flunked their exams in it once in a while. Nevertheless they were exposed to it and are convinced of it.

What is the hope for the future? Very briefly, this country is waking up to Catholic scholarship. This country is waking up in the philosophy departments, at least in some areas, to the possibility of introducing and teaching a scholastic philosophy. Yale had Father Courtney Murray teaching there a year or two ago. Pennsylvania has invited Father Paul Henri, who is teaching now at Iowa. Perhaps in time we will see that kind of thing everywhere, though there is still great prejudice. Philosophers have their prejudices just as well as religious people, and no positivist wants to see a scholastic philosopher teaching in the same institution with him, because he knows well that within a year or two he is going to have to look for another job. You can't fool the kids. Just as two men down at the University of Chicago set the whole institution on its ear because they brought to the place the "public philosophy" for the first time, so these people know very well that as this philosophy is introduced into their colleges they are either going to have to learn it themselves and teach it or they are going to have to get out. There is where the prejudice chiefly lies. It is another cause to pray for.

Help Keep Alive the Spirit of Freedom in Eastern and Central Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 5, 1957

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, an excellent way for the United States to help keep alive the spirit of freedom in the enslaved countries of Eastern and Central Europe would be to assist the democratic patriots of these lands to publish their writings in their own national languages.

At present the exiles from the satellite nations have little opportunity to publish their works in their native tongues. And there is almost no possibility for the underground opponents of Soviet oppression and Communist dictatorship to have their manuscripts printed after they have been smuggled through the Iron Curtain.

Yet the importance of an active cultural output by writers and poets dedicated to national independence and democracy cannot be underestimated. From the author's pen can come—as at the time when our own land became a free nation—the words which will keep alive devotion to liberty, confidence in a common cause, and consciousness of a national destiny. Both those who are refugees and those still enslaved, whom these words will certainly sooner or later reach, will receive new inspiration and feel new pride in their country.

The Soviet Union knows well the significance of a nation's cultural life in keeping alive the spirit of resistance. A massive campaign has long been underway in the satellite countries to destroy independent culture and thus to produce a new generation unacquainted with its own cultural heritage and out of touch with any of the current writing and thinking of its democratic leaders in exile.

The case for a United States publications assistance program has been well presented by one of Czechoslovakia's most distinguished patriots, Dr. Peter Zenkl. Dr. Zenkl—three times lord mayor of Prague, and one of the stanchest anti-Nazi and anti-Communist democrats in Czechoslovakia before and after World War II—now honors the United States by his residence here. As Edward R. Murrow recently said: "Technically, I presume Dr. Zenkl is now classified as a refugee. But he will be at home wherever freedom flourishes and men are prepared to fight for it."

I am glad to present below a memorandum in which Dr. Zenkl expands on these ideas and on other proposals for preserving and strengthening the cultural vitality of the Eastern and Central European nations. Some of these proposals might appropriately be carried out by Government, others by our great foundations or other private organizations. Certainly Dr. Zenkl's thesis deserves careful attention by all of those who are concerned about the ultimate liberation of these captive peoples.

Dr. Zenkl's article follows:

Modern historiography stresses more and more the study of individual cultures and civilizations in contrast to the old historiography which primarily described the political, economic, and social situation (of different countries). According to the opinion of modern historians, the vital force of nations is not their momentary political power or economic prosperity, but their spiritual reaction to the challenge of the cultural world around.

The correctness of this modern conception can be convincingly demonstrated on the history of the central European nations. In their case—more than in the case of any other nation—the cultural and moral collapse always preceded the political downfall and the loss of freedom and, conversely, the cultural boom was always foreshadowing the coming of political freedom. The cultural workers and genii of these nations—such as Mickiewicz, Smetana, or Petofi—were political heroes and forebears of national freedom in the noblest sense of the word. Even the latest events in the countries behind the Iron Curtain demonstrated that the first flames of the political liberation—or of the fight for the liberation—originate frequently just among the cultural workers, among the writers, and the students.

It is one of the seeming paradoxes of Marxism, which has been perfected by the technique of Soviet imperialism and colonialism, that it attacks most violently and bitterly the intellectuals and the culture in general, in spite of the theoretical claim that the cultural activities are only a reflection and consequence of the economic situation or the status of productivity. I repeat that it is only a seeming paradox, because in the Lenin-Stalinist Marxism every detail is weighed very thoroughly: Marxism has to declare in theory that the whole culture is a matter of secondary importance in order to lead away the interest of the nations from the cultural activities, in order to break the ties of cultural cooperation among the members of the cultural and political community so that they would become an easier prey and victim of the imperialistic intentions of the Soviet dictators.

It is a well known fact that the highly cultivated (cultural) nations of Central and Eastern Europe—the nations between the great nations of Russia and Germany—are exposed after the inhuman and devastating 5 years of Nazi occupation to another 9 to 15 years of the most brutal and cruel oppression of their 1,000-year culture which gave so many noble products at all times to Europe and to mankind. Communism, by using a sheer physical force, forbids all kinds of free cultural expression in order to cram into this forcefully created vacuum its own cultural monstrosities. In Central Europe, the Communists burned the books of scientific nature and belles lettres; they plundered the public and private libraries; they stopped the cultural influx from the West; they destroyed the excellent literary and scientific publications, the societies and the museums; they corrupted the cultural upbringing of the children, youth and adults from the nursery schools up to the world-famous universities; they occupied and monopolized the theater, the film production, the broadcasting and television; they even transcribed and changed the whole history of these nations in such a way that they disrupted the centuries old hierarchy of national values and brought in to this once so promising cultural world only lies and chaos. We wish to mention as a little example that one single state-operated publishing house in Czechoslovakia (there is no private publishing enterprise in Czechoslovakia), Artia, published during the last 5 years about 5 million Communist books in different languages which were used to flood other countries with Communist propaganda. During the first 9 months of the year of 1955, Soviet Union imported in tiny Albania 100,000 books and countless numbers of newspapers and magazines.

The purpose of this Communist large-scale effort of the worst kind is not only the interruption of all cultural ties of the satellite nations with the West, but also destruction of their own national tradition. A nation without the roots can be easily subjugated by the Communist doctrine of the so-called historical materialism.

HOW DOES THE FREE WORLD REACT ON THIS CULTURAL OFFENSIVE OF THE SOVIETS?

The free world fights in many ways the political and economic advances of communism. The free world also does a great work on the human side of this problem by giving the possibilities of a new life to many refugees from these countries. But we have to state with regrets that nothing, or almost nothing, is being done in order to preserve the individual cultures of these countries. The Soviet offensive meets with an easy success, because there is no defense. Its rich arsenals as well as new sources had been destroyed by the barbarian Communists. And so the totalitarian occupation of these countries—first the Nazi occupation and now the Communist occupation—aimed primarily at the destruction of all the cultural treasures of the occupied nations in order to have free elbow room for its own activities and in order to be able to conquer the souls of the capitive peoples and to deepen the abyss between them and the West by the mass production of totalitarian culture. In the Communist-occupied countries the Muses are sadly silent. It is certain that many an invincible member of this Nation creates in secrecy, but his products are locked in the bottom of a drawer. They must not be known to the public, because the authors would be thrown in jail. On the other hand, there are many cultural workers from the occupied nations living in exile, and they may indeed enrich by their work in their own language the cultural riches of their own nations, but they are also forced to hide their writings in the bottom of the drawers, because these works cannot be published abroad. It is quite impossible for them to cultivate on a limited basis the free creative forces of their nations which should serve as a bridge between the rich, free past, and the promising creative activities in the future. And so it happens that these rich cultural sources rest unused to the loss of all.

This tragic interruption of the free cultural development of the satellite European nations, this complete interruption of the thousand-year western tradition in the countries situated between the Black Sea, the Adriatic Sea and the Baltic Sea, this interruption will be a shameful spot on the history of the Free World which is losing in this way not a small and unimportant element of its own strength.

It would be a great merit of the United States of it would grasp this problem in its full meaning and if it would help to save the desperate efforts of a considerable number of the Central and East European cultural workers now living in exile. It is rather obvious to me that this kind of help would bring the most beautiful harvest to America and at the same time it would win for the United States a deeper and more permanent gratitude than can be expected in the field of economic or political help. For in this field, that is, in the field of economics, the temporary products only are of concern, but in the field of culture the products are almost of eternal value. Only a tiny fragment of the economic or political subsidy would be needed to save the cultural life itself of these nations. After all, even many Americans derive benefits from the creations of these cultures. It would certainly be an outstanding merit of the young United States of America would render help to the old cultures of the occupied nations in these difficult times.

This proposal is not concerned with any kind of propaganda, not even in the best sense of the word. It does not follow any political goals, either, even if the realization of this proposal would be of highly political nature. The meaning of this proposal is as follows:

1. To make possible the publishing of belles lettres and of the scientific literature of numerous writers from behind the Iron Curtain living in exile, and to publish these writings in the mother tongue of individual nations. These authors, who had great possibilities to publish their works in their homelands, were deprived of this privilege by their anti-Communist demonstration. They have a certain possibility to publish in the language of the country where they live as exiles, but they have no opportunity to publish in their national language. Many people in the free world are able to read the literature in the languages of the satellite countries, and if no worthwhile literature will be published in exile, these people will turn to the books published behind the Iron Curtain, and it certainly would not serve the interest of the free world. After all, the books published in exile will get, sooner or later, legally or illegally, into the countries behind the Iron Curtain, where they are awaited with great anticipation, as we have learned in the most authoritative way.

2. There is also a need to publish belles lettres and scientific books smuggled out from the satellite countries by the authors—anonymously, of course—so that all valuable writings from these countries would not be doomed to decay in the drawers, but that they would become a new source of strength for a new and better thinking.

3. Another problem is the translating of the prominent books of the western literatures into the languages of the occupied nations, so that they would be ready when the cultural Iron Curtain will be torn down. These translations would be readily available for publishing in these countries in order to speed up the desirable cultural contact of these nations with the contemporary western civilization.

4. And it is also desirable that the prominent essays, scientific treatises and belles lettres of these countries were translated into the great western languages, so that the free world would get acquainted with the thinking and the desires of the peoples behind the Iron Curtain and thus to gain knowledge about them. As of now, this knowledge is rather limited in the West.

5. There is also a need for the publishing of the new literary and scientific publications in the national tongues of the exiles, and for the support of the existing publications. They have to struggle with financial and other problems, which cannot be overcome without the outside help that would enable them to compete in quality, print, and general appearance with the richly decorated Communist publications.

6. This kind of aid should not be limited only to the literary arts, but it should be analogously extended to the other branches of cultural activities such as music, painting, sculpture, architecture, film industry, theater, ballet, etc.

President Nasser's Resentment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 9, 1957

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of our colleagues the following editorial which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of April 1, 1957:

PRESIDENT NASSER'S RESENTMENT

President Nasser's point of view, as expressed to a group of American newspapermen in Cairo, is discouraging. This is not because of his negative position on current issues. That is well known. But his patent resentment at the United States, and the reasons he gives for it, offer very little hope of working out a reasonable modus vivendi in the Middle East.

The Egyptian leader harks back to the brusque withdrawal of proferred American aid to the Aswan Dam project—which is understandable. He also charges that the United States is now taking Israel's side without one word about the rights of the refugees. But he completely overlooks the fact that the United States did offer to help build the Aswan Dam and that there would now be no question about Israel's rights in the Gulf of Aqaba and the Suez Canal if Israel, Great Britain, and France had not, under strong urging from Washington, pulled their troops out of Port Said and Sharm el Sheikh. In other words, President Nasser's question to the United States is (as the old joke has it): "What have you done for me lately?"

The United States has made errors in its dealings with Egypt. It has been dilatory when speed was called for (notably at the time of the Egyptian arms deal with the Communist bloc) and too hasty when suavity would have been in order—as in the Aswan Dam decision. But it has never been moti-

PER VLIEGTUIG
PAR AVION

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Ave
New York City
USA

Ern. Thill, Bruxelles, n° 237

STEN

Antwerpen Koningin Astridplaats en Middenstatie.
Anvers Place Reine Astrid et Gare Centrale.

My dear Ed,

Sincere greetings from Europe.

It brings me back many memories and makes me feel more homesick than ever. Cordially yours

Peter

Bunkl

Zenkl, Petr

March 21, 1957

Mr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16th St., NW
Washington 9, D. C.

Dear Mr. Zenkl:

I am afraid that I have reached the end of the road. Under date of March 18 I have a letter from the Ford Foundation saying they "have not been able to get anywhere" with the suggestions I made about your situation. This exhausts my ideas. Have you any notions about what might be done? I confess that I am deeply disappointed in this outcome, for I thought certainly there would be some affirmative response from some one of the many organizations I got in touch with.

Please tell me what if anything I can do now.

Best regards,

W. H. Ferry

cc: Edward R. Murrow

Zenkl

The following is from Dr. Zenkl

I must bother you once more. As you know, I was approached as to whether I were willing to appear on television in the program, THIS IS YOUR LIFE. I thanked them for this offer and I refused to do it as I was advised by you. Now I have some information from Mr. Papanek, former Czechoslovakian representative to the UN and the President of the American Fund for the Czech Refugees; and I got a letter from Mr. Ballaint, a good friend of Jan Masaryk. They informed me that the TV program was not meant for my personal benefit, but for the benefit of the Democratic Czech Exiles and I would be only a representative of the Czech Exiles and the show would end with an appeal: "Please help the Czech Exiles through the American Fund for Czech Refugees." The question I was asked was could you personally refuse a helping hand to the American Fund for Czech Refugees. I was informed that they are willing to do it with me but they are not willing to do it with somebody else. Here is my question: Could I refuse it now when it is not at all for my benefit, but for Exiled children and culture, etc I would like you to give me your advice on the matter. Could you write me a letter, or phone me.

In view of circumstances should accept

CLASS OF SERVICE

This is a fast message unless its deferred character is indicated by the proper symbol.

WESTERN UNION

TELEGRAM

W. P. MARSHALL, PRESIDENT

1201

SYMBOLS

DL = Day Letter

NL = Night Letter

LT = International Letter Telegram

The filing time shown in the date line on domestic telegrams is STANDARD TIME at point of origin. Time of receipt is STANDARD TIME at point of destination

C124CC 8R DH NL

NEWYORK NY JUL 14 1956

REBECCA HOLDER SCRETARY TO MR MURROW

WUX CBS NYK (DELIVER)

YOUR TELEGRAM JUL 13 #35 TO DR PETER ZENKL 2651

15 ST NORTHWEST WASHINGTON DC IS UNDELIVERED NOW

REPORTED ADDRESSEE GONE TO NEW YORK.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO
SERVICE BUREAU WORTH 27300

945P

THE COMPANY WILL APPRECIATE SUGGESTIONS FROM ITS PATRONS CONCERNING ITS SERVICE

CLASS OF SERVICE

This is a fast message unless its deferred character is indicated by the proper symbol.

WESTERN UNION

TELEGRAM

W. P. MARSHALL, PRESIDENT

1956 JUL 14 AM 8 28

1201

SYMBOLS

DL = Day Letter

NL = Night Letter

LT = International Letter Telegram

The filing time shown in the date line on domestic telegrams is STANDARD TIME at point of origin. Time of receipt is STANDARD TIME at point of destination

(05)=

NA005 DH= NEWYORK NY JUL 14=

REBECCA HOLDER SECRETARY TO MR MURROS=

NET WORKS OPERATIONS 21ST FLR = (DELR)=

YOUR TELEGRAM JUL 13 DR PETR ZENKL 2651 15TH STREET NORTH WASHINGTON DC IS UNDELIVERED UNKNOWN TRIED 2651 16 ST NORTHWEST NOT AT HOME=

WESTERN UNION SERVICE BUREAU=

THE COMPANY WILL APPRECIATE SUGGESTIONS FROM ITS PATRONS CONCERNING ITS SERVICE

JULY 13, 1956

DR. PETR ZENKL
2651 16 STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C.

MR. MURROW SAYS DUE TO THE CIRCUMSTANCES HE THINKS YOU SHOULD ACCEPT TO APPEAR ON THE TELEVISION PROGRAM.

REBECCA HOLDER
SECRETARY TO MR. MURROW

414-43

Zenkl

2651- 16th St. NW.
Washington, D.C.

Edward R. Murrow
C B S, New York

Dear Ed:

As I did not find you at your office last week I spoke with your secretary who called my attention to the fact that the galley proof of Brackett Lewis' manuscript has been mislaid. I am sending you another, therefore, and am including also the foreword written by Prof. James T. Shotwell introducing my work on Thomas G. Masaryk.

I am very grateful to you for complying with my request to write a preface and am looking forward to your MS.

Hoping to see you soon,

I am

Yours,

Peter

Peter Zenkl

Zenkl, Petr

MARCH 7, 1956

DR. PETR ZENKL
2651 16th STREET, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C.

REGRET EXCEEDINGLY CANNOT MEET WITH YOU
ANY OF THE DAYS YOU WILL BE IN NEW YORK
DUE TO UPCOMING SEE IT NOW PROGRAM STOP
LET ME KNOW WHEN YOU'LL BE HERE AGAIN
AND PERHAPS WE CAN GET TOGETHER THEN.
BEST REGARDS.

ED MURROW

414-43

2651- 16th St. N.W.
Washington, D.C.
March 2, 1956

Dear Ed:

I beg you to read this letter when you can spare ten minutes of your precious time to think it over. I am writing today to you as a last resource as there is no one else to whom I could turn.

First of all, I am enclosing Brackett Lewis' booklet with your foreword which I treasure. If you think I should send the brochure to certain people, please give me their address.

As I see, my idea has not been received favorably in high places and yet I feel that it would be the best answer and counter-move to Moscow's economic assistance to Burma and similar moves if the United States were to propose to the international forum total or at least partial disarmament under international control on condition that a good part of the money saved be used in helping to build up the countries that choose the democratic order and are in need of assistance, and if the United States were to stress their willingness convincingly and clearly.

I see no other way but to launch a crusade for freedom and democracy, but not under wornout vague slogans. It would have to be stated specifically what the new anti-communist social order is to be like; what the basic living minimum and the working, economic, cultural conditions of the individual are to be, naturally without bloodshed, revolution, brutal force but by a revolution of the mind and heart. Such a clear declaration would resurrect the faith of millions of those already oppressed and also of those in danger. It would slow down Soviet consolidation, making the captive nations even less reliable than hitherto. Have you any idea, dear friend, to whom this idea could be presented for consideration?

I am enclosing the text of two of my recent speeches, should you have time to glance at them.

Now for my personal problem. In view of existing conditions it has become exceedingly difficult for me to accept the $400 monthly stipend. Despite all my efforts on all sides (Social Security, public education, municipal administration, selling insurance and encyclopedia Britannica, hotel administration) , it has been impossible for me to find a way of earning my livelihood. Are there any sources which you could suggest that would be acceptable from the human standpoint, for instance Dupont, Nelson Rockefeller etc? As you know, it is not easy for me to write these lines. I want to continue working for freedom and democracy for my people and others, but I can do so only if I am free in spirit and unbowed. Perhaps a way could be found so that the amount given me would be deductible from the donor's income tax.

can't see him

If I were not assigned a specific task for the monetary compensation by the donor, I would devote all my time, as hitherto, to fight communism in my lectures and writing, to work for democracy, and to give all the results of my labor to the donor for his use.

2 And lastly: I have an idea which you will find explained in the enclosure. While I realize that prayer is no fitting substitute for a return of freedom and human dignity, it would, nevertheless, give renewed hope and a feeling that the people are not alone and that, in itself, is something.

If you think well of the idea, the next move is to find someone to present and plead for the idea at the proper sources, and secondly, to present the idea to the various churches so that the campaign would not be limited to one faith, or to one language, or to one nation alone. It is not to be a prayer of the captive peoples alone, but of all peoples threatened with the loss of freedom.

If you think the idea has any merit, dear friend, would you, yourself, sponsor it? Please give it some thought.

I shall be in New York on March 12, 13, and 14 and would welcome the opportunity of seeing you. May I ask you to let me know by letter whether and when I could see you?

fu Gratelly yours,

for your kindness and forbearance,

Peter

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Ave.
New York City

People behind the iron curtain picking up leaflets from balloons, passing them on, spreading information, or listening and repeating foreign broadcasts are subject to persecution. If copies or notes of the foreign broadcasts or balloon leaflets are discovered on their person or in their home, the victims are severely punished. They cannot approach other non-Communists, except for a few closest friends, to share their ideas and hopes. They cannot give even a hint by any visibl sign that they reject communism, that they are loyal to democracy and yearn for freedom. Thus they often feel cruelly isolated, forsaken, an forgotten.

There are moments in everyone's life when even the strong of heart need to be reassured tht they are not alone. They desperately need to know that there are millions feeling as they do, all around them, and that together with those in other lands there are hundreds of millions them, a tremendous family beyond all bounds. Although they cannot join outwardly in any open manifestation, like joining hands in a visible circle, they can, nevertheless, form an endless invisible chain.

A silent prayer could be the chain joining them all in spirit, giving them strength not only in words, but in the knowledge that millions of people in various lands and in various tongues, yes, even of various religions and races, are saying the same prayer.

Such a prayer could be put into words since all religions preach the same moral truth, freedom of man as against slavery, love of one's fellow man instead of hatred. For this reason it is quite possible to agree on the words of a prayer for those who believe in God, in human dignity, human rights, and freedom.

The prayer would then be made known to the whole world through all channels, by the churches, press, radio, leaflets etc. For a long time it would be repeated constantly until it entered the life stream of the countries concerned.

I realize that it would take time and careful study to choose the words for a prayer for all. It would then be translated into many foreign languages and would have to be clear, concise, very expressive, and very short (no longer than the Lord's Prayer or the prayer of St. Francis of Assissi). In order to be forceful it would have to be restricted to the main thought so that it could be memorized easily and its meaning clearly understood. It would have to be a prayer of universal appeal.

Our Father who art in heaven,
Hallowed be Thy name,
Thy kingdom come,
Thy will be done
On earth as it is in heaven
Give us this day our daily bread and Forgive us our trespasses
As we forgive those who trespass against us
And lead us not into temptation,
But deliver us from evil
For Thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

Suggestion

Our Father, Hear us who seek you to give us strength in the great struggle of good against evil, of freedom against slavery. Comfort us and help us, your children, all, in many lands and speaking many tongues, who know not one another, but have one heart, one great desire to be free! Save our hearts and souls from slavery! Let us not weaken on our road to freedom! See, Oh Lord, our humiliation. We speak not aloud, yet you hear the voice of our conscience. Dry our tears, and lead us to freedom. Let good triumph over evil! [Our Father, hear the prayer of millions, all over the world!]

1)

A TWICE CRUCIFIED DEMOCRACY WARNS THE FREE WORLD

Address by Peter Zenkl to the American Legion

Washington, D.C., February 2, 1956

There is a country in Central Europe, twice crucified, my country. Once a democracy, enslaved Czechoslovakia now sounds a warning to the free world.

Czechoslovakia has a long record of struggle for human and national freedom. In 1918, after centuries of enslavement, Czechoslovakia at last became a free state again. While it was Thomas G. Masaryk, a great democrat, who led the Czechs and Slovaks to freedom ~~to become their first president,~~ it was your great President Woodrow Wilson who played a decisive role.

In the twenty years of her existence between the two world wars, Czechoslovakia was an island of peace and order, of social justice and Western democracy amidst European chaos. Today this Republic is a Soviet colony.

I speak today as one of the humble disciples and co-workers of Thomas Masaryk, who was not only a teacher but a living embodiment of democracy put to practice. What I have to say today is not from books but from experience for which I had to pay a heavy price. First of all, it was the Nazi occupation, six years of it, which I spent as prisoner in Germany. No sooner had Hitler, a scourge as great as the Huns or Avars, made war on Europe, I was thrown into a concentration camp. The whole six years was a dreadful struggle for survival against two enemies, my Nazi jailers and my Communist co-prisoners. As the war was finally coming to an end and the victorious American army was advancing toward Buchenwald, the Nazi director decided it was necessary to squelch any possible revolt of the thousands of prisoners since it would have placed him and his men in a precarious vise between General Patton's liberating army and the rioting prisoners. He therefore ~~selected~~ singled out 46 prisoners for executio as a warning. I was one of them. I saved myself only by ammiracle. It is a horrible story about what went on the last six days and nights in the Nazi concentration camp.

Upon returning home after six years' imprisonment, I had another great struggle on my hands. The Communists, using the basest tricks, tried to outmaneuver me from the office of Lord Mayor of Prague and any vantage position I held and to block every effort of mine on behalf of my country, as I tried with all my might to thwart their plans to subjugate my country. The Communists resorted to a plot to remove me forcibly. Two other Cabinet ministers and I received packages with time-bombs. This plot was discovered in the nick of time. Finally, the Communists seized the government by force and I had to flee for my life. I managed to escape across the border with my wife and your country has given me asylum. Eight years of exile have already passed. Have you any idea how much longing and sadness there is for an exile?

Once again I am far removed from my people but I feel that as long as I live I must never leave the battlefield wherever freedom a thousand years and that it is to Europe's advantage to re-establish it as a free state. Wilson has been criticized for helping our nation to be free and for breaking-up the Austro-Hungarian empire, which, in the eyes of many, was thought to be a political blunder. Why, may I ask? Because so called little Czechoslovakia alone could not stand up to Hitler or to Moscow? Tell me, would anyone else have resisted with better success? And had there been no Czechoslovakia, would not the West have sacrificed someone else to the insatiable totalitarian powers?

Czechoslovakia was crucified for the first time at Munich in 1938, at the altar of peace in Europe like a sacrificial lamb to Hitler, when he assured the world it was his last demand. Czechoslovakia's sacrifice was in vain, except that it gave the West one precious year for arming.

The second time Czechoslovakia was crucified was in February 1948 at a time when the West, including America, was at its lowest ebb in military power having disarmed and demobilized its soldiers, and when re-arming against the Communists had barely begun to take shape on paper. It was not until after Communist destruction of Czechoslovak democracy that the Marshall Plan for Europe was rushed through; that the Americans intervened in Greece; ~~the Communist crusade that Truman's doctrine~~ that attempts were made to create a European political community, an Atlantic defense pact known as NATO. The twice crucified Czechoslovakia Republic once again has served the free world. By their firm resistance the captured peoples, together with the other subjugated nations of Central Europe, have given the free world badly needed time in which to arm and line up its forces. It is often said that the Russian drive westward to the Atlantic Ocean was stopped by the atomic bomb. While I do not wish to underestimate its importance in the slightest, I raise the question: Why didn't it prevent the Russians from communizing China? - and the Communists from attacking Korea? Why didn't it prevent the war in Indo-China? These events illustrate the point that the theory that American possession of the bomb has saved Western Europe is only partly true. One day future historians may discover in Bolshevik archives that Moscow nad needed time to undermine the resistance and to assimilate the brave nations of Central Europe before launching new adventures.

It is only natural for everyone to think his affairs are most important and it is difficult to foresee what political event of our times will be adjudged the decisive one. In my opinion, we cannot go wrong if we rate the ten years since World War II as the decade in which colonialism played the leading role; paradoxically, it is going in two diverse directions at the same time. On the one side, the free world is witnessing the last stage of old colonialism and the freeing of ~~xxxxxxx~~ even the retarded ~~xxxx~~ nations. In the past decade hundreds of millions on this side of the Iron Curtain have become independent and free, for instance India, Pakhistan, the Philippines, Indonesia, a number of Arab states, formerly mandates or colonies. But behind the Iron Curtain we see the exact opposite is taking place: once free and famous nations are being enslaved by Russia: Estonia, Lithuania, Latvia, Rumania, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Albania, China, North Korea, part of Indo-China, East Germany have become colonies in the worst sense. Do you see the two opposite trends? Do you see the colonialism that is taking over and where Do you not feel the tension created by the two trends, the two conflicting powers? On our side is freedom but also ~~diversification; on the other~~ dismemberment.

side, strong and concentrated strength; on our side is the decline of the great colonial powers, England and France; on the other, there is under way the greatest empire of all times.

This tragic tension is often known as the "cold war." I personally do not like to hear it called that because it seems to minimize and belittle the tremendous political problem. I do not like the name because one is apt to speak of reducing or stepping up the cold war, depending on whether Khrushchev smiles or not, or whether or not a few poor prisoners are sent home from Communist China. As a member of a nation that knows what communism means, I beseech you not to take this view, not tofall for carefully planted Soviet propaganda which knows when to smile or frown, when to pay indemnity for a shot-down American plane or when to shoot down another. The Soviets know only too well what is at stake in this world struggle betwen good and evil.

For the Czechoslovaks, the outcome of the second Geneva conference came as no surprise. Communists smile and promise only in vague terms and on general issues. They are capable of repeating endlessly and of promising disarmament until one mentions the word "control." They are willing to discuss lifting the Iron Curtain but what they have in mind is an open door to the West for their spies and a flow of strategic material from the West. Of course they are for a united Germany, Korea, Indo-China provided the Soviets can take over the whole country. It was clear to us from the beginning that the Communists can never permit free elections in East Germany for they would lose the elections. They know this to be true of anyelections in Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, beyond any doubt. To ask them to permit elections is to ask that they turn democrats. One might as well ask the elephant to fly and the hyena to live on candy.

And yet we must keep on asking for free elections. It is a mistake, however, to think that the Soviets will give up voluntarily anything they have seized by force. The Soviets were the ones to gain by the treaties of Teheran, Yalta and Potsdam; they gained at Geneva too. It is possible to wrench the captives from them not by a world war - which obviously no one wants - but by a revolution, one that would take place in a number of captive nations. Such revolutions would not bring on a world war; in fact, they might prevent war by lessening the terrible tension between the two diametrically opposed forces that might otherwise eventually lead to a world conflict, despite the fact that no one wants war.

Soviet aggression has been arrested for a time in Europe but is pushing forward in Asia. World statesmen are now concerned with the problem how to stop further Soviet expansion. In my opinion - and I say this in all humility- it is a mistake to leave the European problems, that of liberating the European nations, somewhere in the rear. Why leave the decision always to the enemy where the next blow is to fall? Is not the fact that Soviet expansion has stopped in Europe an admission that the U.S.S.R. is not as strong there as in Asia? Is it not, therefore, the very moment the West ought to launch a European offensive?

I venture to say that without the highly devellped industries of Czechoslovakia, Poland, and East Germany the Soviets could never take on any new adventure in the conquest of Asia, either militarily as in Korea and Indo-China, or by means of so called economic assistance, such as they are planning now. I claim there is a direct tie-in between the enslavement of Czechoslovakia and the dying of American boys in Korea; between the destruction of human rights in the Soviet empire and so called economic assistance to Aisa. This is not idle talk, for in Czechoslovakia alone there are 350,000 people in forced labor camps. The same is true of the other countries of Central Europe, while in the Soviet Union there are 10 million of these modern slaves. If you figure out, ~~with pencil in hand~~, how much cheaper is the work of a captive, as compared to that of a well-paid factory worker, per day and multiply it by 300 working days, and then by the number of millions of slaves, it becomes clear that the Soviet gesture of aid to India, Communist China, and even to Yugoslavia, and to all the Communist parties in the world costs Moscow practically nothing since it is paid by the sweat and blood of the prisoners of the labor camps. Do you not see that there is a direct connection between freedom and the present policy, between the liberation of captive European nations and American interests?

In a recent speech, Prime Minister Nehru, ~~whom one certainly cannot accuse of not being a neutral~~, ~~toward communism,~~ called communism a backward movement. Misled intellectuals, please take note! It does not seem to matter to some intellectuals that communism is cruel, inhuman, bloody, and totalitarian, so long as it is progressive, so they think. In what way is communism progressive? In that people no longer decide for themselves in free elections but are ruled instead by one dictator or a group of dictators? Communism, as we know, has ruined the farmers, the white-collared class, the so called bourgeoisie, and practically everybody else. Has it at least helped the factory workers? We have accurate reports from Czechoslovakia what this "help" means. I do not intend to compare wages in the United States with those in Communist countries. We have never been as rich as you. And you have not been engulfed by war twice within a lifetime. I merely intend to compare the life of the worker in so called capitalistic Czechoslovakia, which was never quite that - with his present life. The much advertised higher wages in Czechoslovakka are merely on paper, because working hours are longer and prices are much higher. An ordinary pair of men's shoes costs 300 ~~400~~ crowns, that is 42 ~~$60~~. And how much does the worker earn? About 1,000 crowns a month; thus he has to work 10 ~~1~~ days for a pair of shoes, unless he is a better paid miner or falls under one of the categories receiving preferrential treatment. As we know, ~~under~~ Communist classless society has created new classes and ~~new~~ privileges ~~have been created~~. Accordingly, an American earning $350. a month would pay 100 ~~$130~~. for a pair of shoes or- since in the United States an average pair of shoes costs $12., the worker's corresponding wage would be 36 ~~$30~~. a month - I repeat- a month, not a week! Is that progress? Besides, working hours are longer than here and than they were formerly in democratic Czechoslovakia. Furthermore, one cannot choose his profession; it is treason to go out on strike. The labor unions no longer serve to protect the rights of workers but instead are used to drive them to work and to step up the norms. Is this progress?

And what progress is there in other fields? In literature and arts? Communists are not building any new dwellings for the workers, not even humble homes. And is it progress not to know what is going on outside the Iron Curtain? Not to be able to order foreign publications? To read only ~~the~~ local reprints of Moscow orders? Is it progress to stifle free scientific research and to dictate what one may think and believe, and nothing but that! ?

Why did we have wars and the American and French Revolutions, if this is progress?

It is said repeatedly that the world is made smaller by airplanes, radio, and atom bombs. If so, then the people in Czechoslovakia and the other captive nations are practically your neighbors. It is not enough to say on Sunday that something ought to be done for them. They are your allies, not only your neighbors. Why have you fought two world wars if 12 million people, your neighbors, are permitted to languish in concentration camps? The very fact that these concentration camps exist is an indictment of all free people and a threat to them as well. The lesson of twice crucified Czechoslovakia should be a warning. Let no one think it can never happen here. That is what we thought! We too turned a deaf ear to the tens of thousands of Russian escapees after World War I. True, the Czechoslovak Republic gave them asylum, as you have given us. If we are to pay our debt to you, we can best do it by warning you, in your own interest, that one can no more afford to coexist peacefully with communism than to take a nap in a tiger's cage.

We are told on high authority that America will do nothing to sanction the enslavement of the satellites, for instance by signing a treaty with the Soviets, nothing that would give the seal of approval to the present sad status quo. While we are extremely grateful for these statements of assurance, we cannot help but be sad at some of the things going on, such as admitting the Soviet satellites to the United Nations. Far be it from me to criticize American policy, whether it was a profitable move or not! But I must say that the move has buried the hopes of many and created a feeling of frustration behind the Iron Curtain, a fact commented on enthusiastically by the Communist press.

To give another example: In the "smiling period" immediately after the first Geneva conference in July, some people chasing rainbows or sensations, quite influential people at that, wrote articles to the press throwing overboard the exiles from the captive countries and asking them either to return home or to become a part of their new environment. I protest strongly against this viewpoint. Any person returning from the free world behind the Iron Curtain means a Communist victory which Communist propaganda is bound to utilize. Do you really want these individuals to return to captivity and to bring with them new technical knowledge and information?

As to the other viewpoint: Why should the exiles be assimilated? The United States has enough students, writers, journalists of its own. Is it not better that a nucleus of young exiles, inspired by the American idea of liberty and democracy, plan to return home when the right time comes? A trusted friend in Prague, Warsaw, or Budapest is far more valuable to America than one more hyphenated citizen. Obviously, when one hears repeatedly how necessary it is to coexist with communism, one is apt to become materialistic. It leads our young people ~~toxaccept~~x many of whom are worhty and well-qualified, to make a great effort to accept and to be accepted in the new surroundings. It is not always in America's own interest.

Let me point out one more warning, ~~the warning of a man from a country twice crucified~~. It is a great mistake to be always on the defensive. We too in Czechoslovakia were on the defensive when fighting the Communists from 1945 to 1948. We were always trying to prevent the Communists from doing one thing or another, from committing this or that crime. It need be said that we could hardly do otherwise as we were sorely weakened by the war whereas the Communists had greatly strengthened their positions, backed up fully by Moscow and its active representatives. But a defensive is totally inadequate.

An offensive is the answer. But how? Where? Certainly no one wants war, I least of all. I am very much afraid of war. An offensive, however, does not mean war; it may, in fact, prevent war. Let me give you an example what I mean. At the last General Assembly of the United Nations the agenda was fully taken up by moves aimed against the West. There were proposals on Cyprus, Morocco, Algeria, South Africa etc.

Not one charge was made against the Soviet Union and the captive nations! The entire program was devoted to a weak defense of the free world against Communist charges of Western colonialism and exploitation. The Soviet Union, not America, stands out at the United Nations as the standard-bearer for freedom. Two states of the free world left the General Assembly to protest against United Nations interference in their internal affairs, against a breach of the Charter. I ask: Why doesn't the free world at long last take up the problem of the European captive nations on this forum? Human rights, as formulated by the United Nations, are trampled there no less than in darkest Africa. The colonialism practiced behind the Iron Curtain is of the worst kind. Why not protest at the next Assembly of the United Nations that free trade unions have been abolished in Czechoslovakia; that there are slave labor camps in Russia; that there is religious persecution in Hungary, and last but not least, why not ask for free elections in Central Europe? There is no reason why France or South Africa or other free states should be the ones to leave the Assembly. It is high time the attack be directed against Communist Czechoslovakia, or Communist Poland. Why not? This will not bring on war. Quite the contrary. There will be war when and if the Moscow bosses decide they are the stronger. The West must do everything in its power so that the time never comes, so that Moscow never feels strong enough to start a war. In my opinion, an offesnive is a policy of peace.

Similarly, it is possible to start an offensive practically in every field, for instance in the cultural field. We know it is essential for communism to wipe out independent thinking, art, and culture. For this obvious reason, the Communists have built up an Iron Curtain cutting off the captive nations from the sources of free culture and from participating in it. Has the free world done enough to thwart this diabolical plan?

It has done practically nothing. Free Czechoslovak culture, to give but one example, is making a desperate effort, thanks to the personal sacrifices of a few individuals. Yet there are many refugees, writers, and artists, among the Czechoslovaks, Poles, Magyars etc. who could contribute toward free culture, if given financial aid to publish their works. Sooner or later, in one way or another, their books or ideas would penetrate the Iron Curtain. Unfortunately, there is a tendency in the Anglo-Saxom world to underestimate or overlook foreign culture, especially that of small nations. It is not wise because small nations are apt to look toward communism, which puts on a friendly front in order to subjugate them ideologically later on.

There are many other vulnerable spots, where communism could be assailed without war and at no great expense. But my time is up for tonight. Probably I have repeated much of what you already know. We all seem to be waiting for a magic wand to change the course of events for the better. In my own heart I am convinced there is such magic which could bring the desired change within one generation: It is faith in ourselves, in freedom, in the infinite possibilities given us. In this respect, we are often small-minded, for we are more amazed at the figures presented by the Bolsheviks, bragging about their results, than at the miracles to be seen around us in America. Sometimes we think it serious business when, in the free world, two politicians clash in an exchange of ideas, but think nothing of it when heads roll in the Soviet Union.

We need to have faith in ourselves as the best gauge between good and evil. We must return to the principles on which is founded the free world. America must export to the whole world not only automobiles and washmachines but also its democracy, its regard for the individual as an autonomous political unit. We must export the principles of the American Revo ution, which is far more modern than the Russian, though it ~~took~~ preceded the Bolshevik Revolution by almost one-and-one-half centuries. We must be dynamic not only in production and consumption of consumer goods, but in the force of our convictions, in our belief in the dignity of man, which is Christianity's gift to man, now trampled underfoot by the Communists. We must believe that the free world will triumph over communism - provided it will not let its weapons rust, but will hold high its faith in the ideals that ~~never grow old, for they~~ are ageless.

Zenkl

With best thoughts and regards to my dear Ed

Peter

10/I. 56

PHONE COLUMBIA 55169

DR. PETR ZENKL

2651-16TH STREET N. W.
WASHINGTON 9, D. C.

t America's an be ren-
ing. It is, asonable to be taken to r the years ride on that next spring s, underwrit-of the Wash-yed by How-he National this percep-ited gesture t individuals ell, to follow

c an era as s competing e and attenn't sufficient ontributions.
s the essen-to build for uture.
GANSEN.
N. Y.

een brought t the educanferred on ans will ex-
This means
War II vet-have a por-tional beneised as of eit that re-

e for World
nal benefits teran must program of than 1951, re have rein student ne.
from 1951
to be suffihave com-four-year e facts of almost all
II GI stu-
ed school-ged in part ally in the ling down
g the day, not while role of ell.
ool basis, it or most of carry only during any Many such e one year al benefits credit in nefits will l, be for-ng legislapermit an
, or, better

t the date no particu-was arbi-eral years reasonable g which all rans could eir educa-
The mere these part-t have ex-lement by like to see Congress take some action on this and am wondering if anyone else shares my feelings. W.J.P.

Washington.

Letters to the Editor
Wash. Post.
Jan. 10, 56

Russian Colonialism

Edward Crankshaw in The Washington Post and Times Herald on Jan. 3, discussed the situation of Russian colonialism and proceeded to show that the USSR appears as a champion of anticolonialism despite the fact that its empire is composed of many colonial nations. He points out that the Soviets take the line: "Resist us and we shall annihilate you. Do exactly as we tell you . . . and we shall share with you everything we have."

This is basically correct, but there are several important points that need to be added. The Soviet empire includes not only the actual, formally incorporated colonies, but also the Baltic States that had well proven their ability to live independently and to govern themselves in the short time of their state independence, before they were recaptured by the Soviets.

Furthermore, the Soviet empire factually, if not formally, forcibly annexed still other nations through devious means during and right after World War II. It made colonies of them, too, depriving them of freedom, trampling their rights, outlawing the free elections promised them many times during the war.

It makes no difference that the Soviet Union pretends these colonies are free. For these captive nations there is only the rule of sharing, but not receiving, for the Soviet Union exploits them mercilessly. They give their life strength and natural resources, uranium for instance, for which Moscow gives absolutely nothing in return. On the contrary, it forces the nations to sell their products far below price (and to pretend to enjoy it) especially armament to the countries where the Soviets are plotting to stir up fresh conflicts and unrest.

Mr. Crankshaw goes on to say "nobody would deny that Russia has brought benefits to her colonies. The reward of total obedience is a gradual raising of the standard of living." While this may be true of the incorporated countries of the Soviet empire such as Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenia, Khirgizia, Georgia Azerbaidjia, Armenia, etc., it certainly does not hold true of the inhabitants of the Baltic States, and exactly the opposite is true of the captive peoples of Central and Eastern Europe, some of whom had had a high economic, cultural, and social level.

These nations had to be dragged down forcibly and mightily to reduce them to the Soviet level; it was even necessary to rend asunder their sound economic structure, flourishing Western culture, and progressive social structure, so that they would not stand out in the Soviet sphere for all to see and compare.

As a consequence, these nations are very dissatisfied and they will continue to be so even should their economic conditions improve considerably to their former level, or even should these finally be surpassed. The overwhelming majority of the peoples in the captive nations place no faith in the materialistic philosophy of communism. A state of slavery is no life at all for them. Bread alone does not suffice. They attach great importance to moral and cultural values, such as they possessed in the days of freedom.

Persecution and suffering have not reduced them to accept the idea that the real meaning of life is the size of the loaf of bread. Naturally, they do want a fair and bigger slice for their family, but not at the price of enslavement, loss of freedom and human rights. Having once experienced the responsibilities and fruits of freedom, they will continue to exert their strength, such as it is, using all available means at their command, so that they can return one day into the free world where they hope to work for higher standards, for freedom and the ideals to which they remain true. The one-thousand years of history of the Czech nation, to give but one example, gives clear proof that the Czechs will not sell short their freedom for material gains, much less for foreign gain.

Why then is there so much talk in the United Nations about colonialism any time there is the slightest isolated infringement on human rights, for instance of the African nations, when at the same time the most violent form of colonialism, as practiced by the Communists with machine-like regularity, is passed over in dead silence? In the one form of colonialism there are the conflicting interests of a not entirely free nation on the one hand, and those of capitalism on the other. In the case of Soviet colonialism, however, it is a death conflict of the once-free who had enjoyed full democratic order.

Nothing but Communist propaganda can thus misrepresent and deliberately confuse ideas. Why does the free world let the Communists get away with it? PETER ZENKL,

A Czechoslovak in Exile

Washington.

a ne to b

IN that Wes with opp
Co. site with know priv.
A anno of p limit powe tives
Rive
A woul comp new that Or that Adm men not mere out agen
priva
He Inter upon publi is to Demo gatior his wi

Th

The Ass republic not othe spontane lication

Offices
Sawyer-
New Y Chicag
Detroit
Atlanta
Philad
Los An
San Fr
Miami B
The Ha
London.
Joshua

Daily &
1 week
1 month
BY

Daily &
1 year
6 mont
3 mont
1 mont
BY M

Daily &
1 year
6 mont
3 mont
1 mont
Rates
Ent

Zenkl, Peter

2651 - 16th St. NW.
Washington, D.C.
December 7, 1955

Dear Miss Holder:

I am grateful to you for your understanding and help in the matter of Mr. Murrow's foreword which, as you know, I value very highly.

Thank you also for returning the material I had sent you some time ago. I thought it was mislaid by mistake and am glad to have it back.

With sincere wishes,

Peter Zenkl

Miss Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

Lewis Broadus

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

WASHINGTON 25, D. C.

REFERENCE DEPARTMENT
AIR INFORMATION DIVISION

December 1, 1955

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York N.Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Both Dr. Zenkl and I are overjoyed at the moving foreword you have sent for the little study of his life work. It is so sincere, so well expressed that we are happy to have waited for it.

Thank you for the thought and feeling you put on those two pages. You produced a work of art.

There is one small suggestion I wish to make if you permit. The word "undramatic" in the first line may discourage some readers, although I realize you wish to convey that the story is not overdramatized or exaggerated. Would you permit me to omit that one word and leave your description with the one adjective "unadorned" ? I had to strike several more dramatic scenes and passages out of the MS because Zenkl thought them too personal or laudatory. I realize that I have not done justice to his life-long struggle for principles, but would hate to start readers off with any feeling that the subject is undramatic.

If you do not reply by the time we have to start printing, may I take that as a signal that you consent to this slight correction ?

May I add the personal information that the above letterhead indicates a job where the twenty years I spent in Europe, my knowledge of Russian and Czech are being put to good use. The information we gather for the Government is often extremely interesting and might even turn out vital.

Thank you again.

Cordially yours,

Broadus Mitchell

3112 New Mexico Ave., N.W.
Washington 16 D.C.

Zenkl, Petr

November 30, 1955

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Enclosed herewith is the material you requested be returned.

Sincerely yours,

Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr. Murrow

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16 Street, N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

Peter Zenkl
2651-16th Street,N.W.
WAshington 9,D.C.
September 13,1955

Mr.Ed.R.Murrow
485 Madison
New York City.

Dear Ed:

I am enclosing three things,which could be of some interest to you:

1./The full text of my article ,,Keep Smiling but Be Vigilant,,

2./Only a part of it was published in Washington Sunday Star,September 11,under the title ,,Satellite Army Cut are Nit ti Be Trusted,,

3./A very important detail from Munich days which I have knewn well.But it w as not published until now/London, 31,1955 in Czech/.

And somebody dares to say that we didnt want to fight 1938!!

Cordially:

Peter

Peter Zenkl

NB.Because I don't have another copy, return me kindly this paper.Thanks! (*)

Zenkl, Peter

2651 - 16th St. NW.
Washington, D.C.
November 30, 1955

Dear, dear Friend:

I found your foreword upon my return from New York. I lack the words to express adequately my joy and gratitude to you for finding time in your overcrowded schedule to write an introduction to Brackett Lewis' brochure. And I must add that the manner of your writing far exceeds any expectations.

You are so very kind and lenient that it is almost embarrassing for it makes me feel undeserving of your extraordinary praise. Such fine words and colors are enough to stir human jealousies.

If I am given the peace of mind to write my autobiography I shall try to justify in some small measure your opinion of the man who - like millions of others - feels great respect for you and also sincere personal devotion.

Your recognition obligates me to work for the rest of my life to be deserving of your friendship and faith in me.

I hope to thank you in person soon.

Gratefully yours,

Peter

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
C B S
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

Brackett Lewis has written an unadorned, undramatic account of the life of Petr Zenkl. A full account can come only from the pen, the mind and the memories of Dr. Zenkl himself.

It was no accident that nearly all competent Western observers who visited Czechoslovakia in the years between the wars labelled it a "model democracy". XXXX Czechoslovakia was at the same time an inspiration and a challenge to its neighbors. And one of the principal reasons that this was so was that small, smiling and vigilant statesman known as Petr Zenkl. He was three times Lord Mayor of Prague; was Minister of Social Welfare and Public Health under President Benes - leader of the largest anti-communist party in Czechoslovakia. He witnessed the saddest sight a patriot can behold - the death of his nation without battle, when Czechoslovakia was betrayed by her Western Allies.

Dr. Zenkl is a fighting man, with as much faith in free men's ability to govern themselves as any man I have ever known. He spent six years in Nazi concentration camps, was condemned to death, but managed to survive those last few indescribable days of horror at Buchenwald. When this reporter had the honor of finding him there, he was not a broken man; he had not even bent. His faith in his country, in democratic processes, in the dignity of the individual and his right to be free, were undiminished.

Czechoslovakian communists in Buchenwald, seeing me in the company of Zenkl, warned me against him. They said: "Beware of old Zenkl. He still believes in that oldfashioned nonsense, like Masaryk, Benes and Woodrow Wilson." They hated and feared him, because, fortified with an idea, he would not break. They promised to destroy him if he returned to his native land. It never occurred to him to do anything else. He became deputy Prime Minister under Dr. Benes. And then, for the second time, saw his country go down under the flood of a foreign tyranny. Finally he managed to escape, and now resides in this country.

Petr Zenkl knows as much about fighting communism as any man I know. He spent much of his mature life doing exactly that. He is an inspiration for all men who seek freedom. The hatred of his fellow-countrymen in Buchenwald, the fact that the communists in Czechoslovakia still fear and malign him, are both tributes to the power of the man and of the idea he cherishes.

Technically,I presume Dr. Zenkl is now classified as a "refugee". But he will be at home wherever freedom flourishes and men are prepared to fight for it.

There are "refugees" who believe that they know precisely the pattern and form of the government and society which should and must replace the present tyranny when they return to their native land. It is not so with Zenkl. This is a decision he reserves for his fellow-countrymen when, in freedom, they may determine such matters for themselves. The years in prison and in exile have served to intensify and strengthen his intolerance of injustice. He knows that in a world where there is no security for little nations, there is no security for big ones. He is a quiet man, with a truly ferocious faith in freedom. And there will come a time when school children in his own country - and I hope in mine - will read the story of Petr Zenkl, his life and his works, and will draw from it the pride, inspiration and respect for human rights which is the diet on which individuals and nations must survive.

The statement prepared by Peter Zenkl for the hearing on 16. February 1954.
(Internal Security Sub-Com.)

I affirm my willingness to testify before the Subcommittee on Internal Security. I am all the more willing as the hearing is on Communism for I have fought Communism practically all my adult life; ever since coming to this country almost six years ago, I have eagerly grasped at every opportunity, in lectures, articles etc. to warn America of the danger.

At first I was puzzled by today's summons. However in a Czech publication called "Mired" I discovered some of the problems that the Committee was interested in for it described at some length the "secret" hearings to be held, who would be called and what the future course of the hearings would be. The publication itself and those who speak for it do not concern me because they are insignificant, with no influence neither here or in Czechoslovakia. I am concerned, however, with the danger that they might imperil the fight for Czechoslovakia's liberation.

In view of what I have learned about the probable interest of the Committee in me and my work, I have prepared a statement to assist the Committee and myself, especially as I find it difficult to express myself clearly in English.

I first started to fight communism in 1921, when the Communist Party was first originated in Earlin, a suburb of Prague, of which I was Mayor. From the beginning of my political life throughout I have belonged to the National Spcialist Party (sometimes known as the Beneš Party) which was organised 56 years ago as a non-Marxist Party.

Years later, in the thirties, during the world depression, as Lord Mayor of Prague, I was engaged in a great battle with the Communists who were bent on upsetting all our relief measures for the unemployed. Thousands of leaflets were distributed in factories by the Communists denouncing me as Enemy No.1. I was often the target of violent communist attacks.

At the outbreak of World War II I was immediately imprisoned and spent almost six years in Nazi concentration camps. Even here, in the prison cells of Buchenwald, I carried on my struggle against the Communists who managed before the war was over to worm their way into positions of trust assigned them by the unsuspecting Nazis. In the past years I have repeatedly warned against Communist infiltration tactics.

In April 1945 I was freed by General Patton's Army not only from the Nazis who had earmarked me for extermination in the days of the siege of Buchenwald, but also from the Communists who intended to infiltrate the anti-Communist leaders whom they considered most dangerous to their plans. I was high on the Communist list of enemies and have Edward R.Murrow to thank for saving my life.

For the rest of the world the European war had ended on May 7,1945 - but not for Czechoslovakia. Prague was not yet free - worse still - the rest of the country had been "liberated" by the Red Army from the East. It had been the great hope of our people that the Americans would liberate them - and had the American Army been able to push the last few miles to free Prague, Czechoslovakia today would be a free country. I happened to be in London just when the Prague Radio called desperately for help; I was also present when members of the Czechoslovak Government in exile made frantic appeals to Churchill. In vain we hoped and prayed. Czechoslovakia's fate was sealed. (See Churchill: Triumph and Tragedy). It was the Red Army which was in control practically of all Czechoslovakia. It was a tragedy over which we had nothing to say.

Czechoslovakia was completely in the Soviet " sphere of influence." Czech and Slovak anti-Communists realized that with the Red Army at their doorstep and with Communists in control of key posts and enjoying full support from Moscow, Czechoslovakia's only chance at existence as a state depended entirely on co-existence with the U.S.S.R. The Czechoslovaks were never permitted to forget this. At that time, the free war-weary world, too hoped that co-existence between the East and the West would be possible and that Czechoslovakia would serve as a bridge. Czechoslovakia's orientation economically, culturally and politically had always been toward the West and at no time did the non-Communists wish to break their ties with the west; on the contrary, despite their tragic experience at Munich, they tried their utmost to cling to their old ties with the west. In their foreign policy, they desperately stressed the need of West and East.

Please imagine yourself in the place of the Czechoslovak anti-Communists who wanted to prevent the Communists from taking over outright the entire country already in 1945. Remember please that we did not enjoy the liberties made possible to other countries by a liberating American Army. Remember, too, that the West was disarming quickly leaving us to our own devices. We had only two alternatives - one was to refuse to participate in a coalition government (the example of Poland). The other alternative was to take our responsibility in helping to fight within the government and to win back democracy step by step, in a dragged out battle. We were playing for time, hoping that the Soviet tide would recede and working toward a free election. We make no excuse for our choice. It was the only choice left to us and we stood our ground and fought to the last.

We started out against great odds. The Communists terrorized and persecuted, and we could not strike back. Communists made use of their power adroitly by offering jobs and security to their Party members. Former Nazi collaborators were safe from justice if they joined the Party, while innocent people, who refused to join, were unjustly persecuted by imprisonment, loss of jobs, etc. Farmers were not given seed and fertilizers, owners of business enterprises were denied supplies. Communists also used persuasion by promising land to the landless and greater rights to the workingmen in the unions.

It was most difficult to oppose such concentration of power in key positions.

For instance, the Ministry of Information was in the hands of a rabid Communist, Kopecký, who controlled the paper supply and the radio. While the Communists could flood the land with their propaganda we did not have the paper for printing a leaflet. We did not have automobiles and gasoline. Worse by far, the Police "Security organs" were in the hands of the Communists and hidden from view were the NKVD specialists.

To belong to an anti-Communist party took courage.... and yet we made headway. The people, despite the hardships suffered under Nazi plunder and persecution, despite severe privations of the first post-war winter, began to rally. It should be remembered to our credit that we prevented the Communists from taking over the whole country already in 1945. They also had to slow down their bolshevization program. We anti-Communists also prevented them from carrying out a series of measures such as the Millionaire tax. For instance, we succeeded in breaking up the Socialist Bloc no sooner had it been formed.

Events soon proved that we had chosen the right and only possible way to defeat the Communists. By 1947, many American observers, including the American Ambassador to Czechoslovakia, commented most favorably on Czechoslovakia's economic recovery and inner moral recuperation. Democracy as steadily rising, despite Communist terrorization and extreme advantages; resistance to Communists was growing steadily.

Much was expected of the 1948 elections. We hoped that they would be the turning point in our uphill struggle. However, when the Communists in their secretly held Gallup poll learned that their Party would be severely defeated in the forthcoming elections, they decided abruptly to resort to force. With the help of Moscow, under the personal assistance of Zorin and his henchmen, the Communists staged the Prague putsch.

Many competent observers including the American press have reported at length on the event; books have been written on the subject. To mention but a few:

Czechoslovakia in European History,	by S.Harrison Thomson Princeton University Press, 1953
What Happened to the Czechs	by Sir Robert Bruce Lockhart London 1953
The Anatomy of a Satellite	by Dana Adams Schmidt New York Times Correspondent

And of course there is the important House Document No. 154 of the 81st Congress, March 1948.

I should like to add a personal note: In the public demonstrations during the putsch, the Communist mob carried standards through the streets: "To save the Government - Throw Zenkl out!"

To a large degree, Czechoslovakia was the victim of her geographic location, the results of Munich, and lack of unity and purpose in the free world.

After the Communist putsch in February 1948, it became necessary for every prominent non-Communist to flee for his life. Some of us were fortunate in that we succeeded in escaping with the help of the underground and in some cases with outside foreign assistance. I had to wait six months for my chance. During this time I was guarded day and night in my apartment by the Communist Police, until finally my wife and I made out escape. Many others, my closest friends and members of my Party were not so fortunate: Dr.Milada Horáková died at the gallows, Dr.Prokop Drtina is in prison. My brother and my nephew, though not involved in my political life or my escape, were punished in my stead, both are serving long prison terms.

In exile, as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia, I resumed my struggle against Communism and for the liberation of Czechoslovakia. I who spent almost six years in one of the worst Nazi concentration camps, know dictatotship and tyranny from bitter, painful experience and when I oppose Communism I oppose it not as a theoretician, but with all the passion one feels who has suffered under this brutal way of life.

Naturally, my colleagues and I are subjected to constant attacks by the Communist regime over the Prague Radio and in the Communist press. We are usually called "Stooges of Wall Street", "American Mercenaries", "Tools of Wall Street" etc. The Communists, feeling that the people's trust in us and our work for their liberation remains unshaken, recently stepped up an intense campaign of hatred against us (namely: Zenkl, Ripka, Lettrich,etc.)

At the same time we are under attack from another source - on American soil. Articles appearing in "Národ" a Czech newspaper published in Chicago (and in "Der Sudetendeutsche", published in Germany) have bluntly informed us that we are on trial before the Jenner Subcommittee on Internal Security. Some of our denouncers and their charges are therefore publicly known. As the accusers have, and always have been very hostile to our concept of a Masaryk Democracy, we feel that our life-work is threatened.

If it were true, the Communists would have good reason to rejoice because what they have been trying to do all these years would finally be achieved by someone else - the result would, however, be the same. Five years of our effort in exile in keeping up the morale of the captive people would have been dissipated. Worse, by far, psychological warfare carried on in the future behind the Iron Curtain would be totally defeated. For the people would have lost faith in the West. Words would become sterile - for words are believed only when spoken by those when the people have entrusted to carry on their fight as the people's defenders of the common cause.

Zenkl, Petr

November 25, 1955

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Enclosed herewith is Mr. Murrow's foreword he has written to Mr. Lewis's appreciation. I have sent a copy of it to Mr. Lewis. Mr. Murrow asked me to tell you how sorry he is for being so late in sending this to you.

Sincerely yours,

Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr. Murrow

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16 Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

November 25, 1955

Dear Mr. Lewis:

Enclosed herewith is the foreword Mr. Murrow has written to your appreciation of Dr. Zenkl. Mr. Murrow has asked me to tell you how sorry he is for being so late in sending this to you.

Sincerely yours,

Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr. Murrow

Mr. Brackett Lewis
1912 Hamlin Street, N.E.
Washington 18, D.C.

Brackett Lewis
1912 Hamlin Street N. E.
Washington 18, D. C.

June 26, 1955

Edward R. Murrow, Esq.
Columbia Broadcasting System,
450 Madison Ave.
New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It is several years since I last asked you a favor, and the one I ask now is more for our mutual friend Dr. Petr Zenkl than for me.

Would you care to contribute a foreword to a brief appreciation I have written about him ? My only purpose is to acquaint more Americans with the struggle he led against communism through the past 35 years, with his sterling character and his eternal faith in human ffeedom.

Your contact with him just after Patton's Third Army liberated Buchenwald is mentioned about the middle of galley 8. I also enclose proof of a foreword which Prof. Shotwell wrote for Zenkl's study of T. G. Masaryk's ideas of Federation for Europe.

I trust this request does not come just when you are overburdened or about to leave for a vacation.

With warm personal regards,

Most sincerely yours,

Brackett Lewis

Brackett Lewis

take to Cract Lost send more galleys

Brackett Lewis has written an unadorned, undramatic account of the life of Petr Zenkl. A full account can come only from the pen, the mind and the memories of Dr. Zenkl himself.

It was no accident that nearly all competent Western observers who visited Czechoslovakia in the years between the wars labelled it a "model democracy." Czechoslovakia was at the same time an inspiration and a challenge to its neighbors. And one of the principal reasons that this was so was that small, smiling and vigilant statesman known as Petr Zenkl. He was three times Lord Mayor of Prague; was Minister of Social Welfare and Public Health under President Benes -- leader of the largest anti-communist party in Czechoslovakia. He witnessed the saddest sight a patriot can behold -- the death of his nation without battle, when Czechoslovakia was betrayed by her Western Allies.

Dr. Zenkl is a fighting man, with as much faith in free man's ability to govern themselves as any man I have ever known. He spent six years in Nazi concentration camps, was condemned to death, but managed to survive those last few indescribably days of horror at Buchenwald. When this reporter had the honor of finding him there, he was not a broken man; he had not even bent. His faith in his country, in democratic processes, in the dignity of the individual and his right to be free, were undiminished.

Czechoslovakian communists in Buchenwald, seeing me in the company of Zenkl, warned me against him. They said: "Beware of old Zenkl. He still believes in that old fashioned nonsense, like Masaryk, Benes, and Woodrow Wilson." They hated and feared him because, fortified with an idea, he would not break. They promised to destroy him if he returned to his native land. It never occurred to him to do anything else. He became deputy Prime Minister under Dr. Benes. And then, for the second time, saw his country go down under the flood of a foreign tyranny. Finally he managed to escape, and now resides in this country.

Petr Zenkl knows as much about fighting communism as any man I know. He spent much of his mature life doing exactly that. He is an inspiration for all men who seek freedom. The hatred of his fellow-countrymen in Buchenwald, the fact that the communists in Czechoslovakia still fear and malign him, are both tributes to the power of the man and of the idea he cherishes.

Technically, I presume Dr. Zenkl is now classified as a "refugee." But he will be at home wherever freedom flourishes and men are prepared to fight for it.

There are "refugees" who believe that they know precisely the pattern and form of the government and society which should and must replace the present tyranny when they return to their native land. It is not so with Zenkl. This is a decision he reserves for his fellow-countrymen when, in freedom, they may determine such matters for themselves. The years in prison and in exile have served to intensify and strengthen his intolerance of injustice. He knows that in a world where there is no security for little nations, there is no security for big ones. He is a quiet man, with a truly ferocious faith in freedom. And there will come a time when school children in his own country -- and I hope in mine -- will read the story of Petr Zenkl, his life and his works, and will draw from it the pride, inspiration and respect for human rights which is the diet on which individuals and nations must survive.

Edward R. Murrow

Zenkel. Zenkel, Dr Peter

1) All European Captive Nations were deprived of their freedom in their entity – not only partialy.

2) All European Captive Nations have been held in the slavery longer than Eastern Germany.

3) All E.C.N. were enslaved first by Germany.

4) All in Middle and Eastern Europe have suffered, without being guilty, for the cruelities of Germans.

6) There are 100 million peoples in the European Captive Nations, but only 17 million in the Eastern Germany.

Did Germany win W.W. II.?

The greater pressure concerning Germany will be shown by the West the stronger will be Soviet reaction. If the European Captive nations were liberated, automatically the Eastern Europe would be liberated too.

Certainly it would be necessary to pay an adequate price for the freedom.

gresu, v němž poukázal na to, že ve stále se zmenšujícím světě vzrůstá neustále hospodářská závislost jedněch na druhých. Hospodářská prosperita jednoho státu závisí často na hospodářské prosperitě druhého. Poselství presidenta Eisenhowera ukázalo, že hospodářství Spojených Států vzkvétalo poslední tři léta, a že to bylo právě v době, kdy rostl obchodní obrat zemí svobodného světa, a kdy také jiné státy měly příznivou hospodářskou situaci. President poznamenal, že americké dovozy byly důležitým činitelem v tomto vývoji, neboť Spojené Státy se staly největším importérem světa, předhonily v posledních letech Velkou Britanii. President Eisenhower dále připomněl, že americká pomoc, ať již ve formě soukromých investic nebo státních půjček či darů, anebo ve formě technické či jiné výchovy, hrály velkou roli v pokroku hospodářsky nově se rozvíjejících zemí.

Amerika tuto pomoc poskytuje velmi ráda, prohlásil president ve svém rozpočtovém poselství, neboť účelem politiky Spojených Států je povzbuzovat a posilovat tužby lidu rozvíjejících se zemí po zvýšení životní míry. Americká pomoc je jednak přímá, jednak nepřímá. Přímou pomoc nazývá americký rozpočet programem vzájemné bezpečnosti, a ta je pro fiskální rok 1959, který začíná prvním červencem

Zenkl, Petr

June 14, 1955

Dear Petr:

Many thanks for sending me your ideas concerning the problem of the captive countries in view of the forthcoming Big Four Meeting.

I find the material most interesting and am happy to have it on hand.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651-16th Street, N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

fc

Petr Zenkl
2651-16th Street,N.W.
Washington 9,D.C.
May 29th,1955

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York.

Dear Ed,

Allow me to send you a number of my ideas concerning the problem of the captive countries in view of the forthcoming Big Four meeting.

I realize that you are tremendously pressed for time but hope that you will kindly spare the time to read it through.

I enclose also a copy of a short article concerning T.G.Masaryk's Memory Today.

Yours very truly

Petr.

Zenkl, Petr

Let us Fight for a Better, Free United World of Tomorrow .

One of the basic characteristics of Communism is its totalitarianism and its constant urge to pursue imperialistic goals. All its efforts are directed towards the conquering of one country after another. The Communists prefer to do it as much as possible by means of a cold war which is the bloodless method. / We cannot very well speak about a bloodless method, for very often a cold war envolves more suffering and sacrifice than the hot war./

Communism conquers one country after another by infiltration, by the misuse of confidence, national fronts, sudden seizure of power etc. There is not one country where Communism would have achieved power through free elections and democratic procedure. On the contrary, it was the suppression of such free ways and means which helped the "Party" to power.

Wherever Communism has gained power, all possible means were employed to destroy every human right. We cannot expect therefore, that the democratic ways of life could be revived through their own effort and bring about improvement. Communists know very well that any revival of civic rights would mean the fall of their power. They will no allow any such improvement.

The Communists keep telling us that they admit the existence of other political parties and that they are ready to cooperate with them. This is only another of their misleading maneuvres. The parties they refer to are not free, non-communist political parties, but some kind of Quisling organizations intended to deceive the trusting world. They are fully under the command of the Communist party and its secretariat.

Any co-existence of another political party by the side of the Communist is a myth. Different political parties existing next to each other and cooperating with each other would have to share at least some of their basic principles. How could they exist next to a Communist party which does not understand cooperation, but insists under all circumstances on ruling over the others? The same is true about the co-existence of different states and regimes. The Communists will admit them only to conquer them and replace them later by communism. Their constant, never changing plan for an imperialist conquest of the world must be carried out at any price. This is the center of their thinking. Their methods are infiltration and zig-zagging, both adjusted repeatedly to time and environment and used with success in countries selected for conquest. Communist agents in many forms are being introduced into those countries and the fifth columnists there are given great support. There is no doubt about the fact that the Communists have their fingers in many strikes the political aims of which can not always be recognized at first sight. Infiltration ensures the least risk and helps to keep hot war at a distance. The Communists do not want hot war. They are badly prepared and cannot depend on their organized forces.

In the meantime the Communists keep deceiving the world by their false peace operations and continue conquering new countries or their parts by means of a cold war. They destroy all potential enemies and oponents in countries already conquered. They integrate the populations, industries and agriculture extensively and ruthlessly into their own economy. Such countries are being converted into Communist arsenals and military warehouses in preparations for all eventualities. This way the Communists build up their military and police forces, their war production and the war reserves for their homeland. Other interests of the people must remain in the background. At the same time the develish Communist propaganda of lies and hatred tries to stimulate resentment against democratic nations and to strengthen the domain of Communist ideology.

Should the free world believe the misleading tactics and intriques of the Communists, it would mean a disaster. We must remember that the real aim of Communism was clearly outlined in the works of Marx. Lenin and Stalin, that they will not and cannot give up any part of it unless they would want to commit suicide. Everything else they offer as their program is a smoke screen, deceiving, conceiling. They may very well advocate the co-existence and cooperation and use it as a transition stage during which to prepare more adequately and faster for the consumption of another victim.

While the Communists advance towards their goal by all means and forces - in order not to be cought unprepared - the free world must keep pace with them. Since the Communists increase their productive power, their reserves and their armed forces, the free world has to do the same. They should not be allowed to add another advantage to the one they already enjoy in their ruthless exploitation of manpower.

The free world will have to organize its military forces as soon as possible not only to prevent further aggression but to be able to resist such aggression wheresoever it may strike next.

Should the free world limit itself only to prevention of aggression and violence, its efforts would remain insufficient and further losses of free countries could not be avoided. We have to consider the utmost impossible idea of co-existence of Communist and non-Communist regimes. The free world program will have to include also the restitution of freedom in countried deprived of it by the Communists. As long as freedom loving nations will be kept under forceful domination, the liberty of other countries still free will be in danger. In order to achieve full freedom it is necessary to plan the frustration of systematic violence and communisation of conquered countries - in other words - to maintain the old democratic anti-Communist traditions alive. Thus the spirit of resistence and the opposition against Communist rage will be strengthened and stimulated. It is further necessary to encourage the peoples of conquered countries in their sabotage against Communist activities and to nourish in them their desire for freedom and victory over the Communist tyrants. This too will help to provoke action at the earliest opportunity. We cannot say whether such opportunity will come from the outside or whether it will generate inside the country. Preparations for both cases are the same as far as the people are concerned.

People in the free countries know very well what a precious possession their freedom is and that it has to be defended. But even here the values of life and rights have to be stressed. The people have to visualize them as compared with the Communist reality. Leaders of free countries will have to prove by acts of wisdom and statesmanship their good will to bring about the highest possible degree of improvement represented by the welfare of all classes, without discord, revolution or bloodshed. It will mean in the first place improving the conditions of the underprivileged, those who are most vulnerable. Above all the aged, the unemployed, those who need good housing at a reasonable price and good medical care. The most advanced improvements in these fields of human welfare would demonstrate the farthest reaching results. The citizens of free countries should have the steadily rising standard of living before their eyes. Under such conditions all Communist promises would sound like empty words and remain without an echo.

However, to operate only with actual reforms in the free countries is not sufficient. It is not effective enough to talk to the people in Communist dominated countries only about the return of freedom and human rights. We cannot promis only the return to some past after the liberation from Communism. Slogans are not enough. Our words have to be based on concrete facts. We know that the return to any given date in the past history is impossible. We have to admit that in many places the pre-Communist conditions were so bad that the people would not wish them to return. On the contrary, some of the Communist introduced reforms meant improvements which the people would regret to lose. It would therefore be much sounder to proclaim that the free world in its effort to help the enslaved nations - does not want to impose on them after their liberation some new regime or simply help them reinstall their own old regime. It should be clearly said that the newly gained freedom would enable the nations to introduce regimes to their own liking. The new regimes should not only ensure human dignity and civic rights for the people. They should create conditions for the return of human understanding and respect and should eliminate hatred and envy. These conditions should be definitely defined and clearly understood. Among the basic principles of this plan should be mentioned the relations of man to man and man to religion. They should contain statements about labor conditions and the insurance of citizens against all risks of life - working hours, living wage, social protection of all kinds, family welfare, education, medical care, care for old age etc., etc. A charter of well insured minimum human rights should be contructed firmly in order to form a basis for peaceful international life. The program should indicate clearly what its aims are - the reactivation of human and international solidarity, the elimination of poverty, starvation, unemployment, illiteracy, the unification of the world in its interdependency similar to that of a family. This should be done without violence and bloodshed, without destruction and murder, through spontaneous voluntary efforts. Against a Communist world unified by force and violence, against an enslaved world we have to create a world unified by human understanding and the acceptance of differences - real freedom, a world of free people. It is up to us to develop endless effort and lead crusades in our struggle for a better united world of tomorrow. If we wish to advocate and realize such program and make it successful, we have to outline it in concrete, understandable terms. Otherwise it would remain an empty slogan. We have to point out the values that are being destroyed by the present rearmament, the economic advantages of limiting or discontinuing the rearmament. We should illustrate by figures what the needs of people are to-day, what shortages are most (beeing) felt and how much of this could be bought with the money saved on armament. Plain figures must speak - how many housing units, schools, hospitals, roads etc., could be built with that money.

The free nations should issue a proclamation stating that their savings would not be used only for improvements in their own countries. They should say that a part of those savings /e.g. 50%/ be used in underdeveloped countries for at least a period of 10 years. This would prove the fastest way to help these countries to develop and become capable to face world competition.

The planning for a realistically conceived program - if publicized behind the Iron Curtain or in countries threatened by Communism, would have far reaching consequences. People would not only realize what they have been and still are being deprived of by the Communist aggressor, but their desire for the realization of such plan would grow. The enslaved nations would become increasingly conscious of their deprivations and their resistance would become stronger. Their potential power to participate on the construction of a new world would grow as well, together with their desire to see it all realized. More willingness and more success would accompany acts of sabotage. The increasing inner tension in Communist dominated countries would become more meaningful. The consciousness of mental ties with the free world would become livelier and livelier in the minds of people. A concrete plan would supply many subjects for conversation in the fields, factories etc. The Communists would not be able to talk such plans away with slogans and clichés. They would have to offer more definite concepts, for the people would keep comparing existing conditions with the suggested plans.

If nations were thus prepared, the free world could face Moscow with a suggestion to realize the plan in a peaceful manner without bloodshed. If the ideas of this plan would already have been planted in the minds and hearts of the enslaved nations, the Communist situation and their counter propaganda would become much more difficult. The effects of Communist propaganda in countries designated for domination would also be weakened. Communist forces would not be able to consolidate and grow. They would suffer inner decomposure. Finally the Communists would be compelled to really enter negotiations in order to ease up inner tension or they would have to disclose their own plans and engage in an open counter-action weakened by the low morale of their own forces.

PETR ZENKL
2651 SIXTEENTH STREET, N. W.
WASHINGTON 9, D. C.
TELEPHONE: CO 5-5169

June 12, 1955.

My dear Ed:

I am enclosing my article which was just published.

Needing your advise and help I shall try to come to see you for a few moments June 15 or 16, when I am in New York.

Cordially yours
Peter.

Refugee Leader Urges Reds To Free Satellite Nations

By PETER ZENKL

When the Big Four chiefs of state meet "at the summit" in Geneva this summer, there undoubtedly will be substantial pressure for some positive Soviet sign that Russia's East European satellites have reasonable hope for eventual freedom.

There is no way of telling before the event what form such pressure will take. But one technique immediately suggests itself. That is the old stratagem of making one's opponent eat his words.

And words aplenty there have been from the Kremlin in past years. All these words have been directed to making the world believe that Soviet Russia wants peace and freedom for all. Perhaps the Communist leaders at Geneva might be persuaded to prove at last that they mean what they have been saying.

Soviet Pronouncements

Here is a catalogue—by no means complete—of remarks made or subscribed to by Soviet leaders on the subject of peace and independence:

● Foreign Minister V. M. Molotov in 1945 signed the United Nations Charter, which says in its preamble that "the peoples of the United Nations are determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small." The Charter itself adds that the U. N.'s organization "is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members."

● Josef Stalin, on November 6, 1941, spoke directly to the point in a revolution anniversary proclamation: "We have not and cannot have such war aims as the imposition of our regime on the Slavs and other enslaved peoples of Europe who are awaiting our aid. Our aim consists in assisting these peoples in their struggle for liberation from Hitler's tyranny and then setting them free to rule in their own lands as they desire.

"In all countries liberated from Fascist tyranny the Red Army, in accordance with the statements of the Soviet government, is setting an example of respect for the honor and dignity of liberated peoples, for their state system, culture, national traditions, and the great monuments of their past. The Red Army in no case prevents the liberated peoples from living their lives on their lands as they see fit."

[This statement, of course, was made at a time when the Red Army, far from "liberating" any one anywhere, was on the run before the advancing Nazi armies inside Russia itself.]

● Stalin again, a year later, said in a speech "On the Great Patriotic War of the Soviet Union": "The program of action of the Anglo-Soviet-American coalition is abolition of racial exclusiveness, equality of nations and integrity of their territories, liberation of enslaved nations and restoration of their sovereign rights, the right of every nation to arrange its affairs as it wishes."

● Also from Stalin, in November, 1943, came these words: "Together with our allies we shall have to—

"(1) Liberate the peoples of Europe from the Fascist invaders and help them reconstitute their national states. . . . The peoples of France, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Greece and other states which are under the German yoke must again become free and independent;

"(2) Give the liberated peoples of Europe the full right and freedom to decide for themselves the question of their form of government."

● Another high-flown declaration to which Russia was a party was the Yalta conference's declaration on liberated Europe. Along with the other great powers, the Soviet Union pledged itself "to the earliest possible establishment through free elections of governments responsive to the will of the people."

● By February, 1948, when Izvestia printed an article entitled, "On Guard for World Peace," most people were beginning to wonder. The article said: "The Soviet Army stretched out a brotherly, helping hand to the peoples of Europe languishing in Fascist slavery. The European peoples have to thank the Soviet Army for their liberation."

● Even seven years ago when the foregoing article appeared, that tune was an old one. In 1939, at the Fifth Supreme Soviet session, Molotov defended Russia's aims in the Baltic. "The special character of these mutual assistance pacts in no way implies any interference . . . in the affairs of Estonia, Latvia or Lithuania. . . . On the contrary, all these pacts . . . strictly stipulate the inviolability of the sovereignty of signatory states and the principle of noninterference in each other's affairs. . . .We declare that all the nonsensical talk about the Sovietization of the Baltic countries is only to the interest of our common enemies. . . ."

[Today the Soviets do not even observe the satellite fiction in the case of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. These are now officially part of the Soviet Union.]

Record Is Clear

Such is the contents of the catalogue. The record of Russia is clear —16 years or more of preaching freedom and self-determination, 16 years or more of practicing slavery and external domination. The words of Stalin and Molotov stand in sorry contrast to Russia's deeds in the great arc that stretches from the Baltic states through Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, Albania and Bulgaria all the way to the frontiers of Greece.

Last week, Secretary of State Dulles said, "Russia will be asked at the coming meeting . . . to live up to the Yalta, Potsdam and Moscow agreements pledging democratic freedoms for those nations which are now Moscow's European satellite nations."

It will be difficult, on the basis of Russia's record, for the Soviet leaders to convince anyone of good intentions by mouthing the same old, tired platitudes. As President Eisenhower said to the American Society of Newspaper Editors more than two years ago, deeds, not words, will be necessary. One obvious deed tending to prove Russia's good intentions would be the long-overdue liberation of her satellites. Such action would indicate to millions in East Europe and elsewhere that perhaps, after all—as Stalin said in an order of the day on May 1, 1942—"the Soviet Union's aim is clear and noble."

Dr. Zenkl is a former Mayor of Prague and was Deputy Premier of Czechoslovakia at the time of the Communist coup.

Canadians Oppose Plan

Zenkl, Petr
May 29, 1955

The unexpected Soviet turnabout in the case of Austria is fresh proof how extremely important it is to them to bluff the world by simulating a desire for peace. One does not have to prove that their conception of "peace" is quite different from the meaning of the word in the civilized Western world. In the same way the Communists misuse the words "democracy," "liberty," "non-interference," "a friendly neighbor" etc.

The main purpose of the Soviet move in the case of Austria is to sway the citizens of West Germany to demand the unification of their country and the neutralization of all of Germany. This would throw the blame on the West, should it ignore the German clamor, for having prevented the unification of Germany and the consolidation of peace in Europe.

Obviously, a unified but unarmed and neutralized Germany, withdrawn from Nato, would be powerless, subjected to direct Soviet influence from the countries along her border; it is easy to see she would inevitably be victimized. No Soviet guarantee or agreement could save Germany in the long run just as no treaty or grand assurances could save unhappy Czechoslovakia in 1948. It is no secret what would be her fate. The only thing one does not know is what road the Soviets would finally decide on, what subterfuge they would concoct, and what timing would seem most opportune to them.

Naturally, no Soviet soldiers would be stationed either publicly or officially on German soil; the army would be shifted a bit to the east there to wait and make ready for Moscow's thoroughly prepared plan.

Should the Soviets succeed in manoevering West Germany out of Nato and in unifying her, they would first try to win her over by promising to settle her frontiers to her advantage, namely the German- Polish line.

It would be possible, however, to make it much harder for the Soviet Union to line up Germany by neutralizing not only a unified Germany but also other countries behind the Iron Curtain, in particular Czechoslovakia and Poland. That these countries are loyal friends and allies to the West need not be stressed.

Should the Soviets come up at the contemplated Four Power meeting with a proposal to unify Germany and to hold free elections, why not answer with a proposal that free elections- as we understand them in the West and under careful international guarantees- be held not only in East Germany but also in other countries behind the Iron Curtain and that these countries too be neutralized! This would be a fair equalization, but not what the Soviets have in mind. The Soviets by releasing East Germans lose 19 million people to the 50 million West Germans the West stands to lose.

If the Soviets are truly interested in peace, non-interference and in carrying out the Yalta agreement, this is an excellent opportunity for them to prove it. If they accept (contrary to expectations) it will be welcomed enthusiastically by all participants.

Should the Soviets turn down the offer, however, the bitterness over their refusal in the countries behind the Iron Curtain would be focused on them. Their rejection would prove to the captive nations and to the world that the Soviets are not for peace and the easing of international tension, but that they are looking for the best way how to pry open the door to further territorial conquests and how to gain control of West Germany.

The effect of the Allied proposal to hold free elections on the people behind the Iron Curtain would certainly be very important especially at this time in view of the existing dissatisfaction, anti-Soviet tensions, and unmistakable Soviet difficulties.

Peter Zenkl

ut the tgomery
m. The i an exefore the ty scrap-it years.
is will be or in the
Mr. Reese; tras may ntgomery ner, taxa child ap-

, I indorse attempt to with the l economy
he County to hold the iblished by terest of all y citizens.
RIGHAM.
d.

May 24 in er plan for s welcomed are anxious n adopted;
wever, that e minimum e sacrificed are many as who are e the large
These same uld not in-rictions be where they oting a plan area would ning Comes of hearreas. These he commisof adopting

o that area,
it as the have been each area detail the ke to have e plan for means, the le District tailor the eeds.
suggestion
ive-acre lot rificed iga large seg-tion which quate plan-great disng smaller and needs that once tions have ill be exo increase jority in the ...

politically-elected individuals, in this or any one session of Congress, partly or fully undo a great concept of nature protection that was designed to stand for all time against all pressures?

H. EVERETT CLEMENTS.
Rochester, N. Y.

11 miles an hour.

Those who may be injured by such disregard of well-posted speed limit signs are victims of lawlessness whether the offender be a Senator, a hot-rod enthusiast, or a maniac.

HENRY T. MONCURE.
Alexandria.

Masaryk's Memory Today

Today in Chicago Americans of Czechoslovak descent are dedicating a monument to Thomas G. Masaryk.

In Czechoslovakia, in the two decades between the two World Wars, a grateful nation had erected several monuments made of stone and metal to honor their President liberator, while millions enshrined him in their hearts.

Thomas G. Masaryk was their teacher, guardian, and first President who for 17 years guided the democratic, independent Czechoslovak state in the postwar years. The people knew that it was in no small measure through his tireless efforts that a free Czechoslovakia had come into being at the close of war under the sponsorship of Woodrow Wilson.

When in 1948 the Communists seized power in Czechoslovakia, they aimed to exploit the love and respect the people bore Masaryk. But the people were quick to see that Masaryk had worked all his life against the very things communism stands for. That is why the Communist ruse misfired completely.

The Communists struck back with a campaign of lies: It was not Masaryk with the help of the West, particularly of the United States, who founded the republic, they told the people; you owe your independence to Red Russia's October Revolution. And stealthily, usually at night, they removed Masaryk's monuments.

Finally, they gave the people instead a monstrosity—a gigantic figure of Stalin, the tyrant. The recently unveiled statue commands a view of the former seat of Czech kings which was also the residence of the Presidents of the once free republic. Could anything be more cynical, more insulting to the freedom-loving Czechs?

How different are the ways of a dictatorship and that of a democracy!

In Moscow, the dictators ordered their stooges and servants in Prague to erect "with proper elation" a monstrous monument to Stalin out of the state funds extracted from the exploited people. In America, citizens of Czechoslovak descent collected a fund of love, penny by penny, to erect a monument to Masaryk.

Stalin's statue in Czechoslovakia serves to show the world that Czechoslovakia has ceased to exist, for the time being, as a free state, that it is a province of the Soviet Union, the empire built on class hatred and the exploitation of the common man and the small nations.

The monument to Masaryk, the apostle of love and social justice, is in America to show the world that America is leading the world in his struggle for democracy, for equality of people and nations, that America is the hope of the vilified and the oppressed.

There is not the slightest question where Masaryk would stand were he alive today. It is Czechoslovakia's great tragedy that it took Munich to awaken the world to the danger, and that 10 years later Czechoslovakia had to be overcome once more, this time by the Communists, before the West aligned its strength.

In no other country do the Communists have as tough a job as in Czechoslovakia. Nowhere are they as insecure.

The Czechoslovak people firmly believe that they will soon have a monument to Masaryk in Prague. For the present, the monument is here, in the United States. But this, too, is in the old tradition for it was in America, in 1918, that the independence of Czechoslovakia was declared, before it could take place in Prague. Besides, Masaryk was in America while the battle was still raging, and came home until after the war, as the victor. Today, too, the battle is on, but Masaryk, through his learning and ideas, shall return home once again as the victor.

PETER ZENKL.
Washington.

approach to ish try, and a bad job. T tic effort to to ride the
This hold Party. To ideological
But the L they were Party in Ernest Be turned ou at the F
the late J. thing that War was t
That, he for Hitler hardly o brought u
In the the roos policy, p had over lution.
end. Th least to t
—now au parliame ment.

The

P

The Associ republicati not otherw spontaneou lication of 15

Offices
Sawyer-Fer
New York
Chicago...
Detroit...
Atlanta
Philadelp
Los Angel
San Fran
Miami Beac
The Hal
London, En
Joshua B

MET
Daily and S
One week
One month
BEYOND
Daily and S
One week
One month
BY Daily and S
One year
Six months
Three month
One month
Rates o Entered

Washington Post, 29.V.55

Dear Edi, Zinnel

October 28, is the Czechoslovak National Holiday.-
Didn't you forget me?
With all my heart yours,
Peter.

28.X.56.

PHONE: COLUMBIA 5169

Dr. Petr Zenkl

2651-16TH STREET N.W.
WASHINGTON 9, D.C.

28. X. — the Czechosl. Independ. Day.

WHEN COMES CZECHOSLOVAKIA?

A Prague Revolt Seen As Slow but Strong

By PETER ZENKL

The rapid rhythm of events in Poland and Hungary has already clarified the real portent of the tempest blowing over Eastern Europ. In Poland Wladyslaw Gomulka, the anti-Stalinist and anti-Moscovite; in Hungary, Imre Nagy, the Titoist, came to power only a short while after leaving jail.

In the two countries the population gave them at the outset

The author, Peter Zenkl, now a resident of Washington, is a former deputy premier of Czechoslovakia, former Lord-Mayor of Prague and member of the Assembly of Captive European Nations, General Committee.

PETER ZENKL
Writes on Czech Outlook

a cordial welcome, leaving little doubt, however, as to what brought them to their side. It was Gomulka's fiery statement of independence from Moscow and Nagy's Titoist record.

Yet what the Poles and Hungarians expect is more than independence from the Soviets. It becomes evident that what they really hope for is freedom from communism as such. When they claim freedom of press and elections, they claim political freedom incompatible with communism; when they shout for the release of still imprisoned cardinals and clergy, they want freedom of religion incompatible with active atheism; when they claim improvement of wages and working conditions, they want in fact freedom of employment, equitable wages, effective trade unions, and all these are incompatible with the omnipotence of the one and exclusive employer, the Communist state.

Enthusiasm Lacking

In Warsaw the crowd listening to Gomulka manifested by absence of cheering and applauding its doubts about the leader who, for reasons of his own, found it necessary to implore the people to restrain themselves in their manifestations of enthusiasm for big changes. The crowd suspected they were too big for Mr. Gomulka.

In Hungary, there seemed to be a quick realization that Imre Nagy is not the man to bring what the people are waiting for. On a slight provocation from the police, the population turned against the government and is confronted with a horryfying sight of the Titoist and "patriotic" Imre Nagy calling in the Russian troops to subdue his own people, and we see what very few people expected to see—a Titoist held in power by Soviet troops. Within days the picture has changed. After having arisen Moscow, Mr. Gomulka justifies the presence of Soviet troops in Poland and Mr. Nagy uses them.

The situation in Central and meetings and a great many suffered for their courage. The Czech writers assailed openly the hypocrisy of the Communist rule. I have no doubt that broader masses of Czechs and Slovaks will manifest their sentiment at the appropriate moment. One thing, however, has to be remembered: Both in Poland and Hungary, things started moving under the impulses given by Communist leaders. In this respect the situation in Czechoslovakia is less favorable since the Czechoslovak Communists have been less inclined to flirt with Titoism. The reason for that is their awareness that the nation hates the Communist regime at least as heartily as the dependence on the Russians which, one has to admit, is less visible there than in other countries. In other words, a change in Czechoslovakia may be more difficult to start, but once it is begun, it will go a long way.

Singapore Riot Deaths Total 14

SINGAPORE, Oct. 27 (AP).—The death toll in the Singapore riots rose to 14 today, and police reinforcements from Johore and Malaya were rushed to this British island colony to stamp out the disorders, now in their third day.

More than 150 persons injured in the fighting were in hospitals. Rioting in scattered parts of the city continued all day, but not on a large scale.

Police fired volleys to break up several minor charges by rioters, including one attempt to raid a police station. Nearly 600 persons, including 159 Chinese secret society members, had been rounded up by nightfall. It was on similar secret society mem-

22 Scientists Stress Danger Of Bomb Tests

WORCESTER, Mass., Oct. 27 (AP).—Twenty-two Worcester and Shrewsbury scientists, including 18 at the world-famous Worcester Foundation for Experimental Biology at Shrewsbury, today declared the possible danger in hydrogen bomb tests is "a real problem which must be faced and should be discussed openly."

In a joint statement, the researchers said the H-bomb test hazard "is not just a campaign issue."

Also among the signers were two Clark University professors and two researchers at the Worcester State Hospital.

Recount Perils

The statement made the following points:

"1. Explosions of atom and hydrogen bombs produce ionizing radiation which, in the form of fall-out, is distributed throughout the world.

"2. The amount of atmospheric radioactivity released by any single explosion is negligible, the distribution is uneven and small, but measureable increases have already been noted in many parts of the globe, including the United States.

"3. The effects of radiation are cumulative.

"4. The fall-out, including strontium-90, one of the deadliest isotopes which can cause cancer and blood disorders, is washed out of the atmosphere by rain and incorporated into grass and vegetables.

"5. There exist in nature mechanisms which concentrate the harmful radioactivity. For example, cattle grazing over a large area may concentrate radioisotopes spread thinly over the pasture and transmit them in milk or meat. In fact, traces of strontium-90 have been found in milk supplies thousands of miles away from H-bomb explosions.

Hint Danger Ahead

"Recent studies have shown that while there is no immediate threat from this source, there are indications that there may be danger ahead if there were any substantial increase in the contamination of the atmosphere

"6. According to Sir John Cockcroft, director of the Atomic Energy Establishment at Harwell, England, the most important source of contamination is the H-bomb, since it produces from 100 to 1,000 times more radioactive materials than the atomic bomb."

String Quartet to Play At Teachers' Assembly

Polish Catholics Demand Primate's Return to Duty

WARSAW, Oct. 27 (AP).—Leading Polish Catholics today demanded in print for the first time the return to duty of Poland's Roman Catholic primate Stefan Cardinal Wyszynski.

A letter splashed over the front page of Warsaw's Catholic newspaper Slowo Powszechne said "In all conscience we appeal to the government to sort out differences between the church and the state.

"In accordance with the views of all Catholics, we request the return of Cardinal Wyszynski to his duties as primate of Poland as quickly as possible.

"We appeal to the government to accept the church's jurisdiction over church affairs. We demand that the government help settle the problem of spreading Catholic ideas, especially the problem of teaching religion in the schools."

First Published Request

It was the first published request for the primate's release. It was signed by a score of prominent Polish priests and laymen. It included a promise of support for the political and economic policies of Wladyslaw Gomulka.

Cardinal Wyszynski was removed from his duties in 1953 and confined to a monastery.

The military newspaper Soldier of Liberty carried the routine army order of the day which for the first time was signed by the newly-appointed Deputy Defense Minister Gen. Marian Spychalski.

It pointed up his new importance.

Normally, such orders are signed by Defense Minister Marshal Konstantin Rokossovsky, Polish-born Soviet marshal.

Marshal Rokossovsky's future has been a matter of constant speculation here since his removal from the Polish politburo during the upheavals which restored Mr. Gomulka to supreme power.

Transfer to Moscow Seen

Some Polish observers believe Marshal Rokossovsky soon will be transferred back to Moscow as commander of the Warsaw pact military alliance.

Any outright dismissal was considered unlikely.

Prime Minister Josef Cyrankiewicz, speaking in Parliament, denied rumors of Marshal Rokossovsky's influence over the Polish army and said he accepted Polish government orders during the last Polish-Soviet crisis over the last week end.

Radio Warsaw said Gen. Spychalski presided over a political conference of Polish army and political leaders, attended by Mr. Gomulka. Details of the discussion were not given. Marshal Rokossovsky's name was not mentioned.

German Army Bars Unity, Russia Says

MOSCOW, Oct. 27 (AP).—The Soviet government, in new notes sent to the United States, Britain and France, has charged that West Germany is building the largest standing army in Europe.

It said this blocked German unification.

The notes, made public tonight, accused the Western Powers of one-sided action in permitting German rearming and said it violated "most of the important agreements relating to German unification."

France Grants Saar Control to West Germany

LUXEMBOURG, Oct. 27 (AP).—France and West Germany signed a treaty here today restoring the rich Saar Valley to German control.

The signers were Foreign Ministers Christian Pineau of France and Heinrich von Brentano of West Germany. They also indorsed a score of related agreements and said "the last problems standing between the two countries" now had been settled.

Under the treaty, which must be ratified by the parliaments of both nations, the Saarland will revert to German political control next January 1 and will come completely under German sovereignty, as West Germany's 10th state, on December 31, 1959.

In the intervening three years of transition, France will keep certain financial and economic rights in the territory. It has had the Saar since 1945.

The region covers only 991 square miles, about half the size of Long Island, but it is one of Europe's most thickly populated and highly industrialized localities, crowded between Germany, Luxembourg and France.

Under its rolling hills are 10 billion tons of coal—enough to keep its miners busy for more than 500 years. Saar mines produce more than 17 million tons of coal and Saar mills 3 million tons of crude steel yearly. Manufactures include steam engines, pumps, transport equipment, machine tools and mining and farm machinery.

In a joint declaration, Mr. Pineau and Mr. Von Brentano said the agreements they had signed were the result of a long and difficult negotiations and of important concessions from both sides. They said these sacrifices "open a new phase toward a better future."

She's got a Secret!

She's wearing the new, astonishing Sonotone '79' hearing aid entirely at the ear!

● No cord down her neck ● Nothing in her hair-do ● Nothing on the body ● No fussing with eyeglasses

To discover the secret of how you too can hear a whisper and be inconspicuous with a ¾-ounce hearing aid, call, or send for free information.

SONOTONE

1435 G St. N.W., 901 Washington Bldg. DI. 7-0921

Free Home Consultation

WASHINGTON . . . SILVER SPRING . . . ARLINGTON

Prices Reduced on Pianos

New, Floor Sample, Slightly Used

CONSOLES
SPINETS
GRANDS

OPEN EVENINGS in Silver Spring & Arlington Monday thru Friday

RALEIGH HABERDASHER, WASHINGTON AND CHEVY CHASE

The situation in Central and Eastern Europe is still grim and we cannot but bow to the heroic men of Hungary who rose against the formidable monopoly of physical power wielded government. For some time one of the main goals of the Soviets has been to win over the neutral world, especially the young nations of Asia and Africa. Riding on the sentiment of anti-colonialism Russia has been doing its utmost to make herself into a liberator of the enslaved.

A few Asian statesmen have warned the continent that Russia is in fact the biggest existing colonial power in both Asia and Europe. But few seem to listen to these warnings and we have been startled by statements of prominent men from these areas which seemed to show that the Russian propaganda was taking root. We still remember a great Asian saying that Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary were free nations. The bluff has been called for everybody with eyes to see although it may take some time for the truth to sink in.

Red Promises Recalled

In the light of these events, the Soviet promises of helping people along to freedom become entertaining reading.

Izvestia: In all countries liberated from Fascist tyranny the Red Army in accordance with the statements of the Soviet Government is setting an example of respect for the honor and dignity of liberated peoples, for their state system—. The Red Army in no case prevents the liberated peoples from living their lives on their lands as they see fit . . . July 11, 1945.

Pravda: We stand for the scrupulous and punctilious observance of the facts on the basis of complete reciprocity and we declare that all the nonsensical talk about the Sovietization . . . is only to the interest of our common enemies and of all anti-Soviet provocateurs . . . November , 1939.

Bolshevik: The Soviet Union is fighting to have the United Nations as effective as possible . . . No. 22 of November 1946.

Not Quiet in Czechoslovakia

This is the time to invite the Soviets to follow the recipes!

Many people ask me why Czechoslovakia keeps quiet. The answer is very simple: Things are far from being quiet and in fact they have not been quiet since 1953. In that year a few Czechoslovak cities revolted against the regime—the first workers' rebellion in satellite Europe. Last spring, students of Prague and other university cities manifest stormily their condemnation of the regime in open on similar secret society members that British authorities blamed rioting in Hong Kong recently which claimed 43 lives.

Camalier to Speak

Former District Commissioner Renah F. Camalier will address the Sertoma Club of Washington at their regular weekly meeting at 12:15 p.m. Tuesday at the Hamilton Hotel.

The National Symphony String Quartet will perform at a general assembly at District Teachers College at 10 a.m. Wednesday.

Last year, the college sponsored the National Symphony's woodwind quintet and later this year will hear the percussion quartet. Players discuss their instruments and the music before playing.

Monday thru Friday
Hours—12:30 to 9 p.m.
Saturdays—9:15 to 6

A good selection of spinets, consoles, grands and uprights are being offered at large savings! Included are some new instruments, a number of rental returns, floor samples and a few trade-ins. Every one is a fine make instrument and carries our full guarantee. At the prices we're asking these pianos will go quickly, so come in tomorrow while the selection is complete.

These many fine makes CHICKERING
STECK WURLITZER
STEINWAY (used)
MASON & HAMLIN
CABLE-NELSON
ESTEY HUNTINGTON
LESTER BRADBURY
STERLING MUSETTE
BREMEN H. M. CABLE
WINTER GULBRANSEN

As little as $25 Down, 3 Years to Pay

WASHINGTON'S FAVORITE MUSIC STORE SINCE 1909
JORDAN'S
13th & G Sts. N.W. STerling 3-9400
9332 Ga. Ave. S. S. JUniper 5-1105
5169 Lee Hwy., Arl. KEnmore 8-5060
OPEN THURSDAYS UNTIL 9 P.M. in WASHINGTON

ENJOY a HOME TRIAL at No Cost

Hammond Chord Organ

The Instrument Anyone Can Play Without Lessons

You may have a Chord Organ in your home for a Free Home Trial if you wish. Or you may have it on our Rental-Purchase Plan. No obligation whatsoever to buy. Phone or come in for full details.

JORDAN'S
Three Stores
Corner 13th & G Sts. ST. 3-9400
9332 Ga. Ave., S. S. JU. 5-1105
5169 Lee Hwy., Arl. KE. 8-5060
Arl. & S. S. Stores Open Evenings

YOUR PARKING PROBLEM SOLVED FOR LESS THAN

If you are employed in the Downtown Northwest area, let EMBASSY GARAGE park your car, and then drive you right to your office building. When you leave work, step right into their FREE COURTESY VEHICLE and be driven in relaxed comfort to your car. ALL THIS FOR ONLY $18 per month.

PLUS

- Discounts on gas, parts and accessories
- Complete auto maintenance and repairing WHILE YOU WORK
- All inside parking
- Fireproof garage

82¢ PER DAY

The EMBASSY TRANSPORTATION PLAN goes into effect on November 1.

MAKE YOUR RESERVATIONS NOW!

CALL EX. 3-4674

THE EMBASSY GARAGE AND STORAGE CO., INC.
1126 21st St. N.W. (Near L St.)
24-HOUR SERVICE

Next Time Use
Star Parking Plaza
FREE DOWNTOWN PARK-SHOP PARKING
10th & E Sts. N.W.

crisp and colorful as Fall . . . our "custom-tailored" sport shirts by

Stradivari

Sport shirt collectors have a treat in store for them when they see the exciting new Stradivari collection now at Raleigh, downtown and Chevy Chase. For we've assembled all of the new fabrics, colors and patterns that add distinction and fashion to a man's leisure wardrobe and every shirt bears the unmistakable touch of Stradivari . . . "as fine as skilled hands can make." Here are some of the "custom" details that makes these sport shirts among the very finest a man could own and enjoy: single needle tailoring, piped seams, color-matched ocean pearl buttons, double-button cuffs, extra careful collar styling, a full and generous overall cut that assures comfort. And, of course, all Stradivari shirts are washable. All in sizes small to large.

from left to right:

Strad-O-Glosilk. A blend of imported long-staple cotton and silk. Lustrous cross-weave texture in bronze, dark green, blue, grey. $10

Strad-O-Classic. Washable imported cotton and rayon blend with a nubby slub finish that looks like silk. Light blue, white, beige, grey. 8.95

Strad-O-Gab. Washable rayon acetate gabardine in yellow, light green, light grey, beige, steel blue or light blue. $10

Cross-Stripes. Washable cotton and silk in two-color continental-inspired stripes. Spread collar with stays. Brown or dark grey with light grey__12.50

Street Floor, Washington and Chevy Chase

RALEIGH HABERDASHER

DOWNTOWN: 1310 F St. Phone: NAtional 8-9540
CHEVY CHASE, MD.: Wisconsin near Western Avenue

Petr Zenkl
2651- 16th St. NW.
Washington, D.C.
May 4, 1955

7

Dear Friend:

Listening to your Tuesday program (which is a must to me), I thought that you might be interested in a Communist propaganda trick on the theme Lidice and an interesting incident which took place in London recently.

On the Lidice anniversary, June 19th, the Prague regime is preparing a great demonstration "for peace and against German rearmament." Symbolic is to be "the Rose Garden of Peace" planted in Lidice. In London the "Lidice Shall Live Committee" has been organized and rose bushes have already been sent from Britain. The first public meeting of the Committee was held in London on April 21st. It was presided by Barnett Stross, Member of Parliament, and ended as a fiasco for the Communist guests from Czechoslovakia (including Professor Hromadka) and their London friends.

The Czechoslovak anti-Communist colony in London, about 300 strong, greeted the guests with placards: Free Elections in Czechoslovakia- Free Archbishop Beran- End to Slavery etc. and practically took over the meeting. The Prague guests did not appear on the stage and Stross asked the non-Communists to remove the placards and to clear the hall, otherwise the meeting could not begin.

Thereupon a young girl, holding 5 red roses in her hand, came up to the Chairman and asked if she could present them to the Czechoslovak delegation. Stross, presuming she was on his side, invited her to the mike whereupon she said clearly and in full possession of the seene:

> "I ask that you give place the first rose on the grave of the Lidice martyrs; the second rose on the grave of President Masaryk and his son Jan; the third on the grave of the martyr Milada Horáková; the fourth give to the Archbishop Beran in prison; the fifth is for all the suffering people of Czechoslovakia."

Stross was too stunned to stop her. Someone gave the signal to the audience which started to sing the Czechoslovak hymn and God Save the King. The meeting was quickly adjourned.

And that's the "Story of the London Roses." Perhaps you may find a place or the mood for it sometime.

Always yours,
Peter.

1) The girl's name is Hana Sirotková.

2) * Former Member of the Parlament, who spent years in Nazi Prison and was hanged by Communists in Prague.

Zenkl, Petr

LAW OFFICES

ADLAI E. STEVENSON
W. WILLARD WIRTZ
WILLIAM Mc C. BLAIR, JR.
NEWTON N. MINOW

231 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILLINOIS

FINANCIAL 6-5180

March 25, 1955

Dear Ed:

Governor Stevenson is working at his home in Libertyville this week and for that reason has asked me to acknowledge your letter of December 24, which was just forwarded to him by Dr. Petr Zenkl, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia.

I am enclosing a copy of the letter the Governor has written to Dr. Zenkl, telling him that he will be glad to see him some time in the near future.

Your programs get better and better!

Sincerely,

Bill

William McC. Blair, Jr.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Enclosure

LAW OFFICES

ADLAI E. STEVENSON
W. WILLARD WIRTZ
WILLIAM Mc G. BLAIR, JR.
NEWTON N. MINOW

231 SOUTH LA SALLE STREET
CHICAGO 4, ILLINOIS

FINANCIAL 6-5180

March 25, 1955

COPY

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

I am grateful indeed for your very thoughtful and gracious letter and look forward to seeing you some time in the near future.

I shall be in Washington for only a few hours on April 16 and, unhappily, my schedule is already hopelessly crowded. However, I shall make every effort to see you either in Washington or in New York on my next trip East. I have some speaking commitments which will keep me in the East between May 21 and June 8, so am afraid that I shall miss you when you are in Chicago, but I am sure that we can get together before then.

With every good wish, I am

Sincerely yours,

/s/ Adlai E. Stevenson

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651-16th Street, N. W.
Washington 9, D. C.

cc: Edward R. Murrow

Zenkl

March 8, 1955

Dear Petr:

Many thanks for your note of January 17th and for sending me a copy of Half Century of Struggle Against Marxism which I read with great interest.

I hope we shall be able to meet again soon.

Best regards,

Sincerely,

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 Sixteenth Street, N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

fc

Petr Zenkl
2651-16th Street,N.W.
Washington 9,D.C.
January 25,1955.

Miss Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr.Murrow
CBS
New York City.

Dear Miss Holder:

Thank you for your letterof January 20 and for sending me the CBS broadcast of January 2nd and for obtaining for me the book CRISIS.

The book,I know,would be coveted by many,but for me it has special value.I am grateful to you for getting it for me.

I appreciate your information about where the records ,,I Can Hear It Now,, are to be had.I passed on the information to all interested parties.

When I come to New York I shall bring you a small token of my appreciation a lapel emblem pin /the Czech lion/which was the symbol of our struggle for a free Czechoslovakia during World War II.

With best wishes to my dear E.R.M.,

I am,

Sincerely yours,

Zenkl

Peter Zenkl.

PETR ZENKL
2631 SIXTEENTH STREET, N. W.
WASHINGTON 9, D. C.

January 24,1955.

Mr.Ed.R.Murrow
CBS
New York City.

My Dear Ed:

,,Half Century of Struggle Against Marxism,,is offered as a contribution to our common struggle against Communism.

As Chairman of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party I am sending you a copy of this publication,hoping that it may be of some interest to you.

I would like to inform you,that I am no ore the Chairman of the Executive Committe of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia.

With all my heart

Petr.

Half Century of Struggle Against Marxism

Who are the Czechoslovak National Socialists?

Half Century of Struggle Against Marxism

WHO ARE THE CZECHOSLOVAK NATIONAL SOCIALISTS?

Published by the Executive Committee of the
Czechoslovak National Socialist Party

NEITHER MARXIST NOR NAZI.

Czechoslovak National Socialists have nothing in common with either Nazism or Marxism. The party was founded in 1897 under the name of the National Labor Party. In 1898 the name was changed to the National Social Party and again in 1920 to the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party.

It was Hitler who used the same name and abused it. The Czechoslovak National Socialists always fought Hitler.

Nor have they anything in common with those who, under the name of the Czechoslovak Socialist Party, are collaborating with the Communists in Czechoslovakia at the present time.

True adherents of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party are steadfast in their underground struggle against the Communists and their stooges, and have already made great sacrifices in property, liberty, and life in the cause of democracy.

Those Czechoslovak National Socialists who managed to escape from captive Czechoslovakia can and do fight freely and openly for the resurrection of freedom and democracy in Czechoslovakia.

Ceaseless attacks on the representatives of these Czechoslovak National Socialists in exile by the Communist regime in Czechoslovakia best serve to prove that this fight is effective.

WHO ARE THE CZECHOSLOVAK NATIONAL SOCIALISTS?

When an American asks a Czechoslovak political exile to explain the program of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party, the exile can give several realistic illustrations.

He can tell, for instance, how Hitler cried to the world in 1938 "Entweder Herr Beneš oder Ich" (Either Beneš or I). Eduard Beneš, then President of Czechoslovakia, had been Vice-President of the Czechoslovak National Socialists until 1936, and was co-author of the party program. When Hitler occupied Czechoslovakia in 1938, previous membership in the "Beneš-Partei" was sufficient reason for arrest by the Gestapo. In fact, the Nazis found the National Socialist program obnoxious enough to execute 2,400 party members and to place 10,000 others in concentration camps.

Or the exile can relate how the Communists seized the office and printing shops of the Czechoslovak National Socialists three days before the February 1948 putsch. All along the Communists had tried to weaken the party's influence by depriving thousands of National Socialists of their jobs and offices. Loyalty to the party program has cost many members their lives. Even before the death of Jan Masaryk, the miner Herod, a National Socialist, fell or was pushed from a window of the Ostrava police station and was killed. Another National Socialist, a member of the Cabinet, Minister of Justice Prokop Drtina, was seriously injured by a fall from his window in an attempt to commit suicide.

On the list of National Socialist heroes belong the names of Milada Horáková, a national martyr, who was executed by the Communists; Member of Parliament Jaroš and trainman Zajíček. Nor is possible to forget the martyrdom of František Loubal and that of many others now in Communist uranium mines, concentration camps and prisons.

The National Socialist Party continues to be a nuisance and threat to all Czech and Slovak fascists, to these "pathological dregs," as President Masaryk so aptly called them in 1927—a threat, too, to the various separatists and to the Nazis among the transferred Germans. Because the party is a source of threat to these people, Peter Zenkl, Chairman of the Party, Hubert Ripka, former member of the Government, and other National Socialists are continually denounced before the American authorities. This goes on in spite of the fact that, ever since 1945, Zenkl is considered enemy No. 1 by the Communists who attack him and his party ceaselessly in the Czechoslovak press and radio.

This brochure is addressed to those interested in the history of the party and in the National Socialist program.

FOR A CZECH STATE AGAINST MARXISM

The National Socialist Party was founded in 1897 by Czech workingmen, who stated in the very first sentence of their program: "We want to live in freedom both as members of the working class and as a nation." Another sentence was directed against the national and political oppression of the Hapsburg monarchy: "We want the Czech nation to live as an independent and equal member among the European nations, not as a downtrodden nation languishing in bondage."

The party was founded in opposition to the Marxist policy of the Czech Social Democrats, who were dependent, ideologically and politically, on the German Social Democrats of Austria. The Czechs living in Austria-Hungary could never forget that they had once had an independent state. Since the nineteenth century they had struggled, first against Hapsburg centralism and then against Austro-Hungarian dualism, to assert their state rights. The Czech Social Democratic Party, until 1897 the sole representative of the Czech working class, was ruled by the Viennese Central Committee of the Austrian Social-Democratic Party. It fell under the influence of the Austro-German party members and gave up the program for state rights. The National Socialist Party was founded in protest to this situation. The National Socialist workingmen even then realized that the Hapsburg monarchy, and Austria-Hungary as well, had forsaken the cause for which they had come into being and that the Czech nation must look to safeguarding its existence outside the confines of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

The first program of the Czechoslovak National Socialists of 1898 was an expression of certain aims rather than of a dogma. It showed the feeling and ideas of the Czech workingmen in that it was clearly anti-Marxist and national. It has remained so to this day. It is absurd if the reactionary and especially the fascist groups, in an attempt to hide a pro-Nazi past behind a false and chauvinistic front, point out the "socialist" character of the National Socialist Party. The genuine patriotism of the National Socialists has always stood in the way of these groups. Even more paradoxical are certain Social Demcrats who, taking advantage of uninformed Americans, pose as mild social reformers and proclaim that the National Socialists are radically opposed to private ownership.

THE IDEALS OF THE FRENCH AND AMERICAN REVOLUTION AGAINST FEUDALISM

Ever since its new form in 1902, the National Socialist program has stood clearly for national self-determination. The National Socialists were proud and grateful to the United States of America when at the close of World War I, largely due to President Woodrow Wilson, self- determination of nations became the spiritual heritage of civilized man.

The National Socialist program had as its aim the resurrection of the Czech State with full legislative powers. As early as 1905, Františka Zeminová, Vice-Chairman of the Party, spoke publicly of an independent Czechoslovak Republic. (Later, in the days of the Republic, she was elected to Parliament as a National Socialist; recently she has been condemned to prison by the Communists).

Prior to World War I, the antimilitarism of the National Socialist Party weakened considerably the war machine of the Hapsburg monarchy and consequently the Prussian military potential. In this way it contributed to the victory of the Western democracies; moreover, thousands of party members fought in the foreign legions, alongside the Allies, in France, Italy and Siberia.

As mentioned earlier, opposition to the Marxist theory of inevitable class warfare has always been the main tenet of the National Socialist Party since its beginnings in 1897. In its early life, the party checked the disruptive anti-national and anti-humanitarian tendencies of Marxism in the Czech working class by establishing, in 1903, its own trade union headquarters — the Czechoslovak Workingmen's Trade Union—whose basic principles were very similar to the corresponding American. The National Socialist Union headquarters was suppressed by Hitler in 1939. After the war, the Communists with the left-wing of the Social Democrats prevented the re-establishment of this trade union.

The Czech National Socialists have worked for over fifty years in organizing and educating the citizens of Czechoslovakia, especially the working class. It is no exaggeration to say that this party is in large part responsible for the failure of Nazism in Czechoslovakia, and likewise for the failure of Communism to this day. Moreover, Communism can never take permanent possession of Czechoslovakia. The National Socialists have kept alive in the hearts of the common people the tradition of humanitarian democracy and the ideals of the French and American revolutions.

FOR CONSTRUCTIVE WORK AGAINST RADICALISM

In reviewing the work and achievements of the National Socialist Party in the years 1918 to 1938, it can be seen that the party, formerly a radical opposition party, committed itself wholly to the constructive state policies of Presidents T. G. Masaryk and Eduard Beneš. In the interest of peace in Europe and that of cooperation within the League of Nations, it never permitted itself to be provoked by other parties to national radicalism.

Until the coming of Hitler, the Czechoslovak Republic had no serious conflict with the Weimar Republic of Germany. The National Socialist Party was responsible in no small measure for a policy of peace. It supported President Masaryk when, in view of national, chiefly German minorities, he wisely recommended that the Czech and Slovak language be considered the official, but not the state language.

It was the chairman of the formerly anti-militaristic National Socialist Party who, nevertheless, became the Republic's first Minister of National Defense; the army organized by him, together with the Sokol volunteers, drove back Béla Kun's Communist invasion of Slovakia and thereby checked the expansion of postwar communism in Central Europe. This formerly radical party willingly served T. G. Masaryk's humanitarian ideals and worked toward religious tolerance. With the support of this political party Eduard Beneš, then Minister of Foreign Affairs, negotiated in 1928 a modus vivendi with the Vatican, despite the fact that only a few years earlier "Away from Rome" had been the party's revolutionary motto expressing the program of the first Czechoslovak Government viz., to separate the church from the state.

The party rejected radical nationalism and likewise refused to follow the social radicalism spread by the Communists. When the Communist Party was established in 1920 following the split in the Social Democratic Party, the National Socialists might have profited from this split. They directed their efforts, however, toward consolidating the disorganized Social Democratic Party. As a consequence, they suffered a loss in the elections. For the National Socialists, the welfare of the state, not party aggrandizement, was the prime consideration, and in support of its ideals the party sacrificed its own interests to stem the growth of the Communist Party.

FOR FREEDOM AGAINST HITLER

During the occupation the Czechoslovak National Socialists were foremost in the struggle against the Nazis. The present chairman of the party, Peter Zenkl, was one of the first to be arrested; like thousands of other members of his party, he was held prisoner for six years in Nazi concentration camps, until liberated by the American Army. Abroad, in the London Government in exile and in the State Council, members of the party played an important part; Hubert Ripka directed the entire propaganda and participated in every diplomatic negotiation of importance. Thousands of rank and file members voluntarily joined the Czechoslovak Foreign Army and the Allied Armies to fight in the Middle East and in France. At home, the National Socialists were strongly represented in the non-Communist underground, in which Vladimír Krajina played an important part. For instance, their regular secret information service, transmitted by radio, was given full recognition by Winston Churchill and Lord Vansittart for its importance to the Allied Supreme Command.

The toll of Czechoslovak National Socialists in the struggle against Nazism was heavy. More than 10,000 party members were held prisoner in Nazi prisons and concentration camps; 2,400 members were executed, among them Member of Parliament Františka Plamínková, one of the co-founders of the International Council of Women. Of the twelve members of the Board of Directors only three survived, two of whom had spent the entire war in concentration camp. Of the ten women members of party headquarters, four were executed. When the Prague uprising took place in 1945, Otakar Machotka, a National Socialist, was the Vice-President of the National Council of the Revolution leading the uprising.

The Communists made it practically impossible after 1945 to evaluate the part played by non-Communists in the national struggle against Nazism. It is clear, nevertheless, that the Czechoslovak National Socialists have always stood in the front ranks in the liberation of their country. Proof of this is the fact that as soon as they were free of the Nazi oppressor, they took on the struggle for the preservation of democracy against Communist dictatorship. This explains why there are more National Socialists among the political exiles than members of any other party and why the National Socialists at home are subjected to a most cruel Communist persecution.

FOR DEMOCRACY AGAINST STALIN

The roots of Czechoslovak postwar difficulties go back to the period of Munich in 1938, to Teheran in 1943, and to Yalta in 1945. Another factor was that Prague had been "liberated" by the Red Army, with the American forces standing nearby. In May 1945, President Beneš and his London Government returned from London to Prague via Moscow, not via Paris, and as a result, the so-called Košice Government and the Košice Program were forced upon Czechoslovakia by Moscow.

From the beginning of the struggle, the National Socialists stood clearly on the side of freedom. Minister Jaroslav Stránský, a National Socialist, resisted the Moscow dictate to the Czechoslovak Government until the very end of the negotiations. As early as May 28, 1945, with the Red Army still in the land, National Socialist Youth, 100,000 strong, manifested their will at a public demonstration in Prague. This anti-Communist demonstration gave new courage to the citizens, frightened by the atrocities of the Red Army. It was a signal to arms in the battle against the Communists.

The political situation being what it was, there was nothing left for the National Socialist Party but to join the National Front formed in Moscow. Since the working and lower middle classes asked that all Socialists stand together, the party entered the so-called Socialistic bloc. The life of this political bloc, however, lasted for one meeting only, as the National Socialists were quick to see through the Communist ruse and by their abstention made its further existence impossible. It should be pointed out, moreover, that Peter Zenkl and Hubert Ripka, who are now attacked with particular vehemence, were not present at the negotiations of the Košice Program, either in Moscow or in Košice.

The results of the 1946 elections, in which the Communists polled 38% of the votes, were in no way the fault of the National Socialists. In fact, these results came as a very disagreeable surprise, especially in the villages. Despite terrorization and the concerted attack of the Communists, the National Socialist Party received 18.02% of the total vote, that is, 1,290,000, becoming thereby the strongest anti-Communist party in Czechoslovakia.

How the Communists felt about the National Socialists is best illustrated by the plot framed in September 1947 by Alexej Čepička, the present Communist Minister of National Defense. Besides Jan Masaryk, he singled out two other victims for assassination, two National Socialists—Peter Zenkl and Minister Prokop Drtina. The chairman of the Communist Party, Klement Gottwald, best described the course of action of the National Socialists between 1945 and 1948 when he said in November 1947: "The leaders of the National Socialists actually ask to be judged by their fellow members not only by what they have accomplished in the government but by what they have prevented. In other words, they are blocking us deliberately."

Communist Minister Vlado Clementis expressed his party's feelings even more pointedly in 1949: "The non-Communists accepted the Košice program with reluctance. They could not oppose the program openly unless they knowingly were willing to commit suicide. What they could not do openly, however, they did secretly; they weakened and loosened our bonds of alliance with the Soviet Union and bound us by political and economic agreements to the West, which, to them, was their real ally. Their representatives in the government made use of every opportunity to worsen our relations with the Soviet Union."

For this policy the National Socialists are now being attacked by those whose only contribution to the struggle at the time was silence. The National Socialist Party never gave up the idea of alliance with the West, to which Czechoslovakia has always been bound culturally and politically. The party did its best to promote close ties with both East and West, in the spirit of the public declarations of American and British statesmen at that time.

The National Socialists never did reconcile themselves to communism; on the contrary, they repudiated communism completely. It was the National Socialist Party which impeded Communist forces and undermined Communist positions, until the day the enemy finally took complete control under the shadow of Soviet bayonets in February 1948.

At the jubilee party convention in 1947, the chairman, outlining its program, stressed that the party would pursue a democratic course in the Czechoslovak tradition, according to the teachings of Thomas Masaryk.

Although years have elapsed and new situations have arisen since the 1947 party convention, there are not many principles requiring change. Obviously in the international field, policies are formed on the basis of existing conditions; yet, throughout, the policies of the National Socialist Party have been—and are—in accord with those of the Western powers. The present fate of all states behind the Iron Curtain raises the question as to whether there were any other means of saving democracy. Each of the states tried its own way and each succumbed.

The program adopted at the party's jubilee convention of 1947 was the program of a democracy, not of pseudo-socialistic totalitarianism. From the ideas of the French Revolution the party stressed the word "fraternité" in contrast to the communist motto of class warfare. It was a program of evolution, not a dogmatic program of force. It was, above all, a program which placed the national idea and the pluralistic economic system first. Both ideas were planned to serve humanitarian democracy.

FOR THE LIBERATION OF THE NATION AGAINST COMMUNISM AT HOME AND ABROAD

Two days before the Communist putsch in 1948, the chairman of the Communist Party Gottwald declared, "On the basis of bitter experience I cannot trust—and here I shall name one person—Zenkl; I cannot be with him in the Cabinet. And logically, I cannot be in the Cabinet with anyone whom Zenkl would trust."

To this day the Czechoslovak National Socialists in exile are the chief target of Communist assaults, while the National Socialists at home are the victims of the worst kind of Communist terror. Plain figures tell the cruel story:

In the last election in 1947, there were twenty-six members on the Board of Directors. One of these members died and one has failed the party by collaborating with the Communists. Of the remaining twenty-four members eight were or still are, in prison; eleven are in exile (Political Secretary Julius Firt, Ivan Herben, Ota Hora, Secretary General Vladimír Krajina, Deputy Chairman Alois Lysý, Otakar Machotka, Růžena Pelantová, Hubert Ripka, Deputy Chairman Jaroslav Stránský, Peter Zenkl, Jarmila Batková-Žáčková). Nothing has been heard of the last five members. This means that at least 80 percent of the Board members have been persecuted by the Communists.

Of the fifty-five National Socialists who were Members of Parliament, one died, eighteen are in exile, and nineteen are in prison. Two members of Parliament, Milada Horáková and Alois Jaroš, were executed. Thus of the fifty-five Members of Parliament thirty-nine, or 75 percent are victims of Communist persecution. As of today, fifty-five Members of Parliament from all non-Communist parties have escaped from the country. Of these, eighteen, the largest number from any party, are National Socialists.

It is not possible to ascertain exactly how many National Socialists have escaped from Czechoslovakia. According to the questionnaire of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia in 1951, Czechoslovak exiles in the area surveyed were divided among the different political parties as follows:

Czechoslovak National Socialists	62.3%
Czechoslovak Social Democrats	13.3%
Czechoslovak People's (Catholic) Party	13.7%
Czechoslovak Agrarians	1.7%
Czechoslovak National Democrats	1.0%
Czechoslovak Businessmen's Party	1.2%
Slovak Democrats	4.1%

From these figures it is apparent that the Czechoslovak National Socialists are numerically the strongest component of the exile. They do not, however, ask for privileges or advantages on the strength of this numerical preponderance though they are fully aware of the responsibility devolving from the fact. Nonetheless, the party members would be justified if they were to complain of the undeserved and unfair criticism and the denunciations heaped upon them.

In the spirit of our tradition, outlined here in brief, the Czechoslovak National Socialists in exile wish no better than to perform faithfully their duties in the struggle against Communism and to work for the early and complete liberation of the people of Czechoslovakia.

7-B-13

PETR ZENKL
2651 SIXTEENTH STREET N. W.
WASHINGTON 9, D. C.
TELEPHONE: CO 5-[illegible]69

January 17,1955

Mr.Ed.R.Murrow
CBS
New York City.

Dear Ed:

,,Half Century of Struggle Against Marxism,,is offered you as a contribution toward our common struggle against Communism.

As Chairman of the Czechoslovak National Socialist Party,I am sending you this copy,hoping that it may be of some interest to you.

Cordialy

Petr

Zenkl, Petr

January 20, 1955

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

I am very happy to enclose the script of the January 2nd broadcast, "Years of Crisis" and also the book you request, "Crisis," which is now out of print and a collectors item.

The phonograph records can be obtained in any record shop. The title is "I Can Hear It Now" and they are Columbia Records.

Sincerely yours,

Rebecca Holder
Secretary to
Mr. Murrow

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16 Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

rh

2651- 16th St. NW.
Wash ington, D.C.
January 4, 1955

Miss M. Holmer
Secretary to Mr. Ed. R. Murrow
C B S
485 Madison Ave.
New York City

Dear Miss Holmer:

Forgive me for taking up your time again. First of all, I express my thanks for Ed. R. Murrow's letter concerning the visit with Mr. Adlai Stevenson.

1) At this time, I take the liberty of asking you to send me a copy of the discussion Ed.R. Murrow had on TV with his co-workers on January 2nd from 4 to 5 oclock.

2) Please be so very kind and ascertain whether it is possible to obtain or purchase a copy of the remarkable book (which I saw recently for the first time): The Crisis, a report from the Columbia Broadcasting System which contains all the CBS broadcasts in the tragic pre-Munich days in 1938.

3) Lastly, may I ask you where I could buy the unusual phonograph records from the second world war made by Mr. Ed. R. Murrow.

I am afraid that I am asking for too much but I hope you will pardon me for you undoubtedly know how important it all is to me.

With sincere thanks and well-wishes,

Petr Zenkl

Zenkl, Peter

October 13, 1954

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

This is merely a note to say my thanks for your kind words about the Freedom House Award.

It was indeed good of you to wire me as you did.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Peter Zenkl
2651 16 Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

fc

17

RECEIVED
1954 OCT -5 PM 3:15
C.B.S. TRAFFIC DEPT. N.Y

WU040 PD

WASHINGTON DC OCT 5 243PME

EDWARD MURROW

YOU KNOW ED HOW HAPPY I AM ABOUT FREEDOM HOUSE AWARD

PETER ZENKL

314P..

Zenkl, Peter

December 16, 1953

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Thank you for your letter of November 25th. At the moment I am doubtful as to whether Mr. Wheelock's suggestion has any merit but I need more time than I have had recently to think it over. I am leaving for Korea on Saturday, but expect to be back two weeks later at which time I will get in touch with you again.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Peter Zenkl
2651 16th Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

rh

2651- 16th St. N.W.
Washington, D.C.
November 25, 1953

Dear Friend:

In yesterday's letter I forgot one detail of my conversation with Mr. Wheelock who has in mind what I think is an excellent idea: a series of five minute anti-Communist broadcasts. Each would be a true life story (about 3 and half minutes) told by a person from actual experience with communism. The narrators would be from various countries and from all walks of life, of all ages, the young and old. Although coming from so many sources the stories would have one common thread: the unmasking of communist methods of operation. Your closing words would be the climax to the story.

I do not think I am acting against Mr. Wheelock's intentions by writing you of his idea and in offering you " a sample" of my own, a story which I have written on the spur of the moment to illustrate the point. If you think the idea a good one please let me hear from you sometime in the future. I would be happy to help you with suggestions as to possible participants etc. If the idea does not appeal to you please forget the matter.

Very sincerely yours,

Peter Zenkl

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Ave.
New York 22, N.Y.

Peter Zenkl

Forty years of my life have been devoted to social welfare. I fully recognize the great beneficiary advantages brought about by industrialization, but, at the same time, I have always felt the need to help the underprivileged, weaker members of society who have been dislocated by the new social order and who have been caught by the wheels of the speeded-up industrial progress. I believe that we should apply Christian principles in our technical age; that we should prevent and treat social ills systematically and deliberately and that we should give this aid in time and in a way which does not humiliate. In Prague, in the short span of twenty years between the two world wars, I was able to help in organizing a wide network of social services: day nurseries, feeding stations, playgrounds, kindergartens, hostelries, homes for the aged, thousands of small aprtments for the low income group; I also helped in promoting old age pensions, social and other kinds of insurance.

The living standard of our industrious citizens was rising steadily until unfortunately Czechoslovakia, a highly industrialized state, was caught in the world depression. Hundreds of thousands lost their jobs and the situation became very serious. Conditions were all the worse as we had not as yet succeeded in organizing adequate unemployment benefits.

The Communists were delighted. "Now," they thought, "our chance has come." Unemployment, hunger, suffering, eviction from homes, the despair of parents would play into their hands. Prague, the capital, was to be the chief target of their attack.

We quickly organized an over-all drive under the motto: "No worthwhile person, capable of work, wants alms; he wants work." We had large scale projects for tens of thousands. Everybody was put to work regardless of his previous occupation and training. We campaigned for funds to finance our extensive programs. Tens of thousands of children were fed until the unemployment tide began to recede.

At every step, however, we were blocked by Communists who sabotaged our efforts. They attacked us with false accusations in the City Council, the Goverment and the press. They tried to disrupt the work and undermine people's faith in our good intentions.

For instance, Zápotocký, then a Communist small-fry organizer, now the President of Czechoslovakia, took workmen out of their jobs from the near-by mining town of Kladno and herded them into the Lord Mayor's office in Prague, all clamoring for jobs. His reason was to embarass us and ~~to~~ disrupt our work.

One day I asked one of the prominent Communists, a woman now dead but still admired by her Party: "Why do you Communists pretend to be genuinely interested in the aleviation of suffering when you deliberately try to wreck every effort of ours to help those in need?"

Javůrková was surprisingly outspoken: truthful: "That's easy to understand. We don't mind the do-gooders who talk about helping. But you actually do things; you carry out your plans and that is why you are our real enemy. You help people in need. You remove social evils. But we need social injustice and discontent. You give people a roof overhead whereas we want them to live in cellars and under bridges. You build homes for the aged whereas we want old parents to be destitute and homeless so that their sad plight would drive their children into our ranks.

We need incendiaries and social bombshells; you put out the fire instead. That is why you are so dangerous. We need people to suffer and in their suffering to turn to us as their only saviours. Then we shall build a better life for them."

Edward R. Murrow's Conclusion:

Zenkl, Petr

November 27, 1953

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Thank you for your letter of November 23 and for letting me see the outline of your article. It does indeed have merit. I am pleased that the meeting with Mr. Wheelock has been accomplished and shall hope that something fruitful comes of it.

About the Ford Foundation, I enclose a copy of a letter I received last week from Mr. Don Price. I am sorry the reply is negative.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16th Street, NW
Washington, D.C.

dm

COPY File

25 November 1953

Dr Peter Zenkl
2651 16th Street NW
Washington D C

Dear Dr Zenkl

Your letter and material read with great interest.

I have discussed this with the Board of Help Inc, and while we are small and with very limited funds, it is our intention to use them to help people and projects that are worth while on a temporary basis.

It is our opinion that you should have time to develop your book which can be a very important factor in meeting our major problem - Communism.

It has been decided that Help Inc will send you $500 a month for five months (the first check herewith and subsequent ones on the first of January, February, March and April). This in the hopes that it will permit you to develop and publish your book, the outline of which is so interesting and powerful.

I am sending your outline for a magazine article to Mr Hibbs - and shall advise you of his comments.

And I am looking forward to our next meeting - and the pleasure of meeting your wife.

With great appreciation that such as you live, I am

Very truly yours

Signed - Ward Wheelock

Ward Wheelock:C

COPY

copy - Mr Dunn

2651- 16th St. NW.
Washington, D.C.
November 23, 1953

Dear Friend:

Thanks to you I recently had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Ward Wheelock and his wife, with whom I discussed subjects of deep concern to both of us. I appreciate the contact and shall be very happy if we meet again. I presume Mr. Wheelock will tell you of our meeting.

There is this which I should like to bring up to you: In your TV broadcast from East Berlin you recalled what I had said upon my escape from my country; as I listened to you and shared your message with you, I pondered again how difficult it is for citizens of a free country to understand the Communist peril. Daily I am confronted with the question of why and how Americans fail to understand the danger of Communist methods. I got the idea of writing an article (since I still have not ventured out to writing a book on my concentration camp experiences) in which I would show, on the basis of my actual experiences, how Communists, following a carefully prepared plan, systematically and deliberately take over a structure: in this case a Nazi concentration camp, although themselves nothing more than prisoners.

I made an outline of the contemplated article (or articles) which, providing I do them justice, should be interesting and to all practical purposes more instructive than other, less direct accounts.

I am sending a copy of the outline also to Mr. Wheelock who has promised to interest your mutual friend, Mr. Ben Hibbs, editor of Saturday Evening Post.

I would be very grateful if you could devote a few minutes of your scarce time to reading my outline and if you think the idea has merit to recommend it to Mr. Ben Hibbs or to someone else, as you see fit.

I have not heard from the Ford Foundation as yet.

Mr. M.
See Nov. 19
letter from Alan Price.
Dm.

With sincerest wishes,

Yours gratefully,

or if you allow Peter

Peter Zenkl

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

Peter Zenkl

O U T L I N E

The author knows Communists and communism from practical experience in public life from the day the Party was founded in Czechoslovakia in 1920. More than that, he has had the unique opportunity of watching Communists unfold their sinister, complicated and highly organuzed plot in Nazi concentration camps in Germany during his six years imprisonment.

Living with them in close confinement in Buchenwald in the same prison cells, Zenkl saw them develop deliberately a wide network which finally enmeshed the entire Nazi camp. The author is convinced that Communists are capable of penetrating, undermining, converting to their purposes or seizing outright any body or organization unless the proper means are used to check them. To be able to accomplish this one must know how Communists operate, how they bore in from without, branch out and finally take over.

The subject could be written up factually as an article or in narrative form, preferably with real, not imaginary characters, giving actual scenes and events. It would help the writer to know beforehand the desired length of the article or story.

The title should convey the idea that Communists could outwit even the devils by taking over hell itself.

It would contain the following ideas:

There were tens of thousands of prisoners in Buchenwald, the most motley mess of human beings imaginable. Over twenty-five nations were represented; the widest range of religions and creeds; all strata of society, people from the humblest to the social cream of their country; the humble, the noble and the vile, all piled in together. Some prisoners were there because they were anti-Nazis, but the Nazis were there too; war prisoners as well as war objectors; saboteurs and shirkers; professional criminals as well as men inspired by purest motives of religious fervor.

Despite these vast differences, they had one thing in common: misery. They formed one mass of abject suffering, but otherwise they were not united. Even among political prisoners of the same nationality there were differences and cleavages carried over from past experience in political ~~life~~ or social life at home. There were only two exceptions of rare unity, though a world apart in thought and purpose: Jehovah's Witnesses and the Communists. The first group was bound together by incomitable religious fanaticism; the other group by Communist intoxication.

First the Communists formed cells among the national groups (the French, Czech, Polish, German etc); later on, they joined the national cells into one over-all international unit. From then on, they proceeded according to a detailed, minute plan, step by step, with ant-like diligence, to accomplish the following:

a) They did their utmost to place Communists in jobs about camp. No menial job, no matter how lowly, was overlooked. In fact, lowly jobs often afforded excellent opportunities as observation posts, footholds and prongs for future penetration.

b) Communists tried to win over new accomplices and adherents in an infinite variety of ways, for instance by bribery, favors and protection.

c) Naturally Communists worked on young people to indoctrinate them ideologically.

d) Communists liquidated political opponents and even potential opponents.

e) Communists ferreted out inside information as knowledge of Nazi plans was highly important in planning Communist counter-measures.

f) It was done with one purpose: to achieve Communist goals.

g) In the midst of war when all others had only one goal in mind- to end the war victoriously- Communists were far ahead planning already how to take over the concentration camp at the decisive moment and how to eliminate permanently undesirables who could be expected to oppose communism after the war.

h) Throughout the war groundwork waslaid for postwar international cooperation of Communists. The system of National Committees under Communist control in the liberated countries was organized long before the end of war.(As it turned out, it brought disaster to Czechoslovakia).

First of all, Communists had to organize systematic knock-out drives against any other group of prisoners which might for some reason or other endanger or block Communist plans. In Buchenwald they had the professional criminals to contend with whom the Nazis had entrusted with the policing jobs and other tough duties about camp. It took sinister scheming to outwit and overthrow the rule of professional thieves and killers.

1. Bit by bit, from one lowly job to another, Communists worked themselves up from Zimmer Elteste (the prisoner held responsible for the cell) to Blok Elteste (responsible for the block) and finally to Lager Elteste and to Capo (the head). For that matter, every menial job afforded opportunities in and around camp: a Kolfaktor (handy-man) and Laufer (messenger) were actually very important. A Kolfactor sweeping the prison yard was in a strategically important position because from his vantage ground he could watch what was going on and pass on the information to another Kolfaktor or Laufer. Thus Communists were able to pass on important news in an incredibly short time and it was amazing what they knew. In time, by their efficiency, coordination and trickery, Communists "relieved" unsuspecting Nazi masters of various duties until finally they succeeded in planting cells in practically every department of every building. Having inside knowledge of what was being planned, they could protect their Communist members in time and sometimes even wreck Communix Nazi plans. For instance, they substituted other victims from non-Communist ranks and alleviated the suffering of their own members by giving them extra food and privileges at the expense of others etc.

2. By swindling and stealing in the kitchens they were in a position to give or withhold food from prisoners.

3. Their unseen control of workshops gave them tremendous opportunities. Here they favored, protected and hid their own. They conducted forbidden activities, organized, plotted, secretly made articles for their own use and sabotaged Nazi efforts. Best of all, they ingratiated themselves to the Nazis by producing coveted articles and special gifts for Nazi masters.

   For instance there was the Communist shoemaker who made unusually fine riding boots for the Nazi commander and his friends. As a fine craftsman he was permitted to chose his assistants which gave him the opportunity of getting rid of non-Communist workers by sending them to the death quarry and by planting Communist accomplices in their place.

4. In the office of political management Communists learned what was being planned and took effective counter-measures by hiding their members and by substituting non-Communists for various Nazi death projects.

5. In this way Communists liquidated former political enemies and those they hated. For instance, they earmarked the French industrialist Michelin for extermination. Zenkl managed to save him twice from the March of Death but failed the third time.

6. The prison hospital was a beehive of Communist activity where the Communists had a heyday of hiding, scheming and liquidating. They arranged it so that Communists received better medical treatment (if it could be called by that name) while undesirable non-Communists were left to die or were even put to death. Here among the sick and dying they hid under false names the Communists on the Nazi black-list.

7. No less important was the morgue and the pathology department. A Communist hiding from the Nazis was given a dead man's identity. It worked this way: an unimportant fellow died. Before his corpse was done away with, his number and card in the files were exchanged with that of a living Communist who continued to live in the camp under the dead man's name.

8. Camp warehouses of furniture, laundry, clothing and medicine meant on the one hand alleviation to Communists and sometimes even to non-Communists, provided it served a purpose. By controlling supplies Communists had the power to do favors or to victimize anti-Communists. In the life of a prisoner a small tin cup can be tragically important.

9. By the end of war they had an underground armed force and also control of the electric power used to charge the barbed wires enclosing the camp. They actually had control of the camp police.

The entire intricate network had been craftily planned. From one foothold and outpost to another the Communists had advanced. Nothing was left to accidental improvisation (such as the non-Communists at best had to resort to). For a long time the fine threads of the web were not discernible. Not until the whole apparatus was complete, with all the cogs fitted in and functioning, did it become apparent what had happened and by then it was too late to uproot the Communist structure. The system functioned like a series of huge sieves, one fitting into the other, the lower one catching whatever might have fallen through the sieve on top, and so on down the line.

The power of the Communists was such that they ~~cank~~ held services for the German Communist leader Thaelmann in the very heart of the Nazi concentration camp with all the Communist functionaries present.

The Communists had been preparing well in advance for the liberation of the camp and when that day finally came, the American commander was given a Communist welcome, for although the great majority of prisoners was anti-Communistic, the administration of the camp, especially the camp police, was in the hands of Communists.

In the days just before the liberation of Buchenwald, the camp went through a double reign of terror: the Nazis were out to kill and so were the Communists. The Nazis singled out forty-eight leading prisoners for execution in the hope of terrorizing the prisoners into submission and squelching a revolt as news of the approach of the American Army surged across the entire camp. Zenkl was picked out as one of the forty-eight. For days he hid, hounded from place to place. He took on the identity of a "dead man" and finally was saved by the criminals who hid him in their block in a mud hole under their barrack. In the final stage, as Nazi rule deteriorated and the Communists began to take over, the Reds started a manhunt on their own after Zenkl, the democrat, because it was clear to them that should he survive he would resume his life-long struggle against the Communists.

When peace finally came and the tired world was longing for a rest from strife, the Communists were again far ahead with their plans.

In conclusion: Communism is not a political movement, but a world conflagration led by fanatics who have absolutely no sense for moral values. The greatest danger lies in their ability to infiltrate and undermine any organization, society, church or army. If the fortification proves unassailable, Communists wear down and crumble the rock on which the fort stands. They are tireless in their efforts. Often their activity has nothing outwardly in common with their goal. They sometimes hide their real purpose by pretending to have other ambitions entirely. They can work, for the time being, with their enemy in seeming harmony. They take on many a guileless mask while getting ready for the knock-out blow. There is no weapon to which they would not resort.

To fight communism it is necessary to understand the complexity and intricacy of their methods (of which the concentration camps serves as an example). It is not enough to be mortally afraid of communism and through fear to work at crosspurposes.

To fight dynamic communism requires also a dynamic program.

THE FORD FOUNDATION
655 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

DON K. PRICE
ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR

November 19, 1953

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am sorry that you were unable to get to the meeting of the Board on Overseas Training and Research yesterday. The Board plunged me, as the new man with a responsibility in the international programs of the Foundation, into a thorough discussion of the Board's own role which I hope was helpful all around.

In addition, I wanted particularly to tell you that we have given careful consideration to the proposed research program of Dr. Peter Zenkl. After consulting with our best advisers in the East European Fund, however, I am afraid that we have had to come to the decision that we cannot give Dr. Zenkl any assistance on his project.

I hope very much that I can make up for my failure to meet you this week by getting together at some early opportunity.

Yours sincerely,

Don Price

Don K. Price

Zenkl, Petr

October 30, 1953

Dear Ward:

I should like to make a contribution of $2500, check enclosed, to Help, Inc.

If the directors of Help, Inc. share my view that a study detailing how the communists took over Czechoslovakia has merit, I would like to suggest that a preliminary grant in the amount of $2500 be made to Dr. Petr Zenkl, formerly Lord Mayor of Prague and Deputy Prime Minister of Czechoslovakia at the time the communists took over that country. Should the directors of Help require details regarding this project, I should be glad to supply them.

You will appreciate that this contribution is in no way contingent upon the directors' decision to make a grant to Dr. Zenkl. His address is 2651 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Ward Wheelock
Lincoln-Liberty Building
Philadelphia 7, Pennsylvania

dm

Zenkel, Peter.

Inc.

LINCOLN-LIBERTY BLDG.,
PHILADELPHIA 7, PENNA.

6 November 1953

Dear Ed

Thanks for your contribution of $2500 to Help Inc.

The Directors meet next week - and I will put before them your suggestion for a grant to help fight Communism. I do know their sympathy to the idea - and I will tell them of your opinion that this project is a practical help at a cost within our means.

I'll advise you of the results.

Wood

Mr Edward R Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York N Y

WW:C

HELP Inc., is incorporated under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania as a charitable organization

Zenkl, Peter

October 28, 1953

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Thank you for your letter of October 26th. I certainly hope for a favorable outcome of the Ford Foundation matter.

I thought your recording on the program last night sounded very well indeed. It seemed to us a good idea to present your message on the eve of the anniversary rather than wait until the day itself was almost over. Thanks again for doing it.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Peter Zenkl
2651 16 Street, N.W.
Washington, D.C.

rh

2651- 16th St. NW. Washington
October 26, 1953

Dear Mr. Morrow:

I am very grateful to you for your kind words of October 20th and especially for your information from Mr. Don K. Price Jr. Associate Director of the Ford Foundation. It would make me very happy if it would turn out to be a harbinger of a favorable outcome of the whole matter. At this very moment my own situation is coming to a head. I did not want to bother you with my difficulties, but the time has come when I am terribly hard pressed for financial independence so that I could act as my conscience dictates along the principles for which I have fought all my life for the cause of my country.

I too am very sorry that I could not see you on my last visit. Once again I thank you most sincerely for making it possible for me to speak of my country on the sad occasion of its national anniversary.

Toward the end of the week I shall be in New York and shall try to reach you on the telephone to thank you for your never failing understanding.

Very gratefully yours,

Peter Zenkl

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Ave.
New York 22, N.Y.

...l
...16th St., N.W.
Washington D.C. 9

October 28, 1953
(Thirty fifth Anniversary of the Czechoslovak Republic)

3.55

Thirty-five years ago the Republic of Czechoslovakia came into being. It was founded with the help of the Allies but chiefly by the blood and sweat of its own sons and daughters <inspired by their thousand-year old tradition of love of liberty, independence and the Western orientation of their national culture.>

<Despite the difficulties of the times,> the first twenty years of the Republic were happy years. Under the guidance of the first two presidents, <Thomas G.> Masaryk and <Eduard> Beneš, political life showed extraordinary stability. The nation adopted and lived up to a modern constitution. Human rights were safeguarded to all citizens. <The rights of minorities were conscientiously protected.> With a stable economy and currency, industry and agriculture prospered and trade flourished. There was a healthy balance between agriculture and industry. The trademark "Made in Czechoslovakia" had an excellent reputation. <The living standard of Czechoslovak citizens was good and rose steadily.> Czechoslovak schools were progressive; courts were just. There was great cultural and social progress. In her foreign policy Czechoslovakia strove for peace and upheld scrupulously all treaties. As one of the most loyal members of the League of Nations Czechoslovakia defended the principle of collective security until the very day of Munich which turned this principle into mockery and led directly to World War II.

From 1938 onward fifteen tragic years followed: first the partition of the Republic, then the Nazi occupation and the massacre of the finest Czechoslovak men and women. Then followed the so-called "liberation" by the Red Army which gave the Communists such a head-start that the struggle by democratic means was lost beforehand.

The Communist putsch by force in February 1948 has meant the end to democracy in Czechoslovakia; it has also meant the beginning of a new struggle for the restoration of the values for which the Czechs and Slovaks have been fighting for a thousand years; for freedom and humanitarian ideals.

Czechoslovak democracy was not defeated because of inner weakness: both times it was conquered by enemies from without: first the Nazis, then Moscow. It took the whole free world almost six years to defeat the Nazis in war. As to Moscow, it has swallowed up 600 million people since 1939.

It should be remembered that it was Czechoslovakia which, though surrounded by dictatorships long before Munich, nevertheless resisted fascism the most. After 1945 she held out against communism at her doomed outpost for three years. Her subjugation was not Czechoslovakia's fault, but the fault of short-sighted world politis. In 1939 the policy led straight to the attack on Poland and to world war. After the war it led to the present situation: Moscow now has the atom bomb made from the uranium of the Jachymov mines of Czechoslovakia and in Indochina weapons made by the Škoda Works of Pilsen are being used against the French.

Whenever the Czechoslovaks are not masters in their own house, things are not well with the world. Czechoslovakia has been a beacon light to freedom and justice pointing the way to peace. There cannot be peace unless and until the beace is lighted again and Czechoslovakia celebrates her birthday anniversary in her own family and in the family of free nations.

Zenkl

October 20, 1953

Dear Dr. Zenkl:

Many thanks for your note enclosing copy of your address which we have recorded for use on October 28th. I am sorry to have missed seeing you last Friday. I was unduly delayed at a previous appointment and returned to the office shortly after you had left.

I am enclosing a copy of a letter just received from Don K. Price, Jr., Associate Director of the Ford Foundation, which I think you will like to see.

With best regards.

Sincerely yours,

Dr. Peter Zenkl
2651 16th Street N.W.
Washington 9, D.C.

rh

THE FORD FOUNDATION
655 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

DON K. PRICE, JR.
ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR

Copy to Zenkl

October 16, 1953

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I appreciate very much your sending me the paper from Dr. Peter Zenkl and am looking forward to studying it carefully and consulting with the other officers of the Foundation about it.

The Czech experience is certainly worth analysis. I recall one or two documents written by other Czech emigres on the subject, but they by no means exhausted it.

I am looking forward very much to meeting you in connection with the work of the Board on Overseas Training and Research.

Yours sincerely,

Don K. Price

Don K. Price

DKP:jm

Zenkl
1 16th Street N.W.
Washintton D.C.9

5:00 - 5:15

Washington D.C.,October 9,1953.

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
c/o Columbia Broadcasting System
New York City.

My dear Mr.Murrow,

Pursuant our conversation and your kind permission I am enclosing a copy of my address that I expect to deliver on October 28th.The occasion is the 35th anniversary of the creation of the Czechoslovak Republic.

Awaiting your kind decision whwn and where I can record my speach, I am,with best thoughts

Sincerely Yours

Zenkl

October 9, 1953

Dear Mr. Price:

The enclosed from Dr. Petr Zenkl speaks for itself. I should very much appreciate your consideration of his proposal.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Don Price
The Ford Foundation
655 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

dm

Zenkel, Letr.

THE FUND FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF EDUCATION
ESTABLISHED BY THE FORD FOUNDATION
575 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

OFFICE OF THE
ASSISTANT VICE PRESIDENT

October 2, 1953

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting Company
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

Dear Ed:

I finally tracked down the information you wanted. The person to whom you should speak about Mr. Zenkel's project is Don Price, who was formerly head of the Public Administration Clearing House and has just joined the Foundation as Associate Director in Charge of All International Programs. I am sending Mr. Price a copy of this note and he will be expecting to hear from you.

Don't tell anybody, but you didn't miss a thing by being in Berlin for the last BOTR Board meeting.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

John K. Weiss
Assistant Vice President

cc: Mr. Don Price

Whose office is at 655 Madison

Zenkl, Peter

Peter Zenkl

Born: June 13, 1884, in Tábor, Czechoslovakia.

Studied philosophy and sociology at Charles University where he received a PhD degree in 1907. He was professor at a commercial college and in 1918 joined the Ministry of Social Welfare where he was most concerned with the care of youth and aged. He later became Director for the Central Social Security Insurance Administration.

His political career started in community life. He was Mayor of Karlin, which is a section of Prague, and later for three terms he served as Lord Mayor of Prague. During his terms of office, many social welfare projects were realized and a number of institutes developed to care for the aged and youth, especially students.

He was a leading member of the Czech National Socialist Party, called Benes Party here. Appointed by Benes in 1938 he joined two cabinets but after the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Germans he was arrested and held for almost six years in the camps of Dachau and Buchenwald. Finally he was sentenced to death, but escaped by hiding for a few days and was finally liberated by General Patton's troops in the Spring of 1945.

After returning to Prague, he was elected Chairman of the National Socialist Party which turned out to be the largest and most important non-communist party. Was again elected Lord Mayor of Prague, which post had been seized previously by a Communist in the turmoil of liberation days.

In 1946 was appointed Vice-Premier. Throughout the three years 1945-1948 he was an outspoken opponent of Communism and was regarded as a central figure of the Nation's opposition.

He fought desperately to keep the nation in the Marshal Plan which, however, proved impossible in view of undisguised Moscow pressure.

In the Fall of 1947 an attempt was made on his life and on the lives of the late Jan Masaryk and Dr. Drtina, Minister of Justice. In November, 1947, he held firm against the Communist attempts to force a non-parliamentary cabinet.

After the Communist coup in February 1948 he was put in confinement and escaped with his wife six months later, in August 1948, when God and the good people helped him get across the border to the U. S. zone of Germany.

Peter Zenkl

Born: June 13, 1884, in Tábor, Czechoslovakia.

Studied philosophy and sociology at Charles University where he received a PhD degree in 1907. He was professor at a commercial college and in 1918 joined the Ministry of Social Welfare where he was most concerned with the care of youth and aged. He later became Director for the Central Social Security Insurance Administration.

His political career started in community life. He was Mayor of Karlin, which is a section of Prague, and later for three terms he served as Lord Mayor of Prague. During his terms of office, many social welfare projects were realized and a number of institutes developed to care for the aged and youth, especially students.

He was a leading member of the Czech National Socialist Party, called Benes Party here. Appointed by Benes in 1938 he joined two cabinets but after the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Germans he was arrested and held for almost six years in the camps of Dachau and Buchenwald. Finally he was sentenced to death, but escaped by hiding for a few days and was finally liberated by General Patton's troops in the Spring of 1945.

After returning to Prague, he was elected Chairman of the National Socialist Party which turned out to be the largest and most important non-communist party. Was again elected Lord Mayor of Prague, which post had been seized previously by a Communist in the turmoil of liberation days.

In 1946 was appointed Vice-Premier. Throughout the three years 1945-1948 he was an outspoken opponent of Communism and was regarded as a central figure of the Nation's opposition.

He fought desperately to keep the nation in the Marshal Plan which, however, proved impossible in view of undisguised Moscow pressure.

In the Fall of 1947 an attempt was made on his life and on the lives of the late Jan Masaryk and Dr. Drtina, Minister of Justice. In November, 1947, he held firm against the Communist attempts to force a non-parliamentary cabinet.

After the Communist coup in February 1948 he was put in confinement and escaped with his wife six months later, in August 1948, when God and the good people helped him get across the border to the U. S. zone of Germany.

Peter Zenkl

Born: June 13, 1884, in Tábor, Czechoslovakia.

Studied philosophy and sociology at Charles University where he received a PhD degree in 1907. He was professor at a commercial college and in 1918 joined the Ministry of Social Welfare where he was most concerned with the care of youth and aged. He later became Director for the Central Social Security Insurance Administration.

His political career started in community life. He was Mayor of Karlin, which is a section of Prague, and later for three terms he served as Lord Mayor of Prague. During his terms of office, many social welfare projects were realized and a number of institutes developed to care for the aged and youth, especially students.

He was a leading member of the Czech National Socialist Party, called Benes Party here. Appointed by Benes in 1938 he joined two cabinets but after the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the Germans he was arrested and held for almost six years in the camps of Dachau and Buchenwald. Finally he was sentenced to death, but escaped by hiding for a few days and was finally liberated by General Patton's troops in the Spring of 1945.

After returning to Prague, he was elected Chairman of the National Socialist Party which turned out to be the largest and most important non-communist party. Was again elected Lord Mayor of Prague, which post had been seized previously by a Communist in the turmoil of liberation days.

In 1946 was appointed Vice-Premier. Throughout the three years 1945-1948 he was an outspoken opponent of Communism and was regarded as a central figure of the Nation's opposition.

He fought desperately to keep the nation in the Marshal Plan which, however, proved impossible in view of undisguised Moscow pressure.

In the Fall of 1947 an attempt was made on his life and on the lives of the late Jan Masaryk and Dr. Drtina, Minister of Justice. In November, 1947, he held firm against the Communist attempts to force a non-parliamentary cabinet.

After the Communist coup in February 1948 he was put in confinement and escaped with his wife six months later, in August 1948, when God and the good people helped him get across the border to the U. S. zone of Germany.

Zenkl, Petr

October 9, 1953

Dear Mr. Price:

The enclosed from Dr. Petr Zenkl speaks for itself. I should very much appreciate your consideration of his proposal.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Don Price
The Ford Foundation
655 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

dm

The Evening Star
With Sunday Morning Edition
WASHINGTON 4, D.C.

Slave Labor in the Twentieth Century

(Dr. Peter Zenkl was last Deputy Prime Minister of free Czechoslovakia and former Mayor of Prague. He resigned in protest against the Munich agreement and the Nazis subsequently imprisoned him at Dachau and then at Buchenwald. He was under death sentence when liberated by Patton's 3d Army. After World War II he again became active in the Czech government until the Reds took over and he was forced to flee to the United States. He is chairman of the Executive Committee, Council of Free Czechoslovakia.)

By Peter Zenkl

WHEN THE AMERICAN army finally penetrated into the Nazi concentration camps in the last days of World War II and when reports and photographs first appeared in the press, the free world shuddered at the atrocities. It felt that perhaps being at war was not enough, that more should have been done to save the prisoners and to succor degraded humanity. But today the free world is not at war with the Communists. On the contrary, it has retained diplomatic relations with the Communists and meets with them at the United Nations. Yet for many years there have been concentration camps in the countries behind the Iron Curtain, where millions of people are being tortured and murdered in a way which can be likened to the methods of the condemned war criminals who were executed for their crimes. In the case of the Nazis, the free world could ease its conscience by saying that it had not known of these concentration-camp horrors. Does it have the same excuse now? Can it hide behind the excuse that perhaps all reports on Communist atrocities in concentration camps are only concoctions of warmongers and anti-Communist exiles?

The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations together with the International Labor Office have formed a special Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labor which, upon concluding investigations and hearing witnesses over a period of one year, has published a unanimous report which is a terrible accusation and casts a shadow on the 20th century. The chairman of the committee is a citizen of India, a state of which it cannot be said that it does not adhere to neutrality. The world now has an objective document which it can no longer ignore in silence.

In the technical meaning of the word, forced labor is only a more severe form of the unbearable working conditions prevailing in countries behind the Iron Curtain, while concentration camps are only an intensified form of forced labor. Concentration camps are the logical consequence of the Communist slave system; they can be compared to a dark cell in a prison in a country which has become nothing but a prison. From the Communist standpoint they are the most profitable, positive feature of the state budget, which is geared to arm the Soviet Union against the United States of America. They are also a solution by which the Communist state "solves" the unemployment problems. America is a reactionary state in the opinion of Communists because it does not know how "to solve" unemployment in the Communist manner.

—Star Staff Photo.

DR. PETER ZENKL.

There are concentration camps for prisoners who have to work in mines, especially in the uranium mines; there are concentration camps for factory workers; there are concentration camps for young people and for women; for the army; even for priests and nuns. In a memorandum submitted in May of last year the Council of Free Czechoslovakia gave an accurate picture of prevailing conditions in Czechoslovakia (conditions have worsened since then); there were at the time 247 concentration camps with 350,000 prisoners. That is a high per cent for my small nation! As the population of the United States is 12 times that of Czechoslovakia, the number of prisoners in my country corresponds to about 4 million people in America. Should not this number arouse the interest of the entire world, at least as much as the Communists have stirred up for the 11 Communists imprisoned in the United States?

Although the large number of imprisoned and tortured has reached tens of millions behind the Iron Curtain, it does not fully express the tragedy of this inhuman system. To understand its import we should take into account that the best citizens of the nations behind the Iron Curtain are held prisoners in the concentration camps, the people who could neither be bought nor frightened into submission. These are the people who should be the leading citizens of their nations in time of oppression and upheaval, for they are the democrats who have played an important part in public life and who, as world citizens, have worked all their lives for co-operation between nations and for world peace. In the concentration camps are university professors, scientists, writers, artists, technical experts and industrial promoters, priests and former high state officials. These people are systematically and quickly liquidated; they are being destroyed physically and morally only because they have refused to advocate and practice communism.

Can it then be said that this is an internal problem of the Iron Curtain countries? Is it true, then, that America is on one side and Czechoslovakia, for instance, on the other side and that the problems of the two states are alien to one another? Should it not rather be said that on one side is the free world and on the other side the Communist-enslaved world? Do not these unfortunates in the concentration camps belong to America's democratic ranks? Is not the systematic destruction of human rights a matter for the whole world? Is not their protection one of the most important tasks of the United Nations?

This summer the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations postponed—I point out that the United States voted against the postponement—the above-mentioned report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labor as evidently the matter did not seem urgent to people as yet free. The United States proposed that the report be placed as one of 80 points on the agenda of the United Nations General Assembly. Let us hope that with the exception of the Communist delegates no other state will vote against placing the report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the agenda. It is high time that the United Nations, mindful of its Charter, takes up the problem of human rights as it is indivisibly tied up with the problem of war and peace. Closing one's eyes to the horrors which inevitably sooner or later would lead to war is not serving peace. For a certainty, the horrors and not the effort to correct them would lead to war. World public opinion should make this clear to the fearsome souls who, in an effort to save peace, do not wish to save man. What is the meaning of war and peace? Can the methodical murder of millions be called peace?

The time is opportune to show the Soviet Union that the free world has not forfeited its own self. Communism is passing through a severe crisis and at this time it is again—as often before—making a bid to the free world for several years' respite for its recuperation so that it could continue its aggression with renewed vigor later on.

The question actually is: Will it be possible to buy off the free world by releasing two or three of its journalists and by permitting a few wives of citizens of foreign countries to leave the Soviet Union? Or will the free world insist on the liberation of millions of its best allies behind the Iron Curtain?

December 24, 1954

Dear Adlai:

The purpose of this letter is to introduce an old friend of mine, Dr. Petr Zenkl who is chairman of the Executive Committee, Council of Free Czechoslovakia.

Dr. Zenkl was last Deputy Prime Minister of free Czechoslovakia and former Mayor of Prague. He resigned in protest against the Munich agreement and the Nazis subsequently imprisoned him at Dachau and then at Buchenwald. He was under death sentence when liberated by Patton's 3rd Army. After World War II he again became active in the Czech government until the Reds took over and he was forced to flee to the United States.

I have known Dr. Zenkl for many years and I feel sure that you would enjoy talking with him.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

Mr. Adlai Stevenson
11 South LaSalle Street
Chicago, Illinois

fc

December 23, 1954

Dear Petr:

Thank you for sending me your proposal about the cold war.

I have not been able to make use of this and I am therefore returning the material to you.

I take pleasure in enclosing a letter of introduction to Adlai Stevenson.

Sincerely,

Dr. Petr Zenkl
2651 16th Street N.W.
Washington, D.C.

fc

Mr. Zenkl BU 80908 - Zenkl, Petr 48 3/5

E.M. At the microphone is Petr Zenkl whom you remember from my reports on Czechoslovakia. Mr. Zenkl is known for his cultural and social work as the co-worker of the first president and Liberator Thomas Masaryk, of his successor Eduard Beneš, and of the son Jan Masaryk. As a staunwh defender of democracy he was held prisoner by the Nazis for almost six years in concentration camps. Eight years ago I was happy to announce that miraculously his life had been saved not only from the Nazis, but also from the Communists in Buchenwald who also had marked him for extermination as an outstanding fighter for civil liberties and a free form of government. And again, almost five years ago, I was able to broadcast news of his escape from Communist terror to the free world.

Mr. Zenkl, five years ago the Communists took over Czechoslovakia by force in a coup détat. Would you say that in the five years they have achieved their purpose entirely?

Z. Communists have succeeded in seizing all control. The army, police, government, local management, workers militia, courts and judges, institutions, organizations, including trade unions, all media of information and education, schools, theaters, moving pictures, publications are in their hands They have complete control of production and business enterprise, the entire economic life including communications. Economically and even culturally Czechoslovakia has been firmly integrated into the Soviet orbit. The Communists have seized all the material wealth of the country. They have nationalized all production and private enteprise from factory to barber shop and taxi stand. They are collectivizing farms and punishing those who might impede the ~~progress~~ process. Light industry and production of consumer goods has been converted to heavy industry which is to serve enti ely the Moscow tyrants. Czechoslovakia has become an arsenal for Soviet imperialism. The regime is forcing hundreds of thousands of anti-Communists to slave for Communist goals in concentration and forced labor camps while millions have to work tirelessly for the exploiters. In five years the Communists, merciless slavedrivers of millions, have become masters of all property and material values.

E.M. That means that whatever can be had by brutal force, even human bodies, the Communists have already taken.

Z. Yes, and I must add that the Communists are also exerting all their strength and machinations to gain possession of the human soul as well. Any suspected resistance or semblance of something which might eventually contain seeds of dissension is ruthlessly wiped out. Potential enemies are purged in staged mock trials; the condemned confess to non-committed crimes; people are terrified by the examples of functionaries who stood high in favor yesterday and today are sent to the gallows; even ~~the~~ very young offenders receive long prison sentences . Trusted servants of the regime are rewarded with good living quarters, sufficient food, clothing and fuel; all the others suffer from want. No outward attempt at resistance is permitted. Nevertheless even those who have no thought of disobedience knowing the futility of resistance are envertheless thrown out of their jobs, ~~shipped out~~ and subjected to persecution because at one time they had owned a farm or a factory or had been government employees.

E.M. In other words, the Communists prepare the ground materially for their ideological battle, unprecendented in history in its scope.

Z. Again they have all totalitarian methods at their command: all media, radio, publications, theaters, moving pictures, and schools. The people are swamped with Communist literature and propaganda. Competent teachers have been dismissed and replaced by Communist agitators. The nation's history has been perverted; Stalin has become the object of veneration. Great hatred for the West, especially of the United States, is taught. Textbooks have been replaced with propaganda trash. Parents have been deliberately deprived of any influence on their children. The regime decides who shall study and designates vocations and place of work. Only children of Communists are permitted to attend higher schools of learning. All schools from kindergarten up to and including universities are like assembly lines for producing Communist fanatics; in former "workshops of humanity" hatred and vilest instincts are aroused.

E.M. If Communists are fighting parents for control of children, what must family life be like in Czechoslovakia?

Z. Nothing remains of the former friendly ties between parents and the school. The father and mother are waging a great secret struggle for their child's soul, but they are fighting against odds. Both are exhausted from the daily grind, as even women are given strenuous jobs and heavy labor. Children are taken from their parents at an early age and placed in Communist nurseries where they are taught to spy on and report their own fathers and mothers. In the evening the father must attend meetings and indoctrination courses and on week-ends he is ordered to work in voluntary brigades. After an exhausting day in the factory or so-called public sector, the mother spends hours in queues in her search for food and other household necessities to supplement inadequate rations. Not even in church can people be sure of finding solace because in many instances their priests have been sent to prisons and agents, appointed by the Communists, have taken their place in the pulpit. There is no peace anywhere, not even in the inner family circle. Fear and uncertainty penetrate everywhere. Under such circumstances foreign broadcasting which reaches behind the Iron Curtain has tremendous power and consequently carries not only weight but also responsibility.

E.M. In such a tense atmosphere resistance is bound to grow. Where is it felt most?

Z. In my estimation at least 80 percent, perhaps 90 percent are anti-Communists at heart, but Communist terror is great, so great that it is beyond the imagination of the free world. People in Communist countries have no choice other than to say "Tes" or "I agree." Despite the terror, there is a growing number of anti-Communists; besides the former anti-Communists the factory workers are now turning away from communism because they realize they have been misled by false promises and that the so-called "people's democracy" is by far the most mercenary and heartless exploiter. Thus resistance is growing in factories, workshops and on farms. It is naturally the silent resistance of the clenched fist of an empty hand. People have no weapons.

It is rather an atmosphere of resistance, the lull before a storm.

E-M. In your closing remark could you tell us, Mr. Zenkl, whether, in your opinion, the rest of the world is immune and whether we can help the captive countries?

Z. Communism is like the plague: it can infect anyone and penetrates everywhere; no nation is safe from its poisonous infiltration. The free world should always be mindful of the real aim of communism: that is world domination. When Communists offer to cooperate they are merely trying to mislead their future victims to slacken their vigilance. The free nations should tirelessly unmask the true face of communism and call attention to examples of Communist transgression.

If the free nations hope to liberate the captive nations, thereby insuring their own freedom, they must have for their program more than the defeat of communism. Humanity has gone through terrible suffering; hope for a better world has been trapled. Slogans and promises are not enough to pacify the convulsions through which the world is passing. It was hatred which caused man's present anguish. Only a complete reversal, love of fellow man, friendly cooperation and faith can bring about a change. The world must be made aware of its need for solidarity and of its interdependency.

America is blessed with peace and prosperity; her citizens enjoy freedom and dignity like air and water. Yet they have come from many far-away lands, speaking different tongues, to create one nation.

This program could be extended to other nations; it should be applicable even if people are not all transferred to one country; they should, nevertheless, be able to become citizens of one world with one program and determination: to build for all a world without force and upheaval, without the hardships of past life, so that people, in possession of human dignity and human rights would not hate one another and would not live in constant fear of enslavement. Such a world would insure not only a decent life but also a solution of recurring economic and social crises.

Liberation of nations implies a rebirth of man. Communist oppression should be followed by freedom; the road should lead from darkness to light, from misery to human solidarity, from hatred to tolerance and understanding. Toward such a goal which is dictated not by altruistic motives but in our own self-interest, we should all join forces.

Zenkl

Zenkl, Peter

Christian Science

24. I 53

Peter Zenkl,
Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia:

WHY CZECHOSLOVAKIA HAD TO BE DESTROYED

In looking back on the Communist coup d'état in Czechoslovakia five years ago and on the three preceding years of struggle, the struggle against odds which Czechoslovak democracy had waged from 1945 to 1948 against international Communism, we see more clearly as time goes on that from the start the U.S.S.R. had set out with determination and by design to destroy Czechoslovak independence - unfortunately without having to meet any countermove from the West. The Soviet Union had very important reasons for liquidating the Czechoslovak Republic which the free world did not grasp at the time and which we ourselves are beginning to understand more fully in retrospect. As we weigh the reasons we understand why Moscow was more interested in destroying Czechoslovakia than for instance Finland or Austria, and that it was Czechoslovakia's misfortune to be the first and most important obstacle in the way of Communist plans. As it is little known in the free world, especially in the United States, why Czechoslovakia HAD to be destroyed before the others, it is an opportune time to discuss the matter on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the Communist tragedy.

First of all, strategically Czechoslovak territory is extremely important for the defense and conquest of Europe. Bismarck's words still hold true: "Whoever is the master of Bohemia(the land of the Czechs) is the master of Europe." Hitler likewise could not have launched his attacks on Poland and the West without destroying the Czechoslovak stronghold. From the Soviet point of view the possession of Czechoslovakia, bulging out beyond the line Stettin and Trieste, is a conditio sine qua non for holding Berlin and Vienna, a prerequisite for any drive westward. Through Czechoslovakia run the vital railwaylines from north to south connecting not only Warsaw with Budapest but also Berlin with Vienna. Besides, Czechoslovakia has many air bases far to the West.

Furthermore, Czechoslovakia is very important from the standpoint of armaments. The Skoda Works of Pilsen and the Steel Works of Brno, Moravia, are generally known, but few people realize Czechoslovakia's tremendous war potential in all important military fields, especially in the technical and chemical industries, from the manufacture of railroad cars, tracks and ballbearings to the production of essential army textiles and footwear.

There is also this question to answer: Has Finland uranium mines? When the American army seemingly disregarded the uranium mines of Jachymov, the greatest in Europe, what was more logical than that the Red army should take over these mines?

Moreover, Czechoslovakia was a country with Western culture, very developed social legislation and a high standard of living for workigg men and peasants alike. International Communism was tempted to experiment whether it could communize by force this ~~exemplary~~ democratic state in which, due to the strength of its wide middle class the class struggle was not as pronounced as elsewhere (in contrast to Poland, Hungary etc). In this respect Czechoslovakia was to serve as a guinea pig, a pattern, for testing methods which could later be applied in communizing the other countries of Western Europe. Czechoslovakia, which for twenty years between the two world wars had really been a democracy, certainly the most advanced democracy east of Switzerland, was a thorn in the flesh of the U.S.S.R.; Moscow could not suffer such a democracy in the are which, in fact, (if we do not wish to say "by agreement") had been placed in her sphere of influence. What is more, Czechoslovakia is a Slav state; throughout history the Czechs have had considerable influence on the other Slavs: it was impossible to permit Prague to remain the cultural center of the Slavs when Moscow had usurped this role for herself.

This last reason why Moscow had decided to liquidate Czechoslovakia has not been taken sufficiently into account and has not been given its due interpretation. One reason for this is the fact that the relationship and association between Slav nations seems to have no bearing on the West: it is not a point to be overlooked, however

The influence of the Czech nation on the other Slavs dates back to early history. The Czechs were converted to Christianity in the ninth century by Cyril and Methodius, missionaries from Byzantium, who had brought to ~~our~~ Czech countries from Macedonia ~~the Slavonic~~ a language which became the language of the church. This so-called Old Slavonic, which reached a high degree of perfection throughout the Great Moravian empire of Svatopluk, became the language of mediation of the educated Slavs and the Slav nations; the liturgic Old Slavonic is used to this day by the Orthodox Church. Soon Christianity spread eastward. The Western world is not aware that the second bishop of Prague, Adalbert, a Czech, brought Christiniaty to Hungary and Poland where he is revered to this day as a national saint. Adalbert's shrine in Gniezno, Poland, is one of the most sacred Slav pilgrimages of the Catholic Church.

In the Middle Ages under the Czech King Przemysl Otakar II the Bohemian empire extended across Poland to the Baltic sea; this explains the Czech cultural influence in this territory for a long period of time. Besides the Old Church Slavonic, which in its early stage had been linked with our land, the Czech language was the only really developed Slav language; this accounts for its great influence on the grammar and literature of the other Slav nations. In 1412 Jan Hus, known to the West only as a religious reformer, published his "Orthographia Bohemica," which had a decisive influence in developing the written language of several Slavic nations. During the reign of the Luxemburgs, many Slavs from the East came to study at Charles Univeristy at Prague, the first university in Central Europe (1348); it was this university which gave rise to the first university East of Prague, the University of Cracow. It is little known that through the influence of Hus a Hussite sect (derisively called "židovstujuščie") originated in Orthodox Russia; its members attempted the first translation of the bible into Russian. Printing, which had come to the Czechs from Germany, was passed in turn by them to the whole Slav world. In Prague the first Russian translation of the bible was printed, published by František Skoryna in 1517-1519. The first White Russian and Ukrainian translations of the Song of Solomon were from the Czech language. Besides, the old Czech legend of Brunclik introduced the culture of knighthood to Russia. Even after the battle of the White Mountain and the loss of Czech independence, Czech influence continued under the Jesuits who made Prague the center for their eastward expansion. The Czech Jesuits also wrote the Russian and Lusation Serb grammar in Prague.

At the close of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the nineteenth, Dobrovský, a Czech, and Šafařík, a Slovak, published their great works, and Prague became the center of Slavonic research. In 1848 the Slav Congress convened in Prague: it too left a deep imprint on Slav politics. Havlíček, the Czech journalist and man of political influence, advocated the liberation of Ukraine from the Czars; Palacký, the Czech historian, also asked for the independence of the Ukrainian nation which was recognized as an independent nation by the Slav Congress.

Are not these facts important today?

In the nineteenth century the Czechs had considerable influence on the Southern Slavs. I could name hundreds of Czech and Slovak engineers, technical and production experts, writers, artists, musicians who were active among the Slovenians, Croatians, Serbs and Bulgarians. As an example I shall mention at least one name: Constantine Jireček, the founder of the Serbian science of history, a historiographer of the Bulgarian nation, who upon becoming Minister of Education in Bulgaria introduced the Czech educational system. It should also be said that while the Southern Slavs looked to the Czar as their powerful political protector against the Turks, they thought of the Czechs as their cultural leaders.

The outstanding influence of the Sokol (a patriotic gymnastic organization) which originated and had ~~until now~~ its headquarters in Prague, is apparent. The Sokol meets held periodically in Prague were always a political manifestation, and one may add, a "Western democratic manifestation," of all the Slavs. Here the american Sokols met the Sokols from Russia.

I shall not speak of Masaryk's influence on Southern Slavs, including even the Russians, as these facts are widely known.

Briefly: While Moscow and Petrograd were the focal centers of Slav power, Prague was the Slav center of culture. When Moscow proclaimed her ~~sovereign~~ absolute control over all culture, it followed that she could not permit the existence of a rival. As Prague with her outlying Czechoslovak area had always been, since the days of the distant past, a bridge for higher Western culture eastward, the Communists had to tear down the bridge, if they were to drop the Iron Curtain on all the Slavs.

Upon the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the Communist coup d'état I should like to show: that five years ago Czechoslovakia was destroyed not because she was small and weak, but because she was important and from the cultural standpoint famous, and therefore, that she had to be destroyed. All the facts mentioned earlier by me were only too well known to the Communists. Unfortunately, the West was often not well informed about the Slav world. The present growing interest in Slavonic studies and ~~Slavic~~ Slav languages in the United States is very encouraging. It gives us at one more reason to hope that the West will gradually realize what the loss of Czechoslovakia has meant and that this realization will eventually be the reason for its liberation.

Zenkl, Peter

February 3, 1953

My dear Mayor Clark:

I am of course not competent to express an opinion as to whether Dr. Zenkl could fit into a useful position in your city government. In response to your question, however, I have seen him several times within recent months. There is no doubt that he is emotionally upset and deeply apprehensive about the trend of world affairs. He has, I think, received some rather callous treatment by some of our people responsible for Czechoslovakian affairs and this has added to his sense of bewilderment and frustration. But in spite of this, I would think him capable of sustained and effective work if a position could be found where his talent and experience could be used.

Sincerely yours,

Honorable Joseph S. Clark, Jr.
Mayor of the City of Philadelphia
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

JOSEPH S. CLARK, JR.
MAYOR

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR

PHILADELPHIA 7, PA.

January 23, 1953.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York 22, New York.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you very much for your letter of January 15th about Dr. Petr Zenkl. I share your admiration for Doctor Zenkl and the enormous sacrifices he has made for the cause of freedom. After talking to him, however, I am somewhat concerned about his present ability to fit into a useful position in our City government.

I am wondering if you have seen him recently and whether you share my impression that his personality and manner, perhaps also his age, would make it extremely difficult to find a spot where he could be of real use, even in fields where his experience is very great.

Sincerely yours,

Joseph S. Clark Jr.

Joseph S. Clark, Jr.
Mayor

JSCJr-mc

Zenkl, Peter

January 15, 1953

Dear Mr. Clark:

I trust you will not regard this letter as presumptuous. Having learned that you are giving consideration to appointing Dr. Petr Zenkl to some post in your administration, I am impelled to write you about him.

I have known him since he was Lord Mayor of Prague, in 1937, and found him seven years later in the concentration camp at Buchenwald. As you are undoubtedly aware, he then returned to become Deputy Prime Minister of Czechoslovakia; was placed under house arrest when the Communists took over, and finally managed to escape. Zenkl is no ordinary refugee. He is loath to be subsidized by refugee funds; he was, and is, one of the greatest exponents of democratic principles to be found anywhere in Europe.

I cannot speak for his professional skill in any post for which you may be considering him, but I felt obligated to give this brief testimony regarding the man himself. He is entirely in the tradition of Masaryk and Benes, and I commend him to you without reservation.

Sincerely yours,

The Honorable John Sill Clark, Jr.
Mayor of the City of Philadelphia
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Zenkl, Peter

Dr Petr Zenkl
265[illegible] - 16 Street, N.W.
Washington D.C.

December 21,1949

Dear Sir,

In keeping with my promise I am sending you in the meantime the following particulars :

1./ My curriculum vitae - should there be any need for it,

2./ Several small items of different character,

3./ Several events from the Nazi concentration camp,

4./ An example how the Communists prepared their after-war activity whilst in Nazi concentration camps / Could be worked out in detail /.

5./ Particulars about the torture to death of Col. Lukas, former Czechoslovak military attache in Washington.

6./ Broadcast meditation „A sentenced priest."

I shall send you other items in the near future.

I am looking forward to see you soon again and remain in the meantime with kindest personal regards,

Sincerely Yours,

Zenkl

P.S. Could you kindly notify me which of the about items you cannot use, so that I could utilize them otherwise.

Z E N K L Petr: born June 13, 1884 in Tabor, Bohemia, Czechoslovakia. Czechoslovak citizen.

Education: Elementary School and Junior College, Tabor, Bohemia. Graduate studies at the Faculty of Philosophy at the Charles University of Prague.

Degree: Doctor of Philosophy, Charles University of Prague, 1907; Honorary Doctor of Philosophy degree of the University of Strasbourg, France, 1947.

Occupation:
(1907-1918)- Teaching at Commercial College, Graduate School of Social Service, Praha, Agricultural University in Tabor, Bohemia, Commercial University, Prague.

(1918-1926)- Ministry of Social Welfare, Chief of the Division for the social welfare of children especially of underprivileged, and for the Public Assitance of the aged.

(1926-1948)- General Manager of the Czechoslovak Social Security system.

Public Activity - Educational

(1910-1918)- Organization of educational courses and lecture series for the general public, particularly labor. Organization of educational activity for the working youth. Lectures, courses, pamphlets, editing of popular educational symposia (particularly in matters relating to social welfare, social policy, public health, care of the poor and so on).

Literary Activities: Published High school textbooks on literature and language, many articles, pamphlets and books dealing with the problems of Social Welfare and Social Policy.

Public Administration and Politics:
From 1911-1921 member of the City Council of Karlin. Chairman of its Committee for Public Welfare, particularly for the assistance to the needy; later Mayor of the town Karlin.

(1939-1946)- In Nazi Concentration Camps.

(1921-1946)- With the enforced interruption, while jailed in Nazi Concentration Camps, member of the Administration of the City of Prague, member of the City Council, Chairman of its Central Committee for Social Welfare and public assistance to the needy; for three terms Lord Mayor of the City of Prague.

(1932-1936)- Member of the Provincial Diet of Bohemia, Chairman of its Committee for Social Welfare and public assistance to the needy.

(1938) - Member of the Czechoslovak Government, Minister of Social Welfare and Public Health.

1946-1948 - First Deputy Prime Minister until the February Communist coup.
August 12, 1948 escaped from Czechoslovakia; September 17, 1948 arrived in the United States.
From March 1949 to date Chairman of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia.

In the Field of social welfare, was a functionary in the years 1907 1948 (secretary, chairman and other positions) in various voluntary associations, corporations and institutions, dealing with the welfare of infants, disabled children, mothers, children with physical or mental defects, minor factory youths, welfare of young male and female workers, welfare of the aged, poor, sick and disabled. Further, in organizations dealing with occupational guidance, recreation centers, institutions fighting tuberculosis and other diseases. He was chairman of the Associati of Social Health Institutions of Czechoslovakia and chairman of similar Czechoslovak-Yugoslav association. He extended his activities on an international scale, in particular by participating in many conferences, planning organizations and institutions in this field in other countries, by giving lectures, or directly participating in the establishment of such institutions in Poland, France, Bulgaria, Jugoslavia, Switzerland, Austria Greece, Latvia and Lithuania.

Many reviews and articles were written, as well as studios made abou his activities in the field of public administration, social policy and social welfare (in Czechoslovakia, Jugoslavia, Bulgaria, France, U.S.A. and elsewhere).

For such activities he was awarded many honors by various government and foreign institutions.

During the war he spent almost 6 years in a Nazi concentration camp.

His 40 years in the field of public administration, social welfare, public health and care for the needy, encompassed nearly all the sectors of private welfare activity, as well as all sectors of public action in this sphere; whether it was the sphere of activity of the community of the district, the province or the state.

He was active in all these sectors either as a professional worker, or government public officer. His activities extended both to theoretical preparation, practical field work, organization, as well as its propagatio among the public, in particular to arouse its interest and to get support for such projects. His theoretical findings were applied in the wide praxis of daily life, particularly in actual case work, but above all in legislation. Through his extensive lecturing and publications, he spread understanding and achieved support for an orderly systematic solution of the problems of modern social welfare and for a progressive social policy. At the same time, by thorough research of the social conditions of various sections of the country or groups within the community and by an analysis of the problems, particularly of the city of Prague, prepared a reliable foundation for the practical solution of the problems. Simultaneously by giving lectures and courses at the Graduate School for Social Workers, he educated a considerable number of trained social service personnel to carry out in practice his ideas and proposals in these fields.

Among his greatest achievements is the model social welfare system of the city of Prague. To achieve this it was necessary to combine into one administrative unit the various social agencies of some 45 communities of which Prague consisted. This project, which combines most modern agencies of all sectors of social service and social welfare, he utilized his experience with both public and voluntary social welfare agencies in the city of Karlin, in the years 1911-1921. During the 15 years of work in the city of Prague he succeeded in establishing a model system of child welfare, particularly a system of nurseries, kindergardens, guidance clinics for pregnant mothers, playgrounds, out-of-town health and recreation centers, vacation centers for needy children, juvenile courts, professional guidance, care and supervision of working youths, In the same system the establishment of a network of lodging houses for needy transients and cheap housing projects for the poor, as well as homes for the aged, should also be included. In this respect his project of the Masaryk Housing Group earned acclaim throughout Europe. It is a unit of social welfare institutions established and built by the city of Prague, containing 4.000 beds. There are hospitals for children whose health is in danger, health institutions for children with chronic incurable diseases and homes for the old.

His experience in the field of social welfare was also utilized in the establishment and management of the Czechoslovak Social Insurance System of which he was an organizer and later the General Manager. His previous experience and constant research enabled him to bring into harmony the functions and activities of the social insurance system with those of private welfare organizations with great success in all the sectors of social welfare.

Indecorous maneuver of the Germans evicted from Czechoslovakia.

Everybody remembers well how many tens of thousand Czechoslovaks were innocemtly sent to Nazi concentration camps and forced labor camps, how many were tortured and killed, how many were kept prisoners for many years under the most cunning conditions, how their property was looted and robbed etc.

And now some Germans believe, especially those who came to Germany from Czechoslovakia, that they will bring about the oblivion of all those terrible horrors committed by the Nazis, by enlarging some events which happened during the mass transportation of Germans from Czechoslovakia. Certainly nobody will find excuses and give his consent any irregularities which are understandable but not excusable even during such a large scale movement, but which are nothing in comparison with all the horrors committed by the Nazis against their opponents. It would be better even for the Germans not to liven up these events ! How could it stand comparison with gas chambers, mass murders, death injections, hanging etc.etc.

A sentenced priest.

No doubt, you know that in Czechoslovakia the Communists convicted and sent to prison priests, and probably will continue to do so in the future, who have refused to serve the sacraments of his church to a Communist. I am asking you to-day to think with me about this reality which is worth while for reflection. Because hardly anything shows so well the complete horror, degeneration and - I must also add - thoughtlessness of the communist regime.

Why does the church refuse to serve the sacraments to Communists ? Because it believes rightfully that they cannot be of any use to a believing Communist. Because the sacraments without faith in God, without repentance over committed crimes and without the wish to corect them, are not only dead , but according to the learnings of the church even harmful, because it is done sacrilegiously. And are Communists not approaching the sacraments sacrilegiously ? Communism teaches that there is no God, that religion is an opium for people, that the church is an invention of capitalists etc. I ask you, can a person who believes all this and declares it, have any profit in receiving the sacraments ? You would believe that every priest who refuses a bad Communist the sacraments would receive from the Communists, from the true believers of communism, a praise that he is not aiding the superstition of a bad Communist. You would believe that such a priest would be praised that he is not trying to gain an erring Communist for his camp. If religion is the opium for people - as is written on the church at the Red Square in Moscow - then the Communists should welcome if their own followers are not poisoned by this poison. This is, of course, the way every logical person would be thinking. And this is the way it would be in reality, if ..... yes, if it were only a case for the Communists to slander religion and not only a mean to gain and keep their power.

Religion, my dear listeners, is the expression of relationship between God and the human being. And the Communists cannot possibly stand it that a person could have other relationships than with them; even to have perhaps some duties and obligations, which would precede obligations which they themselves impose on people.

Stalin himself wants to be a God and therefore his portrait is being carried as a large ikon in parades and processions. The Communists are against religion, because they do not want that that which belongs to God to be given to God. And what does belong to God ? First of all the soul. And the Communists desire even the human soul - the same way as the devils want them in tails, the way Mefistofeles in Goethe's Faust. They want for people to sign a bond with their blood. They even want to steal the human soul, to "nationalize it ", as if it were a shoe repair shop, or a wholesale business. Because they know that if they do not posess the human soul, their kingdom is not complete and not eternal.

Now I come to the most important : The Communists are modest - if they cannot have everything immediately. If they cannot have immediately the whole person with his heart and soul, they are content for the time being with his hands and back. They prefer, if it is not possible from the beginning, a miserable Communist who slaves for them even if he does not believe their teaching, to a free man. Therefore they do not like the question whether they are for religion or against it. For the time being they like the shadow of uncertainty in which they can fish - just like the devils of all times and ages. Therefore, and only for this reason suddenly, against their better conviction, they begin to state, that even a good Christian can be a good Communist. They suddenly feel weak and do not wish people to think and once and for all to decide either for God or for communism, or for communism and against God.

And therefore, dear listeners, I ask you not help the Communists to preserve this twilight which they like so much and in which they intend to foil your mind. Ask them specific and clear questions whether they are for religion or against it. Ask them why the communist newspapers write that the refusal to serve the sacraments to a Communist is a hateful action ? Ask them whether they believe that the acceptance of the sacrament decides whether the soul of the dying person will go to heaven or to hell. And if they do not believe it, what wrong did that priest commit ? Ask them firmly : do you believe or not ? Make them answer yes or no ! Make an end to their evasivness. If the performance of a priest is fraud, then why do they imprison him if he is not committing a fraud ? Force them that once and for all their language should be : " Yes,Yes - no, no ! "

Dear listeners ! The imprisoned priest for refusing to serve the sacraments to a Communist is a sign of a great moral and idealistic misery of our time. But mainly it is a great admission of the communist weakness, communist fear of religion, fear of undestructable believe even of the ordinary human being in something higher than communist talk. The Communists themselves must see the absurdity and lack of logic of their brutal action. But fear, as is known, brings about lack of logic and mistakes, a fearful person never thinks clearly - if he thinks at all. And so, dear listeners, the imprisoned priest is an examplary declaration to the wide world of communist helplessness and thoughtlessness caused by thei panic fear. A fear every devil has of the cross, of that cross on which a man died but who has proved most famously the immortality and ever lasting free human soul.

From the end of the war until 1947, Col.of the General Staff, Karel LUKAS, was in Washington, attached to the Czechoslovak Embassy as Military Attache. No doubt many people remember him well who were in touch with him during his activity in the United States of America. Lukas / read : Lukass /, was a regular military man and active during both foreign resistance movements during the first and second world war and among others also took part in Montgomery's African offensive. This Col.Lukas was imprisoned by the Communists without any reason, tortured and tortured to death. Eye witnesses have stated that he was tortured with the use of methods employed during the questioning of political prisoners, i.e.democrats, which makes people with normal feelings shudder.

He was beaten with clubs from the sole of his feet up to his knees which caused the renewal of his war injury and both legs transformed into pillars due to swellings. The soles of his feet were exposed to continuous blows from all directions so that the nails were torn off. In the same way the whole body was exposed to blows and also pricked with clubs until the skin was penetrated. Fist blows caused heavy injuries to his lips and eyes. The body was beyond recognition.

During his questioning methods were used very common for to-day's Prague regime :

1./ The play called bear : Approximately 6 police members are posted in a circle and beat the helpless Colonel who had to walk past them in a circle blindfolded. He was beaten with clubs on all parts of the body. Then he had to walk on his toes which strains the muscles which were receiving blows even more painful.

2./ Then followed a five minutes "rest" for him to think it over. Refusing to respond to the wishes of the police he had to kneel on a chair and place his hands on the support The legs were then securely fastened to the chair. Blows followed to the soles of his feet, alternately along and across until the nails were torn off.

When he fainted cold water was thrown at him and the torture continued.

In this way he was tortured to death and died of interior hemorrhage. This was the death of the courageous Col.Karel Lukas only because he was a democrat and refused to to serve the communist oppressors of his own nation. This case is testified by eye witnesses and the names of the barbarian servants of the murdering regime are known.

ad 4

Nazi concentration camps - school for communist practice after the war.

The Nazis - the Communists ! Two extremes ? Not quite. Two extremely similar systems. Similar in aims, totalitarian, imperialistic interests, even in weapons and means, dishonest propaganda, half truth, lies, creation of fear, torture, forced admission of crimes never committed, torture of prisoners, forced labor, artificial court procedure with false documents etc.

The Communists as prisoners of Nazi concentration camps used even these camps in order to follow their aims. To be able to do this they had to win the favor of the Nazis and then persecuted their democratic co-prisoners, their adversaries, who were also held prisoners in those camps. Many democrats perished in Nazi concentration camps through such communist action. Many outstanding personalities of the communist political world, many members of communist regimes in people's democracies are former prisoners of Nazi concentration camps / as an example the French Minister Marcel Paul, the Polish Prime Minister Cyrankiewicz, the Czechoslovak Prime Minister Zapotocky and others /. Very few people know that a great part of communist after-war co-operation began and was tested already during the war in Nazi concentration camps.

The Communists realized the opportunity to misuse the Nazi camps for their own aims. They took over part of the Nazi's duties in the administration and running of the camp and thereby of a part of the Nazi's power over the prisoners; decisions over the fate the life and death of prisoners, namely those of democratic, anti-communist attitude.

Misusing of power for Communist aims of post-war internationale co-operation :

1./ Buying of souls,
2./ Rewarding of party members,
3./ Removing of democratic opponents,
4./ Dealings with informers and spies,
5./ Rescue of Communist agents,
6./ Ingratiation with the Nazis by means of special services / gifts,handicraft work, drawing up of scientific papers for doctors degrees etc./
7./ Struggle for the youth,
8./ Preparation of the so-called underground movement and of liberation activities. Trumping-up of legends designed for the mystification of the public opinion.
9./ Intelligence work and contact with the world outside the camp,
10./Setting up of communist National committees,
11./Setting up of communist international committees,
12./Creation of national action committees disguised under social aid activities,
13./Preparation of international co-operation among Communists,
14./Instructions from outside and working program of post-war policy,
15./Exploiting the liberation of the camp by the 3rd Army of General Patton for communist propaganda.
16./The communist camp police.
17,/Speedy return of Communists from camp.
18./Creation of unrest in the camp after its liberation and of disorder in the camp papers.
19./The Communists after their return from the camp.
20./Organizing of campaigns of lies and distortions against democratic inmates of the camp.
21./Misuse of the so-called retribution proceedings against Nazi administrators who knew Communist misdeeds.
22./The same on the international field during the trials of Nazi administrators of the camp.
23./Glossing over of Communist offences.
24./Why can we not read the truth about the Communists in the literature concerning concentration camps.
25./The pupils surpassing their teachers ; Communists - Nazis.
   a./ examples of infiltration
   b./ the method of provoking fear
   c./ the breaking of adversaries by creating uncertainty d./ the method of lies and frauds e./ rewarding of fellow-travellers f./ the methods of censorship.

A perfect evidence that the Communists act according to the principles that the aim justifies the means. The change of the methods of Communist camp propaganda during the war an unmistakable evidence that the Communists are capable of substituting one extremist principle to another one, supposing it serves their ultimate objectives. These they pursue by means of deceits, frauds, lies, intrigues as well as murders and through removals of opponents by the most insiduous methods.

At the same time they cover up their abominable doings by slogans about liberators, fighters for freedom and democracy.

Under the cloak of a propaganda about their being the propagators of true culture they aim at the destruction of all culture and civilization, being ruthless fanatics of an insane ideology.

ADDRESS BY DR. PETR ZENKL
AT THE ONESTO HOTEL - CANTON, OHIO
MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 22, 1948.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

WILLIAM E. UMSTATTD, PRESIDING

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

MR. UMSTATTD

We are just a little bit behind time, so I am going to start at once with the few remarks that I want to make before we hear the main speaker of the evening.

These meetings started, as you may recall, sometime in the Fall of 1946. For many years we, at The Timken Company, have been very cognizant of the fact that there has been a Communist penetration in the United States in many different walks of life and in many different types of activity.

The labor unions have had trouble with Communists; the Churches in this country have had trouble with Communists; the business establishments and political bodies have been bothered by Communists, and nothing much was being done about it until in May, 1946, Cardinal Spellman published an article in the American Magazine and called to the attention of the United States that Communism was a real and existing menace. Undoubtedly, Cardinal Spellman had sources of information that were not only authentic, but quite extensive. His article was exceedingly well prepared and he has since written several others along the same line.

After as eminent a churchman as Cardinal Spellman made the attack on Communism, it became a little more popular for people to express their distrust and apprehension about the penetration of Communism in our political bodies. Up to that time it seemed to be a rather dangerous thing to speak out against Communism. One was called a "Red baiter" and other names that are hardly fit to be mentioned here this evening. However, after Spellman's article, other people wrote articles. The F.B.I. made pronouncements and the Department of Justice commenced to get on the trail of some of the known and most outspoken Communists, and I think they uncovered quite a few others.

But our company felt that it would be a wise investment to bring some people to Canton who could speak authentically about Communism. The first man we brought was Howard Rushmore, who at one time was City Editor of the Daily Worker and who, after denouncing the Communist Party, became Labor Editor of the Hearst Publications in New York City. We brought Louis Waldman, who was quite prominent in labor circles in New York and probably represents today more labor unions than any lawyer in the world. He was Socialistic at one time and later renounced Socialism because he felt it was too closely parallel with Communism. He was a very interesting speaker. We also had former Representative Pettingill, who at one time was on the Democratic side of the House of Representatives in Washington and recently has been making quite a name for himself as a radio commentator. We invited Louis Budenz, but our wires got crossed and he was brought to Canton by the American Legion and the Breakfast Club of St. Johns Church, I believe - one of the Catholic Churches, at least. And we intend to keep on with this program of apprising people of the Communist penetration in the United States, despite the attack we have had from several labor leaders in this city, castigating the company and me in particular for having these men come to Canton to speak out against Communism.

I can't get over one statement that has been quoted at great length, not only by our company, but many other companies throughout the United States and by various radio commentators, and that is a known statement recently made by William Z. Foster, who is the head of the Communist Party in the United States. He made this statement before a Committee on Un-American Activities in the United States House of Representatives. I presume he believed what he was saying - he made it under oath.

> "No Communist, no matter how many votes he should secure in a national election, could, even if he would, become President of the present government. When a Communist heads the government of the United States - and that day will come just as surely as the sun rises - the government will not be a capitalist government but a Soviet government, and behind this government will stand the Red Army to enforce the dictatorship of the proletariat."

That to me is an intriguing statement. It is a forerunner of what we might have in store for us if the Communist penetration becomes more effective than it is today. One Communist in a group of one hundred or even one thousand can be very effective, and I am sure the speaker of the evening will touch on that subject, because he happens to be a victim of Communist penetration. At present he is a man without a country.

He was Vice-Premier of Czechoslovakia, a country of some 12,000,000 people, that was set up after World War 1 as the ideal Republic of the world, headed by Thomas Masaryk, a great politician and statesman and a man of extremely high character. The speaker this evening was a very close friend of Thomas Masaryk and his son, Jan Masaryk, who died in Czechoslovakia not long ago from either falling or being forced from a window in a place where he was incarcerated by the Communist Party.

The speaker was at one time Lord Mayor of Prague. He has been an instructor and professor in several Universities in Czechoslovakia and throughout other places in Europe, and has acted as an advisor not only to his own Government, but to other Governments in Europe on matters such as social progress and things of such nature. He has been extended high honors by these Governments whom he has served and is a wearer of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor of France.

I think it is particularly fitting that he be with us tonight to speak upon this vital subject. He gave an extremely interesting talk today at noon. He is a most brilliant man. I think you will enjoy his talk, and it gives me great pleasure to introduce Dr. Petr Zenkl, former official of Czechoslovakia, not only in the City of Prague, but of the Federal Government. He was, as a matter of fact, the last Democratic Vice Premier of that ill-fated country before the Cominform and the Communists took it over and pulled down upon it the Iron Curtain.

It gives me great pleasure to introduce Dr. Petr Zenkl.

APPLAUSE

- -

DR. ZENKL

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen: I must beg you to excuse my bad English, because it is not easy for me. I know you are too kind to me and say "take it easy", but it is easier said than done.

First of all, I want to give you my heartfelt thanks for having made it possible for me to come and talk about certain things which I consider it my sacred duty to tell about. I feel this duty as a man who believes in humanity and who respects the civilization of our time, and I feel it also as a believer in democracy who respects man.

It seems to me that fate has given me a certain mission. It was my lot to live under five governmental regimes in the same country. The first was under the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, then in the young, democratic republic under the leadership of T. G. Masaryk, then under the cruel and violent Nazi protectorate, then under the semi-democratic regime which followed the second World War, and finally under the intolerable Communist dictatorship which came after February, 1948. I was three times Mayor of Prague. I was three times a member of the Government nominated by my friends. It was my lot to spend six long years in a Nazi concentration camp and to be sentenced to hang by the Nazis. It was six days before the camp was liberated by the Army of General Patton.

An attempt was organized by Communists last year against my life and against Jan Masaryk, also my friend, and from the first day of the coup I was put in confinement. They didn't dare to imprison me, because I was too popular for them, so they watched me day and night by a group of sixty Communist watchers and when I walked through the streets, when I visited my doctor, my barber, when I visited the grave of my father in the cemetery, when I visited in the Church, they were always with me with pistols and with revolvers. And still my life was always saved and freedom given back to me - twice at the hands of your countrymen, for which I shall always be grateful to them.

But perhaps I was allowed to live through all those horrors and survive, in order that I might help to open people's eyes in this time of confusion and chaos, so that they might realize that they are living on the edge of an abyss. Perhaps I was spared in order to speak to their consciences and arouse them from their carefree calm so that they might understand that democracy, too, must be dynamic if its antagonist, Communism, is so.

I regret that fate did not endow me with the kind of eloquence which would arouse the attention and concentration of every nerve in my listeners, for I myself am so intensely aware that there is terrible danger in delay. I know, too, that I am laying myself open to the danger of being accused of exaggeration. But I assure you that with Nazism and Communism - two completely similar evils which only have different names, different colors and different emblems - the truth is so bad that it is not possible to exaggerate.

Throughout my whole life I have tried to work in the service of humanity, in the struggle for the freedom of my people, for constructive patriotism, for social peace, for international democracy and cooperation.

After six years of faith in and longing for a lasting peace and a free country, after six years of suffering in a concentration camp, and three years of exhausting struggle for the salvation of democracy in Czechoslovakia before the rape of my country in February, 1948, after six months of being under Communist surveillance in my own home in Prague, of which I was three times the Mayor and to whose welfare I had devoted a great part of my life work, after six months of a Communist paradise which were worse for me and my wife than six years of the Nazi hell, I escaped to the free democratic States, to a free, democratic people.

I want to tell you something about my life. I have spent forty years in the field of social welfare and I have done everything that was in my power to better the situation of others. I felt it was my duty to do everything and we must try to better the situation by social progress to safeguard the social freedom in all countries. I was creator of the greatest institution of social welfare for all people in Czechoslovakia, only because I loved my country, only because I loved my nation, only because I was not a Communist and because I was a No. 1 enemy of Communism I was imprisoned by the Nazis and now the Communists.

I must plead for an understanding of my heart. I am the son of a nation which has often bled for freedom and truth, a nation from which issued a great fighter for freedom of conscience and for the truth, Jan Hus, who was not moved in his resolve even by death at the stake, and today the representatives of the governmental regime of this very people use as the main instruments of attaining their goals, lies, deception, half-truths and fraud.

I am the son of a nation which hates oppression, slavery and subjugation, and which has been or was led to freedom by Thomas Masaryk, Edvard Benes and Stefanik, with the help of the great free nations, and today the Communist usurpers are trampling the freedom of that people mercilessly, using the most despicable methods of mastering them.

I am the son of the nation whose King George of Podebrady, five hundred years ago, was seeking the way to peace among the nations, and which today is being used utterly against its will for the spreading of lying propaganda against the world democracies, which stand for world peace.

Humanity has had a terrible lesson in what is freedom and what is slavery, what is democracy and what is totalitarianism, whether under the Swastika or under the Red Star, no matter what name masks it, and today so many act as if they did not understand all this, or had forgotten it. Things are forgotten very quickly, dangerously quickly. Beware, lest that forgetting be fatal! After three short years there has been a shortening of the sentence of that cynical wife of the head of the concentration camp at Buchenwald, Ilse Koch, as a mockery of everything that is just.

I have not spoken about things that happened to me and to my fellow-prisoners in the concentration camp because I considered the Nazi chapter of history finished. And so I didn't speak about my experience in Nazi concentration camps. But in three years, from 1945 to 1948, I gained experience of Communist behavior and of a Communist regime, and I saw an eloquent similarity between both Nazism and Communism. I think that they are not strangers to each other, but they are brothers. Communists assert publicly that they are the greatest enemy of Nazism, but their leaders have the same task and use the same methods and the same weapons as the Nazis did. There is difference only in the names, in the colors and in the emblems of those two totalitarian systems. And here I see my responsibility and the responsibility of all democrats. After the liberation of the camp the American Commander ordered Germans, Nazis and non-Nazis to visit concentration camps and see all their equipment, prisons, gallows, crematoriums, lamp shades made of tattoed human skin, and so on. And he said to them, "You, all Germans are responsible, not only the Nazis. You had the obligation to be interested in everything that happened under the Nazis." And now I see and understand that not only Communist leaders and Communists, but all of us, and especially all democrats in the world, are responsible for the future. And so I would like to tell you a few stories from my own experiences that will show you that with Nazis, as with Communists, the same weapons and means are used - lies and lying propaganda, suppression of freedom of speech, of the press and of broadcast, hypocrisy, terrorizing, intimidation, and so on.

I have spoken about passing some years in the camp. There was a man, General Koch, who was, I am sure, the greatest brute in concentration camps. His wife was second. His wife was Ilse Koch. I knew Ilse Koch. It would be, however, more correct to say that I was afraid to meet her and that I avoided meeting her, since she was one of the most feared persons in the camp. She lived and profited, together with her notorious husband, from what they squeezed out of the administration of the camp, out of tens of thousands of miserable prisoners and from embezzlement. She loved, among other things, to ride on horseback, either in the neighborhood of the camp or in the large riding academy in which later on innocent prisoners were executed. There was even a music band, composed of prisoners, which had to participate in entertaining her. To meet her was bad luck for any prisoner. Sometimes she became furious because he did not greet her, sometimes because he dared greet her, sometimes because he looked at her and sometimes simply because she was in an ill mood. She turned over his number to the administration of the camp and the prisoner was publicly beaten on his nude body in the face of thousands of other prisoners. Some prisoners considered the necessity of looking at these public beatings as an additional punishment. When they were not watched they closed their eyes, so as not to see the blood streaming from open wounds, and closed their ears so as not to hear the heartbreaking cries of the punished. But Mrs. Koch was made of tougher stuff. She used to stay at the camp fence and look at these brutal tortures with keen interest.

I did not see her within the camp, that is to say, on the territory where the barracks of the prisoners were located. But I met her often enough and even more often I quickly turned about when I saw her coming across the territory surrounding the camp itself where the buildings of the camp administration and the workshops for prisoners were located. Nearby were the villas of the overlords of the camp. In the villa of Kochs there was, allegedly, also a lampshade made of tattoed human skin. To say if it is correct is difficult for me, as for thousands of my fellow-prisoners. It could be answered reliably by those only who have been personally in that villa. Those were Koch's colleagues - and which of them would be willing to testify - maybe against himself? - or those prisoners who had to do the cleaning in that villa. Did they survive all their sufferings? Are they alive today? Or don't they feel some of the blame is on them and wouldn't they be afraid to step forward, since somebody could point his finger at them? How much information on concentration camps has been hidden, how many things have been distorted! Many legends have been built up about concentration camps to obliterate so many crimes not only of the Nazis, but also of the Communists.

I never have been in Ilse Koch's villa and thus I couldn't have seen that lampshade there. But I heard about it from fellow prisoners who asserted that the Koch's had in their home not only a lampshade, but even other articles covered with tattoed human skin, and I saw with my own eyes such articles in the concentration camp as, for example, book binding, pocket knives, and so on, and I heard people say that some of them were taken from Kochs' villa. And I remember that we showed these articles to the American soldiers after our liberation.

In the so-called pathological department I saw a large exhibition of pathological items, for example, the head of a prisoner reduced by an elaborate method to the size of a fist and a whole collection of tattoes in one or several colors. Many of them, especially those with obscene illustrations, were taken away by members of the camp administration and by prominent visitors of the camp. It has been said in the Press that such a lampshade no longer exists. This would be really a mystery, but this cannot change the fact that such lampshades have been produced, a fact which can be proved by thousands of people.

Who knows if Ilse Koch ordered such lampshades for herself? Whom would she have asked directly? Did she inform her husband? Whom did the camp Commander order to provide the lampshade? If she denies having had such a lampshade in her home, could she admit ordering it? Or did she receive it as a gift? I realize, of course, there is not a lot of difference between ordering a product of such vile sadism or taking a fancy to it and using it as interior decoration. I do not know where the lampshades were produced. I was in the pathological department since January 1943 to April 1945. During this period I did not observe the production of lampshades of human skin, but I remember that some time in 1940 an order was broadcasted according to which all prisoners with tattoes had to go to the camp hospital. This concerned as well political as criminal prisoners. Their tattoes were described, measured and even photographed. It was asserted that one of the S.S. physicians wrote a paper on them. Many scholarly papers of different kinds were prepared in the camp. For which many prisoners paid with their lives.

Who could prove now, if some prisoners were killed because of their tattoes? One who ordered it? Would he admit it? Would it be admitted by someone who carried out such an order? I observed the working on such tattoed human skin in the pathological department in 1943 and 1944. Rarely thought, but I still observed it. I took even two such items to Prague, but we who were fortunate enough having survived are insufficient witnesses, and the thousands of dead and killed people are silenced forever and cannot talk eloquently and as warning to the conscience of mankind. But their voice should still be heard. Woe to all of us if their sacrifice should have been in vain! It would be a catastrophe for mankind and its culture if anyone should misuse the fact that the dead cannot speak.

I was invited as a witness to Dachau to the trial of the criminals of Buchenwald. I was invited not to testify on single persons, but to give the court an overall picture of the concentration camp and the life in it. I said what I knew, experienced or heard. I distinguished all these sources of information carefully. I shall do the same thing whenever I shall be asked to discuss this matter. I am a guest in this country, and a grateful guest, since I live here after my escape from my country as a free man. I lost everything, but thus I saved my freedom. As a guest I do not expect to criticize the decisions of the authorities of this country which reduced the life-sentence of Ilse Koch to four years. I do not know in detail what they certainly know and what, as I hope, was not known, also, to the judges when they made their decision. But I know from my own experience that hundreds of my fellow prisoners in my country considered the original sentence on Ilse Koch just. They thought she was not sentenced to death because of her pregnancy. I do not doubt, not in the least, that the reduction in her punishment - while no serious changes in the material used against her have been published - will make a very bad impression, indeed, all over the world on thousands and thousands of people, not only prisoners, but all people. They will interpret it unfavorably. And this evil will be used and misused by those who do not shrink from the distortion of truth, if this only serves their purposes. It is self-evident for me that democracy, democracy of the western type, will never degrade itself by using false accusations, falsified confessions in protocols, 'vanishing' of documents, judicial orders and so on, like those systems which pay a noisy lip-service to justice, but are founded on lies and subterfuge. But with every change of a sentence or even with every amnesty its reasons, sufficient reasons, have to be announced publicly. Punishment must not only, if possible, reform the culprit, but also educate society.

Many people in the world know that the Nazis held a special hatred for wealthy people and that they gladly took their lives. They took a noteworthy pleasure in sending them out of the camps in transports which very seldom returned. They liked to destroy their lives with murderous experiments, injections, etc. But far fewer people know that in the later years the Nazis shared part of their power with inmates of the concentration camps, and that by far the most of those who took part in this sharing, in Buchenwald for example, were Communists. And these people used their power first of all against their fellow-prisoners in whom they saw enemies to their ideology. Therefore, the Communists sent on the transports of death also many democrats, therefore they wasted the lives of many with killing work, and with various other hidden methods when they were ill.

When I was in the concentration camp at Buchenwald, I was investigated for distributing anti-Fascist and anti-Nazi literature. The investigating S.S. man sent a Communist prisoner to get me. At the time he was working in the library and enjoyed the confidence of the Nazi supervisors. His name was Jindrich Vesely.

At the time after my resignation from the Government, when the Communist Minister of the Interior, formerly my colleague in the Government, had me guarded in my home by a whole series of secret police, he also sent to me his confidant, the man who heads the secret police in Czechoslovakia today. By chance, his name also was Jindrich Vesely.

However, what is not chance is the fact that it was the self-same Vesely, a man who was the confidant of both the Nazis and the Communists. And so in all the popular democracies today you will find amongst the chief Communist leaders many former prisoners in the concentration camps. They went to school there, they got practice, they entered into international collaboration which today it is possible to detect very accurately. So-called non-partisan, unified organizations of political prisoners, that is Communist auxiliaries, in Czechoslovakia, Poland, France and so forth, here do very valuable work.

Also in the concentration camps some of the prisoners conducted religious services, in spite of all the rules forbidding it. They would have been severely punished had they been discovered. Nazi law was very strict. The Nazis had an intense hatred of Priests. They tried to humiliate them, if possible. So, for example, my friend - my best friend from the camp - was a Priest. And this Priest, it was decided to send him on a transport and it was dangerous to be transported.

And in the concentration camp at Buchenwald the Nazis constructed a brothel for good prisoners, using women from the other camps.

The Nazi overseers were brutal and knew no limits or moderation in their punishing and tormenting of the prisoners without any reason at all. They laughed cynically at their tears and laments, not stopping beating and kicking them in the most brutal fashion. The armed men were heroes as they opposed the unarmed. But when General Patton's American Army drew near and the order came over the loud speaker that all the S.S. men should leave camp at once, they fled like cowards, they crept fearfully around the prison and ran out of the camp with everything that they still had a chance to steal. Some of the Nazis, who otherwise had spoken with the prisoners only with their hands and feet, in the last days when the American Army was drawing close, begged civilian clothes from the prisoners, in order that they might conceal their origin.

To my dying day I shall never forget the horrible impressions I experienced when I first saw tanned human skin with tattooing on it. Or the helpless prisoners being torn apart by maddened dogs and the tearing of the gold from the mouths of the poor dead prisoners. I shall never forget the experience of determining the identity of the terribly emaciated human bodies that lay in camp in piles of hundreds. When large shipments arrived with thousands of bloodied civilian garments and undergarments sent from other camps, especially from Poland, nothing upset me more than when I saw a child's silk dress pierced by bullets in several places, and how many hundreds of those there were.

When I was head of the social security in Czechoslovakia, according to my plan we started to build a large modern sanitorium in the mountains of Slovakia for those injured people who had tuberculosis. The work had gone so far that before the war the sanitorium was almost ready to take patients. Nothing remained but to add a few supplies. The sanitorium was named for the President of the Republic, T. G. Masaryk. Delegates of specialists from foreign countries came to inspect the sanitorium. The war made it impossible to start activity in it at once. When it did become active during the war in about 1944, there was a special announcement about it which asserted that the Germans brought with them progress and culture wherever they went. So even in Slovakia, in what they claimed was a God-forsaken land, immediately after their arrival, they built this sanitorium whose plans were worked out by German doctors and architects and where all the machines and instruments were of German origin. Lie upon lie. And still hundreds of thousands of eye witnesses knew it was not true.

In the camp there was a doctor without a doctorate. His name was Hoven. He was the chief of a great hospital in the concentration camp, but he was not a doctor. He did not finish his studies. In his hands rested the fate of thousands of prisoners, but he was not prepared for this task. It did not matter, for at the same time the chief of the surgical department of the hospital was a typesetter or lathe operator, and the chief of the internal department was a carpenter or something else. But how is it possible in such a case to use the words hospital and treatment? In the majority of cases it was beating, torture, maltreatment, and murder by the most cruel and most refined methods. There were vivi-sections, different experiments with poisonous teas, injections, and operations without anaesthetic. And this doctor without his doctorate commanded prisoners who also were untrained in medicine, to write scientific treatises for him about the treatment of tuberculosis with coal dust, on the basis of many experiments on prisoners. He learned these treatises by heart in three days and made his examinations at the University at Freiburg with honors. Nobody will ever count how many hundreds or maybe thousands of prisoners were murdered by this cynical doctor.

As I said before, the Nazis had an intense hatred of Priests. They tried to humiliate them in the worst ways. So, for example, a certain Catholic Priest saved his life in Buchenwald because he escaped being transported to another camp by making dissections of corpses as a specialist. The Commander of the camp left him in the camp with a sarcastic remark that "there in the company of the corpses he was in closer touch with God." And the truth is that the Priest saved by his activity in the dissection room the lives of some prisoners even though that may seem paradoxical. How did he do it? For instance, it would become known that some prisoner who died that day was dissected and declared to be the threatened person, and the threatened man was sent to another camp under the name of the dead man.

This Priest also conducted religious services secretly even though it involved the risk of his life. Other Priests who were not able to use the Nazi greeting or who forbade children to use it during their religious lessons, were obliged under the lash, day by day, to mark time in front of a box on which lay an S.S. cap, and tip their caps to it.

Communists oppress and subjugate one nation after another and they are boasting about bringing them freedom and "popular" democracy. They destroy their culture and boast that they are spreading cultures. They assert that they create a workers' paradise and they enslave workers and destroy all solid social reform. They spread evil and boast that they are doing the contrary - the same as the Nazis did.

I remember that I sat in the pathology department at my work table listening, as my duty, to the broadcast to hear if the number of some fellow-prisoners would be called by the administration of the camp. And so I heard from Berlin one day about noon: "The Nazi Germans are a noble nation, indignant at the maltreatment of animals. They create associations against the maltreatment of animals and they reward persons who have merited it by their actions. A decoration was given to a woman and to a university professor."

What sensitivity! And at the same moment in which I heard this boasting I could see through the window how a group of armed S.S. men escorted a group of unarmed prisoners of different nationalities. Some minutes after I heard shooting by which the lives of those innocent prisoners were lost.

Against human beings the Nazis were cruel and inhuman; they destroyed their lives with hunger, but to the animals which they kept in the camps they were really kind. When the prisoners were dying of hunger and starvation, animals were getting milk, meat, honey and so forth.

I saw with my own eyes how an S.S. man sicked a dog on a prisoner who was helplessly bound to the window bars because he tried to escape from the camp. I saw how dogs leaped on people and tore their clothes and bodies. The cries of the wretched prisoners, the laughter of cruel Nazis and the barking of the excited dogs blended into an unforgettable horror.

If the dog of an S.S. man died the prisoners had to stuff him for his apartment. But I received blows because I refused to put a prisoner into the crematorium who was still alive.

I shall never forget the horror which was aroused in us by the horrible cries of prisoners who were hung in trees by their hands tied behind them in the so-called "singing forest." And now you can read and hear of so many cruelties which Communists or their agents are using against the enemies of Communism.

In 1938 I had made for myself in Prague a grey suit. On the first of September, 1939, on a nice, warm day, I was wearing the suit in my office. At half past seven in the morning, two Gestapo men in civilian dress entered my room and ordered me to follow them for a few minutes for a statement. And those minutes lasted almost six years. They took me in a cab to the greatest prison in Prague. An interesting remark: When I organized the social service of the City of Prague, the greatest institution for the old, poor and chronically ill in Europe was named the Masaryk Home because people loved their liberator, Thomas Garrigue Masaryk. And now the same people gave to the greatest prison in Prague the name Gottwald's Home as the proof of its feelings towards him. And so I came into this prison. After some days I was transported to the concentration camps Dachau and then Buchenwald. Immediately after my arrival they took my clothes and put them into a storeroom. They cut our hair, shaved us and dressed us in prisoner's garb. And I had fortune in misfortune.

In the last weeks before the end of the war the Nazis began to steal and transport the clothes of the living prisoners. But they did it according to numbers, beginning with the highest, and I was in the camp almost six years, so they did not come to my low number. When the American Army of General Patton liberated the camp, I received after six years my grey suit in which I had passed the last days of my freedom before the war and now the first moments of my regained liberty after the war. In this suit I came in the care of American soldiers to London to escape the persecution of Communist fanatics in the camp, because they considered me as the No. 1 enemy of Communism. In this suit I returned after six years imprisonment to Prague, to my country which had regained its freedom, unfortunately, only seemingly.

In the month of February, 1948, when I resigned as Deputy Prime Minister because I refused to help the Communists in their efforts to introduce totalitarian police regime in Czechoslovakia, the Communists did not dare to imprison me and so they gave orders that I should be watched by groups of Communist volunteers, fanatics and agents. They accompanied me at every step, on my walks, on my visits to the doctor, to the barber, to Church, to the cemetery and so on. They were armed with revolvers and pistols, but they watched me, as they said, only for my own protection.

At last, after five months of terrible mental suffering, I succeeded in escaping with my wife. I did not escape my watchers. It was not possible without hurting them and I couldn't bear to pay for my escape by doing harm to another person. And so I escaped with my guards who were also not able to endure life without freedom. Three men and the wife of one of them are now waiting in the American Zone in Germany until I shall find for them a job in democratic America. This is also one of my tasks in America, a debt that I owe for my freedom.

But I must finish with my suit. When I prepared my escape I decided to escape from my enslaved country into a free foreign country in the same grey suit in which I already once before had escaped from slavery to freedom. In this suit I left my shackled country and I came as a free man to the free United States. I have only one desire - to return in that suit soon to my liberated country.

We wanted the world to judge our nation by Masaryk and Benes, that is, by those representatives who stood uncompromisingly for a free vote. For this reason, the Czechs and Slovaks must not be judged today by the actions of the present usurpers who seized power by force and held it against the will of the majority of the people.

Just as happened before, our people again are under foreign domination and are thrall to a foreign power and kept in this state by force. In the Czechoslovak Republic the Czechoslovak people do not govern, not even the Communist people govern, but only a handful of Communist usurpers who rule according to the directions of strangers, of Moscow and the Cominform.

In Czechoslovakia there is no democracy, there is a sham democracy, boastfully called popular. In Czechoslovakia there is neither political nor personal freedom and safety. There is only force, oppression and terror. In Czechoslovakia there is no freedom of information, of the Press and of speech. There are only the controlled releases of the Communists. In Czechoslovakia there are no human rights, no human dignity and equality - but only surreptitiousness, the caste system, class hatred and the spoils system.

The slogan of the Czechoslovak Republic - "Truth Prevails" - does not proclaim a reality of the present, but is only the expression of the hope and faith of millions in the future. This slogan was betrayed by the sons and daughters of the nation who were seduced by red ideology, foreign to the national tradition of Czechoslovakia. Because of their loyalty to the national ideals of Czechoslovakia, thousands of her courageous sons and daughters are expelled from schools, discharged from work, arrested and thrown into jail. They are falsely accused and sentenced on the basis of false testimony and in the course of fixed trials.

There is an unbelievable amount of cynicism and hypocrisy which knows how to make use of so much falsehood, fiction, untruth, half-truth, rumor, loaded reports, rigged up trials, attempts at assassination and so forth. It is spreading like the plague, unheeded, stealthily. If the world does not take heed in time, it will be overwhelmed by this plague.

In the Czechoslovak Republic free newspaper men are sentenced to silence. Active journalists in the "popular" democracies are the grave-diggers of freedom and human rights, they are the cowardly ravishers of truth and human dignity, they feed on man's moral poverty.

We call upon the free journalists of the real democracies to aid us in our fight for truth and for the freedom of our sorely suffering nations. Our nations suffer immeasurably, but they are conducting themselves courageously. They are insulted, dulled, persecuted, but they do not give in. In spite of all the lies and deceptions of the regime, there is no doubt about the real thinking of the people. The nation showed it at the elections, really sham elections, at the sokol celebrations in Prague, at the funeral of its beloved President Benes. The people show it by their listening to foreign broadcasts, especially from London, Paris and America. They show it by their exclamations and slogans. They show it by the glances they exchange with one another. They show it by the red and white flowers in a black vase. They show it by their tears at the grave of the unknown soldier and when they glance towards the President's residence, dishonored once by Hitler and now by Gottwald, They show it by their words and by their silences. They suffer, they suffer terribly, but they hope and have faith. The underground is once again the altar of their faith. That faith must not be betrayed.

All good people must become helpers in its realization. Not even the freest nation can enjoy its freedom if it must have the consciousness that there are nations in the world who long for freedom and democracy, but have been deprived of them by force by oppressors.

The interests and the security of the world democracy are indivisible. Czech and Slovak democrats, in the very instant when it was clear that their majority in the nation was irresistibly growing, were thrown into the streets with sly and brutal force. Faith in democracy and democrats gives them strength in their suffering and in their resistance. They believe that the world democracies will achieve that state in which it will be impossible for anyone to trample on the idea for which the terrible war was fought and won, so that even small nations will be able to live freely according to their wishes and so that the agreements of non-interference are not broken. A bit of happiness will bloom for everyone in this world only when the gluttons are satisfied with their share.

The Czechs and Slovaks long for peace with all their souls. They are weary to death from the centuries-long thralldom to the Austro-Hungarian rule, from the first World War, the six years of Nazi occupation and the three years of struggle in the defense of democracy. Even though they were free for only a few years after the first World War, they made a demonstration, in spite of some mistakes, through their young democracy, that they could run their own affairs, that they wanted to create social justice, that they wanted to erase from their character the results of not being free, that they wanted to go the way of progress and to work honorably with others, to be sure as the small work with the great, but still as the free working with the free. They believe that freedom must not be only a privilege of the great and powerful, and that democracy equals freedom and totalitarianism equals slavery. For them life without freedom is not life.

For all these reasons the present condition of Czechoslovakia is a heavy indictment of the world and an appeal for an effective solidarity of the democracies. It is not the Czechs and Slovaks calling for their freedom. Their lips call all democrats to the defense of all democracy and human rights.

I can realize that it must be hard for the citizens of democratic states to understand the horror in a dictatorship and a totalitarian popular democracy. They are, to tell the truth, unbelievable things. But this makes the danger all the greater, and also increases the responsibility of the free Press and of representatives in public life, to tell the people the unvarnished truth. To tell them that under the idea of popular democracy is concealed Communistic totalitarianism. A usurpers' Government of Communists and quislings obeying the commands of Moscow and the Cominform, is called a democratic Government! Under the slogan of freedom of speech all the free printing presses are suppressed and nothing is left but the Communist Press, with the Communist state broadcast, with a Communist ministry of information, with a Communist state film monopoly, and with Communist supervision of all production of literature and art. Under the slogan of freedom of education, all education is seized by the Communists and children made stupid by the Communists from their earliest years. Seized and subordinated by the Communists were the powerful sokol gymnastic organization, the labor unions, the youth groups, women's organizations, organizations of political prisoners, participants in the national struggle from both World Wars. Next in turn will come the Church, farmers and the intelligentsia. Everything, every single thing, is being put in a refined way to the service of Communism aiming at mastery of the whole world, as the Czechoslovak Minister Nejedly, lackey of Moscow and the Cominform, only recently proclaimed again.

Experiences like those I have told you about were the hardest burdens of punishment and imprisonment. I was reaching the extreme point of feeling that I could not, with all the moral strength I had, endure any more and that the time had come when I should reach for the poison which I had carried with me for the worst hours since the Nazis had rolled into Czechoslovakia, and the supply of which I renewed when the Communists forced their way to power in February of this year.

In Buchenwald there was an underground organization of prisoners. Its real object was Communism. It helped the Communists, if it was necessary to eliminate political opponents. It got control of the so-called camp police, of most of the leading positions in the so-called self-government of the prisoners, and so forth. The greatest majority of important positions in the camp were in their hands. Woe to him who tried to stand in the way of their efforts. Many even of the democratic prisoners of the camp saved their lives only by serving them or by collaborating with them. The same system which now prevails in the popular democracies. The Communists were not ashamed to use a Nazi concentration camp as a protection against their anti-Communistic fellow-prisoners, and now they organize new concentration camps.

Six days before the arrival of the American Army the Nazis feared that some of the prisoners might influence the others and that it might come to some kind of demonstration of resistance. For this reason 46 prisoners were chosen and called to the political section. They were to be executed. Amongst them was one single Czech. That honor belonged to me. I saved my life by hiding from the Nazis and their bloodhounds night and day under a square of floor, in a sewer, then in the hospital ward for typhus patients, dysentery patients, etc. Naturally I had to make over my face and my expression, and live under the strange name and number of a dead fellow-prisoner. If the liberating American army had not come, there would have been no rescue for me.

Those six years of imprisonment. That constant uncertainty about tomorrow. The uncertainty about the fate of those dear to me. The uncertainty of life and death day after day and night after night, that looking of death in the face for six whole years, and especially those last days and nights, taught me to look at life differently. It spurred my sense of responsibility to society. It obliges me to arouse the conscience of the world and call attention to the danger which threatens humanity. It did all that. I experienced those so-called last moments before death, when it seemed that every second would be the last. And I know that the greatest comfort in such an hour is if a person can say to his own conscience that he has fulfilled his duty as a man. Rich or poor, a clean conscience is the greatest riches and in the end the only comfort. And all of us have the judgment of our own consciences in our own hands. Can there be anyone who would not want this judgment to sound well?

American citizens, I know quite well what the United States has done already twice for the liberation of Czechs and Slovaks. And so I consider it my duty to tell you of some ways to avoid the danger so that I would not have on my conscience the thought that I have not been sincere to you. Americans, you don't realize how rich you are! You don't realize how happy you are that you have freedom and democracy. This is the greatest wealth of mankind.

And this is what I would advise the Americans. Maintain your wealth, your freedom, your democracy. Maintain it, protect it and safeguard it. Perhaps you think this is not necessary, but I say to you that neither your freedom nor your democracy are safe while other nations who believe in democracy and human rights, too, are oppressed and enslaved by the Communists. The interests of democracy are indivisible. If democracy is to be saved, it is not only necessary to protect what has not yet been touched, but to remedy what has already been affected. If all democracies are not protected, all will be lost. This is the very imminent moment of danger.

The Communists assert that the United States doesn't want peace. It is the practice of the Communists always to suspect others of doing or preparing what the Communists themselves, even secretly are doing or preparing. So they said, for instance, that the Czechoslovak democratic parties intended to organize a putsch in the Czechoslovak Republic, but it was not true. The Communists prepared and organized the violent putsch and took the power into their hands. And so it is with their statements that the Western democracies would attack others.

Only the Communists, the Soviets and their satellites, are aggressive and imperialistic, and all the democrats throughout the world know that the Western democracies are willing to do everything possible in their power for a lasting, just peace. The USSR is acting against the ideals for which the terrible war against Nazism was undertaken. The Soviets are interferring in the internal affairs of other nations in spite of all the promises of Stalin and Molotov. They have the same plan and goal and are using the same methods as Hitler did. They say that they don't wish to wage war or be aggressive against anybody, but they are doing so and are becoming masters in one country after the other. It is so much cheaper and more favorable than a regular war would be for them.

Thank you, Gentlemen.

- -

MR. UMSTATTD

It is getting a little late and I don't think that I can add anything to the message that Dr. Zenkl has given us, but despite the fact that it may be repetitious, I want to read something to you just once more. This is what the Communists say in a sworn statement made by William Z. Foster, head of the Communist Party in the United States:

> "No Communist, no matter how many votes he should secure in a national election, could, even if he would, become President of the present government. When a Communist heads the government of the United States - and that day will come just as surely as the sun rises - the government will not be a capitalist government but a Soviet government, and behind this government will stand the Red Army to enforce the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Sometime, at some date, there must have been a group of business and professional men who sat down at a dinner in Prague or some other city in Czechoslovakia.

Perhaps it was in the 20's or early 30's, and I dare say none of those men felt that they would ever be under the heel of a Nazi ruler or a Communist ruler, but they were under the heel of the Nazis for a matter of years and they are under the heel of the Communists now and may be for a number of years to come.

So, when we become a little too smug and we think it can't happen here, just remember one thing, that there are Communists in the City of Canton who openly hold meetings and have visiting speakers come from New York, Chicago and San Francisco and address those meetings. They openly boast in the Daily Worker and in the Sunday edition of that paper, the Worker, that they are making great strides in securing new members for the Communist Party in the United States, and that they have secured many new members in the City of Canton, Ohio, where such persons as Elizabeth Flynn and others of the Communist Party have spoken to open meetings of the Communists.

So don't get too smug and say it can't happen here. It is happening here now. It is just a question of how far it is going to go. I don't know how many Communists it takes to dominate an organization. In a conversation I had with Dr. Zenkl at lunch today, he was fearful that if one Communist would get in the Cabinet of France that the entire democratic French Government would be imperiled.

I don't know how many Communists it would take in our political bodies to control the situation, or how many it would take in a business organization, in a labor Union, in a Church, in a woman's Club, but I can tell you this, that Communists are prodigious workers. They are tireless workers. They are zealous. They never give up. They can change face from day to day, without any embarrassment at all, as witness the fact that the Daily Worker was screaming against the Imperialistic government of the United States one day when Germany and Russia were allies and the next day when Russia had been invaded by the German Army, the United States ceased to be an Imperialistic government and was the Savior of the world because it advanced lend-lease material to the USSR.

So I think it is only intelligent selfishness on our part to fight the inroads of Communism. That is what our company believes in doing. That is what I believe personally in doing. That is what I hope the large majority of the people in this audience believe in doing. Some people may disagree with me and think that Communism is not so bad, and that, of course, is their right in a country such as ours, but I do believe if a person had the opportunity to see the workings of Communistic States, you would most certainly say that we want none of it in the United States.

And I want to thank Dr. Zenkl personally and on behalf of our company and on behalf of this audience for the message that he has so ably delivered and I hope that it will go a long way towards advancing our preparation and our vigilance against the penetration of Communistic influences in this country of ours.

Thank you very much.

APPLAUSE

The satellite countries of communism had to co-ordinate their economic plans in accordance with a unified plan. The leading slogan is : All for the good of the Soviet Union ! The own interests of the individual satellite and its inhabitants mean very little. Even against the predominant majority of that nation these interests have to be sacrificed for the Soviet monster. The individual 2 and five year plans also look accordingly. The consequences are often against their own interests of the individual country which has to produce only such articles which are suitable for the complete frame of the economic and imperialistic interests of the USSR.

So for example a Czechoslovak factory produces automobiles TUDOR. The production costs according to the official ~~tate~~ rate of exchange are $ 1.370.- and the selling price $ 1.720.- The sale to satellite countries only achieves $ 1.140.-/Poland/ and in some other countries even as low as $ 760.- ~~XXXXXXXXXX~~ / Irak,Pakistan, Ceylon etc./ After the devaluation even as low now as $ 420.- That ~~xxxx~~ means that upon exporting one automobil TUDOR there is a loss of up to $ 1.000.- from the original production cost of $ 1.370.-

Only a country with a communist regime can ~~afard~~ afford this, with a communist nationalized industry, with an enslaved worker's class without rights which are natural in a democracy and with tens of thousands of democratic citizens engaged on forced labor in mines and forced labor camps. This is what the so-called ~~xxxxxxxxxxxx~~ communist heaven of the working people looks like.

w the Communists camouflage their activity with democratic slogans.

One Slavic saying states : When they are catching the bird, they sing for him nicely." In accordance with this the Communists always try to gain the broad masses with pleasant slogans and to organize them unifically. As soon as they succeed to get them together in this fashion, they only change the covering shield for the communist one. Many people find it too late to get off there and this for various reasons. When they finally see through it, it is usually too late.

One of the leading Hungarian Communists, Josef REVAI, stated not long ago in the official Hungarian communist paper /official Communist Party periodical of which all issues had been recalled by the Hungarian Government / that at first the Hungarian Communists masqueraded merely as an "Anti-Fascist" group, hiding their real intentions. / Enclosed document Christian Science Monitor . Please return/.

Similarity according to the example :

The Communist regime in Czechoslovakia gave permission not long ago to organize a German minority which declared that they have not organized a German communist committee, but an Anti-Fascist committee. The slogan, of course, is : Proletarians of all countries, unite ! and also " For peace and people's democracy ! "

Exactly like the Nazis ;: deceit, fraud and lying propaganda.

It will not take long and the covering shield will be painted communist.

ONITOR

the ear" P

PUBLISHED BY THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE PUBLISHING SOCIETY

Vis
Antifaschistisches Komitee
Brno, Koblizna
CH. Sc. M. 2/11/49

Tactics Self-Exposed

An Intimate Message from Washington

Registered in U. S. Patent Office

By Neal Stanford

WASHINGTON

The Hungarian Government recently recalled all issues of the official Communist Party periodical containing a speech made by Jozsef Revai, one of Hungary's leading Communists. Unfortunately—or fortunately—it could not get its hands on a few copies in the hands of some Americans.

These copies have found their way to Washington and it is more than clear after a glance at them why the Hungarian Communist regime tried so hard to suppress the issue. For Comrade Revai had been brutally frank in detailing how the Communists had taken over Hungary and then in outlining what further measures were in store.

Comrade Revai freely admitted the truth of some of the important charges against the Hungarian regime made by Britain and the United States, charges that Soviet and Hungarian Communist diplomats have formally and indignantly denied.

The Hungarian Workers Party gets its real guidance from the Communist Party of the U.S.S.R., from the teachings of Stalin, and from the Cominform, says Revai. The 1947 election was won by the Communists only because they controlled the police and because of the presence of Red Army troops in the country, he declared.

Looking ahead, Revai explained that the current tasks of the Communists in Hungary were to end the coalition with the other parties; "reorganize" the parliament; and transform the country into a genuine dictatorship of the proletariat. The farmers would have to be communized, he stated, and if any help was needed to crush the resistance of the Hungarian people, the Red Army would furnish it.

Seldom have Communist tactics been more clearly exposed than in Revai's speech. He showed that the formation of a "Peoples' Democracy" (a phrase invented to describe the Communist-dominated coalition governments of eastern Europe) is simply a first phase leading to the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

He related how in this first phase the Communists masqueraded merely as an "anti-Fascist" group, hiding their real intentions. Progressively, though, their platform was transformed into "a fight against big fortunes and then against the whole bourgeoisie, into a fight against capitalism, aiming first at the expulsion of capitalistic elements and of the capitalistic class and then at their liquidation." In describing this process, Revai recounted the difficulties in restraining the hotheads in the party who would have revealed their true plans.

After the few remaining large estates had been broken up, then, as Revai put it, "the Kulak became the enemy"—the smaller landowners became the target of the Communists.

Industrial and banking "reforms," he explained, had been championed by the Communists with the objective of advancing communism.

At the start of their campaign for power the Communists thus posed as a legitimate liberal group, and sought to create the impression that Hungarian Communists were "different" from the Soviet Communists.

The Communists, however, could not win a fair election.

Turning to what he called "the second phase" of making a Communist state, he frankly admitted that the party was "aided" at the crucial moment by the Kremlin. "We must emphasize that we received the decisive stimulation and assistance for the clarification of our future development from the Communist part of the Soviet Union, from the teachings of Comrade Stalin. The Cominform was of fundamental help to us."

He then went on to explain that the Communist Party must be more "decisive" in its use of force to achieve its ends, for, he explained, "dictatorship also means exercising force in oppressing enemies." The enemies were presumably to be the resisting peasants who had obtained some land through the land "reforms" voted by all parties in Hungary.

The party, however, need not fear a revolt, he continued. "In our case, we can rely upon the Soviet Union and so can be spared from a civil war."

Revai's speech is one of the frankest admissions yet made by a spokesman in any of the satellite nations that they pledge allegiance to Soviet policy. The lesson it contains for free countries, if not already learned, is that no political party can make an alliance with the Communists and survive.

The leaders of the Communist parties in Central and Eastern Europe are supplying daily a irrefutable evidence as regards both the methods and the real objectives of their subversive activities, as well as the location of the only real authority behind the façade of the so called popular democratic Governments.

Let me quote at random a few passages published in two American papers within not more than two days. They are conclusive.

The Christian Science Monitor of November 2, 1949 brought an editorial entitled "Tactics Self-Exposed". According to this editorial the Hungarian Government recalled recently all issues of the official Communist Party periodical containing a speech made by Jozsef R e v a i, one of Hungary's leading Communists. Out of one of the copies salvaged from this tardy ban the Boston paper brings some extracts from Mr. Revai's speech. Mr. Revai admitted that:

The 1947 election was won by the Communists only because they controlled the police and because of the presence of Red Army troops in Hungary. As regards the future, the Communists in Hungary were to end the coalition with the other parties, "reorganize" - as he calls it - the parliament; and transform the country into a genuine dictatorship of proletariat. The farmers would have to be communized and if any help was needed to crush the resistance of the Hungarian people, the Red Army would furnish it. Mr. Revai divides the activities of the Hungarian Communist Party into 2 phases: In the first phase the Communists masqueraded merely as an "anti-Fascist" group, progressively, however, their platform was transformed into what he calls verbally "a fight against big fortunes and then against the whole bourgeoisie, into a fight against capitalism, ~~aiming~~ first at the expulsion of capitalistic elements and of the capitalistic class and then at their liquidation". After the few remaining large estates had been broken up, "the Kulak became the enemy".

In "the second phase" - that of making a Communist state - Mr. Revai frankly admits that the Party was "aided" (his word) at the crucial moment by the Kremlin. I quote him:

"We must emphasize that we received the decisive stimulation and assistance for the clarification of our future development from the Communist part of the Soviet Union, from the teachings of Comrade Stalin. The Cominform was of fundamental help to us".

He further specified, and I quote him, that "dictatorship also means exercising force in oppressing enemies", has, however, no fears of a revolt, because, in his own words " We can rely upon the Soviet Union and so can be spared from a civil war". Changing the scene and drawing on the W.P. of November 3, to Prague we hear Mr. Klement Gottwald, the Communist President in Czechoslovakia, declare in an inaugural speech opening the Soviet-Czechoslovak friendship week that only Russia's what he calls "mighty protection" made it possible for the Communist Party to seize power in Czechoslovakia in February last year. Displaying further symptoms of the sudden frankness-and, perhaps, of the rather wide-spread anxiety to reassure Moscow as to his utmost loyalty - he further stated that the small nations of Eastern Europe never would have been able to maintain their independence without "political and economic help" from Russia. Spurning his own presidential independence, Mr. Gottwald concluded with an impassioned "long live the beloved leader of laboring people of the entire world - Comrade Stalin."

Priloha A./

Pod formou proletarske organisace dochazi se svolenim cs. vlady k organisovani nemecke mensiny v CSR, k organisovanemu prosazovani jejich pozadavku a k priprave nemeckeho denniku. Pripojen obeznik teto organisace. ()p. 10/7/1949):

Zemekoule s praporem a pismeny AFA.

ANTIFASCHISTISCHE AKTION.

LESEN UND WEITERGEBEN.

Informationsblatt der Deutschen Antifaschisten in der CS.

PROLETARIER ALLER LANDER VEREINIGT EUCH.

FUR FRIEDEN U/ VOLKSDEMOKRATIE.

Werte Genossen und Freunde.

Die ausserordentlich grossen politischen Ereignisse im Februar 1948 haben politisch-wirschaftliche und kulturelle Umwalzlung auch fur deutsche werktatige Bevolkerung in der CSR gebracht. Die endgultige Ausseinandersetzung zwischen der tschechoslov. Bourgeoisie hat mit einer vernichtenden Niederlage der Burgertums geendet. Das Burgertum und seine Trabanten waren die Trager des bourgeouisen Nationalismus und Deutschenhasses. Durch seine Niederlage wurden die Voraussetzungen fur die Lozung des Nationalitatenproblems in der CSR geschaffen. Dem proletarischen Internationalismus wurde an diesem Denkwurdigen Tage eine Bresche geschlagen. Fur uns deutsche Werktatige ergeben sich aus dieser historischen Tatsache grosse Entwicklungsmoglichkeiten von weittragender Bedeutung. Diese Ereignisse haben die Richtigkeit der Generallinie der KPC in vollem Umvang bewiesen. Einen klaren Beweis hiefur erbrachte der IX. Parteitag der KPC, bei dem unter a. auch eine strarke Delegation der Deutschen Sozialistischen Einheitspartei Ostdeutschlands mit Wilhelm Pieck an der Spitze anwengend war. An diesem denkwurdigen und historischen Parteitag wurde der erste Schritt zur systematischen Beseitigung des bourgeoisen Nationalitatenhassen zwischen der tschechoslov. Volkern und dem deutschen Volke getan.

Erwahnungswart ist die Stellungsnahme des tsch. Informationsministers zur deutschen Frage. Ein kleiner Ausschnitt aus seiner Rede: " Wir mussen uns dessen bewust werden, dass die Entwicklung von uns die Uberprufung unserer Gefuhle zum proletarischen Internationalismus und unseres Verhaltnisses zu den demokratischen fortschriftlichen Elementen und Volksteilen Deutschlands fordert, deren Sprachrohr die Soz. Einheits-Partei Deutschlands ist. Auch in Ostdeutschland sind tiefe politische, wirtschafliche, zociale and kulturelle Umwalzungen vor sich gegangen, welche die Macht der Junker, Bankiers und Kapitaristen in ihrer Wurzeln ausgerottet haben. Die Ergebnisse der letzten Wahlen in Ostdeutschland haben gezeigt, dass die Entscheidungen dort in die Hand der Arbeiterklasse liegen. Wir sind verpflichtet die Bedeutung der Arbeit der sogenannten sozialistischen Einheitspartei Ostdeutschlands und der kommunistischen Partei Westdeutschlands voll and ganz zu erkennen. Wir sind aber nicht nur verpflichtet, das richtige einzuschatzen und zu werten, sondern auch im ureigendatenem Interesse uns solidarisch zu erklaren mit jedem Kraften welche gegen der Wiedererrichtung eines agressieven deutschen Kapitalismus entschieden Kampfen und fur den Frieden fur Demokratie und Sozialismus arbeiten. Wir wunschen uns alle, dass die herrliche Sympatie-kundgebung, die man unseren Delegationen aus der CSR entgegenbringt, als ein Zeichen gewertet werden, dass sich das Deutsche und Tschechoslovakishe Volknie mehr feindlich gegenuberstehen werden und dass sich die proletarische Internationale Verbruderung im Sinne DES GEMEINSAMEN Marschierens zum Socialismus verwirklichen wird."

Die neue Entwicklung erforderte die Neuwahl eines deutschen Antifaschistischen Kommitees auf dem Prinzip des demokratischen Zentralismus. Die Adresse des neugewahlten Komitees leutet:

ANTIFASCHISTISCHES KOMITEE (PROTIKOMUNISTICKY VYBOR)
Brno, Koblizna 15/17 I. posch. Tel. 14053.

Das Komitee richtet an jeden deutschen Werktatigen in der CSR dringenden Appel, sich in eigenem Interesse, der neuen Bewegung anzuschliessen und tatkraftig mitzuhelfen, unsere Arbeit erfolgreich zu gestallten. Nicht nur jene, die heute noch Sorgen, Schwierigkeiten haben und irgendwie unter dem Ausswuchsen des bougeoisen Nationalismus zu leiden haben, sondern auch alle anderen Deutschen wenden sich vortrauensvoll an das Antifaschistisches Komitee. Unter den Parolen "Proletarier aller Lander vereinigt euch" "Fur dauerhaften Frieden und Volksdemokratie" "Fur den proletarischen Internationalismus" "Gegen den bourgeoisen Nationalismus." "Fur den Sozialismus" wollen wir gemeinsam mit der werktatigen tsch. Bevolkerung marschieren.

Unser Informationsflugblatt - zum erstenmale seit Jahren wieder eine Deutsche Mitteilungsblatt - soll im Laufe der Zeit einer deutschen sozialistischen Tageszeitung ausgebaut werden, die die politischen, sozialen und kulturellen Interessen der werktatigen Deutschen vortreten soll. Sie soll das Sprachrohr des. tsch. deutschen Proletariats werden. ACHTUNG. SEHR WICHTIG.

Dieser Tage hat die tsch. Regierung eine Verornung herausgegeben, derzufolge alle Deutschen in der CSR, die bisher die tsch. Staatsburgerschaft no h nicht besitzen, oder abgewiesen wurden, um diese ansuchen konnen. Die Frist der Uberrischung der Gesuche lauft vom ersten Juli bis 30. Nov. 1949. Wir fordern die staatenlosen Deutschen sowie die abgelehnten auf, sich in ihrem ursigentlicheten Interesse in unseren Amtsraumen Brno, Koblizna 15/17, I Stock einzufinden. Gesuche und Uberreichungen werden durch unsere Kanzlei durchgefuhrt. ....

WERDET UND WERBET MITGLIEDER FUR DIE BEWEGUNG.

Jeder Deutsche findet sich in eigenen Interesse in unseren Kanzleiraumigkeiten ein. Das Antif. Komitee bereitet die Einrichtung einer deutschen Buchrei

fur seine Mitglieder vor, in der unter anderem auch deutschen Zeitungen und Zeitungschriften aufliegen werden. Die deutsche werktatigen Bevolkerung wird aufgefordet uns bei der Sammlung deutscher fortschriftlicher Literatur behilflich zu sein.

Herausgeber: Antifaschistisches Komitee, Brno, Koblizna 15/17
Redaktion: verantwortlich O. Brichta, Brno, Koblizna 15/17.

ad 2.

All the communist countries

ntries are preparing toadying actions for the celebration of Stalin's 70 th birthday. For this reason the Communists in Czechoslovakia decided to erect a Stalin statue of such dimensions as there is no comparison. The statue will be placed on such a spot that it will be visible from near and far and will face the memorable castle of Prague, the seat of the Bohemina kings and also President Masaryk and President Benes. The height of this statue will reach the roofs of this memorable castle which is a kind of shrine for the Czechoslovak nation. On the other hand Prague has no statues of Masaryk and Benes, their liberators. But it will have a statue of that man who is the highest representative of those who have taken away the nation's freedom.

There cannot be any greater cynism.

The Ministry of Post in Czechoslovakia is preparing to issue a special stamp with Stalin portrait in honor of his birthday. Would it not be better to use the space which the portrait will occupy for reproducing the texts of all the solemn promises with which Stalin promised to the Czechoslovaks repeatedly to preserve their independance and not to interfere into their domestic affairs. This ,at least, would be in accordance with the feelings which the absolute majority of Czechoslovaks have for Stalin.

The Communists are building ad 2

ıg one big,large family whose members are solidly unitied by the slogan : one for all and all for one. So far this can be seen only in such a way that exemplary they are caring each for themselves, for their relatives and nearest. So for example in Czechoslovakia : Notorious is the Minister of Justice and chief of church and religious matters, Dr.Alexej Cepicka / read /, son-in-law of President Gottwald. He excells by his ruthless persecution which he probably learned during his stay in a Nazi concentration camp in Germany. His wife, the daughter of President Gottwald, occupies one of the highest posts at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, without the proper education and special qualification.
The son-in-law of the communist Prime Minister Zapotocky, Communist Kaiser, also without the necessary qualification for his office, as well as other extremely unqualified communist agitators, were sent to important posts as Ministers and Ambassadors. It was sufficient in their case to be avarage editors, salesmen in book shops, doctors in charge of prostitutes in the brothel of the Nazi concentration camp in Buchenwald etc. The Communists are one family ! So far, of course, prosperity only for the nearest family circle !

According to the latest

ad 2

confidential reports the Czechoslovak regime is preparing new court cases , this time also against some of his democratic opponents who managed to escape from the communist hell to western countries, in order to be able to work for the liberation of their country and evade communist persecution. It is a matter of course that the Communists have confiscated all their properties. And once again thruth and justice will be twisted by the prosecutor, by the communist radio and the press will publish false accusations, reproduce falsified documents and protokols and and false admissions. Perhaps there will again be executions, life time and long term sentences ! What a repulsive and even to the middle ages unbecoming inquisition ! There are not sufficient many strong words to condemn such barbaric action ! But the Communists would have a possibility to convince us that we are not saying the truth : They should hold the cases publicly, why don't they admit foreign observers from democratic countries where a free press exists and let them show their documents and evidence to representatives of the United Nations !

Insofar the democratic world cannot find enough strong words to condemn the barbaric, communist methods. But if they believe that they are being wronged then they should by means of producing truth force their critics to revoke even the mildest words of condemnation.

Giesen, Edna J.

CLB

COLUMBIA LECTURE BUREAU INC.

113 WEST 57th STREET
NEW YORK 19, N. Y.
Circle 7-6900

EDNA J. GIESEN
Director

HOLLYWOOD
CHICAGO

October 26, 1948

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The advertising association which was interested in presenting you as a speaker, and about which I talked to you recently, has decided that they might wish to present an entertainment attraction rather than a speaker. Should they change their minds again I will be in touch with you. Thank you for considering the matter.

I had a very nice talk with Dr. Zenkl. I think he would do very well as a speaker and we look forward to representing him. I appreciate your sending him to me, and hope you will continue to keep me in mind should other interesting possibilities occur to you. I plan to add about a dozen speakers to my list for 1949-50.

Sincerely yours,

Edna Giesen

ejg:g

Gieson, Edna

September 13, 1948

Dear Miss Gieson:

Thank you for your letter of September 9th. I am very happy to know that you are definitely interested in Peter Zenkl, but I think it would perhaps be better to wait until he gets here when you will have an opportunity of talking with him and making up your own mind before considering him a definite possibility for Spring engagements.

I shall have him get in touch with you as soon as he arrives. Again, many thanks.

As ever yours,

Miss Edna Gieson
Columbia Concerts Lecture Bureau
113 West 57th Street
New York 19, New York

CCLB

COLUMBIA CONCERTS LECTURE BUREAU

Division of COLUMBIA CONCERTS, Inc.

113 WEST 57th STREET

NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

Circle 7-6900

EDNA J. GIESEN
Director

HOLLYWOOD
CHICAGO

September 9, 1948

Mr. Edward Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Just a note to thank you for telephoning me and to confirm my definite interest in Peter Zenkel.

My sales representatives will be starting out on their Fall booking trips in another week or so, and if you are definitely sure that he would lecture this Spring, and that he would definitely sign a contract under our management when he arrives, I wonder whether it would be safe for our representatives to present him as a possibility for engagements this Spring. We do not ordinarily do this until a management contract is actually signed, but I would be willing to go ahead upon your personal assurance that there would be no embarrassment later.

We could not book a long actual tour for him, but I know there would be a good many spot engagements for him.

I should appreciate your giving me a ring and letting me know what you think about this.

Cordially yours,

Edna Giesen

ejg/rwk

3X

THE FOREIGN SERVICE
OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

AMERICAN EMBASSY

Ottawa, Canada, December 28, 1948.

My dear Dr. Zenkl:

In reply to your letter of December 23rd requesting a letter from me containing my observations of your political activities in Czechoslovakia from 1945 to 1948, it gives me great pleasure to express my profound respect for your activities as Lord Mayor of the Greater City of Prague, Deputy Prime Minister, and particularly as Leader of the National Socialist Party. The outstanding role played by you in the rehabilitation and recovery of Czechoslovakia from the effects of the World War and your courageous struggle against Communism will always be regarded by me as identifying you with the great patriots of Czechoslovakia. The struggle conducted by you to preserve democracy for the people of Czechoslovakia was in the best tradition of all true democrats. The fact that the struggle has been temporarily lost does not in my opinion diminish in the slightest degree the credit to which you are entitled for the fearless manner in which you sought to preserve for the people of Czechoslovakia the way of life and traditions of the great Liberator-President Masaryk.

With every good wish for the New Year to Mrs. Zenkl and yourself, in which my wife and daughter join me,

Cordially yours,

Laurence A. Steinhardt

Laurence A. Steinhardt.

Dr. Petr Zenkl,
2651 Sixteenth Street, N.W.,
Washington 9, D.C.

U.S.A.

Copy of an information given by Peter Zenkl to Hon. Senator W. H. Knowland.

FOR OUR COMMON CAUSE

Most of the Czechoslovak anti-Communist political escapees who succeeded in escaping from their Communist dominated country have come to the United States of America.

They have established here a Czechoslovak anti-Communist movement which works closely with American authorities in their struggle against communism and for the liberation of their country.

From the day of their arrival, they have been under attack by Communists (American and Czechoslovak both); by Germans, especially the Sudetens; by enemies of President Masaryk's and Beneš concept of Czechoslovak democracy; by Czech separatists; by Slovak separatists and former collaborators with the Nazis. Their past and background may be different but their goal is the same: to undermine any effort at reinstating the Czechoslovak Republic.

Whereas members of the former anti-Communist parties in Czechoslovakia are persecuted, jailed and hanged by the Communist regime;

Whereas the anti-Communist political escapees are the target of unceasing attacks by the Communist press and radio as "traitors, American mercenaries, tools of Wall Street" etc., and whereas they are denounced at mass demonstrations and tried in contumation by the Prague regime;

Here the same anti-Communists are under another vicious attack by other enemies ever since their arrival to the United States in 1948. A number of the denouncers is on the list of war criminals; because of their past the anti-Communists have refused to accept them, hence their wrath.

The anti-Communists in exile are not as fortunate as their enemies who always seem to have ample funds for their activities. They could not, for instance, defend themselves in court. Moreover, they feared such publicity would affect adversely the Czechoslovak cause by bringing undesirable emigrés and their accomplices before the American public. More than anything, they trusted the American public to be able to differentiate between them and to draw the right conclusion, especially as Americans have always played an important part in Czechoslovakia's democratic cause and have always been well informed on Czechoslovakia's admirable twenty-year record as a democracy, and on her valiant effort at rebirth, despite Munich, during and right after World War II.

Despite the fact that enemies to Czechoslovakia's democratic cause have loud spokesmen in various American institutions and organizations, the anti-Communists are firm in their belief that the United States officially have not changed their stand and understanding of the Czechoslovak people and their aspirations.

In this regard, American authorities have given us repeated assurances. Czechoslovaks place all their trust in the United States and derive fresh courage from these assurances to resist the Communist regime. Thus the great majority of our people behind the Iron Curtain are, in fact, a part of the anti-Communist world front.

Although our enemy camp, despite the common bond of hatred toward Czechoslovakia's democratic cause, is such a pell-mell, one thing stands out; there are two sources for the diversified action; the German and the Communist. It should be quite clear that even the acts seemingly originating from anti-Communist institutions, by their destructive work serve the Communist purpose in the end.

For a long time Czechoslovak anti-Communists tended to overlook the attacks, even though the enemy had succeeded in reaching high official places in the United States and other democratic Countries. They presumed the case was clear and that American officials were no doubt well informed as to the background and aims of the denouncers.

The situation, however, took a dangerous turn on the day the enemy succeeded in getting into the Senate. This move is important not only to the democratic cause of the Czechoslovak exiles but even to American policy.

The instigators had long announced the forthcoming Senate investigations in their press. Their plotting and denunciations finally were the subject of a hearing by the Senate Subcommittee on Internal Security. I am not breaking my oath when I say that the very anti-Communists most hated and earmarked for liquidation by the Prague regime are the ones who were accused of pro-Communist acts and Communist collaboration.

Viewed objectively, the mere fact that the anti-Communist exiles are actually accused will have serious repercussions. Of course the Communists will not be misled but they will use the fact effectively in their psychological warfare against the United States. Their chief objective has been to discredit the anti-Communist exiled leaders in the eyes of the people at home. For over five years they have tried in vain. The people at home are not bluffed by words; they judge by deeds. To them it will be utterly incomprehensible that their anti-Communist spokesmen in the United States should find themselves under suspicion and in the position of the accused. There is the danger that the people's absolute faith in United States policy could be shaken as they might interpret the recent event as an expression of new and different tendencies in American policy. To them, the Senate has always been a forum where Czechoslovakia's ideals are defended - and they simply will not understand.

Herein lies the danger to the democratic cause. If unchecked, it could do irreparable harm to the anti-Communist struggle on the world front. It becomes imperative to get at the truth and to hold the perpetrators fully responsible for their denunciations.

I was careful not to take any steps until after my hearing because I did not wish to create the impression of asking for personal protection. I cannot remain silent any longer, however. Although the secret hearing may seem preferable, I would have preferred an open hearing in some ways. A course must be found which would not imperil our struggle against communism. American prestige must not suffer. Nations behind the Iron Curtain must be saved from dilemma and American intentions must not be misinterpreted. Political tension in the United States must be averted - for this all would play into the hands of the Communists.

I am not speaking in defense of Czechoslovak interests today: I ask that the good name of anti-Communist exiles of other countries also protected.

As a foreign guest of this great country, I avoid scrupulously taking part in American political life, although my enemies have tried to accuse me even on this score. Nevertheless, permit me as a guest and old admirer of your great people, to point out one important idea: The fact that we political exiles receive American financial support has been criticized by some Americans, yet this outlay is insignificant in comparison with the large sums spent by the United States on other undertakings in this battle against communism. Unless a recurrence of the matter under discussion is avoided in the future and unless steps are taken to undo the damage, the value of the other anti-Communist, far greater investments is in jeopardy.

Peter Zenkl

Washington, D.C.
February 19, 1954

FOR YOUR INFORMATION

For Mr. Ed. R. Murrow.
March 7, 54

I am here concerned with Czechoslovak political exiles in the United States but the matter can apply as well to exiles from other countries behind the Iron Curtain.

The United Nations have on their agenda the charge that the Communists, following their world imperialist goal, have subjugated one country after another and are threatening the whole world.

The Congress of the United States is investigating how the Kremlin succeeded in subjugating one Baltic country after another; it has now announced its intention to extend the investigation to other countries behind the Iron Curtain.

Individuals who have succeeded in escaping from countries subjugated by the Communists are received in the United States with open arms. Their courage and yearning for liberty is made much of in various drives.

It is stressed that highest American official places should publicly declare that the U.S. Government would support anyone who, in his dash for freedom, would help the free world in its struggle against Communism by bringing documentary proof of the danger of Moscow's world imperialism.

- - -

A number of anti-Communists, men active in political and public life, escaped for the very same reason. They fled because they did not wish to be Moscow stooges; because they could not live without freedom. They, too, ~~hax~~ came to the United States to inform the West of Moscow's plans, to warn and to fight Communism. They are the real and potential co-fighters in the free world struggle.

As an example, I have in mind members of one anti-Communist and anti-Marxist Czech political party founded over 30 years ago. Its Board, freely elected in 1947, included 26 members. Of these 11 have escaped and are living in exile; 8 were imprisoned; 1 died and the fate of 5 is unknown; only 1 is a traitor, now in the Communist regime.

Unfortunately, Czechoslovak democratic exiles did not ~~meet~~ find only understanding in this country. Many of their political enemies also managed to escape to the United States. Among them are people who have always opposed the concept of Masaryk democracy and the idea of an independent Republic of Czechoslovakia; during the years, they opposed Masaryk's son and President Beneš; some even collaborated with the Nazis, Fascists and Communists. A number of them are determined to wreck any effort at re-establishing a Czechoslovak Republic. Some of them would prefer the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia; after Munich they welcomed the creation of the so-called Slovak State, Hitler's puppet state - this despite the fact that the Slovak State later declared war on the United States.

Their list is increased by American and other Communists and by German extremists and those who are not in favor of peaceful co-existence between a democratic Germany and a democratic Czechoslovakia. They are concocting various schemes against Czechoslovakia and Czechoslovak democratic exiles.

- - - -

Though these enemies of Czechoslovak political democratic exiles may have different aims, they are united in their hatred and often participate in hostile acts, against the democrats. They seem to be amply supplied with funds not only from their members but also from foreign sources or regimes. While the democrats are hard pressed for funds to defend themselves and their work, the enemy has money enough to flood public and government offices and individuals with propaganda. They know how to make full use of totalitarian methods such as signed petitions, letters, half-truths etc.

In this way they have managed to penetrate into high places. They have won the support of several Congressmen and senators. Finally, through their tireless efforts, three+ (to date) leading members of the Czechoslovak democratic exile were subpoenaed by the Jenner Subcommitte on Internal Security and brought before a one-man committee (Senator Welker) in executive session. What irony that anti-Communists, elected by their people at home in free elections - the peoples rightful spokesmen in exile, should be investigated for pro-Communist activities in the Senate of the United States! Fortunately, other Americans took up the cause of the Czechoslovak democrats in exile.

- - - -

It is beside the point whether any member of the United States Senate has the right to question foreign political representatives on their political record at home. The fact that the hearings are "secret" makes the matter all the worse because the supoenaed are not able to defend themselves and protect themselves from the mudslinging in the press which is going on unabated. The subpoenaed victims would prefer by far an open hearing.

The crux of the wole matter is this: Is this the way to fight Communism? Is it the way the right of political asylum should be respected? What can be the reaction of the anti-Communist people living behind the Iron Curtain when they hear that their elected spokesmen in exile are running the gauntlet of suspicion and shame? Is this the way to strengthen the will to resist of the unhappy millions who could be America's most reliable allies? Is this the way to strengthen their faith in the United States?

+ Hubert Ripka
Mikuláš Feršenčík
Peter Zenkl

They were not yet invited to appear in the Foreign Aff. Committee, but in the Internal Security Com!

No matter who may be back of these hostile attacks against the Czechoslovak anti-Communists in exile - no matter who may be financing the campaigns, there is no doubt but that he is supplying the Communists with dangerous weapons. Perhaps it is done without Moscow's initiative and backing- but it is playing straight into Moscow's hands.

- - - -

Are the men who organize and conduct American anti-Communist campaigns, especially those beamed behind the Iron Curtain, aware of the gravedangers? It should be clear that the millions of dollars spent on radio broadcasts could be entirely wasted. "Balloons" and other messages would really be "up in the air," for under such conditions anti-Communist statements and promises would become mere utterances.

Where are we slipping?

Those of us who have experienced the initial stages of Fascism, Nazism, and Communism, who can evaluate the situation psychologically, feel that something in the air which poisoned the minds and weakened resistance of even strong men in the advent of the Fascist plague.

To replace Satan with the devil is utter folly.

Sen. Welker Accused Of Smearing Czech

A top CIO official yesterday charged that a Senate subcommittee has permitted itself to be made a tool in a political fight among Czech emigres, with consequences that make fine grist for the Communist propaganda mills.

James B. Carey, CIO secretary-treasurer, in a letter to Vice President Richard M. Nixon, made the charge against Sen. Herman Welker (R-Idaho) as a one-man subcommittee acting for the Jenner Subcommittee on Internal Security.

Carey said that Welker, at a closed hearing held on February 2 accused Hubert Ripka, Czech Foreign Trade Minister prior to the Red coup, of being a Communist as head of the Council of Free Czechoslovakia.

The council, Carey asserted, is recognized by the State Department as anti-Communist.

Welker, he said, permitted Czech political enemies of Ripka to attend the otherwise closed hearing, and these foes even assisted Welker in interrogating Ripka.

Carey told the Vice President that even though the hearing of February 2 was in secret, the "full story" was printed in a Czech-language daily printed in this country. The CIO official said another member of the council had already been subpenaed by the subcommittee for a further hearing Tuesday.

"If the most respected and authoritative leaders of the democratic forces of Czechoslovakia are to be brought before a star-chamber hearing as virtually prejudged, common criminals and if their political enemies are able to use such a committee of the United States Senate to destroy their usefulness, we will have given the greatest possible assistance to the Communists," Carey declared.

It is almost certain that reports of the secret subcommittee hearing have been "gleefully" transmitted by the Reds to Czechoslovakia, Carey said, "to demonstrate what happens when people flee from Communist domination to the United States."

Carey said no one could have read Ripka's "Czechoslovakia Enslaved," published in 1950, without having a great deal of admiration and sympathy for those who fought the Communists for three years.

TURNER'S
FINE FURNITURE

Dr. Ed

U. S To (

Dr. E Nation'

the number as 1,456. The list has since grown to 2,200.

A check with Government personnel offices showed that any person who left the Government's employment at present received a copy of his "personnel action sheets," the original of which is on file with the Civil Service Commission.

This sheet notes, for example, whether an employe left voluntarily, such as for personal reasons; whether he was separated for economy reasons in a reduction-in-force program, or whether he was discharged.

Inquiry Funds Voted

Meanwhile, on Capitol Hill, the economy drive of Senator Allen J. Ellender, Democrat of Louisiana, apparently ran out of steam, and the Senate appeared ready to invest nearly $500,000 in its two subcommittees that investigate Communists and subversives.

Without objection, the Senate passed a $228,000 appropriation to finance the work of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, headed by Senator William E. Jenner, Republican of Indiana.

At the same time, the Rules Committee unanimously recommended to the Senate an appropriation of $214,443 for the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, headed by Senator Joseph R. McCarthy, Republican of Wisconsin. Floor action on the fund is expected tomorrow or Friday.

Senator Ellender challenged duplication and extravagance by the investigating groups, but did not raise a formal objection when the money for the Jenner group was voted by unanimous consent.

In a formal report to the Senate, Mr. Jenner said that his subcommittee "will continue its inquiries into education, the United Nations and interlocking subversion in Government departments." It also will look into subversive influences in Latin America as they affect this country's security.

Specifically, he listed fourteen continuing investigations as follows:

1. Alleged Communist control of the United Furniture Workers of America.
2. Alleged Communist control of the Distributive, Processing and Office Workers of America.
3. Alleged Communist control of the American Communications Association.
4. Alleged Communist activities of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, Inc.
5. Reported Communist activities of Czechoslovak national groups in exile in the United States.
6. Communist activities in the Washington, D. C., area.
7. Alleged Communist control of the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers Union—Southern industrial area.
8. Alleged Communist domination of the maritime and longshoreman industry—East and West Coast areas.
9. Alleged Communist influence in teachers union—Philadelphia area.
10. Alleged Communist activities in the Federal Shorthand Reporters Association, New York.
11. Alleged Communist penetration in the United Steelworkers Union.
12. General investigations of communism in labor organizations.
13. Alleged Communist influence in the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, independent—Philadelphia area.
14. Communist infiltration of United States Consulates and Embassies—employment of naturalized United States citizens and citizens of Soviet satellite nations.

Senator Jenner declared in a statement that "we haven't caught up with the leadership of the Communist underground in these United States," but "we are still on its trail."

This I Believe

N. Y. Herald Tribune
FEB 16 1953

"Belief Is Not an Evangelical Matter," Declares a Prominent American Author

This is one of a series of statements prepared for broadcast by people in all walks of life on the things they believe in. They are heard in a program presented by Edward R. Murrow over WCBS at 5:55 p. m. Monday through Friday.

By Wallace Stegner
Novelist, Teacher, Author, "Big Rock Candy Mountain"

It is terribly difficult to say honestly, without posing or faking, what one truly and fundamentally believes. Reticence or an itch to make public confession may distort or dramatize what is really there to be said, and public expressions of belief are so closely associated with inspirational activity, and in fact so often stem from someone's desire to buck up the downhearted and raise the general morale, that belief becomes an evangelical matter.

In all honesty, what I believe is neither inspirational nor evangelical. Passionate faith I am suspicious of because it hangs witches and burns heretics, and generally I am more in sympathy with the witches and heretics than with the sectarians who hang and burn them. I fear immoderate zeal, Christian, Moslem, Communist, or whatever, because it restricts the range of human understanding and the wise reconciliation of human differences, and creates an Orthodoxy with a sword in its hand.

I cannot say that I am even a sound Christian, though the code of conduct to which I subscribe was preached more eloquently by Jesus Christ than by any other. About God I simply do not know; I don't think I can know.

However far I have missed achieving it, I know that moderation is one of the virtues I most believe in. But I believe as well in a whole catalogue of Christian and classical virtues; in kindness and generosity, in steadfastness and courage and much else. I believe further that good depends not on things but on the use we make of things. Everything potent, from human love to atomic energy, is dangerous; it produces ill about as readily as good; it becomes good only through the control, the discipline, the wisdom with which we use it. Much of this control is social, a thing which laws and institutions and uniforms enforce, but much of it must be personal, and I do not see how we can evade the obligation to take full responsibility for what we individually do. Our reward for self-control and the acceptance of private responsibility is not necessarily money or power. Self-respect and the respect of others are quite enough.

Turns to Conscience

All this is to say that I believe in conscience, not as something implanted by divine act, but as something learned from infancy from the tradition and society which have bred us. The outward forms of virtue will vary greatly from nation to nation; a Chinese scholar of the old school, or an Indian raised on the Vedas and the Bhagavad Gita, has a conscience that will differ from mine. But in the essential outlines of what constitutes human decency we vary amazingly little. The Chinese and the Indian know as well as I do what kindness is, what generosity is, what fortitude is. They can define justice quite as accurately. It is only when they and I are blinded by tribal and denominational narrowness that we insist upon our differences and can recognize goodness only in the robes of our own crowd.

Man is a great enough creature and a great enough enigma to deserve both our pride and our compassion, and engage our fullest sense of mystery. I shall certainly never do as much with my life as I want to, and I shall sometimes fail miserably to live up to my conscience, whose word I do not distrust even when I can't obey it. But I am terribly glad to be alive; and when I have wit enough to think about it, terribly proud to be a man and an American, with all the rights and privileges that those words connote; and most of all I am humble before the responsibilities that are also mine. For no right comes without a responsibility, and being born luckier than most of the world's millions, I am also born more obligated.

Copyright, 1953, Help, Inc.

THE EDWARD R. MURROW CENTER OF PUBLIC DIPLOMACY

TUFTS UNIVERSITY
THE FLETCHER SCHOOL OF LAW AND DIPLOMACY
Administered with the cooperation of Harvard University

MEDFORD
MASSACHUSETTS 02155

MEMORANDUM

TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian

FROM: Eleanor G. Horan, Curator, Murrow Collection Eleanor Horan

DATE: October 31, 1973

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection - Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

Attached are valuable letters from the Edward R. Murrow Collection. I would ask that they be placed in the Wessell Vault with those sent you previously. They are identified as follows:

1. Lady Clementine S. Churchill's letter to Edward Murrow dated April 16, 1949.
2. Lady Clementine S. Churchill's letter to Mrs. Janet Murrow dated March 3, 1965.
3. Lady Clementine S. Churchill's letter to Mrs. Janet Murrow dated April 28, 1965.
4. Anthony Eden's letter to Edward Murrow dated November 25, 1954.
5. Albert Einstein's letter to Edward Murrow dated April 21, 1954.
6. Hubert H. Humphrey's letter to Edward Murrow dated March 19, 1965.
7. Lyndon B. Johnson's letter to Edward Murrow dated November 15, 1955.
8. Lyndon B. Johnson's letter to Mrs. Janet Murrow dated April 29, 1965.
9. John F. Kennedy's letter to Edward Murrow dated May 28, 1958.
10. John F. Kennedy's letter to Edward Murrow dated June 10, 1958, signed "Jack."
11. John F. Kennedy's letter to Edward Murrow dated July 2, 1958.

12. Krishna Menon's letter to Mrs. Janet Murrow dated December 6, 1965.

13. Robert Oppenheimer's letter to Edward Murrow dated December 30, 1954.

14. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Edward Murrow dated October 3, 1950.

15. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Edward Murrow dated March 7, 1955.

16. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Edward Murrow dated March 31, 1955.

17. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Edward Murrow dated November 10, 1955.

18. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Edward Murrow dated October 9, 1956.

19. Albert Schweitzer's letter to Edward Murrow dated December 1, 1955 and translation.

20. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated February 16, 1954.

21. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated February 23, 1954.

22. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated September 21, 1955.

23. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated January 7, 1958.

24. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated January 16, 1958.

25. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated February 4, 1958.

26. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated February 5, 1958.

27. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated May 13, 1958.

28. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated May 21, 1958.

29. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated August 8, 1958.

30. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated November 24, 1958.

31. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated November 29, 1958.

32. Harry S. Truman's letter to Edward Murrow dated December 12, 1958.

Bob Komidar
10/31/73

WESTERN 1617.

28, HYDE PARK GATE,
LONDON, S.W. 7.

16 April, 1949.

My Dear Mr. Murrow,

I did so much enjoy seeing you and Janet during our brief visit to New York.

I think it was charming of you to send me the records of your "Chronicle of the War". I am taking them down to Chartwell and we shall play them, as also "Kiss Me Kate", during the Easter weekend.

Please give Janet my love, and please do not forget to let me know when you come to England.

Yours very sincerely
Clementine S. Churchill

March the 3rd 1965

CABLES
TREEFERN
BARBADOS

HERON BAY
ST. JAMES
BARBADOS, B.W.I.

My dearest Janet,
I am grieved to hear your sad news about Ed. I send you both my dear love.
Please tell him if he is well enough for a message.
I am so so

Sorry dear Janet

Love from your very affectionate

Clemmie

BARONESS SPENCER CHURCHILL

April the 28th 1965

Lady Churchill
28, HYDE PARK GATE,
LONDON, S.W.7.
KNIGHTSBRIDGE 7171.

My Dearest Janet,
After the letter I got from You in Barbados, I felt there was no hope & I prayed that the struggle would not be too long. That is nearly 3 ~~two~~ months ago -
I am more grieved for You than words can tell.
He was so young to die. But what did he not achieve in those Yours. I really believe he brought America into the War.

I send you my love dear Janet; and my prayers are for you in this sad and solemn hour.

Yours very affectionately

Clementine S. C.

Foreign Office,
S.W.1.

November 25, 1954.

My dear Ed,

I have been shown the letter which you wrote to Howard Smith on November 16 about my interview with him for the programme "See It Now".

I am so glad that you thought it a success. Such praise coming from you is great encouragement.

With best wishes,

Yours ever,

Anthony Eden

Mr. Edward R. Murrow.

April 21,1954

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System,Inc.
485 Madison Ave.
New York N.Y.

My dear Mr.Murrow:

I am sending you this letter to invite you cordially to visit me at my home if your time permits. I would not have the courage to do so if I would not have the hope that,in doing so,you could serve a very good cause. My good friend,Mr.Alexander Sacks,who will bring you this letter will explain it to you in detail.

Aside of the good purpose I should be happy to meet again a man of so outstanding merits in our difficult and troubled times.

Yours very sincerely,

A. Einstein.

Albert Einstein.

April 21,1954

Mr.Edward R.Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System,Inc.
485 Madison Ave.
New York N.Y.

My dear Mr.Murrow:

I am sending you this letter to invite you cordially to visit me at my home if your time permits. I would not have the courage to do so if I would not have the hope that,in doing so,you could serve a very good cause. My good friend,Mr.Alexander Sacks,who will bring you this letter will explain it to you in detail.

Aside of the good purpose I should be happy to meet again a man of so outstanding merits in our difficult and troubled times.

Yours very sincerely,

A. Einstein.

Albert Einstein.

THE VICE PRESIDENT
WASHINGTON

March 19, 1965

Dear Ed:

Thinking of you and hoping the doctors will give you the best of news.

Will be looking forward to seeing you here -- hale and hearty.

Warmest regards.

Sincerely,

Hubert

Hubert H. Humphrey

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
New York Hospital
525 E. 68th Street
New York, New York

LYNDON B. JOHNSON
TEXAS

United States Senate
Office of the Democratic Leader
Washington, D. C.
Hye, Texas
November 15, 1955

Dear Ed:

I was very happy to learn from your note that I am to receive an album of excerpts from Winston Churchill's speeches. I can't think of anything that would be more stimulating than to be able to listen again to those wonderful words from one of the greatest men of our or any generation.

Sincerely,

Lyndon B. Johnson

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

April 29, 1965

Dear Mrs. Murrow:

It was with deep sorrow that Lady Bird and I received the news of Ed's death.

I know that we need not reiterate to you our profound respect and sincere admiration for Ed and all that he accomplished in his rewarding life. You and Casey have all our sympathy, and our prayers that God may bless you and enable you to persevere throughout these difficult days.

Sincerely,

Lyndon B. Johnson

Mrs. Edward R. Murrow
Glen Arden Farm
Pawling, New York

JOHN F. KENNEDY
MASSACHUSETTS

COMMITTEES:
FOREIGN RELATIONS
LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, D. C.

June 10, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Ed:

Many thanks for your letter of June 3.

I understand perfectly about the postponement of this year's project; and I look forward to hearing from you about the new program which you have in mind.

What is this I hear about your entering the political arena?

As always, I am grateful for your interest and friendship.

With every good wish.

Sincerely,

John F. Kennedy

JFK:gl

JOHN F. KENNEDY
MASSACHUSETTS

COMMITTEES:
FOREIGN RELATIONS
LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, D. C.

May 28, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

Dear Ed:

Inasmuch as I am now under some pressure to firm up my schedule for this fall, I am writing to inquire whether you have set any tentative dates for the overseas project we earlier discussed. Being fully aware of the vicissitudes of your profession as well as mine, I would understand completely if you have found it necessary to postpone this project until some other year. If, however, you are still interested in going ahead, it might be desirable to agree on a time schedule now and for members of our respective staffs to meet during the summer.

As one who continues to admire greatly your craftsmanship as well as your news analysis, I am grateful to you for your cooperation and understanding.

With every good wish.

Sincerely,

Jack Kennedy

John F. Kennedy

JFK:gl

JOHN F. KENNEDY
MASSACHUSETTS

COMMITTEES:
FOREIGN RELATIONS
LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, D. C.

July 2, 1958

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Dear Ed:

Your new project sounds fascinating indeed. Let me know any time I can be of help, and we can get together on a date.

Meanwhile, if you are ever in Washington and have a free moment, come by for a chat.

With every good wish.

Sincerely,

Jack Kennedy

John F. Kennedy

JFK:gl

KRISHNA MENON

19, TEEN MURTI MARG
NEW DELHI.

12/6/65

My dear Janet-

I was very grieved to learn from a rather belated press report that my very good friend, your beloved husband had. to no more. It is sad for you, and I know may not convey sadness. He was a great man and a friend, rare these days. The acquaintance with him, who was introduced to me by Harold Laski, is among the few treasures one carries to nurse at this advanced age in one's life! He left a mark on whatever he did and no one could fail to be swept into his vitality and affection. I could bear so. But how can I hope to console you. Time alone can do that.

Oppenheimer, Robert

THE INSTITUTE FOR ADVANCED STUDY

PRINCETON, NEW JERSEY

OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR

30 December 1954

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It was good of you and Mr. Friendly to come to talk with me yesterday. As you will surely know, I have from the first been most grateful for your interest in undertaking a story about the Institute, knowing you both as a great craftsman, and a man of great courage and spirit. It is thus natural that I should readily defer to your own judgment, and understand your decision to present an account of the Institute almost wholly through the conversation that you and I had about it.

Perhaps I ought to add a word. Had you, a month ago, offered to devote one of your programs to a sketch of one Robert Oppenheimer, even my great respect for you would not have overcome my own certainty. I would have refused. I thus take courage to ask you again to make the program that you are planning for next week as much as it can be a story about the Institute for Advanced Study, and as little as it need be a portrait of one man.

With the warmest good wishes,

Robert Oppenheimer

Robert Oppenheimer

Mr. Edward Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

2 PARK AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

MURRAY HILL 3-6810

UNITED STATES DELEGATION
TO THE
GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

October 3, 1950

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The heightened interest in the United Nations since the meetings have been televised is again in evidence, this time by the attached letter.

It certainly is wonderful, and I hope the broadcasts will continue.

Sincerely yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

[Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt]

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York, New York.

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
211 EAST 62ND STREET
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

March 7, 1955

My dear Ed:

I have had a young secretary in the country for several years and she wants now to come to New York and find a job so that she can complete college. She is interested in the kind of work that you are doing and would especially like to have an opportunity to join your staff in some capacity. Her name is Miss Doris Muller and she will be here at my apartment until the 31st of March. She would like to see you at any time that is convenient for you if this is possible. My telephone here is TEmpleton 8-0330.

I talked to Dr. Fromm and think he will try to see you too. I think they will need a great deal more advice on what they hope to accomplish.

Very cordially yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
211 EAST 62ND STREET
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

March 31, 1955

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thank you very much for your letter regarding Miss Muller. I deeply appreciate your interest in finding an opening for her.

With my good wishes,

Very sincerely yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
211 EAST 62ND STREET
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

November 10, 1955

Dear Mr. Murrow:

I am so pleased to have the recordings by Sir Winston Churchill and I want to thank you warmly for thinking of me.

With deep appreciation and the hope we will be able to arrange a mutually convenient date soon.

Very sincerely yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
211 EAST 62ND STREET
NEW YORK 21, N. Y.

1

October 9, 1956

Dear Mr. Murrow:

You probably remember Mr. Louis Bean the government economist who made the successful predictions about Mr. Truman. He has some interesting things to say, I am told, about the health issue in the present campaign which he would like to discuss with someone.

Is there any chance that you might interview him on the health situation of both candidates?

Very cordially yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

Mr Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New-York 22 NY USA

Docteur Schweitzer
Gunsbach. Haut-Rhin
France 1 déc 61

Cher Monsieur Murrow

Vous êtes bien aimable de me faire l'honneur de vouloir me faire parler sur les choses africaines. Mais, j'ai le principe de ne pas parler en public sur les ces choses là. Je suis un simple médecin qui vis depuis plus de 50 ans dans la forêt vierge africaine, et y travaille. Ce que j'ai eu à dire, je l'ai dit dans mon récit de mes activités Dans les Forêts vierges Primaires Forêt, ils y a de longues années. Il me faut que je dois rester dans mon rôle d'humble médecin et de ne pas parler des politiques et des opinions du public. Excusez-moi, je vous prie.

Votre dévoué Docteur Schweitzer

Veuillez excuser aussi le retard de ma réponse. J'étais en voyage et pendant des semaines et tout mon courrier est devenu en chaos.

Par principe je ne pose pas non plus pour la télévision et je ne fais pas enregistrer des discours. Je suis vieux et veux simplifier

Translation ---

Dear Mr. Munro,

You are very kind to with your invitation to speak about Africa
But, helas, principally I do not speak pu about these things. I am a simple doc for more than 40 years in the equatorial there I work. What I have had to say - I in my book "On the Edge of the Primeval Fo been many years. I believe that I have to my rôle as simple doctor and not speak political African affairs. Excuse me, p
Yours devotedly

Please excuse also the late reply to your let travelling during several weeks and my correspond to honor me can affairs.

publically
doctor who lives
l forest, and I have said —
Forest" — it has to stay in eak about please tally
A.S. letter. I was ondence is in a class.

By principle I also ~~pose~~ let myself not be taken by television cameras or make sound recordings of speeches. I am old and want to simplify life.

by on by my

Truman, Harry

HARRY S. TRUMAN
FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING
KANSAS CITY 6, MISSOURI

February 16, 1954

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Thanks a lot for your telegram of the thirteenth. I appreciate the opportunity you gave me very much and enjoyed the show.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Person to Person CBS New York
485 Madison Avenue
New York City, New York

Truman, Harry

HARRY S. TRUMAN
FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING
KANSAS CITY 6, MISSOURI

February 23, 1954

Dear Ed:

Thank you very much indeed for the book and the record THIS I BELIEVE. It was certainly kind and thoughtful of you to send them to me and I more than appreciate it. I am going to enjoy both of them.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Person to Person CBS New York
485 Madison Avenue
New York City, New York

Truman, Harry

HARRY S. TRUMAN
FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING
KANSAS CITY 6, MISSOURI

September 21, 1955

Dear Ed:

October third would be more convenient for me than any other day, and I believe the office would be the proper place in which to do the job. I hope I will have an opportunity to discuss the situation with you before the program starts.

I have refused to do this sort of thing for the rest of the gang for the reason that if I started, I couldn't stop. But because you are in a class by yourself, we'll go ahead with it.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Truman, Harry S

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

January 7, 1958

Dear Ed:

I wish you would tell Eric Sevareid, Winston Burdett, Peter Kalischer, Alexander Kendrick, Ernest Leiser, David Schoenbrun and Daniel Schorr that I more than appreciated the privilege of listening to their reports from at home and abroad. I only wish it had been possible for me to talk personally to everyone of them.

That was a wonderful luncheon at the Overseas Press Club; too much Truman was its sole fault.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Truman, Harry

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

January 16, 1958

Dear Ed:

Thank you very much for the Holiday greetings from you and your staff. It was kind and thoughtful of you to remember me.

Mrs. Truman joins me in the hope that 1958 will be a year of great success and great contentment for you.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

I'll never forget Florida — and I won't forget the Over Seas Press meeting!

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
585 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Truman,

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

February 4, 1958

Dear Ed:

Enclosed is a letter I received, signed by a Jane Hendrix. The envelope was postmarked Ontario, California.

As my pencilled note indicates, I am pleased to welcome you into my club.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
585 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Enc.

Truman, Harry S.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

February 5, 1958

Dear Ed:

I hope you read Dave Lawrence's article this morning. It made me feel good.

Here is one boot-licker whose column is based solely on statements after the fact, and I am sure now that we touched them where it hurts most.

If we had not had something like this, I would have been worried to death about the value of our project.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Unless the opposition squeals we've missed our objective!

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
585 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

May 13, 1958

Dear Ed:

Thank you very much for your telegram of the 7th.

You were kind and thoughtful to remember my birthday, and I am sorry that you could not join us for the celebration.

I know that you got a fine interview with Prime Minister MacMillan, and I will look forward to seeing and hearing it.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

I'm still hearing from ours. The only thing wrong is that everyone of the communications is for office & I'm not accustomed to that!

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

May 21, 1958

Dear Ed:

Thank you very much for your thoughtfulness in sending me that editorial from the Manchester Guardian.

Clippings of editorials from several Canadian papers, this one from England and the various comments I have heard expressed in this country, indicate that appreciation of our joint efforts approaches the universal.

It's an old story for you but new and unique for me.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Truman, Harry S.

Sent script to Mr Robbins, N.C. 8/11.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

August 8, 1958

J

Dear Ed:

Mr. Jhan Robbins of This Week magazine is writing an article based on a few talks with me and certain statements I have made in the past.

He believes it would be of help to him to read a written transcript of your recent interview with me on television and will call at your office in the next few days to see if such a transcript is available.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI
November 24, 1958

Dear Ed:

Thanks a lot for your letter of the 7th, enclosing the check for the Attlee broadcast.

I more than appreciated it and I am looking forward to a view of it because I want to be sure that you got your money's worth out of it.

I hope everything is going well with you and that it will continue to go well.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N.Y.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

November 29, 1958

Dear Ed:

Thank you very much for your telegram of the 26th.

I'm looking forward to seeing that interview with Attlee and will be more than pleased to have a print of the film for my Library.

I expect to be in Washington on December 3rd and 4th and again on the 6th, 7th and 8th. If you happen to be in that neighborhood at the time, I would be very happy to see you.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Truman, Harry

HARRY S. TRUMAN
INDEPENDENCE, MISSOURI

December 12, 1958

H. wants to call him,

Dear Ed:

I expect to arrive in New York on the 22nd and stay there until the 27th.

Perhaps we can get together then for a discussion of some of those things in which we are both interested.

I will be at the Carlyle, as usual.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Haven't had a chance to See Lord Attlee as yet but I hope to run it here in the Library soon.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

TUFTS UNIVERSITY
MEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS 02155

TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian

FROM: Gregory Henderson, Acting Director, Murrow Center of the Fletcher School

DATE: December 3, 1970

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection -Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

We very much appreciate your keeping in your archives the following valuable letters which are part of the Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection until such time as our Murrow Memorial Library facilities are available:

1. Sir Winston Churchill letter to Edward R. Murrow, Esq., dated December 17, 1945.

2. Howard Smith letter to Edward Murrow, dated April 23, 1953, attaching Churchill letter of December 17, 1945.

3. Sir Winston Churchill letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated 10 February, 1955.

4. Clementine S. Churchill letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated February 10, 1955.

5. Edward R. Murrow letter to President Dwight D. Eisenhower, dated April 8, 1954 (carbon).

6. Dwight D. Eisenhower letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated October 16, 1954.

7. Dwight D. Eisenhower letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated November 9, 1954 (Note: President Eisenhower must be refering to the kinescope of Benson PERSON TO PERSON sent to him.).

8. Dwight D. Eisenhower letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated April 21, 1955.

9. Edward R. Murrow letter to President Eisenhower, dated April 27, 1955 (carbon).

Received 12/3/70 Florence Forsyth
Wessell Library

WESTERHAM 93.

CHARTWELL, WESTERHAM,
KENT.

December 17, 1945.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I regret the unavoidable delay in replying to your letter of December 5, but as my Secretary has explained over the telephone, I cannot undertake to broadcast to America on Christmas Day, as you have so kindly suggested. I thank you nevertheless for your courtesy in writing to me.

Yours sincerely,

Winston S. Churchill

Edward R. Murrow, Esq.,
The Columbia Broadcasting System Inc.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.
EUROPEAN OFFICES
26 HALLAM STREET, LONDON, W.1

OFFICE OF THE EUROPEAN DIRECTOR
HOWARD K. SMITH

TELEPHONE LANGHAM 1166 & 1167
TELEGRAMS COLBROSYS LONDON

23rd April 1953.

Dear Ed,

I could not bring myself to bind this letter into my Churchill books. Save it for Casey. The old reprobate (not Casey; Churchill) is undeniably a great man, and the value of having known him will increase with the years.

See you soon.

Howard

Howard Smith.

Mr. Edward Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York 22 New York.
U.S.A.

10, Downing Street,
Whitehall.

10 February, 1955.

My dear Mr. Murrow,

I feel I must tell you how much I appreciate your moving broadcast tribute on my birthday, and your kindness in sending us a recording of it so that we could hear it. I value deeply the sentiments you expressed, and I was touched and pleased by all that you said.

Yours sincerely,

Winston S. Churchill

Mr. Edward R. Murrow.

February 10. 1955

10, Downing Street,
Whitehall.

My dear Ed. Winston and I listened to the master
Recording which you collec arranged a broadcast for his birthday. We are mov that you should have sent your genius. Knowledge - understanding to know him - We felt sad pa of the time because of the situation which is unfolding & developing such grim mystery – so the War one hopes – much that our War comradeship with Russia would continue & we shall not to work

us at all but to
in their immensity.
sufficient to themselves.
I do think you much for having done this for Winston in your own country.
Please give Jane
my love. Yours ever
Clementine S.
Churchill

Edward R. Murrow

EDWARD R. MURROW
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

April 8, 1954

Dear Mr. President:

I think it was Shakespeare who once said, "Beggar that I am, I am even poor in thanks".

Permit me to take this opportunity to repeat what I said when you first arrived in London: that if there is any capacity in which I can serve my nation, I am yours to command.

As ever yours,

President Dwight D. Eisenhower
The White House
Washington, D.C.

BC: MR. PALEY

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

October 16, 1954

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It was especially good of you to send me greetings on my birthday. I want to express my sincere thanks for your friendly thought.

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
C.B.S.
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

November 9, 1954.

Dear Ed:

To my chagrin I find I never acknowledged the pictures you sent me back in September. I hope you will forgive my bad manners, and know that I was truly appreciative of your thoughtfulness.

With warm regard,

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York, New York.

Personal

DDE

THE WHITE HOUSE

April 21, 1955

Dear Ed:

I wonder if it would be convenient for you to come to an informal stag dinner on the evening of Monday, May sixteenth. I hope to gather together a small group, and I should like very much for you to attend if it is possible for you to do so.

Because of the informality of the occasion, I suggest that we meet at the White House about half past seven, have a reasonably early dinner, and devote the evening to a general chat. While I am hopeful that you can attend, I realize that you already may have engagements which would interfere. If so, I assure you of my complete understanding.

I shall probably wear a black tie, but business suit will be entirely appropriate.

With warm regard,

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower

P.S. As a personal favor to me, would you keep this reasonably confidential until after the event?

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, N. Y.

Corl.

April 27, 1955

Dear Mr. President:

As my British friends would say, "It is not without considerable pleasure and appreciation that I accept your gracious invitation to dine at the White House at half past seven on Monday, May sixteenth."

Sincerely yours,

President Dwight D. Eisenhower
The White House
Washington, D.C.

rh

THE FLETCHER SCHOOL OF LAW AND DIPLOMACY

MEMORANDUM TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian DATE: July 3, 1974

FROM: Eleanor G. Horan, Curator, Murrow Collection E G Horan

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection - Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

Attached are valuable letters from the Edward R. Murrow Collection. I would ask that they be placed in the Wessell Vault with those sent you previously. They are identified as follows:

1. Charles A. Lindbergh's letter to Mr. Murrow dated April 29, 1953
2. Helen Keller's letter to Mr. Murrow dated March 13, 1954
3. Harold Macmillan's letter to Mr. Murrow dated June 6, 1958
4. Dag Hammarskjold's letter to Mr. Murrow dated November 9, 1955
5. Harry Truman's letter to "Ed" [Murrow] dated November 16, 1955
6. John F. Kennedy's letter [Jack] dated November 19, 1955
7. Adlai E. Stevenson's letter to "Ed" [Murrow] and signed "Adlai" dated November 21, 1955

Received 7/3/74 Shirley B. Johnson
Wessell Library

Noted and returned

File

Scotts Cove
Darien, Conn.
April 29, 1953

S/10

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Your March 18th letter arrived just after I had left on a month's trip which kept me almost entirely out of contact with office and mail. I want you to know how much I appreciate your invitation to appear on the television program. I hope you will understand when I say that I am most anxious to continue living and working quietly, and have therefore, for some years, declined all invitations to speak or take part in public occasions.

It was very considerate of you to write. Many thanks.

Sincerely,

Charles A. Lindbergh

Charles A. Lindbergh

A.

S/N

March 18, 1953

Dear Colonel Lindberg:

The Saturday Evening Post people were in to see me about doing a portion of our television program, See It Now, in conjunction with your forthcoming series of articles. We told them we would be very interested in doing something with Colonel Lindberg and that if that would help them so much the better. They are all for it, but feel the invitation to you must come from us.

It is my suggestion that you and I could sit down around a table and chat for an hour or so about your Paris flight. It would be my intention to film the entire conversation and then you and I could view it together and determine which sections would make the best historical document. If you so desired, the entire interview could be done at your home in an hour or two. We have done similar interviews with President Eisenhower and Senator Taft and feel we are equipped to do it with a minimum of inconvenience to you and your household.

I shall hold myself in readiness to discuss this with you further and should be delighted to come talk to you.

Sincerely yours,

Colonel Charles E. Lindberg
Scotts Cove
Darien, Connecticut

nic

Keller, Helen

ARCAN RIDGE
WESTPORT, CONN.

Dear Mr. Murrow,

Words cannot express my high admiration of the valiant attitude you have adopted in the present crisis of American history.

I am with you heart and soul in your defiance of hostile elements that would impose the yoke of fear upon a free people. You are right -- there can be no neutrality in matters concerning freedom any more than in other matters which regard public welfare, and that is possible only when voices speak out against the vicious endeavors of demagogy.

Also I should like to salute your sponsors, the Aluminum Company, who have so bravely stood behind you in your supreme adventure.

With warmest congratulations, I am,

Cordially yours,

Helen Keller

March thirteenth, 1954.

Macmillan

10 Downing Street
Whitehall

June 6, 1958.

Dear Mr Murrow

Press comment and letters which I have received have left me in no doubt that the television interview with you and Mr. Collingwood was remarkably well received. This is just to say thank you very much to you both for the way you conducted it. You did a first-class job and I am most grateful.

Yours very sincerely
Harold Macmillan

Mr. Ed Murrow.

SECRETARY-GENERAL

9 November 1955

Dear Mr. Murrow,

I wish to thank you very much for your kindness in sending me the record album, which you and the staff of PERSON TO PERSON have put together, containing excerpts from some of Sir Winston Churchill's speeches.

With best personal regards,

Yours sincerely,

Dag Hammarskjold

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York 22, N. Y.

HARRY S. TRUMAN
FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING
KANSAS CITY 6, MISSOURI

November 16, 1955

Dear Ed:

I am grateful to you and your staff for sending me the record album of excerpts from several of Sir Winston Churchill's speeches.

The photographs in the album are extraordinarily good and augur well for the record itself. I am very anxious to play it.

Sincerely yours,

Harry Truman

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

JOHN F. KENNEDY
MASSACHUSETTS

COMMITTEES:
LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE
GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

United States Senate

WASHINGTON, D. C.

1702 Federal Building
Boston (9), Massachusetts
November 19th - 1 9 5 5

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Ed:

This is to acknowledge and thank you for your very nice letter of November 3rd advising me that you have put together, with Sir Winston Churchill's authorization, a record album containing excerpts from some of his speeches.

I am most happy to receive this album and it certainly will serve to stimulate memories of days that are past.

With warmest personal regards, I am

Sincerely,

Jack

John F. Kennedy.

ADLAI E. STEVENSON
231 So. LaSalle Street
Chicago

November 21, 1955

Dear Ed:

Thanks so much for that splendid recording of excerpts from Winston Churchill. I shall play it at once, and if you perceive any improvement in my utterances, well, you are to blame. Or do I mean Churchill!

Yours,

Adlai

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

G.H.

TUFTS UNIVERSITY

File.

MEMO

TO: Gregory Henderson, Acting Dir., Murrow Center

FROM: J. S. Komidar

DATE: 4 May 1971

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection-
Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

A Sir Winston Churchill letter to Edward R. Murrow, dated 6 August 1965, has been added to the other nine items listed in your memorandum of 3 December 1970.

JSK:ffk

TUFTS UNIVERSITY
MEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS 02155

TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian

FROM: Gregory Henderson, Acting Director, Murrow Center of the Fletcher School

DATE: April 30, 1971

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection - Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

Enclosed you will find an original letter dated 6 August, 1955 from Sir Winston Churchill to Edward R. Murrow. Would you please add this to others sent you on December 3, 1970 from the Murrow Collection for safekeeping.

Thank you for your help to us as custodians of this valuable collection.

Received 5/3/71 Shirley Johnson
Wessell Library

WESTERN 1617.

28, HYDE PARK GATE,
LONDON, S.W. 7.

6 August, 1955

Confidential

My dear Murrow,

I am afraid it is no longer open to me to entertain your suggestion of a five-hour personal television talk, as I had already made certain arrangements with Sir Alexander Korda several months ago.

Let me express my thanks to you for making this proposal to me.

Yours very sincerely,

Winston S. Churchill

Mr. Ed Murrow.

TUFTS UNIVERSITY
MEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS 02155

TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian

FROM: Gregory Henderson, Acting Director, Murrow Center of the Fletcher School

DATE: December 29, 1971

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Library Collection - Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

Attached is a valuable letter written by Clementine S. Churchill to 'Ed' Murrow dated October 28, 1954 about Senator Margaret Chase Smith. I would ask that it be placed in the Wessell Vault together with those sent you previously.

Received 12/29/71

Wessell Library

October 28th 1954

10, Downing Street,
Whitehall.

My dear 'Ed',
Thank-you to me
for cabling about Senator Chase
Smith. What an agreeable and intelligent woman!
I met her at luncheon with Lady Singh.
She

Came & saw Winston in the Cabinet Room.
I was impressed by her energy & quickness
in travelling all the way to Blackpool for the Tory Conference.
I hope you & Sarah & your little son are all well.
Ever
yours
Clementine S.
Churchill

TUFTS UNIVERSITY
MEDFORD, MASSACHUSETTS 02155

TO: Joseph S. Komidar, University Librarian

FROM: Gregory Henderson, Acting Director, Murrow Center of the Fletcher School

DATE: June 4, 1971

SUBJECT: Edward R. Murrow Memorial Library Collection - Safekeeping of Letters in Wessell Vault

Attached are valuable letters from the Edward R. Murrow Collection. I would ask that they be placed in the Wessell Vault with those sent you previously. They are identified as follows:

1. Eleanor Roosevelt's letter to Mr. Ed Murrow dated May 19, 1950, with his response.

2. Lyndon B. Johnson's letter to Mr. Edward R. Murrow dated June 6, 1957, "The Open Curtain, and Mr. Murrow's response.

3. John F. Kennedy's letter to Mr. Ed R. Murrow dated August 30, 1958, "Who Killed the Kennedy-Ives Labor Reform Bill?" and Mr. Murrow's response.

4. Helen Keller's letter to Mr. Murrow dated April 16, 1959, and his response.

Received 6/4/71 [signature]
Wessell Library

Belongs in folder # 9
File 2 Drawer A

SP
ONA

May 22, 1950

Dear Mrs. Roosevelt:

I'm very sorry, but I won't be able to attend the meeting on May 28; I shall be in Berlin.

However, I have had a letter from Mr. Landau and expect to see him tomorrow to learn more about his interesting plan.

Sincerely yours,

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt
The Park Sheraton Hotel
202 West 56th Street
New York, New York

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt
The Park Sheraton Hotel
202 Fifty Sixth Street West
New York 19, N. Y.

May 19, 1950

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Mr. Jacob Landau came to see me the other day. He feels very strongly that one of the greatest causes of trouble in the world today is lack of understanding among nations and the lack of real world-minded reporters to give the kind of background material to newspapers that is needed for a world point of view. He is very anxious to start a miniature AP, not to provide actual news of the day, but to provide background material that has a world outlook.

Mr. Landau wants to get an advisory committee together to help him and asked me if I would ask a few people to let him talk about it. I told him I could not undertake to sponsor anything of this kind or do any real work, but I would be willing to ask a few people if he would send me a list.

You are on his list and I hope very much if you are free on Sunday, May 28th, at 9 P.M. you will come to my apartment here in the hotel. It need not be a long session, but I think it may be of real interest to you.

Very sincerely yours,

Eleanor Roosevelt

Mr. Ed Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York City

Johnson, Lyndon

July 2, 1957

Dear Lyndon:

Belated thanks for sending me your speech of June 8th. As usual, you talked more than a lot of sense.

I would have written earlier, but I am just back from Yugoslavia where I filmed a fairly long session with Tito.

Sincerely yours,

The Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson
United States Senate
Washington, D.C.

fc

(Dictated but not signed by Mr. Murrow)

LYNDON B. JOHNSON
TEXAS

STATE OFFICE:
207 U. S. Courthouse
Austin, Texas

United States Senate
Office of the Democratic Leader
Washington, D. C.

June 6, 1957

Dear Ed:

I wanted you to have this copy of the speech I am making in New York Saturday night, June 8th, because I thought you might be interested.

Best regards.

Sincerely

Lyndon B. Johnson

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York, New York

ADDRESS BY SENATE MAJORITY LEADER LYNDON B. JOHNSON
BEFORE THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE UNITED JEWISH APPEAL
New York City, New York June 8, 1957

FOR RELEASE IN AM'S OF SUNDAY, JUNE 9, 1957

THE OPEN CURTAIN

Mr. Chairman, Distinguished Guests:

I am here tonight with a basic premise in my mind.

It is that you -- the members of the United Jewish Appeal -- are men and women who have dedicated your lives to helping your fellow man.

I do not assume this lightly -- merely from the desire of a speaker to flatter his audience. It rests upon your enviable record.

I raise the point only as a predicate to the remarks which I plan to make tonight. This is the place and you are the people to whom I wish to define a new proposal.

The World We Live In

Never before in history have people been so badly in need of help. And the only kind of help that will serve today is the kind that the people supply for themselves.

There is no need to recite once more the realities of the modern world. We are all only too familiar with them -- the cold war, the armaments race, atomic fallout, international misunderstanding.

Most of these factors have appeared before in history. There have been "cold wars." International misunderstanding has been a normal state of affairs for centuries. There is nothing new about an armaments race.

But for the first time, we now face the prospect of destroying ourselves -- not as the result of an armaments race but merely by indulging in the race.

The Atomic Rain

For several weeks our newspapers have carried daily headlines about the effects of atomic fallout. The scientists disagree as to the amount of damage that is being done to humanity by our nuclear test explosions.

But even the most conservative state flatly that there is "some risk."

I am no nuclear physicist. I do not pretend to have the scientific knowledge that would entitle me to pass judgment on genetics or the effects of Strontium-90.

But I do know that the experts are talking about my children and your children. And it gives me no comfort to be told that some scientists think the risk to them is "slight."

No Monopoly

It is even less comforting to assess the probable future of the armaments race even assuming that our children escape the fallout danger -- whether slight or tremendous. If it continues, the future is bleak.

The intercontinental ballistics missile with a hydrogen warhead is just over the horizon. It is no longer just the disorderly dream of some science fiction writer.

(more)

We must assume that our country will have no monopoly on this weapon. The Soviets have not matched our achievements in democracy and prosperity; but they have kept pace with us in building the tools of destruction.

With such weapons in a divided world, there will be little choice. We will return to the caves of our remote ancestors and burrow underground like the prairie dogs of West Texas.

Reasonable Alternatives

There are reasonable alternatives to this unreasonable prospect. They are alternatives which are available to mankind -- providing that mankind will adopt them.

Our present situation could have been avoided. Twelve years ago -- when we had a monopoly on the atomic bomb -- the United States offered to share the secrets of the atom with the entire world.

We asked in return only reasonable guarantees that the atom would never again be used in warfare. This offer had no parallel in history -- and it would have converted the atom from an implement of death to an implement of life.

Two years later, this plan was approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations. It was blocked only by the Soviet Union and its satellites.

There is no point in reliving the past. I am not going to waste your time and my time in proving that the Soviets were wrong. Free people who have had access to the truth are already aware of the facts.

We live in the present. We no longer have a monopoly on atomic power. But there is a sound reason for recalling the events of 1946 and 1948. One aspect of those events may point the way to the future.

The Russian people have never had an opportunity to weigh the free world's proposal for the control of atomic energy. They were never informed about it openly and frankly. They never knew that Stalin provoked an arms race that, if continued, must end in the total elimination of mankind.

Today humanity is a great deal closer to self-destruction than it was ten years ago.

The Threat and The Hope

And yet, because we are close to the threat, we may also be closer to hope. I do not foresee any quick Utopian solutions. A happy ending to the atomic-hydrogen menace will not be easily found.

But I am convinced, to borrow Churchill's phrase, that if we cannot see the beginning of the end, we can at least see the end of the beginning.

There are pathways of peace and progress open to all humanity. The statesmen of the world have one over-riding duty -- to help light those paths.

Where lie the signs of hope? They lie in the realm of reason.

The Challenge

The challenge is truly immediate. It involves actions that can and must be taken this year, now -- during the remaining 206 days of 1957.

Our basic need goes by the technical name "disarmament." That long, rather dull-sounding word represents a host of complicated problems. The answer -- even a beginning to the answer -- represents the hope of all mankind.

(more)

We must initiate action on five objectives.

1. Controlled reduction of military forces by all countries.

2. A start on a mutual "open skies" fool-proof inspection system.

3. A frank and open search for a method of suspending tests of the bigger nuclear weapons, under air tight conditions which give full protection against violations.

4. A reduction of everyone's stockpile of nuclear weapons under copper-riveted methods of mutual inspection.

5. And this is the key to ultimate hope: A world-wide agreement -- backed by absolute safeguards -- that no nation will make any new fissionable materials for weapon purposes -- neither the three present nuclear powers nor those who may soon have the capacity.

Let The People Judge

How do we launch this program? We do so in the only way possible -- in the only way that accords with American traditions.

We must create a new world policy. Not just of "open skies" -- but of open eyes, ears, and minds, for all peoples of the world.

I call for the "open curtain." Let truth flow through it freely. Let ideas clease evil just as fresh air cleanses the poisoned, stagnant mass of a long-closed cavern.

Mankind's only hope lies with men themselves. Let us insist that the case be submitted to the people of the world.

A few years ago this would have been utterly impractical. But great events have recently stirred the world. We must seize the hopes they suggest. We must not be blinded to those hopes by rigid reflections of the past.

Only four years ago the brutal Stalin died. Only a year ago the world learned that the new Russian leader, Krushchev had found it necessary to expose the depths of Stalin's evil. And only six days ago Krushchev took advantage of America's facilities to come into our homes and state the communist case.

I am glad that he did so. I have complete trust and faith in our people.

They will not be contaminated by open communist propaganda.

We should welcome this example of direct argument.

But we must -- I think -- go much farther than this. Let us take Krushchev's technique and turn it back upon him. Let us use the program as the means to open the iron curtain.

As he has used our TV screens for his appeals, let us demand to use his screens for our appeal -- the appeal of truth undefensive and undismayed.

We should ask Krushchev to provide us with Soviet-wide uncensored radio and TV facilities. We should call on him to allow us to come into Russian homes and state our case -- the American case -- to the Russian people.

(more)

Return to Fundamentals

Let us get back to fundamentals. Let us return to the principles which made America strong and great and free.

The most important of these principles is that truth can be found in the free marketplace of ideas.

It is not secret to any of you that I am a Democrat. My political faith can be traced to many sources. One of them -- and the most important of them -- was Thomas Jefferson, who said:

> I know of no safe depository of the ultimate power of society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them, but to inform their discretion by education.

This is an elegant and graceful way of putting a basic truth that I learned in Johnson City, Texas. Stated more simply, it means: Never underestimate the intelligence of the people.

Sometimes they are misinformed. Sometimes the truth is withheld from them. But when they have the facts, their judgment will be good and fair and honorable.

Faith in the People

I have a deep and abiding faith in the judgment of the people who ride the range in the Texas Hill Country. They may not have the ease of expression and the grace of manner of those who were reared in more settled parts of our land.

But no demagogue is going to lead the lean, spare Texan who runs the cattle on my ranch into the paths of bigotry. And Nikita Krushchev is not going to convert him into a communist.

He's just plain got too much sense. And I don't think that he is unusual. I believe that most Americans are like that.

They may speak with a different accent. They may plow corn land in Iowa or sew clothes in New York City. They may work on the docks in Seattle or run a department store in Kansas City.

They may be Northern Yankees or Southern Rebels. They may be Catholics, Protestants, or Jews. It makes no difference because they are all Americans.

I am not afraid to have them listen to Nikita Krushchev or Karl Marx or Nicolai Lenin himself. They have the intelligence and the independence to make up their own minds.

I know there are some who are fearful of the effects of communist propaganda upon our people. I am a Jeffersonian. I do not share those fears.

(more)

Welcome Competition

I favor granting Krushchev or Bulganin or Molotov or any Soviet leader television time in America every week of the year. I demand in return only that they grant us equal opportunities for reaching the Russian people.

Let the Russians say what they wish. Let our people hear it to the bitter end. I have faith in them. I do not believe that there will be any communist converts.

Krushchev, in his broadcast, called for competition between socialist and capitalist states. There is one form of competition -- the clash of ideas -- that Americans would welcome with delight.

I am not talking of a "propaganda offensive" or "waging peace." Those are the terms of advertising and this country is not interested in making a mercantile item of peace.

I am not talking of merely one reply to Krushchev by the President or some other official.

I am calling for an open curtain for full discussion of the immediate, urgent problems facing our people. We should insist on the right to state our case on disarmament in detail to the Soviet people. We should have weekly appearances during this year on Soviet radio and television, and we should offer similar facilities here.

The Truth Shall Make You Free

Can Krushchev find any reasonable objection to this procedure? Can he advance one logical reason why his people should not hear our proposals advanced from our lips as our people heard his proposals advanced from his lips?

Krushchev said last Sunday: "We have to live on one planet." Let him show that he is willing to make this possible.

I am a man who trusts people when they have the facts. I believe in the Biblical injunction: "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." The Russian people are capable of recognizing the truth when it is offered to them.

We should not let a single day pass without raising this issue. We should call it up in the United Nations; we should make it a basic proposal in all disarmament talks; we should insist upon it every time a Russian representative is within earshot.

Why not allow Soviet labor leaders to talk to our people in return for our labor leaders talking to theirs? Why not allow Soviet industrial managers to talk to our people in return for our industrialists talking to theirs?

Is there any good reason why American and Soviet farmers should not exchange views -- in the plain sight of the whole world? Is there any reason why our scholars and our professional men should be barred from mutual exchanges with their Soviet counterparts?

Let the people know!

Let truth shine through the open curtain!

And when the people know, they will insist that the arms race, the nuclear explosions, the intercontinental missiles all be banished. They will insist upon systems that safeguard us against world suicide.

(more)

The Path of Peace

Once again we will place our feet on the path of constructive activity. We will look forward with joy rather than with dread to our children's future.

We live in a world where over two-thirds of the people are "ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished." When the madness of the nuclear arms race is halted, mankind's creative efforts can be turned to their relief. We shall survive this century only if we find how to substitute human dignity for human degradation.

The people in this room tonight are dedicated to the cause of helping -- rather than destroying -- humanity. You have worked through the years to bring a measure of security and a measure of decency to your fellow humans.

Sanctuary

You have been associated with many humanitarian causes -- and one of them is creating a sanctuary for the oppressed. That sanctuary, Israel, stands today -- permanent and enduring -- in the midst of what was once desert.

Creating that sanctuary meant that rivers had to be dammed; fields had to be tilled; houses had to be built; the resources of nature had to be tapped.

These are the tasks to which all of humanity should be dedicated.

We have had enough of oppression and wars; of trouble and turmoil; of the frustration of every normal human impulse. We have seen noble impulses thwarted and turned to ignoble ends. We have watched the fruits of genius warped and turned into the paths of destruction.

This is not the work of the people of the world. It is the work of the small groups of selfish and twisted men who withhold from their fellow human beings the indispensable tool of freedom -- the truth.

As you go about your humanitarian work, I want to leave you with one thought tonight.

You are people who seek to build; not to tear down. And when doors are opened so the people of the world can find the truth for themselves, we can all turn to building -- building a better life for ourselves and our children.

The people can be trusted. It is time the case be turned over to them.

# # # #

Kennedy, John

September 8, 1958

The Honorable John F. Kennedy
United States Senate
Washington, D.C.

Dear Jack:

I have just re-read your speech on "the Gap". I meant to write to you about it shortly after it was delivered. Without doubt, it is one of the most penetrating and courageous speeches delivered on the floor of the Senate in a long time. It will not offend you for me to say that it was worthy of Senator Vandenberg in his better and enlightened days. More power to you!

As ever yours,

ERM:skh

N.B.
"Gap" Speech given to Leo de Orsey 22 Sept 0.

LISTER HILL, ALA., CHAIRMAN
JAMES E. MURRAY, MONT.
JOHN F. KENNEDY, MASS.
PAT MC NAMARA, MICH.
WAYNE MORSE, OREG.
STROM THURMOND, S. C.
RALPH YARBOROUGH, TEX.
H. ALEXANDER SMITH, N. J.
IRVING M. IVES, N. Y.
WILLIAM A. PURTELL, CONN.
BARRY GOLDWATER, ARIZ.
GORDON ALLOTT, COLO.
JOHN SHERMAN COOPER, KY.

STEWART E. MC CLURE, CHIEF CLERK

United States Senate

COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

August 30, 1960

Mr. Ed R. Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Ave.
New York, N. Y.

Dear Mr. Murrow:

The Research Division of the Democratic National Committee has requested me to distribute to all key Democrats, party leaders, and public officials the two enclosed speeches. Although these issues -- of national defense and labor reform -- may not at present be crucial in your particular area, these materials are sent in the thought that many Democrats may wish to be prepared on these subjects which will certainly figure in political debates across the nation.

A variety of statements by Republican officials make clear their intention to use the "labor" issue against the Democrats in this campaign. Actually, our party need not be on the defensive. It was the vote of approximately four-fifths of the Republicans in the House of Representatives that killed the bill which I had sponsored, which every Democratic Senator supported, and which more than two-thirds of the House Democrats supported. In the enclosed speech, I attempted to demonstrate the unreasonableness of those who opposed a basically strong bill.

The other enclosed address has been requested by several candidates because it attempts to summarize the lag in our defense preparedness over the last six years of Republican rule, and the future implications this holds for our military and foreign policies. While some Republican Senators objected to such a warning's being sounded on the floor of the Senate, I am convinced that these are facts the public needs to know.

I hope this material will be of assistance to you. I welcome your comments -- and hope you will let me know if there is anything further I can send you.

With every good wish, I am

Sincerely,

John Kennedy

John F. Kennedy

JFK:jl

(Not printed at Government expense)

Congressional Record

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 85th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Who Killed the Kennedy-Ives Labor Reform Bill?

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN F. KENNEDY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 22, 1958

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, only the Jimmy Hoffas and the Nathan Shefermans can find satisfaction in the failure of this Congress to pass the labor reform bill, generally known as the Kennedy-Ives bill. Honest union members, informed business men, responsible labor leaders, law enforcement officers, and the general public—all of these will suffer as the result of this bill's death in the House of Representatives.

Those who voted against the bill and those who lobbied for its defeat must bear a heavy responsibility during the coming months when racketeering and gangsterism in the labor movement continue unchecked. I cannot believe that the American people will accept some technical or procedural argument offered by way of excuse for the defeat of a bill which would have put Mr. Hoffa and his ilk out of business.

No two experts in labor affairs could probably agree on a draft bill in this controversial and sensitive area. Therefore, it was natural that criticism and controversy should surround it. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] put it during the debate in the Senate:

477701—67787

Each Senator, no doubt, feels that if he were privileged to write it he could improve on this measure.

In the same colloquy, he expressed what I believe all of us felt, when he said:

I say let us take what we know all of us want, and pass the bill, and then move on.

And the Senate did just that, and passed the bill by an 88-to-1 vote.

That this bill displeases extremists is not surprising, for these same extremists have been the ones who have prevented the enactment of any progressive labor legislation since 1947. But this bill passed the Senate precisely because the members of this body demonstrated, in the words of Business Week magazine, how "wise guidance in the public interest can be substituted for concern over wide apart partisan positions."

The Kennedy-Ives bill, as it passed the Senate, was a strong, bipartisan measure. Whatever may be said about what the Congress might do on some other bill at some other time, this bill represented a real opportunity for effective labor reform in this Congress. The failure to enact it only means that Hoffa and the handful of irresponsible and arrogant labor leaders who plague an otherwise clean labor movement will continue to operate.

Of one thing we may be sure: Next year, there will be more scandals, more racketeering, more abuses by the hoodlums who have infiltrated a tiny fringe of the American labor movement. But we shall lack an effective remedy to stop them; and those who defeated this bill are apparently willing to assume responsibility for tying our hands.

More union funds will be embezzled or otherwise misused next year, and the members and the public will know nothing about it.

More union elections will be rigged next year, and nothing will be done about it.

More exconvicts will serve as union officers; more Nathan Shefferman middlemen will take payoffs; more picket lines will be set up for extortionate purposes; more trusteeships will be used for Jimmy Hoffa-type power plays; more Johnny Dio paper locals will be established to front for racketeers; but we shall be able to do nothing about it.

The results of nearly 2 years of McClellan committee hearings, of several weeks of hearings, discussion, and drafting by the Labor Committee, of long, constructive debates on the Senate floor; all this is to go for naught, because of the short-sighted opposition stemming mostly from one party and one interest group.

PROVISIONS OF THE KENNEDY-IVES BILL

No one who thoughtfully examined the Kennedy-Ives bill could doubt its effectiveness as a labor-reform measure. The key provisions of the bill, as passed by the Senate, included the following:

First. Comprehensive detailed disclosure to members, press, public, and law enforcement agencies of union financial data.

Second. Full reports by union officers on any personal conflict-of-interest transactions.

Third. Criminal sanctions for embezzlement of union funds, false reporting, false entries in books, failure to report, or destruction of union books.

Fourth. Suits by union members for recovery of funds embezzled or misappropriated by union officers.

Fifth. Prohibition of loans by employers or unions to union officers.

Sixth. Secret ballot for the election of all union officers or of the convention delegates who select them.

Seventh. Due notice of all union elections, and real opportunity to nominate opposing candidates.

Eighth. Requirement that union officers be elected by secret ballot every 4 years, by international unions; and every 3 years, by local unions.

Ninth. Prohibition on the use of union funds to support candidacy of any union officer.

Tenth. Prohibition of service as union officers of persons convicted of felony.

Eleventh. Power to Secretary of Labor to institute court action to set aside improper elections, and conduct new elections.

Twelfth. Limit on union trusteeships to 18 months.

Thirteenth. Mandatory annual report to Secretary and union members on every trusteeship, the reasons for its establishment, continuance, and operation.

Fourteenth. Prohibition on counting votes of delegates of trustee bodies unless delegates elected by secret ballot, and on transfer of funds from trusteed local union to international except normal dues and assessments.

Fifteenth. Power to Secretary of Labor to begin a court proceeding to break improper trusteeships.

Sixteenth. Prohibition of picketing for extortion or to secure payoff from employer.

Seventeenth. Prohibition of solicitation or payment of fictitious fees for unloading cargo from interstate carriers.

Eighteenth. Public financial reports of the operations of Shefferman-type middlemen; and a prohibition of channeling bribes and improper influence through such middlemen.

Nineteenth. Elimination of the "no man's land" problem which prevented NLRB action on local labor racketeering, by directing the NLRB to exercise its full jurisdiction under the Taft-Hartley Act.

477701—67787

A STRONG LABOR REFORM BILL

It will be noted that this bill would have implemented every one of the McClellan Committee's legislative recommendations not yet acted on, inasmuch as the welfare fund protection bill had already been passed.

The McClellan committee legislative recommendations were as follows and I quote from the report:

LEGISLATIVE RECOMMENDATIONS

The United States Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor and Management Field recommends that the Congress of the United States give attention to the passage of legislation to curb abuses uncovered in five areas during our first year of hearings.

These recommendations are—

1. Legislation to regulate and control pension, health, and welfare funds;

2. Legislation to regulate and control union funds;

3. Legislation to insure union democracy;

4. Legislation to curb activities of middlemen in labor-management disputes;

5. Legislation to clarify the "no man's land" in labor-management relations.

It must be noted that the committee has explored a number of other areas in labor-management relations and plans to present legislative proposals covering those areas at a future time. For instance, much testimony has been heard during past months on the infiltration of gangsters and racketeers into the labor movement. Additional testimony on this subject will be heard during the coming year and this, along with other subjects of committee interest, such as some phases of organizational picketing on which we have already had some testimony, will provide the basis for further legislative recommendations.

The bill rejected by the House implemented all but the first of these recommendations which was already far advanced in the legislative process. This bill would have accomplished the following:

First. It provided for complete financial disclosure by unions, with broad investigative powers for the Secretary of Labor to insure compliance;

Second. It imposed strict standards of union democracy, including free elections by secret ballot and the regulation of trusteeships;

Third. It curbed labor-management middlemen;

Fourth. It provided an effective solution to the "no man's land" problem.

The bill, as passed by the Senate, was recognized by knowledgeable men on both sides of the aisle as an effective instrument of labor reform. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] said of the bill:

If enacted, and properly administered, it will drive many unreformed ex-convicts, racketeers, gangsters, and crooked officials out of the union movement and strengthen the position of honest, decent unionism, and its leaders.

Senator Knowland, the distinguished minority leader, indicated that the bill marked "real progress" and said, "In the final analysis, the workers will be the ones who will suffer if Congress does not finally act on legislation of this sort at this session." And the ranking Republican member of our Senate Committee on Labor, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], has termed the bill "one of the important landmarks of this Congress."

TAFT-HARTLEY AMENDMENTS

There have been objections that this bill does not go far enough—that it does not restrict labor's rights in the field of collective bargaining or political activity. But the Senate demonstrated repeatedly that it regarded this as a labor reform bill, designed primarily to carry out the recommendations of the McClellan committee—and that it should not be loaded down with broad new measures in the various areas of industrial relations.

The Taft-Hartley amendments contained in the bill were placed in it at the repeated urging of administration spokesmen. The Secretary of Labor in his appearance before our committee insisted on the inclusion of these amendments as did the ranking minority member of our committee, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] both in committee and on the floor of the Senate.

The following excerpt, for instance, is taken from page 32 of the hearings before our committee:

Senator KENNEDY. I will say to the Secretary, the Secretary knows quite well that I would be delighted to see reforms in the Taft-Hartley law, which are long overdue.

The legislative recommendations of the McClellan committee include five areas: Legislation to regulate control of pension, health, and welfare funds, which, as I have said, we have done something about.

Second, to legislate to regulate control of union funds; and three, legislation to insure union democracy; and four, legislation to curb activities of middlemen in labor-management relations; and five, legislation to clairify the "no man's land" in labor-management relations.

I will say that if it is the desire of any member of the committee to offer amendments on any question, when the subcommittee finally meets to decide on legislation, that, of course, is his privilege.

I am merely hoping to the extent possible that we will attempt to confine ourselves to this immediate challenge.

From our experience since 1947, I am aware of the error of attempting a full-scale revision of the Taft-Hartley Act which, I believe, ought to take place.

Now, it may be possible, if the subcommittee could reach a consensus, we could do something about matters like non-Communist affidavits, and the right of economic strikers, and the problem of the building trades, and matters about which I think there is quite general agreement.

However, I am anxious that we do not get into too broad a field, because the result will be that nothing will be done.

Secretary MITCHELL. Certainly, in my answers to questions, I will abide by the chairman's ruling.

Senator KENNEDY. It is not a ruling. It is just an expression of hope.

Secretary MITCHELL. I would like to say it is the reason why I thought it was to the interest of all concerned to unfold a complete labor-management program, in my opinion this program should be approached in the broadest way.

All of the recommendations we have made, we think, are needed reforms.

And again, on page 278, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] had this to say:

I do want to emphasize the importance of giving serious consideration to the entire program contained in S. 3097, S. 3098, and S. 3099 which I introduced for the administration. * * *

For this reason I agree with the distinguished chairman, Mr. KENNEDY, that in the time available, it is impossible to write a major revision of the Taft-Hartley Act, especially if consideration is to be given to the recommendations of the McClellan committee dealing with the urgent problems of racketeering and union democracy, and such testimony as we received from Senator KNOWLAND yesterday, and Senator MCCLELLAN yesterday in their splendid presentation before this committee.

However, although the administration's proposals do not contemplate a major revision of Taft-Hartley, some of them are directed at specific, long-standing inequities and deficiencies, the correction of which are of immediate urgency.

This being so, I hope that it will be possible for us to deal with these proposals at this time.

The only major recommendations of the administration not included in the bill related to organizational picketing and secondary boycotts. But the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] has clearly indicated that the question of secondary boycotts and picketing would be the subject of future investigations by the committee, and consequently, action on these two specific areas was deferred. I refer the Members of the Senate to page 10259 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD where this whole matter was discussed, and I quote from Senator MCCLELLAN'S speech on that page:

> Our committee has only begun to investigate that particular area. We have received some testimony regarding it, and I have repeatedly stated that the secondary boycott problem must be dealt with.
>
> But it is my theory that if we are to have good legislation, we must give it some care and thought. That is all I am asking for.
>
> If the Senate is now to try to legislate at this session, by means of this bill, in the entire labor and management field, then the select committee should be discharged, because then there would be nothing left for it to do.
>
> I want to have good legislation enacted, and I want the Senate to go into this field. But I repeat that I want these proposals properly investigated and considered, rather than to take hasty action and get bad legislation enacted.

OTHER CRITICISMS

Exaggerated criticism came from some quarters about the provisions of the bill requiring reports from employers concerning deals with labor-management middlemen. This provision of the bill prohibited nothing; it merely required information to be reported from employers concerning dealings with what the McClellan committee report called shadowy figures. Neither did this provision in any way interfere with normal employer-employee relations, nor was it ever intended to do so.

Another provision of the bill, clearly designed to prohibit bribes by employers to prevent unionization, was requested by National Labor Relations Board representatives when they appeared before the McClellan committee. This unambiguous antibribery section certainly did not preclude normal wage or other payments as was charged by some.

KENNEDY-IVES STRONGEST AVAILABLE BILL

The hard facts of the matter are that the Kennedy-Ives bill was not only the strongest bill which could pass the Congress—and the only bill which could be enacted at this Congress—it was also the strongest bill available. In most key areas it was much stronger than the proposals of the administration. Permit me to list some of them:

First. The administration proposals contained no effective regulation of trusteeships. This bill set strict standards and provided means by which union members could protect themselves against arbitrary imposition of trusteeships by international unions.

Second. The administration's bill contained weak and ineffective provisions to protect union members' voting providing only a report from a union that it follows its own rules for elections. The Senate-passed bill, on the other hand, would have required secret periodic elections of all important union officers. It went further and provided machinery to upset improperly held elections and established a method by which new elections could be held.

Third. The administration's bill merely reenacted present law dealing with union financial reports while the Senate-passed bill contained a comprehensive reporting requirement including reports by union officers of conflicts of interest.

Fourth. The administration bill contained a very limited provision requiring employers to report only payments to any union officer or employee. This is already covered by section 302 of Taft-Hartley. The Senate-passed bill, on the other hand, contained a strong, detailed provision requiring employers and middlemen to report transactions and arrangements as well as payments and expenditures for activities intended to influence or affect employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed by the Labor Act.

Fifth. The Senate-passed bill contained a strong specific provision against "shakedown picketing" in general and against unlawful exactions from interstate truckers. These safeguards were not specifically covered in the administration bill.

Sixth. The Senate-passed bill specifically prevented convicted criminals from holding union office. This subject is not covered by the administration bill.

Seventh. The Senate-passed bill contained a specific prohibition against using union funds to influence union elections. The administration bill was silent on this subject.

Eighth. The Senate-passed bill contained specific provisions making it a criminal offense to refuse to submit to the Secretary of Labor records, and to refuse to permit the Secretary of Labor to enter and inspect books and accounts. The administration bill would have required the Secretary to resort to protracted court proceedings for this purpose.

Ninth. The Senate-passed bill contained strong criminal penalties against false entries in union books and against destruction of records. The administration bill was either silent or contained much weaker provisions dealing with this subject.

Tenth. The Senate-passed bill contained provisions designed to encourage unions to enforce strict codes of ethical practices binding upon affiliates and members. The administration bill was silent on the subject.

Eleventh. The Senate-passed bill contained a strong provision directing the Labor Board to exercise its jurisdiction in situations warranting such action and presently not covered by reason of the Board's refusal to exercise its statutory jurisdiction. The administration bill would have perpetuated the present Board-created "no man's land" by ceding jurisdiction to States, 36 of which have no State labor relations laws. This would mean applying greatly dissimilar State labor laws ranging from New York's prolabor, closed shop law to restrictive right-to-work statutes on the books in several States. More importantly it would have left thousands of employers and employees in such major industrial States as California and Illinois without the protection of a uniform national labor law.

THE ROLE OF THE REPUBLICANS

Mr. President, neither Senator IVES nor I have ever sought to make this labor reform measure a partisan political issue. We knew that there was too much at stake. I have cited these comparisons with the administration bill to demonstrate that the bill rejected by the House yesterday was a strong and effective measure.

Until this week, it was never a party measure. The bill had a bipartisan origin and sponsorship, and included the recommendations of the President as well as those of the bipartisan McMcClellan committee. It was reported by the Senate Labor Committee with only one dissenting vote. It passed the Senate with only one dissenting vote. It received the endorsement of those members on both sides of the aisle who have taken a special interest in labor affairs.

But now partisanship has killed the labor-reform bill. Two-thirds of the Members were required to pass the bill in the other body. More than two-thirds of the Democrats supported the bill. More than three-fourths of the Republicans opposed it.

This is a fantastic performance. The Republicans have long assailed the Democratic Party for its supposed labor ties. They have long cried out for labor reform. They have long assailed the Democratic congressional leadership for not passing a bill to implement the findings of the McClellan committee. Now, finally given an opportunity to vote for labor reform—for a bill that would have crippled the free-wheeling operations of Mr. Hoffa and his ilk—they chose to defeat the bill and preserve the issue.

477701—67787

I have already commented on the false propaganda campaign against this bill, initiated by the NAM, Retail Federation, and United States Chamber of Commerce. Their success in planting fear and confusion on the Republican side—regarding a bill thoroughly and carefully considered here before it passed 88 to 1—has now been demonstrated.

But none of this would have been possible had it not been for the sabotage of the bill effectively worked by the official Republican spokesman on labor affairs, Secretary of Labor James Mitchell.

Mr. Mitchell has talked long and piously about the need for labor reform. He has sought to give the credit for action in carrying out the McClellan committee recommendations to the Republican administration. He has sought to place the blame for inaction upon the Democratic congressional leadership. But the facts of the matter are that the chief stumbling block to labor reform legislation in this Congress has been Secretary Mitchell.

At no time has he lifted one finger in favor of this bill. At no time has he urged his party members in either house to vote for the bill. He first attempted to sabotage the bill from Geneva, calling it "weak and ineffective," after it had been reported out of committee by a nearly unanimous vote. He has continued these negative and misleading comments up to this very week. Finally, at the crucial moment in the House debate, just before the vote on the measure, he authorized a statement on the floor of the other body calling the bill a "bad bill". The inevitable result of his intervention followed: 79 percent of the Republican Members voted against the bill.

The reason is plain: Mr. Mitchell did not want a labor reform bill. His contradictory public statements about the legislation were designed to kill the only bill that could pass, appease those anti-labor elements in his party that wanted a more restrictive bill, and maintain a synthetic political issue. For Mr. Mitchell's true attitude on labor reform was disclosed at an academic seminar some months ago. The opposition to labor reform legislation which he expressed at that meeting has since been reported in the press, and I have independently checked these quotations and found them to be accurate. At that meeting Mr. Mitchell opposed democracy in labor unions, stating it could lead to "anarchy." He opposed receiving authority to disclose union financial reports, saying he would "prefer to defer this." He opposed effective labor reform legislation, stating that he did "not think anybody is going to be able to write and pass legislation that will correct the evils that the McClellan committee has uncovered. My job is to quiet the hysteria so we do not get the kind of legislation that would be dangerous to the American labor movement. Maybe the right way to put it is: Feed a little innocuous legislation to the lions, and this may give us the time to put the thing in the right perspective."

The President is reported as having stated yesterday that the bill had four shortcomings. However, Mr. President, examination of the record indicates that the President has been inadequately briefed.

First, contrary to the President's contention the bill does contain very adequate power to enforce the standards imposed in it. Under the bill, the Secretary is authorized to make investigations, enter and inspect records and is specifically directed to compile the reports required by the bill when any person responsible for making a report neglects to do so. The bill also contains stiff criminal penalties which if properly administered will compel adherence to standards.

Second, contrary to the President's statement the bill does deal with shakedown picketing in section 603. The problems of secondary boycotts I have already discussed.

Third, the President complains about the Taft-Hartley amendments in the bill. The fact of the matter is that the Taft-Hartley amendments contained in this bill, as I have already pointed out, are all based on recommendations in the President's own labor message of last January, or have been recommended in the past by prominent Republican labor spokesmen. That message called for restoring the right of economic strikers to vote—so did this bill. It called for prehire contracts in the construction industry—so did this bill and so on.

Fourth, the President mentions the no-man's-land problem. The solution proposed by the administration was at first favored but later rejected by our committee, for it would have turned over to the States jurisdiction in interstate labor matters where no labor law exists. Thousands of workers and employees, under the administration proposal, would have been left without the protection of a uniform national labor law.

It is unfortunate that misleading charges and analysis which ignored the many sections on which there was general agreement, has killed a bipartisan bill desperately needed by the American working people and public, regardless of party. I can only say that constructive labor reform legislation will be brought forward again next year; and I can only hope that it will pass the Congress in 1959 with the same constructive spirit that enabled it to pass the Senate by 88 to 1 this year.

477701—67787

U. S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE: 1958

Keller Hel

ARCAN RIDGE
WESTPORT, CONN.

April 16, 1959

Dear Mr. Murrow:

It is a marvelous experience such as God makes possible -- the way in which you are helping to fulfill the dream that has given energy and purpose to my life. When Anne Sullivan Macy and I began working for the blind, I hoped that we might be instrumental in kindling inner light for the blind of America, but I did not expect to live to see a movement started for the deliverance of the blind throughout the world, and behold, the miracle is being wrought through your generosity! I cannot thank you as deeply as I feel, but my heart glows and will always glow with the beauty of your joining the Crusade for the blind of the world.

With affectionate appreciation, I am,

Sincerely yours,

Helen Keller

THE NEW
COUNTERATTACK
REGISTERED IN THE UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE

FACTS TO COMBAT COMMUNISM

55 WEST 42 STREET, NEW YORK 36, N. Y. LONGACRE 3-4608

Counterattack

January 15, 1954
Vol. 8, No. 3

Dear Subscriber:

"CHINA EXPERT" NOW PRESCRIBES DANGEROUS US POLICIES.

THEODORE WHITE is the author of the recently published book "Fire In The Ashes: Europe in Mid-Century" (William Sloane Associates.$5). WHITE was head of the Time magazine China Bureau during the years 1939-45.

The Book of the Month Club made WHITE's book its selection for Nov, 1953. EDWARD R MURROW featured WHITE...and plugged his book...on his nation-wide "Person to Person" TV show (NBC). The NY Times and NY Herald Tribune gave WHITE's book the full page-one treatment in its Sunday book review sections. The Saturday Review raved about it. It has been praised highly by CHARLES SEYMOUR, former Pres of Yale Univ, Columbia U's Prof HENRY STEELE COMMAGER, RAYMOND GRAM SWING and many others.

Obviously this is a very important book...or so these critics and publicists will have the world believe. Now here is WHITE's background on the subject of Communism.

Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, speaker (with AGNES SMEDLEY, the late Soviet spy; ALBERT E KAHN, leading pro-Soviet propagandist; HUGH DEANE, CP fronter and Far Eastern "expert" for the defunct Communoid "Daily Compass"; former OSS Sgt and Army Capt GEORGE S WUCHINICK, who recently refused to tell Senate Internal Security subcommittee if he was a Communist Party member, and former Congressman HUGH DE LACY, who has been identified as a Communist Party (CP) member.

Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, speaker, radio show.

Testimonial Dinner for the Hollywood Ten, sponsor.

Insitiute of Pacific Relations, honored by testimonial luncheon.

WHITE co-authored "Thunder Out of China" with ANNALEE JACOBY. Both the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy and "Amerasia" magazine (the office of which was used for photographing and storing stolen U S secret documents) offered this book as a premium to prospective subscribers. Amerasia praised the book as "required reading" for anyone who (in 1946) wanted to understand current events in China. The Daily Worker also praised the book, as did JOHN K FAIRBANK, LAWRENCE K ROSINGER, and EDGAR SNOW, "China experts" who have been identified as Communists (FAIRBANK and SNOW deny the charge, ROSINGER has taken refuge in the Fifth Amendment).

WHITE also edited "The Stilwell Papers" (1948), another book which was slanted on the question of China. The Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy, cited as subversive by the Dept of Justice, distributed this book and sent out special literature promoting it.

WHITTAKER CHAMBERS has cast some light on the role WHITE played at Time magazine. In his book "Witness", CHAMBERS described what happened when he became editor of Time's foreign news section and started telling the truth about the Kremlin gangsters. A group of Time foreign correspondents who were Published weekly. Copyright 1954 by American Business Consultants, Inc.; J. G. Keenan, President; A. E. Cullen, Vice-President; F. J. McNamara, Editor; L. F. Budenz, Contributing Editor.

5-C-12

June 30, 1955

Dear Ted:

Enclosed you will find, on several hand-typed, smudge-stained sheets, the copies [illegible]ce I had with CounterAttack which I promised you the other evening. I assume that if you are able to pursue the matter, you wi[illegible] worried and [illegible] only my reply over at CBS, yo[illegible] January 15, 19[illegible]

I want [illegible] points about the stuff herewith:

a) On [illegible] kind of namby-pamby. I wrote [illegible] legal action [illegible] operate, possi[illegible] what they are [illegible] to get down, [illegible] charges.

b) Although they replied with rather cold courtesy, they never did send a later explanation as they promised.

c) The reply of a year ago stands today with one slight amendment: On page [illegible], Item 4, I replied to them that I couldn't remember a specific testimonial luncheon [illegible] by the IPR [illegible] that in 1948 Ned Carter of the IPR threw a luncheon in my honor. The Carter-- may his soul rest in peace-- was a dear old man. I [illegible] present than [illegible] enough time to give a luncheon in my honor. [illegible] the IPR was ever taken over by the Communists. I replied this not [illegible] Mr. Theodore H. White [illegible] 239 Central Park West [illegible] New York 24, New York [illegible] Yes, I [illegible] luncheon with Carter [illegible] Dear Teddy: [illegible] I have been beating the bushes and I can't find any affirmative indication as to your being in any sense blacklisted in this shop. I will pursue my inquiries and come the autumn we shall find an opportunity to put this matter to the test in the manner I suggested to you earlier.

Please forgive my long delay in writing, but as we both know, these questions do not answer themselves. I merely wanted to send you this before I depart for the summer. Perhaps in the autumn we will both be less concerned with the urgent and have more time for the important, such as evenings of civilized conversation.

As ever yours,

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

March 24, 1955

Dr. Ed Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York.

Dear Ed:

Enclosed you will find, on several hand-typed, smudge-stained sheets, the correspondence I had with CounterAttack which I promised you the other evening. I assume that if you are able to pursue the matter, you will find the CounterAttack blast at the bottom of CBS' worries and , therefore, you should have my reply. I am enclosing only my reply to them and their response to me, for I assume that, over at CBS, you have a file of CounterAttack including the blast of January 15, 1954 against me.

I want to make a couple of points about the stuff herewith:

a) On re-reading my reply it strikes me now as kind of namby-pamby. I wrote it to them, however, not to pick a fight or threaten legal action but in the hope that I might get to know how they operate, possibly meet their personnel and write a story on just what they are up to and their techniques. My reply was simply intended to set down, factually, the data refuting each of their specific charges.

b) Although they replied with rather cold courtesy, they never did send a later explanation of their action as they promised

c) The reply of a year ago stands today with one slight amendment: On page 2, Item 4, I replied to them that I couldn't remember a specific testimonial luncheon to me by the IPR ---- which was quite true. Nancy and I have since been unpacking our cases and our old letters and files and I learned that it is true that in 1946 Ned Carter of the IPR threw a luncheon in my honor. Ned Carter-- may his soul rest in peace-- was a dear old man, I was deeply fond of him, am still fond of his memory and it is a pleasant thought that he thought enough of me to give a luncheon in my honor. Old Ned was never a Commie in any way, nor do I think that the IPR was ever taken over by the Communists. I point this out simply for the sake of testimony because today I would testify, yes, I did have a luncheon with Ned Carter and so what. There were so many luncheons, speeches, banquets, broadcasts in the busy year 1946 of so many kinds that I feel I can be excused a slip in memory.

It was great seeing you the other night. I wish New York were arranged so that people who like each other could see each other more often. We watched the show after dinner with heightened pleasure and, like all the Murrow shows, it was grand. Take care and don't work too hard and let's try to make contact when I have less melancholy matters to discuss. Bestest.

Teddy

Teddy

certain decency requires that you list them all; and report what they said.

2. Yes, I did speak at the Independent Citizens Committee of Arts, etc. But the transcript of that evening's remarks should be available to you. If you examine them, you should note that my remarks were in the nature of a eulogy of the heroism of the soldiers of Chiang K'ai-shek.

3. You say I sponsored a dinner for the Hollywood Ten. That is totally untrue-- so untrue as to be a pure product of imagination. The records again should help you correct this statement. I lived in Europe continuously from June, 1948 to October 1953. That case developed while I was overseas. I know nothing of it except from my recollection of old news dispatches. I was never approached, do not know who the men are, never took any part in their defence and was not, repeat, not a sponsor. If any letterhead or statement bearing my name in their defence appears in your files I would appreciate having a photostat of it. For then I could sue whoever it was who so violently and without permision made free of my name and abused my reputation.

4. I have lunched with members of the Institute of Pacific Relations many times. I have been a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I cannot remember a specific "testimonial luncheon". The Institute of Pacific Relations carried on its membership roles the names of practically every student of the Far East as well as some of the most distinguished names in American public life and industry. There is no doubt that the Communists penetrated the Institute, trying to take it over. They did not succeed. You cannot charge membership in the Institute as evidence of taint of subversion.

5. I shall not debate Thunder Out of China with you. But if you mention the Daily Workers Comment, you should note that their review called the book "anti-Communist". If the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy or Amerasia used the book as a premium it was done without my knowledge. There is no law I know of to prevent them from buying books and using them as bait.

6. You quote correctly from Mr. Chambers, but Mr. Chambers was in error. I never at any moment signed any round-robin letter against Mr. Chambers when we worked at TIME. I was never even asked to. If necessary, I am willing to testify to that effect under oath of law. If such a letter can be produced with my signature I shall make out a check for all my royalties from my current book and donate it to your favorite charity.

7. On my relations with Time Inc. You say I was fired. I left Time Incorporated in July of 1946. I quit after a series of discussions with Henry Luce which made it obvious we were too far in disagreement to continue working together. But it was I who made the final break. On

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

COPY COPY COPY COPY COPY

April 24, 1954

The Editors of CounterAttack,
55 West 42n Street,
New York 16 New York.

Gentlemen:

I have only now, after much traveling and long delay received from a friend ofmine a copy of your attack on myself in your issue of January 15th. Had a copy been sent to me directly I would have answered you at once.

Let me say at once that I seek neither apology nor retraction from you. As a journalist myself, I know how easily error creeps into the public record; and, for the purpose of this letter, I assume that what you have presented here is an attack based on error and misinformation rather than out of malice. Whether or not you correct your records is a matter of conscience. I feel that it is my primary duty only to set you straight, for thereafter a repetition of these statements can be interpreted only as malice.

It is obvious that you and I represent fundamentally divergent political views. In our form of democracy I must respect and protect your right to express your views as much as it is incumbent on you to protect those with whom you disagree .

The following points are, therefore, corrections of fact or omission which should be in your files if you desire to re-Open attack on me in any honest form.

1. Committee For a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. I was never a member; nor a sponsor; nor lent my name to any of its committees. The dinner to which you refer did take place at the Hotel Roosevelt. And I did speak.It occurred only a few months after I had returned from the war and befor I thoroughly understood the purposes and control of that Committee.

The fundamental fact that you leave out is that the principal speaker of that evening meeting was Senator Tobey of New Hampshire. I was asked to appear for a few minutes on a program with that distinguished Senator whom I had never met; and, wanting to meet him, I accepted the invitation.

I make this statemat with no slightest intent to injure Senator Tobey's reputation whom you must consider, as I do, a Republican of highest integrity. Yet if you list the speakers at that meeting a he personnel records of Time, the separation was recorded as "separation by mutual agreement". Mr. Luce wrote me a most courteous note on my departure. We have since enjoyed friendly relations. I consider him a distinguished American. I cannot bring myself to believe that he said what you quote him as saying.

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

8. Mr. Burnham's review is the expression of his opinion. He did not like my book. I did not like his review. In our country that's the way liberty operates and we can boh go on talking.

9. You claim I wrote exclusive dispatches for the Daily Compass as Chief Correspondent for the Overseas News Agency. This is not true. The Daily Compass was one among several score clients of theOverseas News Agency (among others: The New York Times, the Buffalo Courier-Journal, the Louisville Courier-Journal, the Milwaukee Journal, the Washington Post, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch etc, etc). I was never asked to and never did write an exclusive dispatch for them. the Compass Your error is partially excusable forthe Compass did, without our permission, slug some of the Agency's dispatches as "exclusive". The mangling and distortion of the Overseas News Agency copy by the Compass was so flagrant that ultimately it led to a breach, and the cutting off of our news copy from them.

I present these facts hoping that if you attempt again to trace the difference between my point of view and yours, you will do so with accurate information.

This difference between us is deep and real. As a foreign correspondent, I have seen more of Communism in power and action than, I think, anyone on your staff. I know, far better than you, how wicked, dangerous and malevolent it is. I know its tactics and cruelties. I believe the only strategy of our defence is twofold-- the first being the preservation of our material strength, by arms, the second being the preservation of our spiritual strength, which is liberty. It is my profound belief that Communism thrives in an atmosphere of suspiciion and fear, of rumor and lie. I believe thatyou, inadvertently, may be playing directly into the hands of the Communists and weakening our entire fiber of resistance to the threat.

Should you ever find yourself in need of material about me, I can assure you of my whole-hearted cooperation. You need only call to check whatever you wish to say.

Sincerely Yours,

Theodore H. White

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW Y

REPLY TO MY LETTER OF [redacted] 4/29/54
COPY COPY COPY COPY

COUNTERATTACK THE NEWSLETTER OF FACTS TO COMBAT COMMUNISM, 55 WEST 42nd Street, New York 36, New York, Longacre 3-4608

Mr. Theodore H. White,
239 Central Park West,
New York 24, New York.

May 14, 1954

Dear Mr. White:

This is simply to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 29, 1954.

Due to an unusually heavy workload here, I have not had an opportunity to acknowledge your letter before.

Our present rushed condition is due to the departure of Frank McNamara, our editor, to assume the job of National Director of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Un-American Activities Commission. Under the circumstances, I have not had a chance to check the points you raise in detail and compare them with the documentation used in our issue of January 15. We will do so at the very earliest opportunity and I will write you at greater length as soon as possible afterwards.

Cordially Yours,

Arthur E. Cullen,
Vice-President.

****

NOTE: The subsequent letter promised by Cullen was never sent to me and, presumably, never written.

White, Theodo

June 30, 1955

Dear Teddy:

I have been beating the bushes and I can't find any affirmative indication as to your being in any sense blacklisted in this shop. I will pursue my inquiries and come the autumn we shall find an opportunity to put this matter to the test in the manner I suggested to you earlier.

Please forgive my long delay in writing, but as we both know, these questions do not answer themselves. I merely wanted to send you this before I depart for the summer. Perhaps in the autumn we will both be less concerned with the urgent and have more time for the important, such as evenings of civilized conversation.

As ever yours,

Mr. Theodore H. White
239 Central Park West
New York 24, New York

rh

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

March 24, 1955

Mr. Ed Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York.

Dear Ed:

Enclosed you will find, on several hand-typed, smudge-stained sheets, the correspondence I had with CounterAttack which I promised you the other evening. I assume that if you are able to pursue the matter, you will find the CounterAttack blast at the bottom of CBS' worries and , therefore, you should have my reply. I am enclosing only my reply to them and their response to me, for I assume that, over at CBS, you have a file of CounterAttack including the blast of January 15, 1954 against me.

I want to make a couple of points about the stuff herewith:

a) On re-reading my reply it strikes me now as kind of namby-pamby. I wrote it to them, however, not to pick a fight or threaten legal action but in the hope that I might get to know how they operate, possibly meet their personnel and write a story on just what they are up to and their techniques. My reply was simply intended to set down, factually, the data refuting each of their specific charges.

b) Although they replied with rather cold courtesy, they never did send a later explanation of their action as they promised

c) The reply of a year ago stands today with one slight amendment: On page 2, Item 4, I replied to them that I couldn't remember a specific testimonial luncheon to me by the IPR ---- which was quite true. Nancy and I have since been unpacking our cases and our old letters and files and I learned that it is true that in 1946 Ned Carter of the IPR threw a luncheon in my honor. Ned Carter-- may his soul rest in peace-- was a dear old man, I was deeply fond of him, am still fond of his memory and it is a pleasant thought that he thought enough of me to give a luncheon in my honor. Old Ned was never a Commie in any way, nor do I think that the IPR was ever taken over by the Communists. I point this out simply for the sake of testimony because today I would testify, yes, I did have a luncheon with Ned Carter and so what. There were so many luncheons, speeches, banquets, broadcasts in the busy year 1946 of so many kinds that I feel I can be excused a slip in memory.

It was great seeing you the other night. I wish New York were arranged so that people who like each other could see each other more often. We watched the show after dinner with heightened pleasure and, like all the Murrow shows, it was grand. Take care and don't work too hard and let's try to make contact when I have less melancholy matters to discuss. Bestest.

Teddy

Teddy

THEODORE H. WHITE

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

COPY COPY COPY COPY COPY

April 24, 1954

The Editors of CounterAttack,
55 West 42n Street,
New York 16 New York.

Gentlemen:

I have only now, after much traveling and long delay received from a friend of mine a copy of your attack on myself in your issue of January 15th. Had a copy been sent to me directly I would have answered you [redacted] at once.

Let me say at once that I seek neither apology nor retraction from you. As a journalist myself, I know how easily error creeps into the public record; and, for the purpose of this letter, I assume that what you have presented here is an attack based on error and misinformation rather than out of malice. Whether or not you correct your records is a matter of conscience. I feel that it is my primary duty only to set you straight, for thereafter a repetition of these statements can be interpreted only as malice.

It is obvious that you and I represent fundamentally divergent [redacted] political views. In our form of democracy I must respect and protect your right to express your views as much as it is incumbent on you to protect those with whom you disagree .

The following points are, therefore, corrections of fact or omission which should be in your files if you desire to re-Open attack on me in any honest form.

1. Committee For a Democratic Far Eastern Policy. I was never a member; nor a sponsor; nor lent my name to any of its committees. The dinner to which you refer did take place at the Hotel Roosevelt. And I did speak. It occurred only a few months after I had returned from the war and before I thoroughly understood the purposes and control of that Committee.

The fundamental fact that you leave out is that the principal speaker of that evening meeting was Senator Tobey of New Hampshire. I was asked to appear for a few minutes on a program with that distinguished Senator whom I had never met; and, wanting to meet him, I accepted the invitation.

I make this statement with no slightest intent to injure Senator Tobey's reputation whom you must consider, as I do, a Republican of highest integrity. Yet if you list the speakers at that meeting a certain decency requires that you list them all; and report what they said.

2. Yes, I did speak at the Independent Citizens Committee of Arts, etc. But the transcript of that evening's remarks should be available to you. If you examine them, you should note that my remarks were in the nature of a eulogy of the heroism of the soldiers of Chiang K'ai-shek.

3. You say I sponsored a dinner for the Hollywood Ten. That is totally untrue-- so untrue as to be a pure product of imagination. The records again should help you correct this statement. I lived in Europe continuously from June, 1948 to October 1953. That case developed while I was overseas. I know nothing of it except from my recollection of old news dispatches. I was never approached, do not know who the men are, never took any part in their defence and was not, repeat, not a sponsor. If any letterhead or statement bearing my name in their defence appears in your files I would appreciate having a photostat of it. For then I could sue whoever it was who so violently and without permision made free of my name and abused my reputation.

4. I have lunched with members of the Institute of Pacific Relations many times. I have been a member of the Institute of Pacific Relations. I cannot remember a specific "testimonial luncheon". The Institute of Pacific Relations carried on its membership roles the names of practically every student of the Far East as well as some of the most distinguished names in American public life and industry. There is no doubt that the Communists penetrated the Institute, trying to take it over. They did not succeed. You cannot charge membership in the Institute as evidence of taint of subversion.

5. I shall not debate Thunder Out of China with you. But if you mention the Daily Workers Comment, you should note that their review called the book "anti-Communist". If the Committee for a Democratic Far Eastern Policy or Amerasia used the book as a premium it was done without my knowledge. There is no law I know of to prevent them from buying books and using them as bait.

6. You quote correctly from Mr. Chambers, but Mr. Chambers was in error. I never at any moment signed any round-robin letter against Mr. Chambers when we worked at TIME. I was never even asked to. If necessary, I am willing to testify to that effect under oath of law. If such a letter can be produced with my signature I shall make out a check for all my royalties from my current book and donate it to your favorite charity.

7. On my relations with Time Inc. You say I was fired. I left Time Incorporated in July of 1946. I quit after a series of discussions with Henry Luce which made it obvious we were too far in disagreement to continue working together. But it was I who made the final break. On the personnel records of Time, the separation was recorded as "separation by mutual agreement". Mr. Luce wrote me a most courteous note on my departure. We have since enjoyed friendly relations. I consider him a distinguished American. I cannot bring myself to believe that he said what you quote him as saying.

239 CENTRAL PARK WEST, NEW YORK 24, NEW YORK

8. Mr. Burnham's review is the expression of his opinion. He did not like my book. I did not like his review. In our country that's the way liberty operates and we can boh go on talking.

9. You claim I wrote exclusive dispatches for the Daily Compass as Chief Correspondent for the Overseas News Agency. This is not true. The Daily Compass was one among several score clients of theOverseas News Agency (among others: The New York Times, the Buffalo Courier-Journal, the Louisville Courier-Journal, the Milwaukee Journal, the Washington Post, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch etc, etc). I was never asked to and never did write an exclusive dispatch for them. (the Compass) Your error is partially excusable forthe Compass did, without our permission, slug some of the Agency's dispatches as "exclusive". The mangling and distortion of the Overseas News Agency copy by the Compass was so flagrant that ultimately it led to a breach, and the cutting off of our news copy from them.

I present these facts hoping that if you attempt again to trace the difference between my point of view and yours, you will do so with accurate information.

This difference between us is deep and real. As a foreign correspondent, I have seen more of Communism in power and action than, I think, anyone on your staff. I know, far better than you, how wicked, dangerous and malevolent it is. I know its tactics and cruelties. I believe the only strategy of our defence is twofold-- the first being the preservation of our material strength, by arms, the second being the preservation of our spiritual strength, which is liberty. It is my profound belief that Communism thrives in an atmosphere of suspiciion and fear, of rumor and lie. I believe thatyou, inadvertently, may be playing directly into the hands of the Communists and weakening our entire fiber of resistance to the threat.

Should you ever find yourself in need of material about me, I can assure you of my whole-hearted cooperation. You need only call to check whatever you wish to say.

Sincerely Yours,

Theodore H. White

Returned by Mr. Paley - 12/2

Paley

CBS TELEVISION

Office Communication to: MR. PALEY and MR. STANTON

from: Edward R. Murrow

Accept Regret
Appropriate action
Background?
FYI File JSM
Note & return
Phone WSP
Reply direct
Return to sender
Status?
Suggest reply
To discuss
Comment or recommendation
Copy to WSP
URGENT f/u

November 24, 1953

I am informed that Bill Leonard desired to invite Theodore H. White, author of the November Book-of-the-Month club choice, "Fire in the Ashes", to appear on his program "This Is New York". Mr. Leonard was told, apparently by one, Al Berry, that Mr. White could not appear on the program. This action I understand was taken subsequent to White's appearance on "Person To Person". Being unaware of Mr. Berry's status and authority in the company, I should like to inquire (1) whether he is authorized to prohibit, without stated reasons, the appearance of an author of a Book-of-the-Month selection on CBS; (2) whether I am expected in future to clear guests with Mr. Berry.

If you have not had an opportunity to read White's book, I commend it to you as one of the best on Europe in the last decade. This is an opinion that seems to be shared by a considerable number of conservative reviewers.

Ed

E.R.M.

dm

(Nizer, Louis
re John Faulk)

LOUIS NIZER
LOUIS PHILLIPS
ROBERT S. BENJAMIN
CHARLES BALLON
ARTHUR B. KRIM
WALTER S. BECK
SEYMOUR M. PEYSER
JEROME EDWARDS
LEON ALEXANDROFF
SIDNEY M. DAVIS
EUGENE M. KLINE
PAUL MARTINSON
GERALD MEYER
SEWARD I. BENJAMIN
MORTIMER B. WOLF

FRANK P. GREENBERG
JEROME P. PHILLIPS
SEYMOUR SHAINSWIT
JEROME J. WALLNER
JACOB M. USADI
GERALD F. PHILLIPS
BERNARD ROTHMAN
JULIUS S. CHASE
HERBERT T. SCHOTTENFELD
SIDNEY SHEMEL
JON M. KAUFMAN
HERBERT S. SCHLOSSER
HERBERT N. BOBROW
EDWARD J. BECKER
JULIAN S. PERLMAN

PHILLIPS, NIZER, BENJAMIN & KRIM
1501 BROADWAY
NEW YORK 36, N.Y.

ATTORNEYS
AND COUNSELLORS
AT LAW

TELEPHONE
WISCONSIN 7-7600

PARIS OFFICE
21 AVENUE GEORGES V
PARIS VIII FRANCE
TELEPHONE
ELYSEE 82-67

CABLE ADDRESS
PHILLNIZER

By Hand
Personal and Confidential

October 29, 1956

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
CBS Broadcasting Company,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

Re:Faulk

My dear Ed Murrow:

John Faulk has conveyed to me the problems which have arisen from Charles Collingwood's withdrawal from the middle-of-the-road ticket to a so-called independent candidacy. The confusion arising from the fact that the middle-of-the-road now appears to be on the side of the road with Collingwood in the center, prompts the first inquiry - whether John Faulk should continue his candidacy and risk a possible defeat.

I have weighed such a defeat, if it eventuates, upon the fortunes of his litigation. I come to the conclusion that it would not be serious, and the telescoped reason for that conclusion is that the issues in the litigation do not depend upon whether John Faulk is popular with the union membership or not.

However, having faced the consequences of defeat, it is, of course, important to take every step possible to assure victory. Here, too, we must not over-state the value to the litigation, but the psychological effect and the litigation effect, combine to make this a desirable end.

Two suggestions come to mind, as to how to buttress the campaign for victory - one, is to attempt to win back Collingwood, by pointing out to him that the middle-of-the-road program does not require a destructive attitude towards the opposition. On the contrary, it is designed to prevent destruction by boycott and blacklisting of any member of the union - middle-of-the-roader, or otherwise. It is possible that if Collingwood feels the middle-of-the-roaders have come over to him, rather than that he has reversed his position, he may see the issues in clearer light, and with less personal caution.

The second thought is that, if you would sponsor the middle-of-the-road group by some statement (this does not mean becoming a candidate), your enormous prestige would go very far, and perhaps almost make certain the election of the middle-of-the-road group, even if Collingwood stood aloof.

I have been reluctant to write this letter for two reasons:

First, I do not wish to meddle in the political campaigns of the union.

Second, I feel that you have been such a bulwark of strength that it is not fair to place additional burdens upon your strong back. However, as between too heavy a burden and a stronger back - there are some who prefer the latter.

I resolved my reluctance to write, because it was conveyed to me that you would be pleased to talk to me about Faulk's problem. Of course, I shall be willing and eager to do so, but I thought I would put down my present thinking in writing, for your consideration in advance.

My kindest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

Louis Nizer

LN:S

PHILLIPS, NIZER, BENJAMIN & KRIM

Vincent Sheean

MILANO August 15 1956

Dear Ed,

My candidate for the presidency of the United States, which means the world, is you. I say this because of your vast international experience and because of your sound domestic policies.

However, I am perfectly willing to compromise on Adlai. Will you tell him so the next time you see him? I have been telling him for about eight years that he is next best to Abe Lincoln, so he won't mind being next best to you.

Health,

Jimmy

Give Adlai my best, and Franklin and damned near everybody around there except our old friend.

Sheean

August 10, 1956

Dear Mr. Sheean:

Before Mr. Murrow left for the convention in Chicago on August 8th, he asked me to send the enclosed check to you.

Sincerely yours,

Rebecca Holder
Secretary to Mr. Murrow

Mr. Vincent Sheean
c/o American Express Company
Via Monte Di Pieta
Milan, Italy

$200

Shean, Vincent

EDWARD R. MURROW
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

February 9, 1954

Gentlemen:

I enclose my personal check for $375.00 for the current school fees of Miss Ellen Sheean. I do this at the request of her father, Vincent Sheean.

Sincerely yours,

The Seering Tutoring School
22 East 60 Street
New York, New York

rh
cc: Mr. Vincent Sheean
Mrs. Vincent Sheean
Mr. Alexander Scheer

Vincent Sheean

3 W 52

Thursday

Dear Ed,

Ellen failed in the tests for Brearley. Best advice is that she should go to a tutoring school for the next few months so as to catch up with her contemporaries at the Brearley standard. Latin, French and algebra---all disagreeable to her, since she is interested only in literature and drama, particularly Jean-Paul Sartre(her idol). The advisors at Brearley say it would be fatal for a child of this kind to go to the public high school--not only because of marihuana and juvenile delinquency, but because the sheer weight of numbers and collective rudeness would overwhelm her.

It is a disaster psychologically because the child is afflicted by some terrible superiority-inferiority feelings: that she has to be first in everything, that she can't, that she suffers from not being first, and nevertheless is first in some things, which makes it worse. She has not yet been told of this latest horror.

The tutoring school costs $15 a day, that is, $5 an hour for the individual lessons. (Latin French and algebra). I could ask Professor Einstein to give her the algebra lessons but he lives at Princeton and it would cost more to get there and back than it would to pay here. Besides which, I am not at all sure that Professor Einstein remembers algebra. He certainly does not remember arithmetic, to my personal knowledge.

My idea was that you might pay for five weeks of tutoring, which would come to $375 unless I am quite wrong in multiplication. At the end of five weeks if I am not able to make the payments myself I ought to be dead anyhow. As soon as I know about these things I will tell you. Dinah has an appointment with the headmistress of the tutoring establishment this afternoon.

I also have an appointment this afternoon at the same hour(2:30) with my lawyer, who has this morning been with the counsel for the collector in the 3rd District of New York for internal revenue. Perhaps there has been some kind of settlement of my tax troubles. If there is, it will take some time to get it all in order legally, but there will be funds available to pay you for your wondrous loans. It seems that I will have to have a trustee from now on to administer every penny I receive, and it will be percentaged away to nothing, but in any case I will be able to go on living. At times this has seemed improbable.

The settlement may be(I hope) for 10% of the gross on arrears plus a hold-back, maybe 25% or 30%, for current taxes, with Curtis Brown as trustee. Whatever it is will be an immense relief. I do not like being outside the pale of the law.

Yrs ever James

Sheehan, Vincent

EDWARD R. MURROW

November 18, 1953

First National Bank and Trust Company
Montclair, New Jersey

Gentlemen:

Enclosed please find my personal check in the amount of $1000 for deposit to the account of Vincent Sheean.

Sincerely yours,

/s/ E.R.Murrow

bc: Mr. Sheean

From Vincent Sheean
Wednesday Nov.18

3 West 52nd Street Eldorado 5-8314 (8134)

Mu 8-1971

Dear Ed,

I am in the very devil of a hole---tax liens on all sources of income. Can you lend me a thousand dollars?

You may know that the difficulty is great by the mere fact that I ask. I had no lawyer but have now ~~xxx~~ returned to Stern and Reubens, the firm of literary lawyers who took care of all my affairs for many years. They are taking things in hand but it will require a little time. Meanwhile, although there is money coming to me, nothing can be paid until the tax levy is lifted, compromised or otherwise arranged. Dinah is in a similar fix, and although we are separated now, I still dislike the thought of involving her, and would like to share this with her. As you know, we both have what would pass for large incomes, but have fallen into arrears through sheer incompetence.

If you can come to my aid in this emergency I should try to pay you back during the early months of 1954, when some payments are due me(if they're allowed to be paid!) And if you can do it, the sooner the better, I should like you to send the money to the First National Bank and Trust Company, Montclair, New Jersey, to my account. The bank is not subject to the tax levy but of course they fell heir to part of the trouble in that I(not knowing of the levy) had counted on certain payments last week and have overdrawn my account.

Pretty, isn't it?

I turn to you because most of my close friends(John Gunther for example) are in hardly better condition ~~than~~ than I, and I just can't borrow money from Dorothy---it isn't possible, somehow. You and I haven't met for a long time but I somehow count on you always, whether I see you or not, as one of the steadfast. This is a real emergency, Ed, an 18-carat one.

Yrs ever

Jimmy

This house where I am staying is a regular London lodging-house, run by an Englishwoman, quite like the one in Curzon Street where I lived in the days of my youth. Decayed gradeur---you know. But they do take messages!

Vincent Sheean

Gray, Gilson

GILSON GRAY
530 EAST 86TH STREET
NEW YORK

Sunday 15 May 1955

Dear Ed:

I hope you have some idea of how much I appreciate the letters you have written for me.

I had intended to go to Washington last week. But instead, Neff and I flew to Fort Benning (Georgia) where Gilson, who had taken a 280 mm. battery from Fort Bragg for a big JCOC demonstration, had been in a bad auto accident.

He and two of his men, in a jeep, were hit head-on by a drunk civilian in a pick-up truck who came around a curve so much too fast that he was clear over on the wrong side of the road. All of them were pretty well smashed up. But Gilson is even tougher than I thought. He was ambulant when we returned on Friday and is well on the road to complete recovery.

So I'm driving to Washington tomorrow. If all goes as expected and they fly Gilson back to Bragg at the end of the week and he gets sprung for some convalescent leave (damn well better!) I'll drop down and bring him back with me.

Have a good trip to London and give Janet our love. I'll hope to see you soon after your return and give you a report on my Washington trip.

Best, as always,
Dick

June 3, 1955

Dear Wallie:

I am just back from London, where it was pleasant to see many old friends of yours and mine.

Briefly, about Gilson Gray. You will be aware of his Service record. I have only known him here over the last twenty years with, of course, a nine year interruption while I was abroad. But I have seen both Gray and his family on a considerable number of social occasions and have seen him operate under difficulties here. He had about as loyal a crew of subordinates as I have ever seen. He was respectful but never servile to his superiors. I would regard him as both tough and tactful -- have seen him on his own initiative throw out advertising copy which was contrary to company policy, thereby risking considerable loss of income to the company and without ever bothering his superiors about it. He can certainly stand the gaff of long hours and high pressure and do it with good humor. I would say that around this shop he had very few intimates and no enemies although his job was the kind likely to attract enemies. I have never known him to engage in gossip or idle chatter. His judgment of world affairs is not, I should think, profound. I think maybe this better be just an informal note to you, although if it's useful I have no objection to any of your colleagues seeing it.

Hope we can make a rendezvous soon.

As ever yours,

Mr. Wallace Dueul
3026 Cambridge Place, N.W.
Washington 7, D.C.

rh

3026 Cambridge Place, N. W.
Washington 7, D. C.

May 25, 1955

Dear Ed,

I've had two good talks with Gilson Gray and have been much taken with him. Thank you for sending him to us.

There aren't places available every day of the week--or every week of the year, for that matter--for a man of his qualifications, as you can well imagine. He's too damned good for any but damned good jobs. At the moment, as Allen and I told him, there just isn't a place fit to offer him.

Jobs good enough for Gray do become available from time to time, though, and this is where you come in:

> Would you please write me everything you can think of about Gray that would help us in judging his suitability for work here?
>
> Would you also tell me the kind of work you consider him best qualified for?

This is not a formal, official request. Make your letter as personal and informal as you like. Mark it "Eyes Only" and "Destroy When Read" if you don't want your comments to be passed on.

If and when a job becomes available that looks like the kind he'd be suited for, there'll be all kinds of formal, official, inquiries. But it would be helpful to know more about Gray now in deciding whether--and when--to set the wheels of official inquiry in motion.

We have, of course, all the "Who's Who" sort of data Gray has provided. What you can help us with is character, temperament, personality, special gifts and capacities, and that sort of thing.

Does he run a taut ship? A happy ship?

How does he treat subordinates? Superiors?

How tough is he? How forceful? How gentle? How adroit? How tactful?

How is he on long, hard, dull grinds? On crash, crisis operations? On being rooted out of bed in the middle of the night? On coping with vivid, colorful types? With dull drones?

Can he endure red tape? Frustration?

How good is his judgment of world affairs? His discretion?

How would he react to service which in some ways is a little like taking holy orders--being sworn to silence (or at least secrecy), to poverty, to obedience, and to long, long, long, long hours of extraordinarily hard work?

How are you?

All the best.

Yours,

Bonnie

3026 Cambridge Place, N. W.
Washington 7, D. C.

15 May 1955

Edward R. Murrow, Esq.,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York 22,
N. Y.

Dear Ed:

Gilson Gray hasn't got in touch with me yet, but if and when he does there'll be at least one Servant of the Republic in our establishment who'll see him--namely, me. Or, as the tourist lady said, "C'est je."

My work grows more exacting by the day, but since it also grows more exciting and rewarding, I complain not. With Allen here, it's the best job I've had since Frank Knox died. Beyond that, what's the point of trying to imagine things?

Old Man Beattie says he's coming to town some time this Summer. Are you (pl)?

All the best.

Yours,

Wallace

Dulles, Allen

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY
WASHINGTON, D. C.

OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR

9 MAY 1955

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Ed:

Many thanks for your note of May 3 concerning Mr. Gilson Gray.

When Mr. Gray comes to Washington, if you will be good enough to have him call my office, EXecutive 3-6115, Extension 601, I will be very happy to see him and refer him to the appropriate people here in line with his interests.

Faithfully,

Allen W. Dulles
Director

Talbott, Harold

THE SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE
WASHINGTON

May 11, 1955

My dear Mr. Murrow:

I have been on the lookout for your friend, Mr. Gilson Gray.

I will be glad to have a visit with him.

Sincerely yours,

Harold Talbott

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, New York

Sent to Gray

Conf - Gray, Gilson

May 3, 1955

Dear Carl McCardle:

Occasionally, a reporter encounters an American of confidence and experience who is willing and eager to serve his Government not because he is unable to find a position in private industry, but because of a real desire to be of service. Gilson Gray is such a man who will be calling your office shortly, and I hope someone in your organization can see him.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. Carl McCardle
Assistant Secretary
Department of State
Washington, D.C.

rh
Also sent to Wallace Deuell, Allen Dulles, Harold Stassen, and Harold E. Talbot

Amana Refrigerators. — Nancy Lee + Mahan

National Fd. For Preventive Med. —

Prevent disease

— Gilson Gray. — Prof Wenth

State dept. + Mr Cadle

C. I. A., Wally Orell. — Allan Dulles

Talbot. —

Harold Stassen

Next Wed day. —

Muecke, C. A.
Conf. M.

April 29, 1955

Dear Mr. Muecke:

This is in reply to your letter of April 19. I am not acquainted with your client or his wife.

Regarding the organization, "International Student Service," may I say that I was associated with this organization from 1930 to 1937, at which time I went abroad for a period of nine years and therefore lost touch with the organization and its activities. During the period with which I was familiar with the organization's work, there was never the slightest trace of communist activity or influence. Of those persons which you state were named on the letterhead I am personally acquainted with the following; by which I mean I have had sufficient association and conversation with them to have some measure, or rather some opinion of their political and social orientation. These persons are: Mary A. Cheek, Alfred E. Cohn, Stephen Duggan, Clyde Eagleton, Harry D. Gideonse, Alvin Johnson, Mrs. William Paley, George N. Shuster, Thomas K. Finletter, George D. Stoddard, and Arnold Wolfers.

To suggest that the above named persons would have been associated with any subversive or communist organization is grotesque and ridiculous, if not libelous. They represent individuals of great stature and distinction in the academic world; scientists, college presidents, a former Cabinet member, and others.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. C. A. Muecke
Parker & Muecke
Attorneys at Law
310 Luhrs Tower
Phoenix, Arizona

rh

PARKER & MUECKE
ATTORNEYS AT LAW
310 LUHRS TOWER
PHOENIX, ARIZONA

DARRELL R. PARKER
C. A. MUECKE

TELEPHONE
ALPINE 8-3404

April 19, 1955

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Murrow:

Our firm has been engaged to represent a Mr. Maxwell H. Norman of this city in a security hearing. Mr. Norman, until recently, was a civilian employee of the U. S. Army Air Force at Williams Air Force Base, Chandler, Arizona. At the air force base Mr. Norman was an instructor in navigation until he was suspended for security reasons in February of this year pending a final decision in his case.

Among the charges made against Mr. Norman by John F. Freeman, Jr., Assistant Executive Secretary, Central Security Board, is the charge that "you have maintained a close continuing association with...your wife, Enid Kass Norman,... reported to have been affiliated or sympathetically associated with communist organizations and the communist movement."

The Communist organization or movement that Mr. Norman's wife is accused of having been associated with is the "International Student Service". Mrs. Enid Kass Norman was a member of and active in this organization during 1946 and early 1947 when she was a student at Hunter College. Ann Anthony, Dean of Students at Hunter College, and George N. Shuster, President of Hunter College, have both been apprised of these same facts and have both given Enid Kass Norman a clean bill of health. We have affidavits from both in our files. We are gathering their affidavits and affidavits of everyone that was connected with the International Student Service in any way in preparation for a hearing that will be held in this matter on May 12, 1955, in Phoenix, Arizona.

You are being sent this letter because your name appeared on the letterhead of Student Service of America, Inc., United States Committee of the International Student Services, 2 West 45th Street, New York 19, New York. Other persons named on this letterhead include: Charles G. Bolte, Mary A. Cheek, Alfred E. Cohn, Herbert J. Davis, Stephen Duggan, Clyde Eagleton, R. H. Edwin Espy, Edgar J. Fisher, Harry D. Gideonse, Alvin Johnson, Walter M. Kotschnig, Mrs. William Paley, George N. Shuster, Mrs. Quincy Wright, Bradford Abernethy, Malcolm Davis,

J. Huntley Dupre, Thomas K. Finletter, Laurence M. Gould, Walter C. Langsam, John W. Nason, James G. Patton, George D. Stoddard, Harold Taylor, Mrs. Harrison Thomas, Henry P. Van Dusen, Howard Wilsonand Arnold Wolfers,

We would be profoundly grateful to you if it would be possible for you to send us an affidavit relating to your knowledge of the above-mentioned organization. We are particularly interested in any statement you could make regarding the non-communist or non-subversive nature of this organization if that be your recollection. We would also appreciate it very much if you could conveniently contact any of the other persons listed above to help us receive as many affidavits as possible.

Naturally, anyone whose patriotism is under attack is in a very difficult and precarious position. Mr. Norman is very much interested in doing anything possible to clear his name. Your help will be deeply appreciated.

Mr. Norman, incidentally, has never at any time been accused of being a member of any subversive organization. The International Student Service, I might add, has never appeared on the list of subversive organizations as listed by the Attorney General of the United States.

If you desire any further particulars please do not hesitate to write to this office. You may also wish to check on this matter with Ann Anthony, Dean of Students, and George N. Shuster, President of Hunter College of the City of New York, 695 Park Avenue, New York 21, New York.

Whatever you may do, we would appreciate your keeping in mind the deadline of May 12, 1955, which is the date set for hearing in this matter by the Government.

Very truly yours,

C. A. Muecke

C. A. Muecke

CAM/brs

Conf. Reynolds
Nizer, Louis

LOUIS NIZER
LOUIS PHILLIPS
ROBERT S. BENJAMIN
CHARLES BALLON
ARTHUR B. KRIM
WALTER S. BECK
SEYMOUR M. PEYSER
JEROME EDWARDS
LEON ALEXANDROFF
SIDNEY M. DAVIS
EUGENE M. KLINE
PAUL MARTINSON
GERALD MEYER
SEWARD I. BENJAMIN
MORTIMER B. WOLF

FRANK P. GREENBERG
JEROME P. PHILLIPS
SEYMOUR SHAINSWIT
JEROME J. WALLNER
DANIEL GLASS
JACOB M. USADI
GERALD F. PHILLIPS
BERNARD ROTHMAN
JULIUS CHASE
BENJAMIN ROCKMORE
HERBERT T. SCHOTTENFELD
MAURICE SHIRE
JON M. KAUFMAN

PHILLIPS, NIZER, BENJAMIN & KRIM
1501 BROADWAY
NEW YORK 36, N.Y.

ATTORNEYS
AND COUNSELLORS
AT LAW

TELEPHONE
WISCONSIN 7-7600

PARIS OFFICE
21 AVENUE GEORGES V
PARIS VIII FRANCE
TELEPHONE
ELYSEE 82-67

CABLE ADDRESS
PHILLNIZER

June 29, 1954.

Mr. Edward R. Murrow,
Columbia Broadcasting System,
485 Madison Avenue,
New York, N. Y.

My dear Ed Murrow:

The purpose of this letter is not to advise you of the good news for, with your facilities, you probably had it simultaneously with the utterance of the words by the foreman of the jury.

Rather, it is to express, on behalf of Quent and myself, our gratitude for your cooperation in the high principled cause.

Not by way of compliment, but as a lawyer evaluating the bearers of his facts, I can tell you that your appearance on the stand, your demeanor and customary felicity of expression deeply impressed the court and jury.

As an old admirer, it was good to have this professional contact with you, particularly since it was tinged with sentiment and friendship between you and Quent.

My affectionate regards,

Sincerely yours,

Louis Nizer

LN:GS

PHILLIPS, NIZER, BENJAMIN & KRIM

Conf. S.
De Orsey & Leo

LAW OFFICES OF
DE ORSEY AND THOMPSON
NATIONAL SAVINGS AND TRUST BUILDING
WASHINGTON 5, D.C.

April 26, 1954

C. LEO DE ORSEY
ROBERT K. THOMPSON

No answer

AIR MAIL

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
c/o Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.
485 Madison Avenue
New York City, New York

Re: Eric Sevareid

Dear Ed:

As I told you - Eric already is bound by a contract with CBS to February 1, 1955, so that an attempt by NBC to secure his services was as much value in negotiating as is a wet cigaret that will not cause cancer.

However, I've discussed the situation several times - made counter suggestions and came to New York last Tuesday to button it up.

We have arrived at an agreement on all points and the final draft is being prepared by CBS attorneys.

I am really of the opinion that he has a good and profitable contract. He will have a FIVE YEAR FIRM contract. Only one other commentator has such a long term firm contract, according to the CBS officials, and they said "You know who that is." It further provides for TEN years of security.

All I can say is - Eric had better take time out and in his prayers say "Thank you Ed Murrow."

Regards.

Sincerely,

Leo

CLD/c

Smith, H.

personal

Mr. Edward R. Murrow.

March 9, 1954

84 Hallam Street, W.1

Dear Ed,

Something of a rather grave nature has just happened to me. I think it is important for you to know about it. I dislike being mysterious, but would prefer not to write you about it. Have you any plans to come over here soon? (I have heard rumors of you having an interview with Churchill, for example).

If you have no such plans I will, reluctantly, write you about this matter. Meanwhile, I think it might be wise to suspend any negotiations to get me back to the States to settle this year: this matter rather changes the aspect of things.

I am sorry to adopt this tone, but I am sure you will see the necessity for it when I have talked with you. If that is not possible, then I will write you about the whole thing. Please let me hear from you.

Best wishes,

Howard Smith

Circle 7-2690

Leonard Bill

THOMAS L. STIX & J. G. GUDE
30 Rockefeller Plaza
NEW YORK 20, N. Y.

Corres.

April 8, 1953

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
CBS
485 Madison Avenue
New York 22, N. Y.

Dear Ed:

Paragraph 16 is the clause in a proposed renewal contract for Bill Leonard that has been in dispute.

Clearly, this so-called "morality clause" is not restricted to moral turpitude, scandalous behaviour, etc., but also entitles CBS to abruptly cancel the program in the event of a complaint, legitimate or otherwise, by any organized group. Organized group is not further defined, and admittedly (by CBS's Legal Department) could be the owner of a chain of Syracuse, N. Y. supermarkets who didn't happen to approve of Bill Leonard's reporting over either the radio or television facilities of CBS.

As you know, Bill is not a member of the CBS news staff, but even so his reporting on "This is New York" is rightfully subject to the editorial supervision of WCBS management, and his work on the "6 O'Clock Report" on television is under the supervision of the network TV news operation. Therefore, to all intents and purposes, he functions in exactly the same way as any regular member of the network news staff.

I have made these points with CBS in my discussions of this contract clause:

1. Leonard has been broadcasting "This is New York" and other radio and television programs six days a week, uninterruptedly for more than seven years. In that time, it seems to me, he has demonstrated his reliability and responsibility as a producer and reporter.

2. Both he and I, although we object to this type of morality clause in principle, concede the possibility of organized groups, crackpot or otherwise, exercising pressure in such a way that it would become intolerable.

3. Rather than insist that CBS completely delete what they say is now a standard clause in all contracts, we have merely asked that they amend the clause in one of these two manners:

(a) Include an arbitration clause in the contract, which WCBS management has been unwilling to do, or

(b) Instead of the 30-day cancellation notice, that CBS exercise its contractural right as stated in paragraph 14, to terminate the contract on 13 weeks' notice, and whether Leonard performs during this period or not, he will be paid in full on the basis of his commercial schedule at the time notice is given.

The latter proposal, in a sense, asks CBS to provide "an insurance policy" which we feel very strongly anyone of Bill Leonard's long and responsible service with CBS is entitled.

CBS's position to date is that this clause, characterized as "a matter of top-level management policy," may not be deleted or amended in any manner whatsoever.

Sincerely,

JGG

J. G. Gude

December 16, 1952

Mr. William Leonard
New York, New York

Dear Mr. Leonard:

The following, when signed by you and by us, will constitute a complete and binding contract between us and will likewise constitute a cancellation effective this date of the existing contract between you and us dated May 7, 1947.

We hereby engage you, and you hereby agree, to render your services in connection with a series of radio programs (hereinafter called "the Programs") presently entitled "This is New York" to be broadcast substantially in their present form over Radio Station WCBS, on the following terms and conditions:

1. You will assist in the gathering of appropriate material for the Programs and will help in the writing of the scripts for the Programs to the same extent as you have during your previous employment by us in connection with the same series. You will also read the commercial announcements on the Programs, and act as Narrator and Master of Ceremonies.

2. The Programs will be broadcast over WCBS only, from approximately 9:00 to 9:30 AM, CNYT on Monday through Saturday of each week of the term of this contract; provided, however, that we may, at any time and from time to time, on one day's notice to you, change the days of the week and the hours of the day on which the Programs or any of them are broadcast but in no event shall the Programs exceed thirty minutes in length each nor be broadcast more than six times per week. It is specifically understood that notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained herein, we may at any time and from time to time sell the 9:00 to 9:05 AM news broadcast with the services of another announcer for commercial sponsorship. In the event we should at any time reduce the schedule of broadcasts of the Programs hereunder to less than five half-hour programs per week, you may cancel this contract by giving to us at least thirty days prior written notice within ten days after notice of such reduction is given to you, it being understood that for the purpose of computing the length of the Programs hereunder the period from 9:00 to 9:05 AM shall be considered part of each of the Programs even if said period shall have been omitted from the same and sold for commercial sponsorship as aforesaid.

3. You will devote your best talents, efforts and abilities in connection with your services hereunder and will attend all rehearsals, reasonable program conferences and publicity photographic sessions, if any, and you will perform services subject to our direction and control.

4. You represent that you are, and agree to remain during the term of this contract, a member of the American Federation of Radio Artists in good standing.

5. You acknowledge that the services to be rendered by you hereunder are of a special, unique, unusual, extraordinary and intellectual character which gives them a peculiar value the loss of which cannot reasonably or adequately be compensated for in damages in an action at law, and breach by you of any of the provisions contained in this agreement will cause us irreparable injury and damage. We shall be entitled as a matter of right, without further notice, to injunctive and other equitable relief to prevent the violation of any of the provisions of this agreement by you. Neither this provision nor the exercise by us of any of our rights hereunder shall constitute a waiver by us of any other rights which we may have to damages or otherwise. You warrant that you are free to enter into and fully perform this contract.

6. You agree that we own all rights and title in and to the Programs as presently constituted, whether by you or by us, including, but not limited to, their name, idea and format, and that any future developments of the same, whether by you or by us, shall vest solely and completely in us as soon as they come into existence. You further agree that as between you and us, all ideas, creations, literary, musical and artistic materials and intellectual properties (hereinafter called "materials"), whether or not furnished by you, used on or in connection with any of the Programs, shall be our sole and absolute property for any and all purposes whatsoever, and you agree that you do not have, and will not claim to have, either under this agreement or otherwise, any right, title or interest of any kind or nature whatsoever in or to any such materials.

7. You warrant that all materials furnished by you hereunder will be your own and original creation, except for matters in the public domain, and said materials and the use thereof will not violate the right of privacy of, or constitute a libel or slander against, or violate any rights of any person, firm or corporation.

8. You will at all times indemnify and hold us, the sponsors, if any, their advertising agencies, if any, and station WCBS harmless from and against any and all claims, damages, liabilities, costs and expenses, including counsel fees, arising out of (a) any breach by you of any warranty or agreement made by you herein, (b) the use of any materials furnished by you for the Programs, or (c) any acts done or words spoken by you in connection with the broadcast of any of the Programs unless such acts or words shall have been authorised by us.

9. During the term of this agreement you will not

(a) be connected, directly or indirectly, with any radio or television broadcasts of any kind or nature, either live or recorded, other than the Programs hereunder or other programs for which your services may be required by us or such other programs on which you may render services with our written consent; provided that we may withhold our consent to the rendering of your services on other programs in our sole discretion and under no circumstances will you render services on any radio or television program which will be broadcast at the same time as the Programs hereunder;

(b) be connected, directly or indirectly, with any activity of any kind or nature whatsoever, or authorize the use of your name, likeness, voice or endorsement in, advertising, promoting or publicizing in any manner any product or service competitive to any product or service of any sponsor then currently sponsoring or otherwise participating in the Programs hereunder;

(c) engage in any activity which shall interfere with the performance of any of your obligations hereunder.

10. You agree that we, the sponsors, if any, and their advertising agencies, if any, and station WCBS shall have the right and may grant to others the right to disseminate, reproduce, print and publish your name, likeness, voice and biographical material as news or informative matter, and in connection with advertising and for purposes of trade; provided, however, that in no event may we, the sponsors, if any, or their advertising agencies, if any, or station WCBS use, or grant to any person the right to use, any direct endorsement by you of any product or service without your written consent. This right shall terminate with the termination of this agreement, except for any material authorized or released by us, station WCBS, the sponsors, if any, or their advertising agencies, if any, prior to the termination of this agreement. We, the sponsors, if any, and their advertising agencies, if any, and station WCBS may open all correspondence intended for you which we receive and may answer or cause to be answered any correspondence relating to the Programs.

11. The Programs hereunder may be broadcast with or without commercial announcements and we may at any time and from time to time change the number of or eliminate all such commercial announcements.

12. You agree that you will not render your services in connection with the Programs hereunder, or in connection with any substantially similar programs, for a period of six months after the cancellation or termination of this contract unless such program is broadcast over Radio Station WCBS.

13. We agree that you may take a vacation for a period not exceeding two consecutive weeks once during each year of the term of this contract at a time to be mutually determined. During each such vacation as aforesaid, we will pay you the weekly compensation provided for in Paragraph 15 hereof and you will furnish at your sole cost and expense a substitute satisfactory to us to appear for you during the period when you are on vacation. In the event of your incapacity you may, for a period not to exceed three (3) weeks during each year of the term of this contract, furnish at your sole cost and expense a substitute satisfactory to us to appear for you and we shall during said three-week period continue to pay to you the compensation provided for in paragraph 15 hereof. Should your incapacity continue for a period in excess of three (3) weeks during any one (1) year of the term of this contract, the compensation payable to you for such period in excess of three (3) weeks shall be the subject of renegotiation between us. The term "incapacity" shall mean any material, physical, mental or other disability incapacitating you from fully performing all services required to be performed by you hereunder, or any material impairment of your voice. You agree to pay such substitute furnished during your vacation or incapacity not less than the then current minimum union scales provided in our collective bargaining agreement with AFRA.

14. The term of this contract shall be for a period of five (5) years commencing January 1, 1953 subject to our right to cancel at any time by notifying you in writing on thirteen (13) weeks prior written notice to you.

You shall have the right to cancel this agreement effective at the end of any year of the term hereof by giving us at least thirteen (13) weeks prior written notice.

15. The compensation payable to you for the services to be performed by you hereunder and for the rights granted by you to us hereunder shall be $400 for each week during which the Programs are broadcast without any commercial announcements or with not more than one (1) commercial announcement. For any week during which more than one (1) commercial announcement is broadcast on the Programs we will pay to you the sum of $400 plus $6 for eachadditional announcement broadcast on the Programs, it being understood that if five (5) additional announcements shall be broadcast on any of the Programs on any day on which the period from 9:00 to 9:05 AM shall have been omitted from the Programs and sold as provided in paragraph 2 hereof, said period shall be considered the sixth announcement made on such day for the purpose of computing the compensation payable to you hereunder.

If any of the Programs hereunder are omitted or prevented for any reason whatsoever, we shall not be obligated to pay you for any commercial announcements scheduled for, and not broadcast on, said omitted or prevented program unless, at our request, you "stand by" for such program in which case we will pay you for all announcements which were scheduled to be broadcast. Any payments due you pursuant hereto shall be made not later than the Wednesday of the week following the week for which such payment is made. Payment of your compensation as provided for in this paragraph 15 shall fully discharge our obligations to you hereunder.

16. You will at all times act with due regard for public morals and conventions. If at any time you shall have done or shall do any act or thing which shall be an offense involving moral turpitude under federal, state or local laws, or which might tend to bring you into public disrepute, contempt, scandal or ridicule, or which might tend to offend the community or any organized group thereof, or which might tend to reflect unfavorably upon us, station WCBS, the sponsors, if any, or their advertising agencies, if any, or injure the success of the Programs, we shall have the right to terminate this agreement upon notice to you at any time prior to the expiration of thirty (30) days after the date on which we acquire knowledge thereof.

17. Notwithstanding any provision in this contract to the contrary, it is specifically understood and agreed by and between us that:

(a) We are each bound by all the terms and provisions of the AFRA CODE OF FAIR PRACTICE FOR COMMERCIAL BROADCASTING MINIMUM TERMS AND CONDITIONS FOR RADIO ARTISTS, but nothing in this provision shall affect terms, compensations or conditions provided for in this contract which are not covered by said Code or which are more favorable to members of AFRA than the terms, compensation and conditions provided for in said Code.

(b) You are a member of AFRA in good standing and will remain in good standing for the duration of this contract.

(c) Any controversy or claim between you and us arising out of, or relating to, the said AFRA Code or any contracts or engagements (whether over-scale or not) governed by the said Code, or the breach thereof, shall be settled by arbitration, in accordance with the rules then obtaining of the American Arbitration Association, and judgment upon the award rendered may be entered in the highest court of the forum, State or Federal, having jurisdiction. The procedure for such arbitration shall be the same as that specified in the said AFRA Code. AFRA's written consent to any arbitration requested by you must first be obtained.

This contract contains the whole agreement between us and no change or modification thereof shall be effective unless made in writing.

Very truly yours,

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.

By_____

ACCEPTED:

_____
William Leonard

EXCERPT - Proposed renewal contract for Bill Leonard

16. You will at all times act with due regard for public morals and conventions. If at any time you shall have done or shall do any act or thing which shall be an offense involving moral turpitude under federal, state or local laws, or which might tend to bring you into public disrepute, contempt, scandal or ridicule, or which might tend to offend the community or any organized group thereof, or which might tend to reflect unfavorably upon us, station WCBS, the sponsors, if any, or their advertising agencies, if any, or injure the success of the Programs, we shall have the right to terminate this agreement upon notice to you at any time prior to the expiration of thirty (30) days after the date on which we acquire knowledge thereof.

Lawrence, Jock

SUPREME HEADQUARTERS
ALLIED POWERS EUROPE

APO No 55
NEW YORK, NEW YORK

19 November 1951

Mr. Edward R. Murrow
Columbia Broadcasting System
485 Madison Avenue
New York City, N.Y.

Dear Ed:

You will remember that I talked to you about General Eisenhower's former assistant, Kevin McCann, who has taken on the difficult job of being President of Defiance College at Defiance, Ohio. You very kindly said you would try to help him in some way. Before the end of this year, if he can raise a small sum of 25,000 dollars, it would be a tremendous thing and would help him very much. Personally, and please do keep this to yourself, I have a feeling that, if he raises only that amount, we would have an opportunity to bring him back over here for temporary duty again, as General Eisenhower's Assistant.

Could you possibly telephone him at Defiance College, in Ohio? He would come on to New York and talk with you, I am sure. But just the idea of you telephoning to him would be a great help.

I would be deeply grateful, dear Ed. Of course, General Eisenhower obviously knows nothing of things like these and I would be doubly grateful if you keep it strictly on a basis where it never can be attributed wrongfully.

Sincerely,

Jock

J. B. L. LAWRENCE
Colonel, U.S. Army
Deputy for Plans & Public Affairs
Public Information Division, SHAPE

Conf. Huntley

EDWARD R. MURROW

January 7, 1955

Dear Chet:

I have delayed answering yours of December 6th hoping that I could dredge up some tangible or believable information on the subject you raise, but I regret to say I could not.

I have not, repeat not, been able to discover anything that would lead me to believe that you are "persona non grata" so far as CBS is concerned. My own impression, and merely my own, is that the whole situation was confused with Hollywood and New York offices; but I am not even sure about that. Sorry to be so unenlightening, but I have done my best.

As ever yours,

Mr. Chet Huntley
American Broadcasting Company
1539 N. Vine Street
Hollywood 28, California

rh
bc: Mr. Mickelson

Chet Huntley
American Broadcasting Co.
1539 N. Vine Street
Hollywood 28, California

Dec. 6, 1954

Dear Ed,

I have hesitated to write to you about this, for fear you might permit it to encroach upon your time and generosity. On the other hand, in view of our conversations in the past, it seemed you might be interested; and it continues to haunt me sufficiently that I would appreciate a word of counsel from you should you ever stumble upon the key to this slight confusion.

A couple months ago, CBS-TV here approached me relative to joining them. I was most unhappy with ABC-TV, anyhow; and proceeded to make myself a free agent in television. At that time there was no question raised about my commitments on ABC-radio, from which I plan, however, to extricate myself over a period of time.

However, the negotiations with CBS have been called off rather suddenly and somewhat inexplicably. From one source I am told that the "hitch" was the continuing identification with ABC radio for a time. Another source says I just simply am "persona non grata" with CBS New York!

The first explanation I find much easier to understand and adjust to than the latter reason. As you may understand, it constitutes an anxiety and source of wonderment.

Therefore, Ed, please don't make this a project; but if the truth of this should ever become apparent to you, I would certainly appreciate a clue. Not that I want to get revenge on the "culprit" but it's surely a comfort to know your friends from your enemies.....if there be some; and it could help a lot in making my future plans.

I still feel like a "you-know-what" in annoying you with this; but maybe I do so in hope of the small solace of knowing just what the hell happened.

Thanks, Ed, and again my apologies.

Sincerely,

Chet